Summary

When Regulus Black woke up in 1991 after he was supposed to die twelve years prior, he realized two things. One, the locket he had worked so hard to steal had never been destroyed so the Dark Lord was still alive. And two, Harry Potter, James Potter's son, was in danger.

OR

Regulus goes to school with the Golden Trio.

warnings for this chapter: mentions of child abuse and torture, some graphic violence, vomiting and drowning

Regulus was going to die.

Of course, he had always known that he would die one day, but it always seemed like some faraway prospect, some untouchable idea that he never bothered to contemplate. He was safe, he was capable, he was unafraid, he was an idiot. He should have known this day would come, but he was an idiot, nothing but a sheltered child.

A sheltered child no longer.

He knew his death was coming. He knew the moment that Kreacher came back and told him what happened. He knew the moment he realized what the Dark Lord was hiding. Sometimes, he thought that he knew the moment he'd let the Dark Lord brand him. However, the concept of his death didn't fully set in until he felt the first brush of cold water against his arm. He'd thought that he had accepted his death, had even felt comforted by it, but as nails began to tear at his flesh and water began to fill his lungs, he wondered if he should have fought to survive a little harder.

The Dark Lord asked to borrow his house elf only a few short but eventful months after he graduated from Hogwarts. Regulus allowed the Dark Lord to borrow Kreacher because what other choice did he have? One didn't say no to the Dark Lord unless they wanted to meet a painful end. Kreacher was missing for a long time, two full days, but when he finally returned, he was shaking and throwing up all over his feet. Regulus had never seen a house elf get ill before, especially not to the point of vomiting on the floor. It disturbed him deeply. He did his best to care for Kreacher, using his limited skill to nurse the old elf back to relative health while hiding him from his parents.

Once Kreacher was well enough to speak, Regulus asked him about what happened. He did not demand it of him but waited until Kreacher felt comfortable enough to share. He hadn't commanded Kreacher to do anything in a long time, always asking and waiting rather than forcing his actions. His mother always called him weak for that. He never knew if she was right.

He listened carefully as Kreacher described the cave, the water filled with dark creatures, and the potion he was forced to drink. Kreacher had been left there to die, discarded like a piece of rubbish. The Dark Lord hadn't known that Regulus told Kreacher to always return to him no matter the circumstances. The Dark Lord had tried to kill Kreacher, he'd nearly succeeded, and Regulus couldn't let it go.

Regulus spent the next few weeks researching the object that the Dark Lord was hiding. The Dark Lord had let it slip that it was an object of great importance, and based on Kreacher's limited description, Regulus knew the object had to be something made of exceptionally dark magic. Considering the Dark Lord had gone to such trouble to hide the item, he knew it could not be a weapon. Otherwise, the Dark Lord would have kept it nearby. It had to be something that could be kept out of reach, something that needed a permanent and safe place.

He also researched the potion Kreacher was forced to drink. He found it quickly, the Black family library had books on all kinds of dark and dangerous potions. The Emerald Potion, or the Drink of Despair, caused extreme physical pain and thirst, as well as hallucinations and fear. It caused the drinker to grow weak and powerless, though it was unclear how long these effects would last.

Regulus wasn't able to find any accounts of a person taking the potion and surviving for very long after. Kreacher was able to fight off the side effects due to his elvish nature, but a human? That part was unclear. It may cause death for everyone who drank it, for all Regulus could guess. At least it seemed like most poor souls that had taken the potion in the past died shortly after, usually by the hand of the person who made the potion — a pity killing.

Regulus tried to come to terms with the fact that the potion may very well kill him. At the very least, he tried to come to terms with the immense suffering he would have to endure to steal the object. He had never been good with pain. If he survived, it would be a long road back to health.

Once he discovered what a Horcrux was, he knew he would never make it out of that cave. The potion and the inferi, it was all meant to keep a thief there permanently. The Dark Lord wouldn't risk setting a trap that could be escaped from, not if he could control it, and Regulus wasn't one to underestimate someone so powerful. He knew he would have to go into the cave and drink the potion to steal the Horcrux, and after, he would succumb to the potion or kill himself to escape its punishment.

There was a small, shameful part of him that wanted Kreacher to drink the potion again, but he shoved that aside with all the self-hatred he could muster, a considerable amount given the last few years of his life. He thought maybe Kreacher could pull him out of the cave, but he knew from the beginning that anti-apparition wards made by the Dark Lord himself would keep him there. Not to mention that if he made it out, he would be hunted down for his betrayal. Killed, if he was lucky, but more likely tortured into insanity. His family would follow, no doubt. When the Dark Lord learned of the betrayal, his mother and cousins would be tortured and slain. And who knew where the Dark Lord would stop, who else he would go after to punish Regulus? The thought twisted in his stomach like a deadly poison. Regulus couldn't risk it. He wouldn't risk it.

In the end, it couldn't be helped. That was the thought that Regulus settled on, at least. He briefly considered contacting his brother, but it had been so long since they last spoke. That last night before Sirius escaped. Sirius would never believe him, and even if he did, Sirius thought he was beyond help, beyond saving. Of course, Sirius was right. Regulus had lost his chance at salvation a long time ago. He thought about trying to tell... well, he mostly tried not to think about trying to tell him.

There was no guarantee that either of them would even hear him out long enough for him to speak. They would probably kill him on sight these days. No, he was alone, just like he always wanted, and his death was on the horizon. It couldn't be helped.

He repeated this in his head as he walked to his death. It can't be helped, he thought as he organized his room for the last time. He wouldn't be returning, but he couldn't bear to leave a mess. It can't be helped, he thought as he wrote his final letter.

To the Dark Lord, he wrote, grateful that his hand wasn't shaking. I know I will be dead long before you read this, but I want you to know that it was I who discovered your secret. I have stolen the real Horcrux and intend to destroy it as soon as I can. I face death in the hope that when you meet your match, you will be mortal once more. - R.A.B. He wondered if the Dark Lord would even know who 'R.A.B.' was or if he would one day read the letter with nothing but confusion.

It can't be helped, he thought as Kreacher apparated him to the entrance of the cave. The cold ocean air cut through him in an instant. He hadn't worn a cloak. The warmth wouldn't save him. It can't be helped, he thought as he cut his hand and summoned the boat to take him over the water. Honestly, the Dark Lord was more dramatic than Sirius. It can't be helped, he thought as he gave Kreacher his final instruction.

"You will force me to drink the potion, then you will take the Horcrux and go." Kreacher shook his head violently, tears in his eyes. Regulus didn't like forcing Kreacher to do things, but there was no room for error here. Kreacher needed to follow through. "Tell no one what happened here tonight. Mother will ask you where I am, but you are not to tell her. Destroy the locket, please."

Kreacher made an awful choking noise. Regulus ignored it.

He took a steadying breath and drank the first sip of the potion. He was surprised by its almost pleasant taste, he expected that a potion of such torture would taste bitter, but instead, it tasted like a floral tea. It only took a few seconds before the potion's effects took hold of him. He was only able to drink one more cup of it before his hands shook too badly to do it himself. Kreacher forced the next cup down his throat.

"Please," Regulus begged against the ache in his bones. Kreacher was gone, though; in his place stood Orion, Regulus's father.

“Be thankful that you are not smart enough to disobey me,” he said. “If you disappoint me, Sirius will suffer for it.” His father spoke in the stern voice that always flooded every room with a dark cloud. His father was like smog, the way he permeated every space he entered, never screaming like his mother, but staying as a constant reminder of what he could do.

“Please, no more,” Regulus begged him. He never begged his father for anything. Once as a child, he witnessed Sirius begging for food after his mother locked him in his room for several days without it. His father slapped Sirius across the face so hard that Sirius blacked out. Regulus ran to him, but one look from his father stopped him in his tracks. He froze under that dark glare and never begged again, not that Sirius learned the same lesson. But now, he had no choice but to beg. The potion made his veins feel like they were fighting to disentangle from the rest of his body. He burned and shivered and ached and, finally, he begged. “Please.”

“You must understand,” Orion responded. “You are the heir now. You have to act a certain way. If you do not, I will make sure you never make the same mistake again. We cannot afford another misstep”

“I don’t want to be the heir,” Regulus said pitifully, choking as the potion was tipped into his mouth. “I don’t want to be head of the family. It’s Sirius, he should be the heir.”

“Do not say that name. You do not have a brother,” his mother spoke; his father had now vanished. “If I hear you mention his name one more time, you will not leave this room for the rest of the summer. He is dead to you, to all of us.” His mother was always so combative with Sirius. Not that she wasn’t combative with everyone else, including Regulus, but Sirius seemed to spark a unique form of hatred from within her.

“I’m sorry,” Regulus said hoping she would leave him be. Sometimes she would follow through on threats even if he didn’t do anything else wrong.

“Anything the Dark Lord asks from you, you must give him. Do you understand?” his mother asked, forcing another cup of potion into his mouth. Regulus sputtered at first but eventually managed to swallow it. “Anything.” Regulus felt bile rise in his throat. The look in her eye when she spoke was so demented that Regulus felt like he was being skinned alive.

“Please, brother,” Regulus begged. His mouth was so dry, his voice croaking painfully when he tried to speak. Sirius had to understand, that he was trying to do the right thing, he was trying to fix it.

“James is my brother,” Sirius said, a look of pure rage marring his face. “You are nothing to me. Nothing but a waste of my time.” Regulus could feel hot tears against his cheeks.

“Please, no,” Regulus begged. “It’s me, I’m your brother. Please, Sirius. I’m sorry.”

“I can’t even look at you,” James spoke, his voice low with betrayal and hurt, his eyes both glassy and hard, resolute.

“No,” Regulus said weakly. Not James, please, not James.

“I loved you, Regulus. How could you do this?” Regulus felt like those words had once been spoken with great sorrow, but now they were said with anger, with hatred. Loved, past tense, the worst word in the English language.

“It’s not enough, Regulus,” James said fiercely. “You’re not enough, not anymore.” Regulus didn’t want to hear anymore and the potion had stopped coming. James was gone then, and Regulus was alone. Thankfully and horribly alone. He was so thirsty, desperate for water. He crawled and crawled, dragging himself along the stone floor.

But the water brought only pain. Dead hands began to claw at his skin, dragging his drained body deep into the depths of darkness. The scratches along his cheeks and into his eyes caused him to scream out, but he heard nothing. Water filled his lungs, a painful burn that destroyed him from the inside out. In his final moment of clarity, he wished he had fought harder, that he had run away with Sirius, that he had stood up to his parents, that he hadn’t taken the mark, that he had let James save him.

He woke to the feeling of nausea rolling through him, his body shivering against the cold. He dragged himself along the dark rocks, the room black and empty. He barely moved before he was forced to vomit up what tasted like water, blood, and bile. He was frozen, his body drenched in icy water, and his muscles throbbing painfully. He collapsed on the rocks, thankfully not in his own vomit, and let the exhaustion take him for a while.

He didn’t know where he was or what was going on. He tried to think about what he was doing before this, but the only thing he could remember was pain, fear, and water. He drifted in darkness, but he couldn’t tell if his eyes were open or closed. He kept trying to open them, to find out where he was, but it was only black that greeted him.

“Kreacher,” he tried to say. His voice was scratchy, and it hurt to speak, but he needed help. “Kreacher,” he said a little louder. “Kreacher, help me.”

He could feel the exhaustion claiming him once again. He surrendered to it, desperate for a moment of respite from the torture he was experiencing. The last thing he heard was a shaky voice saying “Master Regulus” right into his ear.

The next time Regulus opened his eyes, he was at home in his bed. He had never felt so grateful to wake up at Grimmauld. He often felt claustrophobic in the house after Sirius left, though he kept that specific opinion to himself rather than risk punishment. However, at that moment, there was nowhere he would rather have been than at home. He tried to move, to sit up, but his body rebelled against him. He was made of pain.

“Kreacher,” he called and was shocked to hear the voice that came out. It was more high-pitched than he expected, too high-pitched. “What?” He spoke again. Why did he sound like that? He tried to recall what he was doing before he went to bed, but his memories were fuzzy like he was trying to access a dream, the harder he tried to remember, the more the memories slipped away.

Before he had too much time to spiral, there was a popping sound, and Kreacher appeared next to him. Kreacher looked old, older than the last time Regulus had seen him, more tired and worn out perhaps. He had always been a wrinkly thing, old by the time Regulus was born, but now he looked like age had eaten away at him. Like the very act of living was too much for his small body.

“Will you bring me a pain relief potion?” Regulus asked. He cringed at the high-pitched voice that came out of him, but for the moment his physical pain took priority. Kreacher popped away and popped back a second later with a small vial. Regulus gulped it down quickly, already feeling the potion work to soothe his stressed muscles. With the painful cloud clearing in his head, he finally had a chance to wonder about what was going on. “What happened?” he asked.

These seemed to be the magic words to break Kreacher because the moment Regulus asked, Kreacher broke down in tears. He was blubbing and shivering violently, his small hands gripping onto Regulus’s arm as he stood at his bedside. Regulus thought he caught the words “poison” and “locket” and “dead,” but it was hard to make out through all the crying.

“Kreacher, calm yourself and tell me —” Regulus cut himself off as the memories of the cave flooded back into him. The Horcrux, the potion, the pain, his father, his mother, Sirius, James, the thirst, the water, the hands, it all came back in a flash and Regulus suddenly understood why Kreacher was so upset. “How am I alive?”

“Master Regulus told Kreacher to leave him behind, but then he called Kreacher back. Kreacher listened to Master Regulus,” Kreacher said around a few more sobs. Kreacher was clearly distraught. Regulus knew he would be, being forced to leave his master to die could not have been easy.

“How? I didn’t think that you could apparate me out of the cave,” Regulus said.

“Kreacher could not apparate an adult,” Kreacher answered and gave Regulus an indecipherable look. Yes, Regulus was young, only eighteen when he went into the cave, but he was still an adult. Yet the look Kreacher was giving him made him wonder if maybe there was something he wasn’t being told.

“What?” Regulus asked, his brain still working too slowly to form a full response.

“What do you mean, Kreacher?” Regulus reached his hands up to feel his face. He remembered the feeling of the claws against his eyes and the skin of his face, but he didn’t find wounds beneath his fingertips. His skin was soft and unmarked.

“Master Regulus must look at himself.” Regulus sat up immediately, thankful that the pain relief potion had done its job so that he could move freely. He jumped out of bed and made his way into his bathroom. The moment he looked in the mirror he understood what was wrong.

He was much shorter than expected for one, though that was hardly the most pressing issue. He was young, far younger than he should be, maybe ten or eleven. It was hard to gauge exactly. He had always been small for his age, much shorter than his classmates and Sirius; he hadn’t hit a growth spurt until the age of fifteen.

“Kreacher, I don’t understand,” Regulus whispered, touching his face in wonder. His tiny fingers brushed against his skin. He looked down at his hands in wonder and confusion.

“Kreacher does not know, Master Regulus. Master Regulus has been gone for a long time.” Regulus whipped his head around to look at the elf, who was rubbing his hands together anxiously, the way he did when Regulus would ask Kreacher to disobey something his mother had explicitly told him to do. It wasn’t something he had seen Kreacher do in a long time and it immediately put Regulus on edge.

“How long have I been gone?” Regulus asked. Kreacher gave him a long look before answering.

“Kreacher left Master Regulus twelve years ago.” Regulus suddenly felt very disconnected from his body. Twelve years. He had been in that cave for twelve years, and he came back as a child? None of it made sense. He felt his knees buckle below him, but he barely registered it, falling to the floor and curling up in a tight ball. How was this even possible? How could he have survived at all? Was this some bizarre afterlife? It felt so real, but he wondered if this was a punishment or perhaps a hallucination right before he succumbed to death.

Kreacher forced a calming draught down his throat, and it was only then that Regulus noticed that he was having a panic attack, his breathing dangerously close to hyperventilation. Regulus had a lot of them the year following his break up with James, and Kreacher had become exceptionally equipped to help. Once he drank the potion, he slowly began to feel normal again. The sound of Kreacher saying ‘twelve years’ kept playing over and over again in his head.

What must everyone think? Surely, he was declared dead after he went into the cave. He expected that to happen, the family trees would update by magic, but did they ever update if he came back to life? Did they look for him? Did the Dark Lord ever discover how he died or why he went missing? What became of them all? And most importantly, what became of the Horcrux?

“The locket?” he asked first, trying to limit the scope of how much he didn’t know. Kreacher immediately burst into tears again, sobbing uncontrollably.

“Kreacher tried to destroy it, Master Regulus. He tried everything he could think of, but it could not be destroyed.” His words were difficult to understand through the painful crying.

“Where is it?” Regulus asked distantly once Kreacher had stopped wailing.

“Kreacher has kept it safe, Master Regulus. Kreacher has hidden it.” So if the locket was not destroyed, that meant that the Dark Lord was most likely still alive. Like a knee-jerk reaction, Regulus shoved up the sleeve of his shirt, a pajama shirt he noted, though he had no memory of dressing himself in it, and found nothing but smooth, unblemished skin. He hadn’t been marked. Of course, he wasn’t. He didn’t receive the mark until he was sixteen.

“Kreacher, I need to know what has happened since I left.” There was so much he didn’t know. What became of his mother? Did the Dark Lord target his family after he was gone? What happened to everyone else? Were they still fighting against him? Was Sirius? Was James?

James. What had James thought when Regulus disappeared? Did he mourn him? Unlikely, a snide voice said in his head. He probably felt relieved, if he even thought of Regulus at all. Would he be surprised to find out that Regulus was still alive? Regulus forced the thoughts away; he had no way of knowing yet, and the questions were doing his head in. Kreacher looked just as overwhelmed as Regulus felt.

“Is Mother here?” he asked. It seemed a more pressing question than whether the Dark Lord had looked for him. Surely, he wouldn’t know that Regulus just reappeared, unless his mother had contacted him.

“Mistress died many years ago. Kreacher tried to help her, but she was sick once Master Regulus disappeared.” So his mother was dead. He was surprised that he felt no sadness. Yes, his mother was a monster in many ways, but she was still his mother. Yet all Regulus felt was relief that she was gone. The thought that she grew sick after he disappeared was surprising to Regulus. It was likely that the death of her last heir brought too much shame for her. He doubted it was because she cared about him. He had given up that notion a long time ago. A foolish boyhood hope that his mother might love him as a mother should.

“Who owns this house then?” he asked. He tried not to think about it before but now it seemed pressing. He was unsure of who would take his place as heir after his death.

“Sirius?” His brother was restored as heir? Had his mother been that desperate? Surely there were others in line behind him. He wondered what his brother thought when he disappeared. He must have found it hilarious when Regulus’s death led to his reinstatement to the family. Though Sirius was always quick to shed the weight of the Black family from his shoulders, Regulus always did wonder if he would regret it one day. Turns out that Sirius never needed to behave, or fall in line — Regulus only needed to die.

“Locked away?” Regulus asked, his eyebrows furrowed. He didn’t like to think about Bellatrix, especially Kreacher’s love for her.

“In Azkaban, Master Regulus.” Kreacher sounded regretful and sad while saying it, but Regulus was sure that sadness only extended to his cousin, not his brother.

“Bellatrix is in Azkaban? Sirius is in Azkaban?” Regulus could hear his voice rising in panic again, but the calming draught seemed to ground him enough to keep going. “Why? What happened?”

“Kreacher does not know. Filthy blood traitor returned to the Dark Lord, Mistress said.” His brother had turned sides? When and how did that happen? His brother had spent so much of his life opposing everything the Dark Lord stood for, and then he went to work for him? Was he forced? Or perhaps imperiused or tortured into it? Was the draw of reclaiming his position in the family enough to sway Sirius?

“When did this happen?” Regulus asked, his voice taking on a nervous, anxious tone despite the calming draught.

“Many years ago, Master Regulus.” This seemed to be Kreacher’s designated answer. Regulus wondered how long the house elf had been alone in Grimmauld and how long it had been since Kreacher had spoken to another living being. Regulus put that aside for the time being, there were more pressing matters.

“The Dark Lord was destroyed.” After that, Regulus lost the plot again. It took him far longer than was proper to return to any kind of coherent thought, and by that point, Kreacher seemed too fearful to answer any other questions Regulus had. In the end, Regulus requested that Kreacher bring him every copy of the Prophet that they still had in the house, which ended up being just about every single one published up until the death of his mother.

It was reading through those that made Regulus wish he had never crawled out of that cave. The Dark Lord had targeted James’s son and had gone to their house based on information given by Sirius. Sirius, who was James’s best friend. Sirius, who called James his brother. The Dark Lord killed them, James and Lily, but he could not manage to kill their son. The Boy Who Lived, they coined him. James was dead, his James was dead. Or not his James, he corrected. Lily’s James. He thought of the last conversation he had with James, that night in the Astronomy Tower when Regulus confided in him about the cowardly choice he’d made, when Regulus showed him the mark branding him for life, and James had yelled at him for the first and only time. He thought of the look in James’s eyes as he broke Regulus into tiny, little pieces.

James went to Lily after, which Regulus knew was coming. James had always been infatuated with Lily, and once he was free from Regulus, the two of them came together, as they were always meant to. Regulus remembered watching them from afar, his heart falling into the soles of his feet as he watched James kiss Lily’s cheek or watch Lily laugh brightly at something James whispered in his ear. He knew they had gotten married, that happened before he went to the cave, but he didn’t know they had a child, a son. Harry.

A son who apparently destroyed the Dark Lord, at least temporarily. There was no way that he was truly gone, not if the locket still existed. Regulus found it later in the house. It was cold to the touch, so cold that it almost burnt his skin, and the first moment he held it, he could hear James yelling again. He put it back in the parlor eventually, deciding to keep his distance until he knew what to do with it.

It took almost a week for him to recover from the cave. Constantly reading up on what happened after he disappeared definitely prolonged his recovery. Reading about Sirius's betrayal was the worst of it all, somehow worse than discovering that James was dead. Sirius had betrayed them, then attacked his friend, Peter Pettigrew, killing him and twelve muggles in the process. He stared at the picture of Sirius's manic laughing face for what felt like hours.

How could he have done that? The Sirius that Regulus knew would never have betrayed them. He felt sick to his stomach every time he thought about it, and then, eventually, he felt rage. It was easier to feel rage than it was to feel the wretched desolation that came with knowing that, in the end, Sirius was just as bad as everyone else in their family. He wanted to strangle his brother. How dare he kill James? It was nearly too much to handle, Regulus felt like he was drowning in the anger.

Some moments he would start drowning in denial. Not Sirius, he couldn't. He wouldn't. But then who else? He would picture Sirius, his moving photo in the Daily Prophet. His brother had gone mad. That was the only explanation. In his moments of rage, he wished that he had never helped him escape. He should have let his mother kill him. Everything he thought about his brother, or about James, he felt like he disconnected even further from himself. He struggled to believe that he was alive, and not just a ghost who'd returned in his childhood form. He didn't leave his bed for a few weeks after his first meltdown. He felt weak and, admittedly, afraid of what the outside world held. He was just lucky that Kreacher was there to take care of him, otherwise he would have rotted like the corpse he was.

Eventually, as the days dragged by, he realized that he needed to put his feelings about everything aside if he wanted to move forward. He couldn't continue on as he had. He used his well-honed Occlumency skills to build up a wall between himself and what Sirius had done, a wall between himself and James's death, a wall between himself and the life he'd sacrificed needlessly.

He needed to focus. The Dark Lord was still out there somewhere, the locket still existed, and he needed to destroy it. And if what he had read was any indication, then James's son, Harry, was in danger. At first, he wondered if perhaps Harry had died later, at some point after his mother's death, but when he had Kreacher go out to get the most recent Prophet, he knew Harry was still alive. It was front-page news that the Boy Who Lived would be attending Hogwarts that year. It was this information that helped Regulus create a plan. He had no idea why he had survived the cave and even less of an idea of why he suddenly looked like he was eleven years old, but regardless, he intended to use it to his advantage.

The Dark Lord must still be in hiding. It seemed his body was destroyed when he tried to kill Harry, and without the locket, Regulus wasn't sure that he could be properly revived. Regulus needed to kill him.

The first time he left his room was a full three weeks after he woke up in bed. The house was dusty and dark. Though it had always been a dark place, the dust and dankness were new. He wondered why Kreacher had allowed it to fall into disarray, but decided not to mention it. It was clear that the decade had been very hard on the house elf, and Regulus had no desire to make that worse. His deceased mother's portrait on the wall was the biggest shock though. She spotted Regulus as he was coming down the stairs.

"Regulus?" She asked, her voice filled with shock and awe.

"Mother," Regulus greeted politely. He was still dressed in his pajamas, he remembered his mother once locking him in his room for a full day because he left it without dressing like a proper pureblood. She didn't seem to notice now though.

"You're alive," she said with a sharp smile. "I should have known. My only son. You look so different from the last time I saw you." Regulus felt unease creeping up his back, he desperately wanted the conversation to end. "Oh, how I've missed you, Regulus."

Regulus forgot all his pureblood training at that moment. His mother had never been kind, even in a false way to lead someone into a trap like most Slytherins would. She would never have said she missed Regulus, even if she was alive to witness his miraculous reanimation. Regulus couldn't stand another moment in her presence. He left as quickly as possible.

"Regulus," his mother called. "Regulus, please come back dear." Regulus had to suppress a shiver as he made his way into the kitchen. He wondered when she had the portrait made.

Portraits were only a reflection of who a person was when they were living and even that was limited. When a magical portrait was brought to life, the person painted would be made up of what the painter knew about them. The more people who painted and animated the same person, the more accurate the portrait versions became. But if only one painter cast the spell, then that person's portrait would be limited to only what one painter knew. It was clear that his mother was limited in this way. Even those who claimed to like her when she was alive would not have described her in the way she was presented in her portrait. He wondered how she would act in the presence of someone other than him.

The first time he left the house was on a trip to Gringotts. He didn't have any real clothes that fit him, but Kreacher had saved his wand and thankfully, it still worked, so he transfigured himself an outfit out of one of his old robes, shrinking it down to size. He was surprised that his room and clothing remained clean despite the dishevelment the rest of the house was experiencing. He wondered if Kreacher had cleaned all his things when he came back or if Kreacher had kept them clean in the intervening years like a person worshipping at a shrine. Regulus didn't ask — he wasn't sure he wanted to know — he only dressed and ventured out of the house.

He'd come to the conclusion that attending Hogwarts was the only way to protect Harry. If he was going to protect the boy, then he needed to be where Harry was. Not to mention that outside of Hogwarts, he looked like an unsupervised child. He wouldn't be of much use in the wizarding world, not yet. He didn't think that he would show up in the registry again, which meant he had to work out a way to get an acceptance letter. The solution to this problem was brought up to him by Kreacher.

Kreacher told him that he was still part of the family magic, as Kreacher was still compelled to obey him. It was the only reason that Kreacher was able to hear his call in the cave. However, Kreacher told him that he had been removed as heir and may or may not have access to the family vaults and property. The goblins, Regulus knew, were some of the best beings to deal with unusual magic, often having experience that wizards could not even fathom. Regulus's first task was to make his way to Gringotts to add himself back to the family.

"Hello, I need to speak to the goblin in charge of the Black family vaults," Regulus said, his small voice sounding comical to his ears as he attempted to speak with authority.

"And who are you?" the goblin asked, leaning menacingly over the counter. The goblins had fascinated Regulus as a child, he often asked to visit Gringotts with his parents whenever they went just so he could watch the creatures. Now they just intimidated him.

"I am Regulus Black," he responded. After that, the goblins seemed to spring into action. He decided to trust the head goblin in charge with his near-death experience, leaving out anything to do with the Dark Lord or his locket, but explaining how he had disappeared for twelve years, coming back in the body of a child. The goblin wouldn't share his secret. Goblins hoarded secrets more intensely than they guarded wealth.

The goblin was stoic throughout Regulus's explanation but Regulus wasn't surprised by this. Growing up in the family that he did, Regulus expected others to hold their emotions and information close to the chest. If anything, it made it easier for Regulus to confess the bizarre order of events that led him to seek help at Gringotts.

"I need to find a way to attend Hogwarts a second time," Regulus said finally.

"It may be possible," the goblin answered. For a price was left unsaid. Regulus would need the goblins to help fabricate records of his existence, lying to the Ministry and Hogwarts. It was a difficult thing to manage and it would not come cheap.

"How?" Regulus asked, brushing passed the insinuation. If he had access to the family vaults, then he would have no problem paying them.

"You would need to be someone other than you were," the goblin responded simply like he was answering a riddle.

"Yes, that is obvious. But who?" Regulus asked, trying his best to keep his small voice even.

"Perhaps the child of someone in your family? Someone that others could not question?" The goblin had a particular glint in his eyes that Regulus had only seen when someone he knew had just come up with a dangerous scheme. It reminded him of Sirius when he was still young before he left for Hogwarts.

Oh no. The realization of what the goblin was implying was unpleasant at best, and downright horrid at worst.

“He is unreachable in Azkaban, and he is the head of House Black,” the goblin argued before Regulus could even respond.

“You want me to pretend to be my brother’s bastard child?” Regulus asked incredulously.

“I do not want anything, but you will need an identity in order to get a letter from Hogwarts,” the goblin answered. “And seeing as Regulus Black II has already graduated, it will have to be someone else. They will know who you are related to regardless of your relations.”

Regulus sighed deeply. His brother, the one who left him in that rotten, claustrophobic house, the one who disowned Regulus as his brother and replaced him with James, the one who betrayed James and led him to his death.

So Regulus left Gringotts that day not as Regulus Black II, born to Orion and Walburga Black in July of 1961, but as Regulus Black III, born to Sirius Black in July of 1980. He felt ridiculous pretending to be the son of his brother, but it did provide him with the perfect cover for who he was. By the time he woke up the next day, he had his acceptance letter in hand for Hogwarts School of Witchcraft and Wizardry.

Regulus got access to the Black vaults after he met with the goblins, so he could purchase new school supplies the next day. It felt a little strange to be re-buying books that he had already read and studied. He was glad that Kreacher had taken his wand before he died. He thought that maybe he'd given it to him in his final moments, but he couldn't be sure. Regardless, he was happy that he still had his old one. He didn't think visiting the odd fellow Ollivander would be very fun in his new form.

Revisiting Diagon Alley at all was surreal. He watched as small children — children who now looked his age, he supposed — ran around, trailing after their parents and guardians. Regulus knew he stood out, dressed in immaculate robes and walking all alone. He tried to speak to as few people as possible, but he could feel their curious eyes on him.

He purchased his supplies quickly, pausing only for a bit to linger in front of the Magical Menagerie, staring in as children and teens of varying ages talked excitedly with their parents about what pet they were going to get to bring to Hogwarts.

“Are you going in?” a woman asked him, pointing to the shop.

“Oh, no,” Regulus said politely. “Sorry.” She gave him an odd look but stepped around him to enter. It took him a few minutes to realize the look was pity. He wondered if his look of longing was a little too obvious.

Regulus had never been allowed a pet at school, even an owl. His father had always said that he didn't want to risk his children getting attached to a creature. He couldn't deny that he would have been very attached to any pet given to him. He'd always been a bit soft. He almost wanted to get one now, but he decided against it. Perhaps one day in the future, but not this time around. He looked once more at the regal owls perched in the window before heading off back to Grimmauld.

He knew he would have to be careful not to draw too much attention to himself in classes. Most of the spells and potions he learned during first year he could do wandlessly and wordlessly at this point. He had years of practice, and if he wasn't careful, he would stand out too much in classes. He needed to pretend to struggle with spells so that he would blend in with his peers, otherwise, someone might become suspicious. He wasn't worried about the other students, eleven-year-olds were hardly the most observant bunch, but the professors — especially the professors he had already been in class with — could put him at risk of discovery.

He purchased a new trunk, worried that his old one would draw unwanted attention. His old one had had a huge painting of the Black family crest on the side, his initials branded into the front. It was ostentatious, meant to assert his wealth among his fellow students. Though his initials hadn't changed this time around, he still didn't want one that held such value.

He packed the trunk himself, Kreacher lingering in the room and watching him resentfully. It was customary for house elves to do that kind of task, and clearly, Kreacher felt robbed that Regulus wasn't letting him participate.

"I just want to make sure I have everything," Regulus said by way of explanation.

"Kreacher can make sure that Master Regulus has his supplies," Kreacher said unhappily.

"I know that," Regulus said with a quiet sigh. "I promise I'll let you do it next time." Kreacher seemed displeased with the excuse, but he didn't say anything. He was far too proper for that.

He apparated himself to King's Cross bright and early on the morning of the first of September, realizing only after that perhaps he shouldn't be openly using magic as an underage wizard, especially something that required a license. He resolved to be more careful.

Even though he was now registered for Hogwarts, it thankfully didn't seem like the trace had been reactivated. He had tried it out the moment he received his Hogwarts letter, only a few days after his visit to Gringotts. The wards on Grimmauld were so thick with magic that anything he did inside the house, even when he was underage, would never have been picked up by the trace, so he walked out into the street and tried casting a simple lumos. There was no reaction, though Regulus wasn't surprised. He wondered if the magic of the trace would even work on him or if it would recognize him as an adult rather than a child. Regardless, he could use his magic freely, but other adult wizards would grow suspicious if they saw an eleven-year-old apparating on his own.

He arrived very early for the train and quickly found an empty cabin, casting a subtle Notice Me Not Charm on the door. He wasn't interested in interacting with anyone on the way there. He knew he needed to find and befriend Harry Potter, at least befriend him enough that he could watch out for him, but he didn't feel like that was pressing enough for him to find Harry on the train. The last thing he wanted to do was overwhelm him and scare him off. Not to mention that he was a bit nervous about meeting James's son.

He tried to do as much research as possible on the child, but the information available was very limited. It seemed like he had been raised with muggle relatives, Lily's no doubt. After James's parents passed, he had no other living family. But beyond that small tidbit, Regulus knew very little about Harry Potter.

He was a mystery to the wizarding world, no doubt only increasing the awe and worship he inspired from people. He wondered how a child would handle that kind of fame and admiration. He thought of the way James and Sirius would relish in the applause of others, the way they sought out the spotlight, always drawing attention to themselves. Regulus expected Harry would be similar to that, though Lily was always understated, keeping to herself most of the time except when she was yelling at James and his friends. She seemed very pragmatic, at least that's what Regulus thought based on his limited awareness of her. Perhaps Harry would be the same.

So, he did not plan on introducing himself on the train, he felt that that would come off as too desperate. Harry might feel hunted if Regulus sought him out too early. Not to mention, he did not want to have to interact with any other children who might question who he was, or any children on the train at all if it could be helped. The Black family name was very well known in the wizarding world, and if he ran into any purebloods, they would have questions about who Regulus was and where he came from. He decided that he wanted to limit the queries until he arrived safely at Hogwarts.

He was worried about the professors recognizing him once he was there but was hopeful that the Black genes would outweigh any questions they might have. He and his brother looked very similar when they were growing up, nearly identical except for Sirius's height advantage and long hair, so it wasn't completely unreasonable to assume that Sirius's son would look the same. He hoped that would be enough to dissuade them from questioning his identity. He did his best to grow out his hair a bit in the month before school began. When Regulus started his first year during his first life, he had very short, cropped hair, far shorter than he ever wore it after that year, so he aimed to hide in plain sight by trying to appear more like Sirius.

He had invented a backstory for himself in the weeks leading up to September. He decided that he would tell people he was the child of Sirius and a French witch named Seraphine Bissett. His 'father' was never in the picture, and Regulus was raised by his 'mother' in France. Regulus, like all members of the Black family, spoke fluent French so it seemed like a likely enough story. He didn't expect anyone to go beyond this limited explanation; he would tell them he just returned to England a few months ago, which was why no one knew of him. It was enough for now.

He watched the hoards of children flutter around with their parents, saying goodbye and piling into the train. He didn't recognize anyone at first, not that he expected to. It was only when he saw his cousin, Narcissa, that he remembered she had a son. Narcissa had married Lucius when Regulus was in his third year and he knew they were trying for a child. He had seen the name Draco Lucius Malfoy on the Black family tapestry shortly after he came back, but it hadn't registered to him that this child would also be at school with him.

This added a slight complication, as Narcissa would no doubt recognize him, but he hoped that he could avoid running into her. She had been his favorite cousin growing up. Andromeda, before she was disowned, had always loved Sirius, the two of them were always thick as thieves. Bellatrix was a difficult person, even in childhood, and Regulus spent most of his time around her, worried that she would attack him. Narcissa seemed cold to some, overly proper perhaps, but with Regulus, she was soft and kind. He always loved her. He wondered idly how Narcissa had reacted to his death, though he didn't dwell on the morbid thought.

It wasn't long after he saw her that the train was pulling away from the station. It hadn't been that long since Regulus rode the Hogwarts Express, but to him, it felt like years and years had passed. He supposed that it had, considering that it was 1991. But really, so much had changed since Regulus boarded the train for his seventh year.

For one thing, he wasn't a marked Death Eater any longer. He remembered the train ride back to school after he was marked, the Dark Mark still burning on his skin, the ache of shame still weaving throughout his thoughts. He wasn't as weighed down by the expectations of his parents or burdened by the abandonment of his brother and James now either as he had been on the train before seventh year, the only year where Sirius and James had already graduated.

Of course, some things had not changed. He still felt an enormous responsibility, though now it was self-imposed. His goal to kill the Dark Lord for good weighed heavy on his thoughts. He knew it was dangerous, but he figured that, at this point, he had nothing to lose. He had already died once trying to kill him, what was one more time? He no longer had any family to protect from the Dark Lord's vengeance, as he had in 1979. Perhaps he would have worried about Narcissa, but so much time had passed that he doubted she would be made to pay the price for his betrayal, especially considering her loyalty to her husband Lucius. Lucius had managed to slither out from under the conviction other Death Eaters had gotten, arguing that he was imperiused and forced to serve. The Dark Lord would take revenge on him regardless of Regulus's choices.

Nor did he have to worry about the safety of James, who was already long dead, though Regulus did his best not to think about that fact. Sirius had sided with the Dark Lord in the end, so Regulus couldn't care less what became of him. No, he was free to find and kill the Dark Lord in a way he had never been in his first life.

He wasn't sure why he had been given this second chance, but he did not intend to waste it on anything except the Dark Lord's destruction. He knew there was a high probability that he would fail or possibly die in the process, but as he kept reminding himself, he had nothing holding him back anymore. He was already living on borrowed time, and he had no qualms about losing his life. He had already done it once, and he could surely do it again.

The world outside the train passed quickly and before he knew it, Regulus was arriving at the station in Hogsmeade and getting out to convene with the other first years. He nearly walked over to the carriages with the older students but managed to catch himself at the last minute. He loaded into a boat with three students he was sure he didn't recognize and listened as they chatted with each other excitedly, but he did not engage. Instead, he sat back and watched as Hogwarts came into view across the black lake.

The first time he had made this journey he had been filled with anxiety and dread, worried about his sorting, whether he would end up in Slytherin and make his mother and father proud, but isolate his brother or whether he would be sorted somewhere else and face the same abuse that his brother endured over the summer. Now though, he found that it was like looking at Hogwarts as the fortress that it was.

Hogwarts had been a refuge when he was a child, a way to escape his parents even for a little bit. He never rebelled like his brother did, but he did feel like he could breathe easier when he was there. It was different this time around, but the feeling of refuge was still there. Harry would be protected at Hogwarts, at least better protected than he would be with his muggle relatives who were defenseless against magic. Who knew how he had survived this long? All Regulus had to do was make sure he stayed that way.

He stood around with the other first years waiting for Professor McGonagall to return and bring them into the Great Hall. He overheard a few students discussing how they might be sorted, and he could practically taste the nervous energy building in the air. Entering the Great Hall for the first time was surreal, his chest tightening uncomfortably as some indecipherable emotion flooded through him. He listened as the other children around him gasped in amazement, their experiences unmarred by their past. Regulus kept his head down the entire walk up to the front, trying his best not to draw attention to himself from the staff and the older students.

The Sorting Hat sang a long song about the houses before the sorting began. It was much more tedious when he was anxious to get the sorting done with. It was like his first life all over again. He was sure he didn't hear a single word of the song the night he was first sorted, too focused on the uncertainty in his head to hear it. Honestly, Regulus had completely forgotten about the singing, but it was interesting to hear that it hadn't changed.

McGonagall stood tall before them, a list of students written out on parchment before her. She had the same stern look that she always had but with a few more wrinkles. He wondered if the years had been hard for her. He never spoke to her much during his first life, only interacting when he went to classes. He wondered if she would recognize him.

"When I call your name, you will put on the hat and sit on the stool to be sorted. Abbott, Hannah!" McGonagall said. One of the girls who had been on the boat with him stepped forward. She looked nervous, anxiously gnawing at her lower lip, but she didn't hesitate.

The Hat was only on her a moment before it shouted, "Hufflepuff."

She jumped off the stool with an excited smile, prancing over to the Hufflepuff table, where she was greeted by her new housemates.

"Black, Regulus!" She didn't falter when she said his name, but he noticed the double take she did when she glanced down at him. Her eyebrows furrowed just as whispers erupted around them. He wondered if it was other purebloods wondering who he was. Most of them would know of his family. He tried to ignore them, but it was hard to miss the curious look he caught from Headmaster Dumbledore.

Regulus lifted his chin proudly, letting the whispers roll off his back the way Sirius might. He walked to the front confidently and sat down on the stool, McGonagall immediately placing the Hat on his head.

"Regulus Black," the Hat said as it fell over his eyes. "Back again, I see. It is uncommon that I get the opportunity to sort a child twice."

"Uncommon, but not unheard of?" Regulus asked.

"It has been known to happen," the Hat said evasively. Regulus's interest was piqued. "Now, let's see. I sorted you into Slytherin last time. An easy choice, you not only belonged there but practically begged for the placement. But now..."

Regulus waited patiently, his stomach twisting at the memory of him begging for Slytherin. He remembered his first sorting well, especially how terrified he was of being sorted anywhere but Slytherin. He knew his brother would react poorly, but Regulus had never been able to disobey his parents, too afraid of what they might do to him. Growing up as the spare, he was always disposable, and he worried what his parents might do if he went against their wishes. Sirius had called him out for it immediately, ignoring him for two full days after the sorting, only to eventually corner Regulus and accuse him of purposefully betraying him.

Regulus had denied it, yelling at his brother, but the shame of the truth always stuck with him.

It wasn't terribly important where he was sorted this time around. He didn't know where Harry Potter might end up, though probably Gryffindor if his parents' houses gave any indication, but Regulus felt confident that he could get to know the boy regardless of his placement. It was odd now to be so unbothered by the sorting, but there was no one left who cared what happened to him. Regulus Black was dead, this new version was all alone in the world. If the Hat didn't sort him into Slytherin, then it hardly mattered where else he ended up.

"You no longer belong in Slytherin, I do not believe it would suit you well," the Hat pondered. Regulus agreed though he still remained silent. He was never a very good Slytherin anyway. "You have a good mind. Last time I briefly considered putting you in Ravenclaw. But no, your bravery is what I see now. Bravery will serve you well, Regulus Black, and you need a place to cultivate it." This was a surprise to Regulus, of all the options, the one he least expected was Gryffindor. He did not consider himself brave. This didn't stop the Hat, though. "Better be... GRYFFINDOR!"

There were some gasps around the room and a few moments' pause before cheering erupted from the Gryffindor table. Regulus took the Hat off and noticed a few curious faces in the crowd, but he rushed off to the table as quickly as he could. He sat down and briefly acknowledged a few older students, not even taking in the names that were spoken to him, before glancing back up at the front of the room.

It was only then that he noticed the stricken look on Professor McGonagall's face. He wondered if she was thinking of Sirius and his noteworthy sorting into Gryffindor. He knew she had a difficult relationship with Sirius and his friends, but he thought she always had a soft spot for them. Was she thinking about Sirius's betrayal? Did it haunt her the way it was haunting him? He looked away quickly, unwilling to stare back at her as openly as she was looking at him.

He watched with mild interest as the other students were sorted. Draco Malfoy, Narcissa's son, was sorted into Slytherin the moment the Hat touched his head, no surprise there. When Harry Potter's name was called, the entire Great Hall dropped into silence in anticipation. It seemed to take longer than expected for him to be sorted.

Regulus thought he might be arguing with the Hat, but it was hard to be sure with the way it fell over most of his face. When it finally shouted Gryffindor, the table seemed to erupt in shouts and cheers so loud that Regulus thought he might lose his hearing. Harry Potter was greeted with handshakes from every student that could reach him, and to Regulus's surprise, he seemed deeply uncomfortable with the attention. That was interesting. James had always thrived on attention, the very definition of an extrovert. Regulus wondered if perhaps Harry got more of Lily's personality, rather than James's.

Harry must have noticed Regulus watching him because he gave him a very shy smile and looked away quickly. He looked so much like James that, for a moment, Regulus felt like he couldn't breathe. He tried his best to shove away the memories that threatened to drown him, but his chest remained tight for the remainder of dinner.

The rest of the sorting was uneventful and Regulus barely spoke to anyone as he waited for it to be finished. He looked at the professor's table, trying to see which ones were new and which ones he recognized. He had not been expecting to see Severus Snape staring at him with a burning intensity. Regulus had not realized that Snape would be teaching at Hogwarts. If Regulus had to guess, he would have expected Snape to be dead before he expected him to teach children. Not to mention that Snape was a Death Eater. How did a Death Eater manage to not only escape a prison sentence but also land a job as a professor at Hogwarts?

Yet there he sat, eyes glued to Regulus like he was a riddle Snape must solve on pain of death. This complicated things a bit. Regulus hadn't known Snape very well in school, they certainly hadn't been friends, but Snape would still likely recognize him. Even if he didn't, Snape vehemently hated Sirius, so Regulus did not expect to be treated well by the professor when he realized that Regulus was Sirius's son.

"Ouch!" Regulus heard Harry say suddenly. He looked over and noticed that Harry was holding his fingers against his forehead.

"What is it?" asked an older student, he had bright red hair like many of the Gryffindors around them.

"N-nothing," Harry answered and dropped his hand. Regulus had read about Harry Potter's infamous lightning scar, but it was different seeing it in person. He hadn't noticed it at first, blocked by his curly hair, sticking out like a rat's nest on his head, but the scar scattered down his forehead, starting at his hairline and separating into smaller lines down into his eyebrows. It was still red and looked almost fresh, a cursed scar then, Regulus determined.

"Who's that teacher talking to Professor Quirrell?" Harry asked. Regulus looked back over and noticed that Snape had adjusted his glaring so that he was staring at Harry now. Harry looked nervous, and a line of discomfort deepened between his eyebrows.

"He teaches Potions, but doesn't want to — everyone knows he's after Quirrell's job," Regulus caught the tail end of what the older Gryffindor was saying. "Knows an awful lot about the Dark Arts, Snape."

Well, that was certainly true. Regulus remembered Snape in school drawing a group of friends by showing them violent dark magic curses he had discovered or sometimes invented. He wondered if the Defense Against the Dark Arts professor still changed every single year as it did when he was at Hogwarts. Students would often joke that it was a cursed position.

Regulus didn't talk during dinner, but he listened idly as the first years around him spoke. One of them also had bright red hair to match some of the others at the table and he spoke to a pair of twins on and off while he shoved chicken wings in his mouth. A girl with very curly hair watched him with mild disgust as the food got all over his face. Harry ate like a ravenous creature, adding a little bit of everything to his plate before wiping it clean. Regulus wasn't sure where he was keeping all the food in his tiny body, but the elated look on his face was all Regulus needed to know that he was enjoying himself. Harry watched the redhead boy with a quiet smile, laughing fondly when he talked with his mouth fully open.

After the meal was finished and the food all disappeared, Dumbledore stood up to make his announcements. Most of them were normal, the forest was forbidden, Quidditch trials would be held during the second week of term, and no magic was allowed in the corridors. Regulus was nearly tuning it out when Dumbledore finally said something of interest.

“I must tell you that this year, the third-floor corridor on the right-hand side is out of bounds to everyone who does not wish to die a very painful death.” Regulus wondered what that meant. There had never been an announcement like that while Regulus was in school. Why would Dumbledore set up something so ominous and mysterious on the first day of term, and why would they block off an entire corridor? Regulus knew he would have to figure out what was on that floor.

Perhaps the Sorting Hat was right to put him in Gryffindor.

Regulus followed the other students up to the Gryffindor dorm. He had only been to the Gryffindor common room once or twice during his first time at Hogwarts, and he'd never actually seen the dorms. The common room itself was smaller than the Slytherin common room, but it was warm and brightly lit. The stone walls were built into high ceilings and Regulus could see the stairs leading to tiny areas where chairs and tables sat for the students to use.

They marched tiredly up the steps to their dorm room. It was circular, with huge windows on one side of the room. There were six four-poster beds with burgundy curtains hanging off the posts. There was a small furnace in the room, one that was hot enough to warm the entire room despite its small size. Regulus's new trunk was already sitting at the foot of one of the beds, his robes sitting next to the bed, the elves having charmed them to have the Gryffindor colors and emblem on them.

He thought about how Sirius must have felt his first night in the Gryffindor dorms. Was he just as overwhelmed by the massive amount of red-colored items? It was truly overbearing. At least in the Slytherin dorms, it was mostly black furniture and walls. Here, it seemed like every inch of available space was swamped with bright red. He felt comfortable here, he felt oddly at home.

He wondered if it would take some getting used to remembering to come here rather than the dungeons when he ended the day. The other boys in his dorm went to sleep almost immediately after they reached the dorm, and Regulus was inclined to follow them. He was exhausted from a long day of traveling and the huge meal, but the moment he was inside the safety of his bed, he found that he couldn't sleep.

It was so bizarre to think that he was eleven years old again, this time tucked away in the Gryffindor dorms. Sirius had wanted so badly for Regulus to be in Gryffindor with him, but Regulus knew it wasn't going to happen. Even the Hat agreed, only ever considering Ravenclaw before settling on Slytherin. Regulus would sometimes fantasize about what his life might have been like had he been a Gryffindor. He would imagine following his brother up to the dorms, spending time together in the common room, Regulus being welcomed into their friend group. He remembered crying his first night at Hogwarts, thinking about the betrayed and angry look that crossed his brother's face when he was sorted.

He wondered if his life would have been better if he'd been sorted into Gryffindor. His relationship with James would no doubt have been easier. They probably wouldn't have had to sneak around as much, perhaps they would have even told Sirius. Maybe he would have been disowned like Sirius, but then he wouldn't have been marked. Then James would have never left him, and he would have never died in the cave. But of course, he would never have discovered the Dark Lord's secret, so perhaps it would all make sense in the end. He dozed off to the thought, wondering about what James would think if he could see Regulus now.

The next morning was chaos. All five of the other boys were in a whirlwind to get ready for the day. He remembered his first morning at Hogwarts. The room was quiet and subdued, all the other Slytherin boys were used to going about their days with barely any help from their parents. It wasn't uncommon for wealthy purebloods to be raised by house elves, and they typically developed independence early on in their childhoods.

The Gryffindor boys were not like that at all. It was clear that most of them were very used to their mothers taking care of everything, waking them up, getting them clothes, and pushing them out the door on time. Only Harry seemed out of place; he was just as disorganized and frazzled as the other boys, but there was a serious nature to him like he was used to being alone. Regulus watched him curiously but waited to speak to him until they were at breakfast. It was remarkably lucky that they had ended up in a house together.

"I'm Regulus," he introduced himself the moment Harry sat down diagonally across from him.

"Hi Regulus, I'm Harry," Harry responded. Harry was already tense, whispers seemed to follow the boy everywhere he went, and it was clearly putting him on edge. Not that Regulus was surprised, he imagined that all the other wizard students were excited that Harry Potter was attending school with them.

"Just ignore them," Regulus offered as he watched several older students down the table from them whisper furiously as they tried to get a look at Harry's scar. "It'll stop eventually."

Harry shrugged a little, though he offered Regulus a small grateful smile before starting to load up his plate. He greeted the redhead boy from last night, his hair somehow even brighter in the light of day. It reminded him of Lily, though hers was always a slightly darker red rather than the vibrant orange that these children seemed to have.

"Ron, this is Regulus. Regulus, Ron," Harry said with a lazy gesture of his hand.

"Ron Weasley," Ron said. Regulus didn't know many Weasleys. He knew they were a pureblood family, though, in the Sacred Twenty-Eight, they weren't exactly accepted by most of the other pureblood families due to their views on muggles. That was the extent of his knowledge of them. He tried to remember if any Weasleys went to school with him, but didn't think so.

"Regulus Black," Regulus responded.

“Oh,” Ron said and Regulus caught the exact moment that his name registered. “My mom told me about the Blacks. A lot of dark wizards.” Ron’s lip curled up slightly in disgust.

“Ron,” Harry chided. “Sorry,” he added, directing it towards Regulus. Regulus wondered why Harry even bothered, it wasn’t like he knew Regulus.

“That’s okay,” Regulus said, trying to let the statement roll off his back. “Your mom isn’t wrong, but I’m not a dark wizard.” Lie, he thought. He was exactly like the rest of his family, worse in many ways in fact. Ron seemed unsure, but Harry nodded like it had all been resolved. Oh, the simplicity of childhood, where people were either good or bad, and they told you outright where they stood.

“Did you say your name was Regulus Black?” another boy asked him, interrupting their conversation. The boy seemed familiar to Regulus for some reason, but he couldn’t place why. He tried to recall his name, but he didn’t recall almost anyone from the sorting.

“Yes,” Regulus answered. The boy seemed to grow pale. “What’s your name?”

“Neville,” he answered. “Neville Longbottom.” Oh.

Regulus suddenly remembered reading about his cousin Bellatrix’s arrest, how she, along with Barty Crouch Jr., Rodolphus, and Rabastan Lestrage, had tortured the Longbottoms into insanity. Fucking Barty, Regulus thought. He and Barty had been friends in school, more than friends at times though Regulus didn’t like to think about it. He knew Barty was perhaps less than sane from the beginning. His difficult relationship with his father seemed to constantly egg Barty on, in the same way that Sirius was affected by their parents, except in the opposite direction. Evan’s death pushed Barty closer to the edge of madness. By the time Regulus died, he had all but cut Barty out of his life.

“Right,” Regulus said, suddenly realizing that he had been staring at Neville for far too long and that Neville was now nervously looking down at his breakfast. Ron and Harry were watching the interaction with intense interest. Regulus opened his mouth to say something else but closed it again when he realized he had no idea what to say. He was luckily saved from the awkward conversation when McGonagall came by to give them their class schedules.

“What was that with Neville?” He heard Harry ask Ron on their way to their first class. Ron only shrugged, but Regulus caught him looking suspiciously over his shoulder at Regulus. It was interesting that Ron would be so suspicious of him, not that he was wrong to feel that way, although Regulus wanted nothing more than to protect Harry, he wasn’t exactly a good man.

Being in first-year classes again was just as boring as Regulus expected. He tried his best to keep from showing off in class, but it wasn’t always easy. He realized his mistake in his first Transfiguration class when he completed the assignment immediately, and McGonagall came over looking shocked and, not surprisingly, suspicious. Though he doubted she suspected that he was secretly an adult. He also caught another first-year girl watching him closely and he vowed to be more careful so as not to arouse more suspicion.

Regulus made an effort to sit near Harry when it was an option, though Ron Weasley was almost always hovering nearby. Regulus was pleasantly surprised when Harry found a way to clear the air almost immediately, barging into the conversation headfirst, just like his father always would when something needed to be discussed.

“Why did you react to Neville’s name like that?” Harry asked a few days after their initial conversation. Regulus noticed that Ron was watching him with interest, clearly also curious about the uncomfortable moment. He wondered if the two of them had been discussing it.

“Oh, well,” Regulus stuttered out, caught off guard by how forward Harry was. “One of my family members attacked Neville’s parents,” he answered and, seeing the looks on both Harry and Ron’s faces, hurried to add, “but I don’t know her. She’s been in Azkaban most of my life, but it’s hard to get away from the name. I wasn’t even raised in England, I didn’t know any of my family.” Regulus snapped his mouth shut when he realized that he was rambling, they didn’t need his entire fake backstory.

Harry said nothing as he spoke, just watched him patiently and waited for him to finish his maundering. Regulus felt an unreasonable amount of guilt about lying to Harry. During his first life, Regulus became a very skilled liar, lying to most of the people in his life, and not once did he feel guilt over it. But looking into Harry’s trusting eyes caused a feeling of shame to shoot through him. Not that he had another choice, there was no way he was going to tell Harry who he really was. How did one explain to a child that they were secretly an adult in a child’s body and that they’d come to protect them because they were once in love with their now dead father?

Harry nodded knowingly, he must have understood what it was like to be judged for something you didn’t remember or know about, not that those circumstances applied to Regulus exactly. Ron was silent for a few beats longer before he seemed to accept this as well and after that, the three of them were friendly.

Most of his classes weren’t noteworthy, even in the ones where he had the same teacher as the last time around, the professors barely acknowledged him. This was not the case for Potions. The Gryffindors had their first Potions class on the Friday morning after school started. Up until that point, Regulus had almost forgotten about seeing Snape at the Professor’s table during the Welcome Feast. He sat at a potions table with both Ron and Harry, Harry sitting in the middle of them, and he watched warily as Snape stalked into the classroom and started taking roll.

When he said Regulus's name, he sneered openly at him but kept going on the list. However, when he got to Harry’s name, he paused before saying, “Ah, yes. Harry Potter. Our new... celebrity.”

Regulus noted that a few of the Slytherin boys were laughing at this, Draco Malfoy among them. After that, Snape went on a tirade asking Harry questions that he clearly did not know the answer to.

It seemed unfair to Regulus that Snape would zero in on a child like this, but he should have known when he saw the cold, dark look Snape had given them. A Potter and a Black, together at a table in a classroom with Snape; Regulus thought that maybe Snape was having flashbacks to his time at Hogwarts when James and Sirius were constantly after him. So he wasn't exactly surprised by Snape's reaction to Harry but was surprised that Snape hadn't targeted him at all, but Snape seemed to have trouble even looking in Regulus's direction for too long.

By the end of class, Snape had taken points from Gryffindor for Harry's "cheek" as well as Harry's inability to stop Neville from making a mistake during the potion-making process despite Harry sitting at a completely different table.

To Regulus, it was almost comical, watching a grown man fight for power over an eleven-year-old, especially one that had no idea what was going on, but it was clear that Harry did not see the comedy in the situation. He was practically sulking as the three of them made their way out of the class.

"Don't worry about it, Harry," Regulus told him, bumping his shoulder against Harry's. "Snape probably just hates Gryffindors."

"He seems to hate me the most," Harry said sullenly.

"He's a prat," Regulus said simply. Ron chuckled and even Harry gave a small smile.

Regulus followed the other two boys as they went to Hagrid's after class. Harry had been invited over and asked if Ron and Regulus wanted to come. Regulus did not particularly want to spend the afternoon in the hut belonging to some half-giant, but he aimed to stay friends with Harry, so he wasn't going to let the opportunity pass him by.

"This is Ron," Harry told Hagrid once they'd settled into the oversized chairs around Hagrid's living room, "and this is Regulus."

"Another Weasley, eh?" Hagrid asked Ron. "And a Black," he said, turning his gaze on Regulus. "Who are —"

"Sirius," Regulus answered, already knowing the question Hagrid was going to ask. He had forgotten that Hagrid had worked with Sirius and their band of do-gooders. It wasn't that Sirius and James were friends with Hagrid, at least not to his knowledge, but they were nicer to the groundskeeper than most.

"Right then," Hagrid said awkwardly, a complicated look crossing his face. "A rock cake fer ya?"

It was clear that Hagrid did not want to say anything about Sirius, and Regulus was more than happy about that. He surprisingly found that he enjoyed spending time with the half-giant. He could just imagine his mother rolling in her grave if she could witness this.

Near the end of their afternoon with Hagrid, Harry noticed a Daily Prophet's article about a break-in at Gringotts, supposedly on the same day that Harry had been taken there with Hagrid. On the way back to the castle, Harry told them about the strange object that Hagrid had picked up from the vault that was broken into, and Regulus knew that something was very wrong at Hogwarts.

Regulus settled back into a routine at Hogwarts easily. It was almost as if he had never left in the first place.

He was surprised by how comfortable he felt in Gryffindor, though the red ties and Gryffindor robes always pulled darkly at his memories, threatening to bury him the moment he let them in. He managed to keep them at bay easily throughout the day, but at night they always crept through his bed curtains and whispered disturbingly in his ear.

The moment he slept, he would dream of strong hands untying a red tie, touching Regulus in a way that he had never been touched before they slowly started strangling him, dragging him below the cold, icy water of the cave. He almost always woke with a shout in the morning so he had taken to casting silencing spells on his bed curtains so he didn't disturb the others.

He got on well with the other Gryffindor boys, although Neville always kept his distance. Ron had abandoned his suspicion of Regulus almost immediately and welcomed him into his life with an easy warmth. Dean and Seamus had become fast friends with each other, but they seemed to like Regulus enough. He didn't speak much to the Gryffindor girls, but he knew that one of them was keenly interested in his classwork—Hermione, he discovered her name was—but he did his best to downplay his skill when in class, trying to shake her watchful eye.

Harry was always kind, which didn't surprise Regulus at all. Even though he hadn't been raised by James or Lily, or anyone that Regulus had known at school, he seemed to have their spirit and disposition. He tried his best to learn about Harry's home life and the muggles who raised him during the first couple weeks of school, but Harry was always stilted when answering Regulus's questions.

Regulus would give him ample details about his life—fake details, but still.

“My mother didn't want me to attend regular schools, so I've been taught by tutors most of my life. Did your aunt and uncle teach you themselves?”

Harry cringed. “It was fine.”

Every conversation went much the same. It was like de-gnoming a garden, long and tedious with very little reward. Not that Regulus had ever de-gnomed a garden, the Black family didn't even have a garden when he was growing up and even if they did, they would have had house elves to manage it for them, but he'd read enough books to know de-gnoming was a menial task.

As time went on Regulus grew more and more concerned about the boy, there was something off that he couldn't quite put his finger on, but he wasn't sure what to do when Harry was so reticent to give details.

The most surprising element of Hogwarts was Draco Malfoy. Regulus had never liked Lucius; he was always rude and condescending, so he expected nothing less regarding his child. Draco Malfoy did not disappoint. He seemed very interested in everything Harry did and would do his level best to mock him for it. For instance, Draco watched closely to see how much mail Harry was getting each morning, which wasn't very much, actually wasn't any at all beyond a letter now and then from Hagrid, then Draco would ridicule Harry for his lack of letters from home, often gloating about the packages of sweets he got from his mother.

This would not have been out of the ordinary for a son of Lucius Malfoy, except for the fact that Draco Malfoy seemed exceedingly obsessed with Harry Potter. No other child seemed to notice how much mail Harry was getting, even though Harry was one of the most closely watched people in the school—most of the student body was still vaguely obsessed with the Boy Who Lived. Draco Malfoy, on the other hand, watched Harry closely and, in turn, needed all of Harry's attention, it was like he needed Harry to know that Draco saw everything wrong with Harry's life.

"Just what I always wanted. To make a fool of myself on a broomstick in front of Malfoy," Harry grumbled the morning they found out that Gryffindor and Slytherin would have their flying lessons together.

Draco had been bragging about how good he was on a broom, even spinning some tale of escaping muggles in helicopters. Regulus had no idea how Draco even knew what helicopters were given how he was raised. Regulus didn't learn about anything muggle-related until he was a teenager and that was only after he raided Sirius's room after he left home for the last time—even then it was mostly just what naked muggle women looked like, he assumed it was the same for witches though he wasn't a reliable source on that fact.

Regardless, Draco was busy boasting about his flying ability, always doing so when he was sure Harry was paying attention, and Harry was always sullenly paying attention to it, stressing about the upcoming lessons. Harry privately confessed to Regulus that he was more excited about the prospect of flying than he was about anything else at Hogwarts. This wasn't a surprise considering James was flying since he could walk, maybe even before that.

"You're going to do fine, Harry," Regulus reassured. "Just ignore Draco."

"What if I'm terrible at it?" Harry whined. The two of them were up late in the common room after the others had gone to bed. Regulus never slept well those days and Harry didn't like to leave his friends.

"You won't be. I bet you'll be a natural," Regulus said. "And either way, it'll be your first time on a broom, so even if you're not excellent, you'll get better, just like you have with every other kind of magic." Harry looked reassured for the most part, but Regulus could tell that he was still dwelling on the fact that Draco would be there watching him.

“Have you ever been on a broom?” Harry asked.

This was a tricky question for Regulus. In his first life, he was not allowed on a broom until he went to Hogwarts. He loved flying once he’d gotten the chance to try it and often spent hours flying around the Quidditch Pitch. He was even the Slytherin seeker for a few years, dropping off midway through his sixth year when the thought of playing Quidditch and seeing James on his broom openly flirting with Lily Evans became too much for Regulus to bear. So he would likely still be a skilled flier and it would be difficult to hide that fact, but he also did not want to add to Harry’s unease.

“Really? What’s it like?” Harry asked, a sparkle lighting up in his eyes.

“It’s amazing,” Regulus answered honestly. “The best feeling in the world.” Harry smiled at that, his worries about Draco momentarily forgotten.

Hermione was nervous as well, spending the morning spouting off tips on flying that she’d read in the library. Neville was nearby paying close attention to what Hermione was saying, obviously nervous as well. Regulus didn’t feel like reading about flying would be of much help to someone new to flying on a broomstick, but during their first flying lesson, when they all watched Neville crash to the ground and break his wrist, Regulus wondered if he should have offered to give them more tips.

After Madam Hooch left to take Neville to the Hospital Wing, Draco decided to steal Neville’s Remembrall and, when he saw that Harry was watching him, taunted Harry with it and threw it as far as he could. Regulus watched Harry soar through the air with a wide smile on his face. Regulus didn’t even have the time to stop him. Yes, what he was doing was incredibly dangerous and would most likely get him into trouble, but Regulus couldn’t deny the warm feeling he got watching James’s son take to the sky like the natural he was born to be.

Most of the time, Regulus had his Occlumency walls firmly in place to keep out the thoughts about James. Of course, they slipped now and again, but during the day he was usually good about keeping them up. When they did fall, when a thought slipped through, Regulus often only felt sorrow, an anguishing pain that gutted him the moment he experienced it. Watching Harry fly caused his walls to slip, but instead of pain and regret and sadness and anger, Regulus only felt nostalgic, the warmth of love filling his chest. When he looked at Harry, he felt only pride.

Draco, however, looked more annoyed than ever. It was clear that he’d expected Harry to be a terrible flier, or at least get into horrible trouble for flying when he wasn’t supposed to. This backfired quite spectacularly when Harry ended up on the Quidditch team as a first year—only James Potter’s son could manage something like that—but from that point on Regulus understood exactly what was going on. There wasn’t a moment when Draco and Harry were in the room together that Draco wasn’t watching Harry. And of course, Harry responded in kind by spending an unreasonable amount of time complaining about Draco, usually talking more than he had the entire day just ranting about the boy.

Ron would often encourage Harry, agreeing with him about how annoying Draco was being, but Regulus stayed quiet. He did not want to be involved in the potion fire that was Harry and Draco, and he did his best to stay out of it. Naturally, this became difficult when Draco challenged Harry to a wizard's duel and Ron accepted for him before Harry could even respond.

"This is definitely a trap," Regulus said for the third time that night. He had spent the last several hours listening to Ron give Harry half-hearted advice on how to duel. Regulus offered no such help, he was not about to encourage him by training James Potter's son how to duel. Not to mention that he was sure they were all going to be spending the next several weeks in detention when they were caught out of bed. Still, Regulus wasn't going to let them go on their own. He was sure Draco wouldn't show, but if he did Regulus wanted to be there to make sure no one actually got hurt.

"Shut up already," Ron whispered furiously. "We have to go! It's already half past eleven. If we don't show then Malfoy is going to think Harry's a coward."

"Draco isn't going to show," Regulus responded. "He is definitely setting you both up and we're all going to get detention for being out past curfew."

"He's setting all three of us up, you mean," Ron said nonsensically.

"You don't have to come, you could just stay here," Harry offered, not for the first time. Regulus grumbled at him, but still got up and followed them out of the door. Ron seemed fired up for the potential duel, but Harry mostly seemed regretful that he was even participating in it. Not regretful enough to say no, of course, but regretful all the same.

Hermione was at the bottom of the stairs when they made it to the common room. In retrospect, Regulus should have realized that she would have been listening to them. Especially with the way she watched him.

"You can't be out after curfew," Hermione said sharply. "You'll lose house points! And you'll get detention. Or expelled!"

"Shove off," Ron grumbled, sidestepping her.

"If you go out there, then I'm going to go get your brother Percy," Hermione said, sticking her nose up in the air. She was already dressed in her pajamas—a silk set that made it look like she was wearing a tiny muggle suit. Her curly hair was braided down into pigtails.

Ron groaned. "Go away!"

Regulus and Harry watched them argue as they walked out of the portrait hole, Hermione following them outside so she could continue to lecture Ron. He seemed to get a kick out of riling her up.

"And you, Regulus, I expected you to talk them out of this," she hissed at him.

“What?” Regulus had not expected to be dragged into this conversation. He’d actually been more than happy to stay out of it. “Why would you think that?”

Hermione didn’t answer this question, only gave him a very snobbish look before turning to go back to the common room, only to find the portrait empty. For now, she was stuck with them. Unless she wanted to just sit outside the common room entrance where anyone could happen upon her.

They found Neville outside the common room as well, slightly down the hallway, curled up on the floor. The poor child had forgotten the password and couldn’t get in. The five of them made their way toward the trophy room, far too large of a group for a successful sneak around the castle. Especially considering how far the trophy room was. The castle seemed much bigger now that Regulus was eleven again.

The night went about exactly as Regulus had expected. Draco naturally didn’t show and they were almost discovered by Mrs. Norris and Filch, before being cornered by Peeves. Hermione took the reins when it came to reminding Harry that Draco had tricked him into getting in trouble, saving Regulus the trouble of delivering a, certainly unwanted, I-told-you-so. They sprinted through the castle, picking directions at random to try and evade capture. Regulus couldn’t help but think of James and his brother, of their time as students when they would explore the castle corridors as freely as they could. He wasn’t paying close enough attention to where they were going and they ended up arriving in the forbidden corridor on the third floor. Regulus had yet to investigate it, though it was still on his mind periodically.

He had been wondering what Dumbledore was trying to hide there. It seemed too obvious a spot for something valuable. His mind drifted, unwarranted, to the locket currently tucked away in Grimmauld Place.

They rushed inside stupidly, still trying to escape Filch and Mrs. Norris, and Regulus only realized a beat too late that Filch was probably the better option.

Inside the door was a huge dog with three massive heads, impossible to miss, and Regulus damn near pissed himself. He suddenly felt very ill-equipped to have been sorted into Gryffindor. He wasn’t brave, he was terrified.

He pulled his wand, trying to remember some sort of spell that could fight off a giant, three-headed dog. He was the only adult in the group, though no one else knew that, and it was his job to protect the others but he felt stuck like he couldn’t move. He edged around so he was in front of them, standing guard between them and the ginormous dog growling viciously.

He wondered if he should throw himself at the dog’s mercy—certain death—and let the others escape. Suddenly, he heard them all start to shuffle and fall backward through the door and someone grabbed onto the back of his robes, pulling him with them.

Regulus gasped for breath when the door slammed between him and the dogs' snarling mouths. He was shaking from head to toe, so bad that he could barely hold his wand. His heart was beating so loudly that it was the only thing he could hear.

"We have to get out of here!" Harry said. His voice sounded like it was coming from behind a very thick wall, far away and barely audible, but he grabbed Regulus's wrist when the rest of them started running and dragged him along.

The trip back to the dorm was traveled in a daze. They ran the entire way and didn't stop until they reached the portrait of the Fat Lady. Regulus couldn't believe he had frozen like that. He was supposed to be protecting Harry, and he had failed the moment he was supposed to do it. He was too busy beating himself up to register the conversation the others were having but it hardly mattered. He didn't particularly care why there was a monstrous dog in the castle, that was a problem for another day.

All he cared about was the fact that he was completely and totally useless.

Harry and Ron spent the next day trying to figure out what the package Hagrid had moved from Gringotts was. They had already decided that was what the dog was guarding and Regulus was inclined to agree with them though he didn't say so out loud. However, all they knew about it was that it was small.

"It's either really valuable or really dangerous," Ron said.

"Or both," Harry replied. Regulus thought that was accurate, but he had no further insight to offer. There were so many magical objects out in the world that fit that description. Why Dumbledore would choose to store that item at Hogwarts of all places, Regulus had no idea.

He was beginning to feel overwhelmed with the number of mysteries left to solve, and for the time being, the object being hidden at Hogwarts was not a priority. He knew that he needed to work on figuring out how to destroy the locket, but he didn't think the Hogwarts library was going to be particularly helpful on the matter.

During one free period, Regulus found an empty bathroom and called for Kreacher. Regulus remembered during his first life when he discovered his house elves could come through the Hogwarts wards. He abused that privilege far too often during his final years at school.

"Master Regulus," Kreacher greeted when he popped into existence next to Regulus. He then bowed so deeply that his long, pointy nose touched the floor.

"Bring me all the books in the Grimmauld Library that mention Horcruxes and anything on soul magic," he instructed. "Oh, and any of them that might mention dangerous beasts." Kreacher nodded and by the next night, Regulus's trunk was stuffed full of, most likely illegal, books. He always wondered how Kreacher knew which books to pull. It wasn't like he could read—at least, Regulus didn't think he could. It must have been some elvish magic that he didn't understand.

After that day, Regulus started spending more and more time tucked away in different parts of the castle researching the subject. The books that mentioned Horcruxes ended up only being Secrets of the Darkest Arts and A History of Cursed Objects. Both of these were mostly useless to Regulus. A History of Cursed Objects only mentioned Horcruxes in a footnote when referencing a cursed object that might affect a person's mental state, and Secrets of the Darkest Arts provided only a simple definition for what a Horcrux was, nothing on how one might be created or destroyed.

He wondered how the Dark Lord had found out about them in the first place. He must have learned how to make one from somewhere, but perhaps it was by word of mouth rather than through a book. He figured it would take more trial and error to destroy the locket, something that he couldn't do effectively at Hogwarts. In the meantime, he read up on soul magic, an interesting but not particularly well-researched branch of magic. He also spent more and more time looking up dangerous creatures and though he learned a lot about Dragons, Basilisks, and Chimaeras, he could find almost nothing about large, three-headed dogs.

Time seemed to pass quickly in his second life. It was strange to feel so at ease at Hogwarts, but it was like a tiny sanctuary that made the passage of time easy and uninhibited. Harry was busy with Quidditch practice and Ron almost always tagged along to watch, leaving Regulus alone to study. It surprised him when he looked up one day and found that two months had already passed and that Halloween was upon them.

He worried about Harry from the moment he woke up on Halloween morning. He knew from reading the Prophet that Halloween was the day that James and Lily had been murdered and Regulus expected Harry to be upset. He couldn't imagine how it must feel to wake up on a celebratory day knowing that it was the anniversary of when you became an orphan.

"How are you?" Regulus asked Harry as they walked down to breakfast. The smell of baking pumpkins filled the air and Regulus felt a sudden deep longing for his first Halloween at Hogwarts. It was the only holiday spent at Hogwarts where he and Sirius didn't actively hate each other. The bad blood between them hadn't curdled yet.

"Good," Harry answered happily, shaking Regulus from his memories, he smiled but when he noticed Regulus watching him closely he gave him a questioning look.

"Oh, that's good," Regulus responded slowly, watching Harry for any sign that he was lying, but Harry just seemed confused.

"Why?" Harry finally asked.

"Well, it's Halloween. I just thought..." Regulus trailed off, feeling suddenly out of his depth.

"Do you not like Halloween?" Harry asked, a look of sadness crossing his face for a moment like he couldn't imagine not liking a holiday made of jack-o-lanterns and candy and that Regulus had just revealed something terribly tragic.

"Er, it's not my favorite holiday," Regulus responded. This wasn't exactly a lie, though the truth was closer to something like: this holiday makes me wish I'd never crawled out of the cold, inferi-infested water in that cave, because at least if I was dead, then I would never have to know that James was gone.

"Why not?" Harry asked, a look of sympathy on his face.

“Just a difficult day, I guess.” Regulus evaded the question. There was technically no reason that he should feel this way, at least no reason that he could share with Harry.

“Oh, I’m sorry,” Harry said kindly. Regulus couldn’t tell whether Harry was holding his emotions in or whether he was genuinely fine.

“I expected you not to like it either, I guess,” Regulus said after a moment of hesitation.

“Why wouldn’t I like Halloween?” Does he not know? Regulus wondered. All Regulus knew from Harry’s upbringing was that he was raised by muggles, but it seems unlikely that they wouldn’t have told Harry what day his parents had died. Surely they knew that Lily was a witch, why and how she died. Regulus thought about asking, but Harry was already skittish when talking about his home life and Regulus did not want to add to it if he didn’t have to, so he let the subject drop for the time being.

Regulus watched Harry carefully for the rest of the day, but Harry showed no signs of being bothered. Ron, on the other hand, was in a terrible mood. Their morning Charms class was filled with bickering between Ron and Hermione, something that was becoming worryingly common. Ron left the class ranting about Hermione and making snide comments about her lack of friends. Hermione, after overhearing Ron, didn’t show up for any of their other classes that day. He wondered if he should do something, though he didn’t know what.

Soon enough it was time for the Halloween feast and Regulus let himself, if only for a moment, get caught up in the excitement of the day. He had always loved the decorations and the feast at Hogwarts during Halloween. Sitting in the Great Hall enjoying the food, he could almost forget that on this night over a decade prior, the love of his life had been ruthlessly murdered by the Dark Lord.

Regulus's ponderings were interrupted when Professor Quirrell came sprinting into the Great Hall screaming about a troll in the dungeons. Regulus felt the hairs on the back of his neck stand on end. Hogwarts already seemed to be a much more dangerous place now than it had his first time around, what with the barely locked corridor housing a dangerous beast, but now another one had made its way into the dungeon of the school.

Regulus watched closely as the professors headed off toward the dungeon and then began to follow the prefects up to the dorm room with the rest of the students. He stopped when he felt Harry pulling him and Ron aside.

“Hermione! She never came to dinner! She doesn’t know about the troll!” Harry said frantically.

Regulus had barely paid attention to the details of the schoolyard drama between Ron and Hermione that morning in class and he hadn’t noticed that the girl wasn’t at the Halloween feast, even though she’d missed most of their classes that day, but it was clear that Harry had been keeping track. Regulus thought that perhaps warning someone, like a prefect if they could find one, would be a good plan, but before he could suggest it, Harry was taking off running towards the girl’s bathroom, and Regulus and Ron had no choice but to follow.

Harry came to a skittering stop. "Wait," Harry hissed, pulling them behind a statue. Regulus followed, before leaning out to the side just in time to spot Snape heading down another corridor in the distance. He wasn't going in the direction of the dungeons.

"What's he doing?" Ron asked quietly.

"I think he's headed for the third floor, but I don't know why," Harry whispered. Regulus was surprised that Harry had picked up on that but he thought that he was likely right. It was an astute observation.

"Ugh, what is that smell?" Ron said suddenly, covering his mouth and nose with the sleeve of his cloak. The smell hit Harry and Regulus a second later. It was like rotting sewage. Regulus gagged.

He had only encountered a troll once in his lifetime. After Evan was killed by Aurors, Barty became more ruthless and reckless in his dealings as a Death Eater. He began to use Unforgivables more freely and occasionally would bring along dark creatures when they were sent out on raids. Regulus had no idea where Barty was getting these creatures and by that point, he was too afraid to ask. One night they were sent to a muggle village and Barty showed up with a ten-foot-tall troll in tow. It smelled so bad that Regulus almost threw up in his mask. When asked where he found the thing, Barty just laughed and started shooting stinging hexes at it to make it attack people. It was horrific, and Regulus spent the entire raid just trying to avoid the beast.

The troll he was faced with now was much the same as the one Barty used. It had the same dull, granite gray skin and disfigured lumpy body. It carried a huge wooden club, so large that it dragged on the ground behind the troll. Its head nearly grazed the vaulted ceiling.

"The key is in the lock," Harry whispered as the troll entered the girls' bathroom. "We can lock it in."

"Good idea," Ron said, already moving to twist the key.

"I thought we came over here to warn Hermione, not kill her," Regulus snapped. Harry and Ron looked at him in shock for a second before they jumped into action, following the troll into the bathroom. Hermione was cowering against the far wall and the troll was moving toward her quickly, or as quick as a troll could move, smashing the sinks off the wall as it went.

Regulus was not about to repeat what he had done with the giant dog, freezing up and being completely useless. He had spent weeks researching how to fight off dangerous animals and perhaps a troll didn't fall exactly into this category, but the same principles applied.

"Stupefy!" Regulus yelled the spell and summoned all the magic he could to attack the beast, but it barely affected it. He followed it up with another stunner and then the Conjunctivitis Curse. The troll seemed more annoyed than anything, but at least it was focused on Regulus rather than the other children in the room. He threw a few stinging hexes like he'd seen Barty do, but this only made the troll turn back to Hermione like Regulus was purposefully egging it on.

He felt desperation pull at his control, but he had spent years facing the dangers of his parents, the Dark Lord, and the Aurors near the end of his life, so he was more than equipped to use it to his advantage. He dropped his Occlumency walls just enough to flood himself with the emotions that threatened to overwhelm him daily, the fear and the pain, and he drove it into his next spell.

“CONFRINGO!” His magic burned down through his fingertips and he wondered how his wand managed not to catch on fire in the process, but the spell exploded out of him and hit the troll in the stomach.

Only a moment later, he wondered if he should have used a less messy spell than a blasting curse as all four of them were suddenly coated in troll innards. Regulus sneered in disgust, but the other three were frozen in shock, staring at Regulus with wide eyes. The door to the bathroom slammed open and McGonagall, Snape, and Quirrell rush inside.

“What on earth is going on?” McGonagall said furiously. “Why aren’t you in your dormitory?”

“Please, Professor McGonagall,” Hermione said, her voice faint and shocked. “They were looking for me.”

“Miss Granger!” McGonagall’s voice climbed up an octave as she yelled.

“I went looking for the troll because I—I thought I could deal with it on my own—you know because I’ve read all about them,” Hermione said, tripping over her words as she went.

Ron dropped his wand in shock while Harry’s mouth hung open. Regulus was also confused about why the girl would tell a lie to the teacher for them. She barely knew Regulus, they had hardly spoken to each other, and Ron and Harry were not exactly kind to the girl. There was no reason for her to protect them.

“If they hadn’t found me, I’d be dead by now. Regulus—he...” she gestured over to him helplessly. McGonagall looked stricken. It was clear that Hermione had no way of properly delineating what Regulus had done, so the reference to the carnage around them was the only way she could explain.

“I stopped him,” Regulus said. He crossed his arms and turned his nose up in a haughty gesture reminiscent of his past self, the gesture was slightly ruined by a piece of troll intestine plopping down off his shoulder onto the floor.

“How?” Snape asked, a curious glint in his eye that Regulus did not appreciate.

“What spell?” Snape said angrily. The other teachers seemed just as interested in Regulus’s answer, but Regulus was very aware that an eleven-year-old should not have known the blasting curse, let alone been able to use it well enough to kill a troll. Regulus shrugged and looked away from the professors.

“Well, in that case,” McGonagall said when it became clear that Regulus was not going to elaborate, staring at them all, “Miss Granger, you foolish girl, how could you think of tackling a mountain troll on your own?”

McGonagall ended up taking five points from the poor girl but awarded five points each to Regulus, Ron, and Harry for their actions. That bizarre night seemed to bond the four of them together, though Hermione was looking at him like he was keeping a very important secret, which he supposed that he was. He knew that eventually, she would confront him about the spell he'd used, and how he knew it, but for the time being, she just seemed happy to have a few friends.

November brought a cold chill and the knowledge that Snape had been injured while trying to get past the three-headed dog on Halloween night. Regulus wondered why a professor would need to get past the beast, though he thought that maybe he was trying to remove it for some reason. But then again, Regulus knew that Snape was a Death Eater, how he had gotten a job under Dumbledore was a mystery, but regardless he might be after the item hidden at Hogwarts for some nefarious purpose. He wondered if Snape knew that the Dark Lord was still alive.

He didn't appreciate the way that Snape's suspicious sneaking around sparked the interest of Harry, Ron, and Hermione though.

The first Quidditch game was more stressful than Regulus would have hoped. He was secretly looking forward to watching Harry fly, he knew that it would remind him of James, and though the memory still stabbed through him like a hot poker, he couldn't help reveling in the nostalgia. Instead, Regulus had to watch Harry be jerked around on a jinxed broom. Regulus had his wand out the whole time, ready to throw a spell to slow his fall if he lost his grip.

“It's Snape. Look,” Hermione said to Regulus and Ron. Regulus looked across the pitch to see Snape staring unblinkingly at Harry on his broom, muttering to himself. The fact that Snape would try to attack Harry so brazenly in the middle of a Quidditch match made Regulus reel back in surprise. Snape had always been careful, overly so in some ways, though he would share spells with other kids growing up, he usually held his plans and opinions close to the chest.

“What should we do?” Ron asked, his voice panicked.

Regulus followed them to Hagrid's after the game. Harry, Ron, and Hermione told Hagrid frantically about Snape jinxing the broom, and when he didn't believe them, Harry spilled the beans about Snape heading to the third floor on Halloween night and being bitten by the three-headed dog.

Fluffy, they found out its name was. Fluffy the three-headed dog belonged to Hagrid and Dumbledore was letting him keep it in the castle. It wasn't there on accident, not that Regulus thought that was really the case, but it was still bizarre to hear it confirmed.

"I lent him to Dumbledore to guard the..."

"Yes?" Harry said eagerly.

"Now, don't ask me anymore. That's top secret, that is."

"But Snape's trying to steal it." Hagrid seemed surprised that they would think that—as if Snape was someone to be trusted and not a Death Eater. Hagrid was dismissive though, and he clearly didn't believe that Snape had hexed the broom either, despite the desperate pleas of the three children.

Snape hexing the broom didn't surprise Regulus though. Snape hated James more than anyone and after James and Lily began dating, Regulus would catch Snape watching them hatefully. If Regulus had been a nicer person, he might have felt bad for Snape at the time, but Regulus was not a nice person, so instead, he relished in someone else experiencing the same pain he felt watching James and Lily fall in love.

"You forget that dog, an' you forget what it's guarding, that's between Professor Dumbledore an' Nicolas Flamel—"

"Aha!" Harry interrupted. Harry, Ron, and Hermione had no idea who Flamel was and Regulus was glad for it, because the moment he heard the name, he knew exactly what was hidden at Hogwarts. The Philosopher's Stone, an item that could give someone immortal life. And who did Regulus know that craved immortality above everything else?

This piece of information made Regulus more sure than ever that his plan to come to Hogwarts was a good one. It was clear that Hogwarts wasn't safe, especially not for Harry.

the forbidden forest.

Regulus thought about going home for Christmas. He felt slightly bad for Kreacher, stuck in Grimmauld all alone with only Regulus's mother's painting for comfort. Regulus felt like she had gone insane in her portrait. He wondered if she was even capable of leaving the frame to talk to any of the other portraits in the house, he had never seen her do so and hadn't asked Kreacher. If he was honest with himself, he didn't really want to ask Kreacher anything about his mother at all. Regulus and his mother had a very distant relationship in his childhood. Sirius was her son, Regulus was his father's. Of course, she became far more overbearing in the later years of his life once Sirius began to act out, especially when Sirius was eventually disowned. He didn't have many fond memories of the woman and he had no desire to spend any time with her now. He could only imagine what she had been saying to Kreacher all those years.

So Regulus did think about going home but only briefly and ultimately decided it would be best to stay at Hogwarts. Besides, who knew what trouble Harry could get into alone in the giant castle? He wondered why Harry wasn't willing or didn't want to go home for the holiday, but he kept himself from prying too much. He asked once or twice, but Harry was always quick to change the subject.

Draco tried taunting Harry for the fact that he was staying. He seemed to find it wildly entertaining though clearly no one else did. Harry actually seemed unbothered by the taunts which was highly unusual. It stood out enough that Regulus was sure Harry was purposefully hiding his feelings about the topic, burying all of them, including his reaction to Draco's taunts.

Regulus woke up Christmas morning warm in his dorm bed and for a moment he forgot where he was. The feeling of Christmas was in the air and Regulus let himself fantasize about his last happy holiday, the Christmas of his fifth year when James wrote him letters every other day. James had wanted to stay in the castle to spend time with him, but they both knew it would be too suspicious for Sirius. They spent the week before break sneaking around the castle avoiding James's friends and stealing food from the kitchens.

Regulus purposefully let go of the memory, it wouldn't help him to dwell on James today. He finally got out of bed when he heard Ron and Harry moving around, both of them waking slowly before remembering what day it was. Ron jumped up excitedly, but Harry moved much slower. He wondered about the difference in their behavior, but he didn't understand Christmas excitement well enough to make sense of it.

Harry's reaction made slightly more sense to him as Regulus had not expected to get presents for Christmas. They never exchanged gifts in his home growing up, so it hadn't occurred to him that he might receive something. He certainly hadn't purchased any for anyone else. So he was surprised when he discovered a small package at the foot of his bed. He unwrapped it slowly and discovered a hand-knitted blue sweater with a gold R stitched onto the front of it.

“Oh no,” Ron groaned. “She made you a Weasley sweater. Every year she makes us a sweater and mine’s always maroon,” Ron said to Regulus as he unwrapped his own sweater. Regulus understood his complaint when he saw it, the maroon color clashed painfully with Ron’s complexion, making him look like he’d recently contracted a deadly illness.

“Oh,” Regulus said uncomfortably. “Well, tell her I said thank you.” The sweater was extremely soft and comfortable, and Regulus surprised himself by putting it on immediately. His own mother had never given him a Christmas gift, it wasn’t something they did in their family; his mother didn’t consider it proper and his father was never home for Christmas so his opinion hardly mattered. His brother usually snuck a few sweets for them both when they were children, but after Sirius went to Hogwarts, Regulus spent almost every Christmas alone. He thought briefly about the one Christmas he spent imagining himself at James’s house again but wrenched his thoughts away quickly, it was too dangerous to think about such things in the light of day.

Regulus was extremely interested in Harry’s gifts. The flute from Hagrid and a sweater from Mrs. Weasley weren’t a surprise, but his father’s invisibility cloak was. Regulus had watched James take off the cloak enough times to recognize it on sight and seeing it in Harry’s small hands made Regulus’s heart clench painfully. Why didn’t Harry already have the cloak? He had forgotten about it until that moment, but it seemed odd that he wouldn’t be given it until he was eleven.

Regulus looked at the note attached to the package, but it gave no further indication of who it could be from. Why didn’t James have his invisibility cloak when he died? He wondered if it would have helped him on the night the Dark Lord came to kill them. Could James have escaped with it had he had it? Could Lily? The thoughts caused nausea to sweep through him and he worked to push them away. It was too painful to think of the ‘what ifs’ from that night.

Worst of all was the “gift” from Harry’s aunt and uncle. It was a small parcel with a note attached that said, “We received your message and enclosed your Christmas present. From Uncle Vernon and Aunt Petunia.” All that was in the parcel was a piece of muggle money. Regulus didn’t know much about muggle money, but he could tell that Harry was annoyed.

“That’s friendly,” Harry grumbled. Ron was fascinated by the money, but Regulus knew immediately that something was very wrong with Harry’s home life. He had noticed before that Harry was skinnier than he should be at his age, the smallest of the six Gryffindor boys, but Regulus thought perhaps he just wasn’t a big eater. However, he also noticed that Harry tended to eat like someone was about to steal the food right off of his plate. These two things combined painted an unfortunate image, plus the small non-gift from his family made Regulus very worried, though he wasn’t sure what to do about it.

Briefly, and with great pain, he wondered what James would want him to do.

The first night that Harry had the invisibility cloak, Regulus noticed him sneaking out of their dorm late at night, not exactly a surprise given who his father was. He told them he was searching the library’s restricted section for information on Nicolas Flamel, but Regulus guessed that he was mostly out wandering the castle. It seemed harmless to Regulus, so he made no effort to stop him.

However, one morning he told them about a strange mirror he discovered while trying to run from Filch and Snape. He told them that he had seen his parents and while Ron was immediately fascinated with what Harry was saying, Regulus was watching closely as Harry picked around his food, a vacant look in his eyes. Harry woke Regulus and Ron later that night and dragged them both around the castle until he found the room with a mirror in it.

“See?” Harry whispered. He threw his cloak on the ground as they entered the room and approached the mirror as quickly as his tiny legs would let him.

“I can’t see anything,” Ron replied. He sounded irritable, it had taken far longer than expected for Harry to find the room again, and it was clear that Ron was tired and grumpy.

“Look! Look at them all...” Harry’s voice was laced with reverence. The vacant look in his eyes from earlier was gone, but it was replaced with a glazed look like he was sleepwalking.

“I can only see you,” Ron said, shaking his head slightly.

“Look in it properly, go on, stand where I am.” Regulus looked at the mirror curiously while Ron and Harry talked. It had some sort of writing on the top, but Regulus wasn’t sure what it said. It wasn’t in any language that he could recognize.

Ron exclaimed when he finally stood where Harry had been standing, telling them he saw himself holding the House cup and the Quidditch cup while wearing a Head Boy badge.

“Do you think this mirror shows the future?” Ron asked.

“How can it? All my family is dead... Regulus, you take a look,” Harry said, shoving Ron out of the way.

“Hey!” Ron protested as Regulus walked up to look in the mirror, ignoring Ron’s outburst.

Regulus watched as his eleven-year-old self vanished from the mirror and was replaced with an older version, his eighteen-year-old self. Except this wasn’t him exactly. He was wearing a short-sleeved muggle t-shirt, like the ones he always saw Sirius in, and his forearms were blank and unmarked. Standing beside him was James, smiling and wrapping his arms around Regulus's waist. The two of them grinned widely at each other and kissed softly, lovingly.

“Regulus? Are you okay?” He heard Harry say.

“Yes,” he said. His voice sounded rough and only then did he realize he was crying. He wiped at his eyes furiously, embarrassed that he had broken down so easily.

“What do you see?” Ron asked tentatively.

“It doesn’t matter,” Regulus said. “I don’t think we should be messing with this mirror.” Both of the boys looked unwilling to argue with him, it was clear that Harry was still anxious to look into it again and see his family, but Regulus's tears seemed to have unsettled him.

A sudden noise outside the room interrupted them, and they quickly ran back to their dorm to avoid being caught out of bed. They were lucky that no one caught them, even with the invisibility cloak, their footsteps were loud and echoey in the castle corridors. Regulus noticed Harry sneaking off the next night, but he didn't follow him, no matter how much he worried about the mirror's effect on the boy. He didn't know what that mirror was, but he wasn't interested in being taunted with what he could never have. He'd made his choice. Despite his insistence that he wouldn't waste his dwelling on the past, he still found himself ruminating on the 'if onlys.'

If only he hadn't taken the mark. If only he had run when Sirius did. If only he hadn't been sorted into Slytherin. If only he hadn't been a Black. The 'if onlys' seemed to run through his head on repeat, and he had more trouble than usual blocking them out after seeing what future he could have had. Regulus barely ate in the days after seeing the mirror and by the time school started back up, Regulus was shaking and disoriented from lack of food and sleep.

He heard Hermione chiding Harry for being out after hours and not using the cloak to research Flamel, but he was too disconnected to chime in. It didn't matter either way. He didn't want them looking to Flamel and he didn't want Harry going to the mirror, but what could he do? Steal the invisibility cloak from a child? No, he would never do that, no matter how much danger Harry could be in. That cloak belonged to Harry, it was likely one of the only pieces Harry had left of his father. It would feel like a betrayal to James to take it, and Regulus had betrayed James more than enough for one lifetime.

The beginning of term wasn't enough to bring him back; he was only shaken out of his funk when he found out that Snape would be refereeing the next Gryffindor Quidditch game.

Regulus knew that Snape hated Harry, but this seemed like an odd way to play out his vendetta. He wondered if Snape would do something to hurt Harry during the game, but it felt like it was far too public of a venue. Then again, if he was the one to jinx the broom the first time around, that was also far too public. He wondered why Snape wouldn't just go after Harry in private if that was his goal. The other children were positive that Snape would use the opportunity to hurt Harry, or worse, cause them to lose the game. Their words, not his.

The issue was moot though when Harry caught the snitch only a few minutes after the game began. His flying was impeccable as if he came out of the womb on a broom. Even James, as good of a Quidditch player as he was, couldn't fly like that without years of practice.

Disturbingly, Harry, Ron, and Hermione also discovered who Nicolas Flamel was shortly after the new year started. Regulus had underestimated them, he thought he at least had a few more months before they figured it. Though they figured out what was probably hidden at Hogwarts, Regulus didn't think it would necessarily put them in any more danger. He listened to them theorize about why Snape was trying to steal it, though the prospects of infinite wealth and immortality seemed like enough for them. All this meant to Regulus was that none of them knew that Snape had once served the Dark Lord. It was probably for the best, though Regulus himself didn't trust Snape, he didn't need a group of children planning to accuse a dangerous Death Eater of something at the wrong time.

The afternoon after the Quidditch game, Harry shared the details of a conversation he overheard between Snape and Quirrell where Snape threatened Quirrell before questioning him about how to get past Fluffy.

“So you mean the Stone’s only safe as long as Quirrell stands up to Snape?” Hermione said.

“It’ll be gone by next Tuesday,” Ron added.

Regulus agreed though it was clear that Quirrell had no idea how to get past Fluffy. Quirrell was a horrendous Defense teacher, so this didn’t surprise him. He spent many hours mulling over how he himself might get past a three-headed dog, but short of an extremely powerful sleeping draught, he wasn’t totally sure.

A creature that size would require a high-powered spell to kill it or even to knock it out, and it would most likely take more than one person to deal with it. Not to mention that Dumbledore would know immediately that someone had broken in and stolen the stone the moment he saw the dead animal. If someone were trying to be sneaky about it, they would have to knock Fluffy out for only a short enough time to get in and grab the stone.

Time picked up once the spring term began. Hermione started studying for finals ten weeks early and though Regulus didn’t need to study, he ended up joining her in the library most of the time, using the time to secretly research soul magic and dangerous animals. One afternoon, when Harry and Ron deigned to join them, they saw Hagrid in the library, an odd sight to be sure.

“Yer not still lookin’ for Nicolas Flamel, are yeh?” Hagrid asked. Way to bury the plot, Regulus thought. Hagrid was the absolute worst choice for hiding secrets, Regulus decided. Though he was a kind man, and Regulus was surprised by how much he liked him, he was very unimpressed with his ability to keep information to himself. Regulus would be annoyed if it wasn’t for how caring the half-giant was towards Harry, offering support and friendship that no other adult seemed to do.

“Oh, we found out who he is ages ago,” Ron said smugly.

“Hush,” Regulus hissed at him. Ron looked vaguely offended for a moment before it was replaced with the serious look that always crossed his face when Regulus told him to do something like he was a secret spy given an important mission. Regulus privately found the expression endearing. Something about a small child looking so responsible like he was mimicking an adult really tugged at his heartstrings.

“We’re not,” Regulus promised with an innocent smile. “Don’t worry.” Hagrid gave him a side-eyed look, clearly not believing him. Hagrid left a few moments later after asking them to come and see him.

“What was he hiding behind his back?” Hermione asked. Regulus was curious as well, but he didn’t feel like this boded well. Ron went to check the section Hagrid had been in and came back with a dismayed look on his face.

“Dragons,” he whispered importantly. “He was looking up stuff about dragons!”

“Hagrid’s always wanted a dragon, he told me so the first time I ever met him,” Harry said.

“Well, let’s stay out of it,” Regulus said before Ron could respond. “If Hagrid is trying to illegally obtain and raise a dragon in his wooden hut, then we should be as far away as possible.” Hermione nodded, but Ron and Harry looked unconvinced.

Later that night, Hermione, Ron, and Harry left to visit Hagrid, planning to talk to him about the Philosopher’s Stone. “Be subtle about it,” Regulus instructed.

“You’re not coming with us?” Harry asked while he threw on his heavy school cloak. Regulus had noticed that he almost always wore his school uniform, even on weekends and evenings.

“No, thank you,” Regulus said primly. “I am more than happy to remain here.”

Once they were gone, Regulus took a quick look through Harry’s trunk. He knew it was an invasion of privacy, but he was so curious about why Harry chose not to wear his own clothing. What he found was odd and disturbing. He owned only a few items of clothing, a few loose shirts that Regulus had seen Harry wear to bed in the warmer months, and two pairs of pants, both way too large for his small frame. He wondered if he was given anything besides underwear to wear to sleep in. The clothes were worn and old, plus they had a slight smell to them, like old sweat, that must have been permanently staining the fabric if even the house elves couldn’t get them out.

Regulus had spent the year accumulating more and more unpleasant facts about Harry’s home life, and this just compounded on the disturbing details. He felt rage sear through him, hot and painful, but when it faded all he felt was guilt. Yes, Regulus hadn’t been around when Harry was growing up, still drowned in the cave, but he felt a semblance of responsibility for the boy. He cared about him, and it was becoming clearer every day that he was one of the few adults who did.

He wasn’t sure what to do about that for the time being, though he knew he would have to tell someone else and, hopefully, encourage someone who had the power to help to do so, but for now, he decided to fix the problem in front of him. He worried that Harry would be embarrassed if Regulus bought all his clothes for him, and since Christmas had already passed, he decided to collect a fuller wardrobe, fit for a well-taken-care-of wizard child, and give it to him for his birthday. He lounged on the bed after deciding this, making a list of everything he would need to purchase, and waited for the others to return.

Of course, it turned out that Hagrid had somehow obtained a dragon egg, supposedly winning it in a game of cards with a stranger, and one morning at breakfast, Harry received a note telling him the egg was hatching. Regulus trailed after them as they went down to Hagrid's hut to check it out after their lessons. He should have known that it would be a terrible idea.

"Hagrid," Hermione said uncertainly as the dragon burst out of its egg, "how fast do Norwegian Ridgebacks grow, exactly?" Regulus watched on nervously. He had never encountered a dragon in person, and it wasn't something he'd ever planned to do. When he was a child, Sirius used to tell him stories about dragon tamers and the exciting, adventurous lives they lived, always talking with clear hero worship, but all the stories did was make Regulus nervous. He remembered having nightmares for weeks about Sirius being attacked and eaten by a dragon. Though the dragon in front of him was as small as a puppy, he still felt a cold sweat break out on the back of his neck.

"Someone was lookin' through the gap in the curtains." Regulus heard Hagrid say when he finally started listening to the conversation again. Harry ran to the door and looked out.

"It was Malfoy!" Harry yelled. "Great! Malfoy saw the dragon. Of course, he did." Harry looked so forlorn that Regulus almost laughed out loud. He managed to keep it in though, holding back the laughter when he realized how bad it could be for them, Hagrid especially, if Draco told anyone.

Regulus could understand Harry's worry over the situation, but all Draco seemed to do was smirk at Harry about it, not much of a plan if you asked Regulus. Regardless, it presented the opportunity for them to convince Hagrid to get rid of the thing. Dragon breeding was highly illegal and Hagrid lived on the grounds of a school with children living in it. Needless to say, Regulus was more than happy to hear that Hagrid agreed to let Charlie, Ron's older brother, handle the dragon.

Charlie agreed to take the dragon but asked they get it to the Astronomy Tower at midnight in order for him and his friends to pick it up, which seemed ridiculous to Regulus. Why couldn't they just travel straight to Hagrid's hut instead of asking Hagrid to carry a rapidly growing dragon up to the top of a tower? Of course, it wasn't Hagrid who was going to do it, but Harry and Ron. This was about the time that Regulus put his foot down.

"Tell Charlie no," Regulus said. "There is barely any difference between flying from the Astronomy Tower to flying to Hagrid's hut, especially if it's at midnight on a Saturday."

"We can't tell him no," Ron said bewilderedly, like Regulus had just suggested spitting in the Minister of Magic's face.

"I'm sure he has a good reason for asking," Harry added pragmatically. "Besides, I don't mind. Anything to get rid of Norbert... and Malfoy." Regulus rolled his eyes. If Regulus had a Galleon for every time Harry brought up Draco in conversation, he would be a very rich man. Not that he wasn't already absurdly rich, but still.

“Okay, then make Hagrid carry him up there,” Regulus argued. Hagrid was the adult for Merlin’s sake, there was no reason a group of children should be handling this problem.

“He probably can’t go up there that easily, given how big he is,” Ron said.

“This is ridiculous. You two should not be in charge of this. You’re going to get caught,” Regulus argued. “You’re going to get expelled if they find you out of bed moving an illegal dragon through the castle.”

“I have the cloak, it shouldn’t be that difficult,” Harry said.

“Shouldn’t be that difficult? Are you crazy?” Regulus all but yelled.

“Relax Reg, it’s not a big deal. You don’t have to help,” Harry said. Regulus paused for a second at the nickname but decided to let it slide for the time being.

“Of course, I’m going to help. I’m not just going to leave you two on your own,” Regulus said. Harry and Ron shared a look of exasperation.

The night they moved Norbert ended up only being Harry and Regulus after Ron was bitten by the dragon and had to spend the night in the Hospital Wing. The cloak wasn’t quite big enough to fit three children and the dragon’s cage, so Hermione stayed behind. The plan was fraught from the beginning when Draco took the book that Ron had stored Charlie’s letter in, meaning Draco knew their exact plan for the night.

They stayed hidden throughout the castle easily with the help of the cloak and were treated to the sight of Draco getting detention when McGonagall found him roaming the halls looking for Harry. Why he didn’t just give the note to a teacher beforehand seemed ridiculous, but of course, Draco would want to personally witness Harry getting into trouble. Regulus noticed Harry smirking when they got to the top of the staircase but decided not to mention it. He didn’t think they had time for a full Draco rant in the middle of their task.

They almost got away with it all, watching Charlie’s friends swoop down on broomsticks and fly away with the dragon - which Regulus found insulting, he couldn’t even come himself - but they made the dumb mistake of forgetting the cloak at the top of the tower, and were caught on their way down by Filch. Regulus could have hit himself in the head. It was such a rookie mistake, but what was done was done.

Both them, plus Draco and Neville, who was out of bed for the express purpose of warning Harry, were given detention and they lost a total of 150 points for Gryffindor. Harry and Neville were both extremely sulky about this, but Regulus wasn’t exactly bothered. The thought of house points barely crossed his mind during his first go around at Hogwarts, and he cared even less now.

The detention they were given was to be served with Hagrid, which Regulus found ironic given he was the reason they got detention in the first place. When he found out they were going into the Forbidden Forest at night, he just about started screaming at Hagrid. He only barely managed to hold his tongue.

As he watched Neville and Draco head off with Fang, alone in the forest, Regulus wondered if perhaps Hagrid was trying to get them all killed. The run-in with the centaur named Ronan put Regulus even more on edge.

“Always the innocent are the first victims,” Ronan said when Hagrid mentioned something killing unicorns. “So it has been for ages past, so it is now.” Regulus shuddered when he heard the words. It felt like Ronan knew more than he was letting on, but then again, it wasn’t uncommon for centaurs to keep information to themselves.

“Hagrid! Look! Red sparks, the others are in trouble!” Regulus heard Harry yell shortly after Ronan left them, trotting deeper into the forest. Hagrid took off toward the sparks, leaving Harry and Regulus alone in the forest. Regulus pulled his wand and looked around warily.

The minutes seemed to drag by, but eventually, Hagrid found them again, Draco and Neville in tow.

“Right, we’re changin’ groups - Neville, you stay with me an’ Regulus, Harry, you go with Fang an’ this idiot,” Hagrid said, then leaned down to whisper something to Harry.

“Wait,” Regulus interrupted, “it’s fine, I’ll go with Draco. Harry, you stay with Neville and Hagrid.” Regulus did not feel comfortable being separated from Harry, but he felt like Harry would be safer with Hagrid by his side, even if Hagrid was the one to drag them out there. Regulus did not like the odds of both Draco and Harry coming back intact if they set off together in the forest.

Regulus and Draco set off into the forest with Fang and walked in complete silence for a solid few minutes before Draco started speaking.

“Are you actually a Black?” Draco asked, his tiny, high-pitched voice filled with disdain.

“Yes, of course,” Regulus said, giving Draco a sidelong look. Draco was watching him through narrowed eyes.

“Who are you even related to?” Draco asked though Regulus felt like that was a dumb way to phrase the question given he and Draco were also related. Still, he understood the point of what Draco was asking.

“Sirius Black,” Regulus answered. “He’s my father.” He still felt uncomfortable telling this lie. Every time he said his brother’s name, he had to swallow down the anger that threatened to overwhelm him. Pretending to be the son of that traitor was difficult, to say the least.

“Who’s your mom?” Draco said after a second. Regulus wondered how much he knew about Sirius — if Narcissa ever mentioned him.

“She’s from France, you wouldn’t know her.” Regulus was used to this excuse. He wondered if anyone would ever grow suspicious of why they would never meet the imaginary woman.

“Is she a pureblood?” Draco asked with grave importance. Regulus wasn’t exactly surprised by the questions, Lucius and Narcissa no doubt instilling the importance of blood purity into Draco at a very young age, but he was surprised by how frank the question was. Clearly, Draco lacked the delicacy of conversation that Narcissa had perfected by his age.

“Yes,” Regulus answered confidently like he wasn’t making the entire thing up. He figured it was easier to go with the lie that she was a pureblood, plus he still couldn’t shake the feeling of shame that came along with possibly pretending to be a half-blood, though that feeling of shame was always paired with an unwavering feeling of guilt to go along with it.

“I don’t believe you,” Draco said snootily. Regulus wondered if he needed to be worried about Draco. Right now he was more than focused on Harry, but if he chose to look too closely into Regulus’s backstory, he might be able to figure out the lie, especially with the help of Narcissa.

“I don’t care,” Regulus replied, though he cared very much. Draco figuring out his secret could be very bad for him. “You better be quiet, otherwise all that noise you’re making might attract a werewolf.” Regulus saw Draco looking away nervously, even though it wasn’t a full moon and there were many more dangerous things in the forest beyond werewolves.

“What is that?” Draco said a few minutes later. Regulus followed where he was pointing and saw the unicorn’s blood pooling on the forest floor, the silvery glint shining like liquified metal.

Draco and Regulus watched in horror as a cloaked figure walked out of the shadows and approached the dead unicorn the blood was dripping from. Its knees bent the wrong way, giving it an uncanny effect that made Regulus feel vaguely ill. When the figure reached the unicorn and lowered its head to drink its blood, Draco let out a loud scream and ran with Fang following close behind.

Regulus whipped his wand out and watched as the figure turned to look at him. It staggered to its feet and prowled towards him. Regulus had no idea what or who would be out in the forest drinking unicorn’s blood, but he knew that there was only one reason that someone might indulge in the cursed liquid, immortality. Even with the grave cost, there were still those desperate enough to drink the substance if it meant staying alive.

The figure was wraithlike and Regulus could only think of one person who might appear as such. He’s out here in the forest, drinking unicorn’s blood. His thoughts were spinning rapidly in his head. He’s in the same forest as Harry.

He pointed his wand at the approaching figure and tried to summon every modicum of hatred he felt for the Dark Lord. You have to mean it, he heard Bellatrix’s voice echo in his ear. She had tried to teach him how to cast the Killing Curse when he was thirteen, far too young to be safely using dark magic, and again when he was first marked as a Death Eater, but he never could make the spell work. He remembered trying to cast it at a muggle woman during a raid and watching in surprise as it seemed to hit her and dissolve. He vowed not to make the same mistake again now.

A Killing Curse wouldn't truly kill the Dark Lord, not with the locket tucked away in Grimmauld Place still intact, but it would make Harry that much safer, possibly at least destroying the wraith-like body in front of him.

"Avada —" he began but was cut off by the loud sound of hooves behind him. The cloaked figure shuffled back before taking off into the forest just as a centaur galloped into the clearing.

"Are you all right?" the centaur asked in a silky, deep voice.

"Yes," Regulus said, half relieved and half disappointed, the hatred he felt was still stuck inside him, now with nowhere to go.

"You had better get back to Hagrid. The forest is not safe at this time. Can you ride? It will be quicker this way," the centaur said as he lowered himself to allow Regulus to climb on. Regulus did not want to ride on the back of a centaur, but he knew it would be rude to refuse. What would Mother think? The unwelcome thought cropped up and Regulus batted it away quickly. "My name is Firenze."

"Regulus," he offered in response.

"Yes, you are," Firenze responded mysteriously. Firenze was interrupted by Ronan and Bane and Regulus tuned out their inane conversation. Instead, he thought about the Dark Lord, roaming freely out in the forest. How easily Harry could have been the one to come into contact with him tonight. After arguing with them, Firenze eventually left Ronan and Bane, and he and Regulus traveled in silence until they found the others.

"Regulus! Reg, are you all right?" Harry was running toward them down the path, Hagrid trailing along behind him.

"I'm fine," Regulus said, climbing off Firenze's back. Harry was very distraught once Regulus walked over to him. He grabbed Regulus's arms tightly and seemed to check him over for injuries. "I'm all right," Regulus said, helplessly chuckling at Harry's worry.

Ron and Hermione were asleep in the common room when they got back and Regulus gave them an abridged version of what happened in the forest. Draco had told Harry and the others about the cloaked figure, but he clearly didn't know who it was, so Regulus left that part out as well. There was no reason to worry the children with the prospect of the Dark Lord wandering around the Forbidden Forest right outside of Hogwarts.

Ron and Hermione seemed very interested in who it was under the cloak, but Harry was mostly distracted by his own self-condemnation.

"You didn't want to help in the first place and I talked you into it!" Harry ranted. "You could have died. I almost got you killed."

"You didn't almost get me killed," Regulus replied, rolling his eyes at the young boy's dramatics. "I agreed to help you willingly, and it was also partially my fault that we left the cloak in the Astronomy Tower.” Harry did not look mollified by this, but he didn't argue back.

“I can’t believe Draco just ran away and left you,” Ron said.

“No,” Regulus disagreed. “Draco did the right thing. What was he going to do? Fight off someone that killed a unicorn?” Ron looked surprised by what Regulus said, but Hermione nodded in agreement. Harry merely looked unsure. “If any of you come across something like that, you need to run away too.”

Regulus could tell immediately that Harry didn’t agree with him. His face was doing something strange as he listened like he was more determined than ever that he should stay and fight this hypothetical enemy. Regulus did not feel good about what that look might mean for the future.

Taking first-year exams for the second time around felt almost like cheating. He could have completed them in his sleep. He felt slightly ridiculous trying to purposefully do worse on them than he could have, but he knew it would only draw unneeded attention to him if he was first in his class. The year had flown by far faster than he expected, he could barely believe that the term was almost over. He hadn't made any progress on his Horcrux problem nor had he figured out how to get past Fluffy. He'd never felt more useless in his life and taking sham exams didn't help.

After exams, he followed Harry, Ron, and Hermione out onto the grounds to relax.

Harry was complaining about pain in his cursed scar, rubbing his hand across his forehead as he winced. Regulus found it odd that a scar that old would still hurt him, but cursed scars had a reputation for having a mind of their own. Nonetheless, he thought it was concerning. Hermione was in the middle of telling Harry to go see Madam Pomfrey when he suddenly leaped to his feet.

“I’ve just thought of something. We’ve got to go and see Hagrid, now.” He took off running immediately and the rest of them had no choice but to get up and follow. Harry rambled on about the dragon egg Hagrid had won as he ran, but Regulus was having a hard time following his train of thought.

“And did he seem interested in Fluffy?” Harry asked while peppering Hagrid with questions about the person who gave him the egg. Oh no, Regulus thought. Of course, there were only two people who knew how to get passed the monstrous dog: Hagrid and Dumbledore. It wasn’t Quirrell that they needed to worry about, no it was Hagrid all along.

“We’ve got to go to Dumbledore,” Harry said as they sprinted back up to the castle. “Where’s Dumbledore’s office?”

“This way,” Regulus said, guiding them toward the Headmaster’s Tower entrance. He’d never actually been inside the office, but he at least knew where it was.

“What are you three doing inside?” McGonagall interrupted them as they sped down one of the hallways.

“We need to speak with Dumbledore,” Regulus said solemnly.

“Professor Dumbledore,” she corrected, then seemed to realize what he had said. “Why?”

“Professor Dumbledore left ten minutes ago,” she responded coldly. “He received an urgent owl from the Ministry of Magic and flew off for London at once.”

“When will he be back?” Regulus said, interrupting whatever Harry was about to say.

“I’m not sure how that is any of your business,” she said. “What is it you need to discuss with him?”

“It can wait, we will talk to him when he gets back.” Harry, Ron, and Hermione all looked incredulously at him and McGonagall looked irritated. “Thank you, Professor,” he added and grabbed Harry to drag him away, Ron and Hermione following just a bit slower.

“What was that? We have to tell her about the stone!” Harry said, ripping his arm away once the four of them were out of sight.

“We can’t just bring it up to her, she’s going to wonder how we know about it,” Regulus explained.

“Who cares! It could be in danger. Snape could have already stolen it,” Ron nearly yelled.

“Exactly,” Regulus responded. “Hagrid was given that egg months ago, the stone could already be gone, we have no way of knowing.” Regulus wondered if there would be any way to tell if the stone was already being used by the Dark Lord. He almost wished he still had the Mark so he could know if the Dark Lord was calling his followers. “However, if it’s still there -”

“Then we need to get it first,” Harry said, that determined look back on his little face.

“You’re not suggesting that we try to get into the trap door,” Hermione said, scandalized. It was the first thing she had said in a while, still looking bewildered by the turn of events.

“If he hasn’t stolen it yet, then it’s unlikely he will steal it right now. We should wait until Dumbledore gets back,” Regulus argued, but he could already tell that it was a losing battle. Once the three Gryffindors set their mind to something, it was almost impossible to sway them. Regulus wished that he had spent more time trying to figure out how to get passed the three-headed dog, he felt like he had done nothing but waste time this year.

“I can’t let him get that stone,” Harry said seriously.

“It’s not your responsibility,” Regulus said as harshly as he could manage. Why Harry felt the need to stop Snape, like it was his job alone, Regulus would never know. He never met a kid who was so willing to shoulder responsibility.

“If he comes back, then he’s going to try and kill me,” Harry added.

“If who comes back?” Regulus asked nonplussed.

“Voldemort!” Harry yelled. Regulus flinched violently at the name.

“What? How?” Regulus asked, trying to organize his thoughts enough to ask a full question. Harry, along with Ron and Hermione, suddenly looked very guilty. He wondered how long they had been discussing this topic. There was no way they should know about the Dark Lord in the forest. “Explain,” Regulus said firmly.

“Well,” Harry started slowly, “Hagrid told me that he thought he was still alive, ‘too weak to go on,’ he said. And with the thing you saw in the forest—”

“Drinking unicorn blood is considered incredibly evil,” Hermione interrupted, taking over the explanation. “It’s supposed to keep a person alive even if they’re on the brink of death. I looked it up.”

“Why didn’t you tell me about this?” Regulus demanded. They all shared a glance, but Harry was the one to answer, taking the lead as he always did.

“Because you were the one to see him, I didn’t want you to worry. I mean, you literally came face to face with him in the forest,” Harry explained. Regulus rolled his eyes so hard that it hurt.

“You should have told me, okay? I could have helped you, or explained what I saw.”

“Wait,” Hermione said, “you knew who it was?” Harry’s guilty look was replaced with one of accusation.

“I had my theories. Firenze, the centaur, may have mentioned something,” Regulus said vaguely. “But it’s not your responsibility to worry about that monster. Hogwarts is supposed to be safe.” Harry still looked extremely put out but seemed to shake off the feeling, his focus narrowing back to their most pressing topic.

“Well, we still need to get the stone before he does. If he is capable of surviving without unicorn blood, then he’s going to try and kill me.” Regulus couldn’t argue with that, given that it was the exact reason for him attending Hogwarts for a second time around, but he also did not like the fact that Harry was so aware of the danger he was in. He felt like it was too much for a child to bear.

Regulus grunted in frustration. “Fine! Then I will go down and get the stone.” All three of their mouths dropped open. “You guys should go back up to the common room and I’ll meet you there.” Now that he knew how to get passed Fluffy, he figured it would be easier to steal the stone. He at least felt like he had a fighting chance.

“You’re not going down there alone!” Hermione said, her voice taking on a shrill quality that reminded him of McGonagall.

“Yes, I am,” Regulus replied matter-of-factly.

“Why you and not me? I’m the one Voldemort’s after,” Harry said fiercely. Regulus flinched again but tried his best to stop himself. He wished Harry would stop throwing that name around.

“Because I’m more experienced,” Regulus said, though his voice sounded slightly shakier. Ron looked mollified like this statement made all the sense in the world, which perhaps it did after Regulus had killed the troll. Harry only rolled his eyes like Regulus was throwing a fit. Hermione, however, looked extremely suspicious, like something she was already unsure of had just been revealed.

“I’m going with you,” Harry said. Regulus opened his mouth to argue but was interrupted.

“I am too,” Hermione said.

“Me too,” Ron added.

“No, we can’t all go,” Regulus said. “None of you should go,” he corrected. “There is no reason for us all to be in danger. I’ll be fine on my own.”

“Then I’ll fight it,” Regulus responded. “I killed that troll just fine.”

“Just give it up already, Regulus,” Ron said, shrugging.

“I will not give it up already, this is serious,” Regulus said exasperatedly.

“Exactly,” Harry agreed. “So there is no way you’re getting rid of us.” Regulus threw his hands up in the air helplessly. Harry nodded like this had all been settled.

“Right, so we will go after curfew, that way there will be fewer professors out,” Harry said.

“Fine,” Regulus said and followed them up to the common room, already making an alternate plan for how to get around them. He figured he could knock them out early, he knew a semi-gentle sleeping spell that his father would use of him and Sirius when they were children. It wasn’t exactly ethical, but at least it would keep them out of danger. However, the moment he was inside the common room, he felt jittery and restless. They all settled on the couches in front of the fire, but after a few minutes, Regulus jumped up. “I’m going for a walk.”

He was up and out the door before any of them could respond. He just needed to walk off some of his energy, get a minute to clear his head and process the fact that Harry knew about the Dark Lord and his desire to hurt Harry. He wasn’t even sure what his plan was until he found himself in the third-floor corridor.

He didn't have an instrument to play music, but he thought he remembered a spell that would emulate a few notes of the piano. Melumcantis, he remembered. He thought about one of his friends from school, Pandora, who would often use the spell when she was studying in various places around the castle. He practiced a few times before he opened the door. It wasn't perfect, but Regulus thought it would work well enough.

There was no time like the present, he thought. He didn't want to wait till the evening, he felt like he needed to go after the stone now. He opened the door and immediately cast the spell.

"Melumcantus," he whispered. He heard the quiet piano carry out of the tip of his wand and it instantly helped him relax. He stayed just barely in the doorway, keeping the door cracked open so he could slam it shut if the dog lunged at him. He thought the spell was working okay until he heard a voice yell behind him.

"Hey!" it said, and Regulus slammed the door shut on instinct, spinning around to see Harry, Ron, and Hermione running down the corridor toward him. Regulus knew it was a bad plan to go ahead right away, but he figured he at least had an hour or so before they found him, not following him immediately. In retrospect, he had been incredibly dumb. He somehow still wasn't used to being surrounded by Gryffindors, especially ones who actually paid attention to him. His Slytherin friends, if he could even really call them that, during his first life, couldn't have cared less what Regulus was up to.

"What do you think you're doing?" Hermione said accusingly.

"Nothing," Regulus said. I swear I used to be a much better liar than this, he thought.

Harry didn't say anything, but Regulus could tell he was mad. He shoved Regulus to the side and pulled something out of his cloak pocket. It took a few seconds for Regulus to realize that it was the flute Hagrid had given Harry for Christmas.

Harry opened the door, slamming it open fully without caution, and immediately started playing the flute. Perhaps playing was too generous a term because it sounded horrendous, but Fluffy seemed to enjoy it because it only took a few moments before the dog was laying down its three giant heads and closing its eyes. Regulus ignored them all and walked forward to shove the dog's paw out of the way and open the trap door.

It was pitch black and Regulus wanted nothing less than to slam it shut and leave the room, just abandon the plan and let the Dark Lord steal the stupid stone, but when he looked up at the other three kids in the room with him, he knew he couldn't run. They would surely go on without him and he could never let them face whatever was down the trapdoor alone.

"I think it would be better if you just let me go alone," Regulus tried again. "Then you could go get help if I don't make it back," he added. Harry handed the flute to Ron who started playing it right away.

"We're coming with you. Hermione is right, it's better if we're together," Harry said, his voice calm and collected.

It was strange at that moment because, for so much of the year, Regulus had looked at Harry and thought of James. Harry looked so much like him, the same hair, the same smile, the jokes and troublemaking, the fierce way he watched Draco every time the little blonde boy entered a room, but Regulus didn't see James so much anymore. He never knew Lily, but he wondered if this level-headed stoic determination came from her. Or perhaps it was just Harry, a person of his own making.

“Okay,” Regulus conceded and before he could think any further, he threw his legs over the side and let himself fall through the trap door.

The protections for the stone were extremely odd. The Devil’s Snare was dangerous no doubt, but easily avoidable if you knew anything about Herbology. Regulus cast a lumos maxima almost by second nature, freeing the others from the plant. Catching the key required flying skills, but not even particularly good ones as even Hermione could have done it, though perhaps not as quickly as Harry managed to. The chessboard unsettled Regulus more than he’d like to admit. Why would the protection for an extremely powerful stone include a high-stakes game of chess?

The chess game was also when things started to go awry. Regulus had always been okay at chess, passable, but not terribly good at it. Harry was much the same it turned out and Hermione was absolutely terrible, so Ron took charge and played for them. It seemed to go fine until Ron had to sacrifice his own piece and ended up knocked out on the side of the room. Regulus cast a quick diagnostic spell on him, not even bothering to temper his skill level in front of the other two children, and determined that he was mostly fine, only suffering from a small concussion.

It was all very dramatic, but Regulus was more worried about what came next. Hermione, rather reluctantly, stayed behind with Ron and started heading back to get him to Madam Pomfrey while Harry and Regulus went on.

The next room was a giant troll, like the one Regulus killed on Halloween. Regulus knew something was very wrong then because he seemed to take care of it relatively easily on Halloween, so why would they keep something that an eleven-year-old could defeat as part of the elaborate protections? Regulus didn’t think he had it in him to kill another troll, and he was not interested in being covered in entrails again, so they had to improvise. They ended up using a combination of stinging hexes, stunning spells, and the troll’s own club to knock the thing unconscious. It was made easier by the fact that the troll was moving slowly and lethargically like it had been down there for a long time without food.

The next room was a potions riddle. It required no actual knowledge of potions, only the ability to think through a word problem. Regulus found this particularly bizarre. They knew that Snape was one of the professors protecting the stone so it wasn’t a surprise that he would make a potion-related protection, but why not make it into something only a potion’s master would know how to get through? Regulus made quick work of the potion riddle, but there was only enough to get one of them through to the next room.

“I’ll go,” Harry said grimly, but Regulus only rolled his eyes.

“No, you won’t,” Regulus said. “I’m better equipped to deal with anything beyond that door than you are.” Harry looked like he was about to argue, but seemed to realize that there wasn’t anything he could say that would convince Regulus to let him through the door. “Besides, I’m the one who figured out the riddle so it should be me.”

“You should head back and find Hermione,” Regulus suggested. “We don't know what's behind that door, so it's safer if you leave.”

“Exactly, we don't know, so I'm going to wait here and if you don't come back then I'll go get help.” Harry crossed his arms and Regulus thought that he looked very grown up for an eleven-year-old, more mature than Regulus ever felt at that age. It was unnerving in a way that he couldn't express. It almost made Regulus feel regretful like Harry was being robbed of an easy, carefree childhood.

“Okay,” Regulus agreed. “I'll be back.” He drank the smallest bottle of potion and proceeded through the black flames. It felt like walking through ice and Regulus wondered for a moment if he had made a mistake in deciphering the riddle, but then he was through and in the next chamber.

It was a wide open space with stone pillars along the oval walls. In the center of the dimly lit room was the mirror Harry showed him during Christmas break. Regulus was not looking forward to seeing his older self and James again, the last time had nearly broken him, but he knew he needed to get the stone.

He stepped forward to look in the mirror properly and was surprised when all he saw was his eleven-year-old self looking back at him. All he could think about was finding the stupid stone so that the Dark Lord couldn't get his hands on it. Maybe he would even destroy it if he could manage such a thing, though he still hadn't figured out how to destroy the other powerful magical object in his care. But if it would prevent the Dark Lord from using it, he would figure out a way.

He looked around the details of the mirror, inspecting the carvings above it, but couldn't make sense of this puzzle. Every other trial had been easily understood, but this one stumped him. He looked back at himself in the mirror and jolted when he noticed the smirk curved across his face. It was uncanny to see himself with a look that he had so often worn in his past life. His mirror self had his hands in his pockets, but when he noticed the real Regulus watching, he pulled out one hand and lifted it to his face to inspect it. It was only then that Regulus realized that his mirror self was holding something. His mirror self looked back at Regulus before winking and putting the object in his robe's inner pocket.

“What?” Regulus said aloud. He brushed his hands along his robe and felt something that wasn't there before. He reached into his pocket and pulled out the object, a small red crystal. The stone. “How?” Regulus asked, but of course, there was no answer.

He hadn't done anything yet and he couldn't figure out what had triggered the mirror to give him the stone. The realization caused him to shiver slightly. It was too easy. Something had to be wrong. Why would this be hidden so poorly? All anyone would need to do is come in and look in the mirror. The trials were so easy that any moderately skilled wizard could have gotten through them.

He shook off the thoughts. He would have to figure out later why it was so easy. For now, Harry was still waiting in the potion room for Regulus to return and Regulus was not keen on leaving him there alone for too long. He rushed back out of the chamber and through the black flames to find Harry leaning against the wall.

“Did you get it?” Harry said excitedly. Regulus reached into his pocket and drew the stone out to show the boy. “Woah, what did you have to do?”

“It was the mirror,” Regulus told him. “The one you showed me during Christmas break.”

“The Mirror of Erised,” Harry said. Regulus looked at him questioningly. “It shows you your heart’s desire or something, that’s what Dumbledore told me.”

“Oh,” Regulus said, thinking of his own vision in the mirror. “Do you know how he could have hidden the stone in it? I didn’t do anything except look in the mirror.” Harry shrugged and shook his head.

“No idea,” Harry replied.

“Well, let’s not worry about it for now. We should get out of here before anyone else comes.” Harry agreed easily and the two of them drank from the rounded bottle that would get them back through the flames and started heading back toward the entrance.

Regulus should have known that the other shoe was about to drop. Things had been far too easy, despite Ron’s injury, and there was no way they were making it back through the chambers unscathed. It reminded him of the cave when he first stood staring at the potion before he ended up surrounded by inferi. They were making their way back across the chessboard when the door on the opposite end of the room opened.

The first thought Regulus had was that the troll made sense now. Who had alerted them on Halloween night that there was a troll in the dungeon? It should have been obvious in retrospect. Of course, this realization was lost on Harry.

“He’s come to get the stone for Snape,” Harry whispered.

“No, I don’t think that’s right,” Regulus said, drawing his wand.

“You two,” Quirrell said, shocked. “What are you doing down here?”

“Could ask you the same question,” Regulus said, taking a step toward the stuttering teacher, although that stutter now seemed to be mysteriously missing.

“Is Snape with you?” Harry demanded, stepping up beside Regulus.

“Severus?” Quirrell laughed. “Yes, Severus does seem the type, doesn’t he?”

“It was you this whole time,” Regulus interrupted. “Snape was trying to stop you, wasn’t he?”

“What?” Harry said, whipping his head around to look at Regulus. “But Snape tried to kill me!”

“No, no, no,” Quirrell said, speaking to Harry and giving Regulus an appraising look. “I tried to kill you.” Quirrell explained how he had been the one to jinx Harry’s broom, but Regulus had stopped listening. He could feel a chill on his skin, a cold sweat breaking out on his forehead. There was something else in the room with them, and he needed to get Harry out as soon as possible.

“Snape was trying to save me?” Harry asked. That at least explained partially why Snape, the Death Eater, was teaching at Hogwarts. He must have had some deal with Dumbledore, especially if he was trying to save Harry despite his obvious dislike of the boy.

Regulus thought that perhaps he could sneak in a spell while Quirrell was talking, but he figured he only had one chance to catch him unaware. After that, he would lose the element of surprise and now that he knew Quirrell was faking his stuttering, fearful behavior, Regulus had no gauge for how the professor would handle a fight.

“You let the troll in?” Harry asked incredulously. Regulus focused all of his energy on his magic. He only had one shot and he needed to make sure it landed. He couldn’t risk Harry being hurt. Regulus had never been particularly adept at wordless magic, but he didn’t want to give Quirrell a heads up, so he focused on the same spell he used on the troll, a vicious blasting curse, and shot it off.

Regulus should have realized that Quirrell was watching him far too easily for it to work. He blocked the spell and sent it bounding off where it hit one of the chess pieces, shattering that piece into several shards.

“Foolish boy,” Quirrell said, but Regulus barely listened. He stepped in front of Harry, blocking him with his body, and fired again, much weaker but still quickly and wordlessly. Quirrell blocked his spell again, before shooting off one of his own. Regulus just barely had time to throw up a Protego before Quirrell was aiming another hex at him.

“No, I’m not leaving you,” Harry said fiercely.

“Let me speak to them,” a raspy voice spoke, causing a painful shudder to ripple through Regulus’s body. Quirrell stopped fighting, but Regulus still kept his shield in place, though he was too shocked to continue their duel.

“Master, you are not strong enough!” Quirrell said fearfully. No, Regulus thought. He grabbed Harry by the arm and pulled him fully behind Regulus since Harry had stepped out to face Quirrell once again.

“We need to get out of here,” Regulus said quietly. Harry grabbed onto the back of his cloak tightly.

“I have strength enough... for this...” the voice spoke. Regulus felt like he was going to be sick. Quirrell unwrapped the turban from his head deftly and turned his back on them. On the back of his head, was a face, a horribly mutilated face with a long stretched mouth, red eyes, and slits for a nose.

“Harry Potter,” the face whispered. Regulus felt the hand on the back of his cloak twist in fear. “And Regulus Black... another one.” Regulus raised his wand a little higher, but his hand was shaking too much for it to be intimidating.

“See what I have become? Mere shadow and vapor —” the face said.

“You’re...” Regulus said, interrupting the face, his voice quivering slightly. Regulus swallowed quickly and tried to make his voice sound more firm so it wouldn’t shake. “You’re the Dark Lord.”

“You look so much like him,” the Dark Lord said, looking directly into Regulus's eyes, “Your name's sake. I did wonder what became of him.” Regulus met the red eyes head-on, though he wanted desperately to look away, to look at the floor in front of him like he always did when he met the Dark Lord in the past. Although this version of the Dark Lord wasn’t like the one Regulus had known. Though he never looked quite human and the red eyes made an appearance often, he still looked alive, but this thing on the back of Quirrell’s head looked like a monster out of a storybook. Horrific and twisted in a way that shouldn’t even be possible.

Regulus felt frozen to the spot, trapped with the monster he had betrayed. The monster that was after Harry, the one who had killed Harry’s parents, had killed James. Regulus didn’t fully understand how he could even be alive enough to attach himself to Quirrell, but that hardly mattered when he was face to face with him.

“He was quite the cowardly thing, the Regulus Black I knew,” the Dark Lord continued. “He would have never dared to draw his wand against me, too afraid of what might be done to him.” There was a cruel mirth in his voice now and Regulus couldn’t help but bristle at the sound of it. “Although there was talk,” he said, “whispers that he was too afraid to truly join us.”

“You don’t know anything,” Regulus spat. He hadn’t meant to speak, but the words just spilled out of him.

“Don’t I?” It was then that Regulus felt a slight pressure on his mind and he slammed his Occlumency walls shut as fast as possible, though the fear was now permeating throughout his body. How much had he seen? Regulus wondered. The Dark Lord hummed curiously. “Now... why don’t you give me that stone in your pocket?”

Regulus took a step backward and Harry stepped with him, watching over Regulus's shoulder, his whole body shaking slightly. Regulus had almost forgotten that Harry was there with how silent he was being. Regulus didn’t blame him. Though having the Dark Lord focus on him was terrifying, he preferred it to the alternative of Harry being targeted. The only thing Regulus could think of now was getting Harry out safely. He wanted to keep the stone safe, but if it was between that and Harry surviving, then he would choose Harry every time. Regulus pointed his wand at the Dark Lord, preparing to fight.

“Don’t be a fool,” the Dark Lord snarled, his face morphing with rage. “Better to save your own life and join me. Or you’ll meet the same end as the last Regulus, begging me for mercy.” This was surprisingly a relief to hear. It meant that the Dark Lord hadn’t seen enough to know how Regulus truly died.

“NEVER!” Regulus shouted, firing off a spell before he grabbed Harry by the arm and started pulling him across the room, trying to get past the Dark Lord and Quirrell.

“Seize him!” The Dark Lord screamed and Quirrell whirled around and grabbed Harry by the wrist. Harry screamed in pain, much more pain than he should have given where Quirrell was grabbing him. One of his small hands shot up and touched the scar on his forehead, his face curled in anguish. Regulus prepared to hit Quirrell with a spell when Quirrell suddenly let go of Harry and stumbled back.

“Master, I cannot hold him — my hands — my hands!” Regulus pulled Harry again, though Harry was moving noticeably slower, still clearly feeling residual pain in his scar.

They were almost to the door when the Dark Lord screamed, “Then kill them, fool, and be done!”

Quirrell raised his wand and Regulus did as well, but Harry was faster. He wrenched his arm free from Regulus's grasp, running over and grabbing Quirrell's face. Quirrell screamed loudly. His face was blistering as his hand had been. Regulus watched in horror as Harry grabbed onto Quirrell's arm and held on as tight as he could, Quirrell screaming and trying to throw him off the entire time.

The Dark Lord was screaming as well, but Quirrell's body was quickly disintegrating. Regulus could only watch in shock, but finally shook himself when he noticed that Harry was quickly losing consciousness. Regulus ran forward just in time to catch the collapsing boy before he fell to the ground. The door behind them was wrenched open and Quirrell was torn away from them. Regulus looked up to see Dumbledore pointing his wand at the dying professor, but there was nothing he could do as Quirrell lost his corporeal form and crumbled to the floor.

Regulus held Harry tightly and stared at the pile of ash that was once Quirrell. The Dark Lord was gone as well, though perhaps still here in a non-visible sense. Dumbledore looked at the two of them, his face worried and serious in a way Regulus had never seen it. There was no sparkling glint in his eye.

“We must get Harry to the Hospital Wing,” Dumbledore said and Regulus felt his body relax for the first time all day.

“Is Harry going to be okay?” Regulus asked. Dumbledore had hurried them to the Hospital Wing once he found them, but neither had spoken. Harry was lying on one of the beds, more still than Regulus had ever seen him. Ron was in another bed, also asleep, but Hermione was nowhere to be seen, most likely already dismissed by Madam Pomfrey.

Regulus watched the gentle rise and fall of Harry’s chest closely, calming himself by remembering that he was at least still alive. His plan to protect the boy had already gone so awry, and he felt more overwhelmed with his own failure than he ever had.

“He will wake,” Dumbledore answered gently. “But his body, and magic, are exhausted. It is best that we leave him to rest. And I believe we have much to discuss.” Regulus did not like the sound of that, but he trailed after Dumbledore as he led them to the Headmaster’s office. The moment they entered the large, circular room, Regulus reached into his pocket and placed the stone on the Headmaster’s desk, all thoughts of possibly destroying the stone forgotten in the face of Dumbledore’s timely return.

“Ah, so you managed to get past the Mirror,” Dumbledore said mildly.

“Why was the stone here?” Regulus demanded, not interested in listening to the Headmaster’s inane questions. “Why hide it at the school? It was barely protected.” Dumbledore looked at Regulus with a curious glint in his eye.

“You are an unusual student, Mr. Black,” he said. Regulus felt his hackles raise.

“What do you mean?” Regulus asked. Dumbledore looked at him piercingly for a moment before leaning forward, steepling his fingers carefully in front of his face.

“Tell me, are you familiar with the Book of Admittance?” Dumbledore asked.

“No,” Regulus lied. Of course, he knew what the Book of Admittance was. Every pureblood probably knew of the Book of Admittance. It was mentioned many times in the Black household, often immediately following suspected accidental magic. His parents would argue about whether the magic present was enough to put his or Sirius’s names in the book, or perhaps brag that their names had been in the book since birth. Though the book was well known, the actual mechanics of it were still largely a mystery to the wizarding public.

“The Book of Admittance,” Dumbledore began explaining, “is a powerful magical item containing the names of every magical child ever born. It, along with its counterpart, the Quill of Acceptance, are largely misunderstood artifacts. Though it is true that no human hands have touched the book since the founders of Hogwarts created it, it is not completely isolated. In fact, I find myself spending time in its presence when I need a moment to think, and I do so often need that moment.”

Regulus watched the man carefully and was watched in return, but he couldn’t make out where he might be going with this. Somewhere in the back of his thoughts, he was registering the fact that he was being derailed from his earlier tirade. But he couldn't quite grasp his anger anymore, instead, he felt an unsettling protectiveness curve around him, like his magic was preparing for an attack.

“I have read that people believe a name is only written once the child shows sufficient signs of magical abilities, but this is a myth,” Dumbledore continued. “You see, all the names of your peers, Harry Potter, Hermione Granger, Ron Weasley, all of them were written on the date of their birth. Their magic did not mature as they did, it is an innate thing they are born with.”

Regulus felt a cold sweat break out along his skin. Now this made more sense. Obviously, his name was shared with the Ministry via the goblins at Gringotts, but that didn't mean that he was added to the Book. Regulus wondered if it was even possible to be added twice. He found himself spiraling with existential thoughts of whether he had ever been recognized as dead, or if magic considered him one and the same as his former self. His thoughts were interrupted by Dumbledore's calm musings.

“So, you can imagine my surprise when the name Regulus Arcturus Black appeared in the book only a few months before he was due to start his first year.”

“My mother did not raise me here. I was not even sure I was coming to Hogwarts originally, she almost sent me abroad for school,” Regulus tried to explain, though his voice wasn't even convincing to his own ears.

“Ah, yes, so I have heard,” Dumbledore said, “but then again, I never said it was every child that would attend Hogwarts. The Book contains the name of every magical child ever born, regardless of where they are born, or what school they may eventually gain admittance to.”

Regulus sat frozen in his chair. Dumbledore was still looking at him with kind patience, but Regulus couldn't help feeling like an animal caught in a trap.

“Even more surprising,” Dumbledore said, leaning back in his chair slightly, “was the exact name it wrote.”

“My name,” Regulus mumbled confusedly.

“Oh,” Regulus said helplessly.

“How strange it is to see that exact name appear twice in my lifetime. Especially considering I received news from the Ministry only a few short weeks later telling me of a new Black heir, Regulus Arcturus Black the Third.”

Regulus stared at him wide-eyed. Why would he wait until now to bring this up? Why not question Regulus about it the moment he saw the name? Or the night he arrived at the school and was sorted into Gryffindor? Why wait an entire school year? Why wait until Regulus had broken through his poorly crafted traps and stolen the Philosopher's stone?

“You know, using the Mirror of Erised wasn’t in my original plan for hiding the stone, but after Harry discovered it, I thought perhaps it would be enough to deter anyone from making it past the final test. It was one of my more brilliant ideas, and between you and me, that’s saying something.”

Regulus did not feel that this was the appropriate time to start bragging about one's brilliance, but he was too confused to truly question it. Why Dumbledore had shifted the conversation so abruptly was a mystery to Regulus.

“You see, only one who wanted to find the stone, find it, but not use it, would be able to get it,” Dumbledore explained. “Otherwise they would just see themselves using the stone’s effects: drinking the Elixir of Life, or making gold.” Dumbledore looked at him expectantly, but Regulus wasn’t sure what he was supposed to tell him.

“I only wanted to keep the stone away from the Dark Lord,” Regulus explained. Dumbledore nodded like this was exactly what he wanted to hear.

“I do not know why, or how, you are here, Mr. Black, but it is clear that you are a different person than you were. Or at least different from the person you once presented yourself to be.”

Regulus’s mouth fell open in shock. Dumbledore had no idea who Regulus was, now or before his death. Though perhaps the headmaster knew more than he was letting on, Regulus couldn’t tell.

“Harry’s life will always be in danger, as long as Voldemort survives.” Regulus flinched at the name. “He will need our help, your help, and I will not stop you from offering it.”

Later, Regulus would realize that he had been expertly maneuvered out of the answers he was seeking, most notably why Dumbledore thought it was a good idea to hide something like the stone in a castle full of children and why Harry was left with muggle relatives who seemed to neglect him, but at that moment, he was only thankful that the headmaster seemed so understanding.

It took several days for Harry to wake up.

Hermione was waiting for Regulus the moment he returned to the common room, and though she had a million questions, he didn’t have the energy to answer them. He went to bed immediately, placating her with the promise to explain everything tomorrow, and was asleep before his head hit the pillow. He dreamt of turbans and stones, and cold, dead hands grasping at his skin.

He was shaken awake by a very nervous-looking Neville and once he was awake enough to remember where he was, Neville asked where Ron and Harry were.

“You guys did something to get in trouble, didn’t you?” Neville asked, his voice tinged with worry.

“Yes,” Regulus answered honestly because that was exactly what they had done.

“Oh Merlin, how many points did you lose this time?!” Neville yelled, distressed.

“None yet,” Regulus replied, slightly surprised by the answer. “Though the day is still young and I haven’t spoken to anyone but Dumbledore.”

“You had to speak to the headmaster?” Neville’s eyes were opened wider than Regulus had ever seen them.

“Yes, it was rather an odd night,” Regulus explained before realizing that he probably shouldn’t be telling Neville anything about what happened. “Now, if you do not mind, I’m going to shower.”

He showered off the last remnants of the dream, and Neville had left by the time he was back in the dorm. He headed down to the common room and saw Hermione sitting in one of the overstuffed chairs in front of the fire, chewing nervously on her thumbnail. The rest of the common room was mercifully empty.

“Good morning, Hermione,” Regulus said quietly. She jumped up from her spot and hugged him fiercely.

“Sorry, sorry,” she said, pulling back a moment later. “I was just so worried and there was no time to do that last night. I’m so glad you’re okay. I already went to the Hospital Wing this morning. Harry and Ron are both still asleep, but Madam Pomfrey said they should be fine.”

“Oh, good,” Regulus said, the tightness in his chest abating instantly.

“Now, tell me what happened!” Hermione all but yelled. Regulus led her back to the chairs and proceeded to tell her about the mirror and the confrontation with Quirrell and the Dark Lord, though of course, he left out the Dark Lord’s mentions of his past self. He also left out the part about Harry destroying Quirrell’s body, essentially leading to the man’s death. He wasn’t sure if Harry would want that kind of thing shared, and he definitely didn’t feel comfortable explaining such a graphic death to a twelve-year-old.

Hermione seemed even more shocked that Harry had discovered that it was Quirrell, rather than Snape, who was working for the Dark Lord. Harry had zeroed in on the Potion’s professor and so any other option had clearly not occurred to him, not that Regulus was much better, but Hermione responded like her entire sense of self had been shaken, like her failure to see the signs was a personal flaw.

“Of course, I ran into Quirrell right before I lit Snape’s cloak on fire,” Hermione said. Regulus chuckled helplessly and she shot him a look so distressed that he immediately sobered. “No wonder Snape was always going after Quirrell, why he was trying to figure him out. And Hagrid always claimed that Snape wasn’t trying to hurt Harry, but he never said anything about Quirrell. It all makes sense, why didn’t I see it?”

“Hermione, honestly,” Regulus said gently. “Those are hardly signs. There was no way for you to notice those things. Of course, Hagrid never defended Quirrell, we never accused him and Hagrid never had to. I'm sure he would have said the exact same thing about Quirrell as he did Snape, I mean even Quirrell had a hand in protecting the stone. You're being too hard on yourself. I didn't even see the signs."

"Why would that matter?" she whispered furiously. "Why should you be picking up signs where I missed them? You know I'm just as smart as you." Regulus rolled his eyes. Hermione had been told privately by Flitwick that she received the highest grade in the class and she was still obviously riding high from that success.

"I know that, thank you. I'm just saying that you're not the only one. Quirrell fooled all of us, not just you. Besides, we stopped him in the end. If anything, I think Snape would have been a much more formidable foe."

"Why?" Hermione asked, but Regulus realized that he had no way of explaining his past knowledge of the man.

"He just seems the type," Regulus said. "But anyways, you shouldn't blame yourself. It all worked out. Dumbledore said that Harry and Ron would both be fine, plus the stone is back in his hands so it's hardly our problem now." Hermione looked unconvinced but she let it drop for the time being.

It turned out that Ron had much the same reaction when he finally woke up later that afternoon. Bloody Gryffindors, Regulus thought. They were always so quick to take on the blame for something, always finding a way to blame themselves. Regulus was very careful not to think about the Gryffindors he used to know, though he was positive this was a consistent trait among them.

Ron bombarded him with questions about what happened with Quirrell and he was surprisingly more perceptive about what Regulus was leaving out, asking specific questions about what happened to Quirrell and where he was if he was no longer at the school. "Dumbledore took care of him," became Regulus's go-to answer, though he was sure it was the house elves who were forced to clean up the dusty remains of Professor Quirrell.

Harry finally awoke two days later. Regulus, Hermione, and Ron found him sitting up and talking to Dumbledore when they came to visit him after lunch.

"Harry!" Ron and Hermione yelled in unison. Both Harry and Dumbledore looked up at them. Dumbledore murmured something quickly to Harry and Regulus watched as Harry gave him a kind nod before the headmaster took his leave.

"You're awake!" Ron yelled cheerfully.

"How are you feeling?" Hermione said.

Ron and Hermione spoke over one another as they ran to his bedside. Regulus followed at a slower pace and noticed that Dumbledore gave him a small smile on his way out. Regulus tried to return it, but he wasn't sure he succeeded.

Harry was all smiles as he spoke to his friends, looking more relaxed than he had in months. He finally looked like the happy child that he was supposed to be, rather than the haunted adult that Regulus often found himself interacting with. They only had a few minutes to catch up before Madam Pomfrey shooed them away from the Hospital Wing, telling them that Harry still needed his rest in order to recover.

Harry was still in the Hospital Wing on the day of the end-of-year feast though he had luckily been permitted to attend. Regulus went up to speak with him alone right before and was treated to a very emotional Hagrid apologizing for putting Harry, and the stone, in danger. Regulus stayed out of sight though, not keen on speaking to the man at the moment. Once Hagrid left, Regulus snuck in to speak with Harry alone.

“Hey Reg,” Harry said, giving him a wide smile, though it dimmed quickly for some reason.

“How are you, Harry?” Regulus asked, taking a seat in a chair next to Harry’s bed.

“I’m fine,” Harry answered with an easy shrug. “And you?”

“Fine,” Regulus replied and an awkward silence fell between the two of them. It was clear that Harry was holding something back, he had a slightly uncomfortable look on his face, so Regulus waited patiently to see if he would go on.

“Go ahead, I know you want to ask something,” Regulus said.

“It’s just... are you really named after one of Voldemort’s followers?” Regulus let out a slow breath before answering. He should have seen this coming, but he wasn’t sure whether Harry remembered the details of Regulus’s conversation with the Dark Lord. He should have realized that Harry was far more observant than he was given credit for.

“Yes, the last Regulus Black was a Death Eater,” Regulus said, trying his best to keep his voice even.

“I’m sorry,” Harry said and Regulus jolted slightly.

“Why are you sorry?” Regulus asked mystified.

“I know it must not be easy to be named after someone like that,” Harry said with a grim look on his face.

“No...” Regulus paused, “No, it’s not. Though many people in my family were supporters of the Dark Lord, not just Regulus. It is unavoidable I’m afraid when you come from a family so keen on reusing names.”

“Was...” Harry started, Regulus nodded for him to continue though in reality he desperately wanted this conversation to end, “was your dad a... what did you call them?”

“A Death Eater?” Regulus clarified. Harry nodded. “Sirius was... well, he wasn’t...” Regulus stumbled over his words. The Sirius he knew and grew up with would have died rather than become a Death Eater. He nearly did when his mother gave Sirius the ultimatum of becoming one of them or being tortured to death. However, Sirius eventually betrayed James to the Dark Lord. In the end, even Sirius scampered back to the Dark Lord's side. "Yes," Regulus settled on. "Yes, he was a Death Eater."

Harry grimaced though his face quickly settled into one of sympathy. "What happened to him?" Regulus watched Harry closely, it was clear that the child was just trying to understand, though he seemed very sensitive to how Regulus might feel.

"He got what he deserved," Regulus said simply. The conversation drifted into easier topics after that and Regulus was glad for it. It wasn't long after that the two of them headed down to the feast together. Regulus noticed that people stopped speaking when they entered and some of them were even standing up to watch Harry walk to his seat.

Luckily, it wasn't long before Dumbledore began his end-of-year speech. Dumbledore went through tallying the points for each house, placing Gryffindor in last place and Slytherin in first. Regulus all but tuned out the numbers, it had been a long time since he cared about house points, though it was clear that his fellow Gryffindors didn't feel the same.

"However, recent events must be taken into account," Dumbledore said, cutting through the cheering coming from the Slytherin table. Regulus looked up quickly and when he noticed the devious twinkle in Dumbledore's eye, as well as the furious look on Snape's face, he knew Dumbledore was about to destroy the Slytherins' night.

"First, to Mr. Ronald Weasley for the best-played game of chess Hogwarts has seen in many years, I award Gryffindor House fifty points." Ron's face was so red it looked like it was about to catch on fire, but Regulus could see the pride there when they heard Percy bragging loudly about Ron being his brother.

"Second, to Miss Hermione Granger for unending loyalty to her friends, I award Gryffindor House fifty points." Hermione buried her head in her arms, likely overwhelmed by the attention.

"Third, to Mr. Regulus Black for perseverance in the face of great danger, I award Gryffindor House fifty points." The Gryffindor table continued to scream and cheer, but Regulus couldn't help but give a small eye roll at the sentiment. Perseverance isn't the word he would use for what he had done, but if Dumbledore wanted to paint him that way, then there wasn't anything he could do to stop him.

"We're only 10 points behind Slytherin," Neville said, his voice struck with awe.

"And finally, to Mr. Harry Potter for pure nerve and outstanding courage, I award Gryffindor House sixty points." The entire hall burst into noise with both Hufflepuff and Ravenclaw cheering alongside Gryffindor. Regulus looked over to the Slytherin table to see the stricken faces of the children who just had their victory ripped out from under them. Regulus grimaced, and though the children around him were swallowed up in excitement, Regulus couldn't find it in himself to join them.

The rest of the night went by quickly and before Regulus knew it, they were back in their dorm packing up their trunks. He had almost forgotten about their exam results with everything going on. Hermione had the best grades of their year, unsurprisingly, and even Ron and Harry did well. Regulus wasn't far behind Hermione, though technically he was fourth behind Draco Malfoy and Padma Patil. Regulus didn't think this was too bad considering he was specifically trying not to draw attention to himself.

They packed their trunks the night after the feast, or at least, Regulus packed his trunk. Hermione had been packed for days and trailed after them up to the boys' dorm. Neville, Dean, and Seamus seemed to have gotten used to her intermittent presence and went about their nights as if she wasn't even there.

"Are you going to pack?" Hermione asked Ron and Harry.

Ron shrugged, but Harry responded, "I don't have much to pack anyways, I'll just do it in the morning." He leaned back on his bed with his hands behind his head.

"It feels strange that the year is over," Hermione mused. "What are you all doing for the summer?"

"Nothing I expect," Ron answered with a slightly bitter twist of his lips. "Probably just chores, playing Quidditch, the usual."

"And doing your classwork," Hermione nettled, but Ron only shrugged again. She turned her attention to Harry.

"Probably the same for me," Harry answered, but there was a distinct look of sadness on his face, "without the Quidditch of course. Can hardly play Quidditch in the middle of a muggle neighborhood."

"Which neighborhood is that exactly?" Regulus asked, but Harry didn't answer.

"What about you, Regulus?" Hermione prompted. She looked extremely curious to hear his answer which unsettled Regulus for some reason.

"I'll be in France I believe, with my mother," he said.

"I'll be visiting France as well," Hermione said excitedly. "Perhaps we can meet up." Regulus gave her an empty smile.

"Yes, maybe," he answered, though he knew he would be spending his summer locked away in Grimmauld place.

They went to bed soon after, but Regulus couldn't stop thinking about Harry at his muggle relatives' house, all alone during the summer with a group of people who didn't seem to care for Harry the way he deserved to. It made his stomach twist painfully, but he wasn't sure what he could do about it.

The ride back to London the next day was depressing. Ron and Hermione were clearly excited about the break and to see their families, but Harry grew more and more morose as they approached the city. They tried to engage him in conversation, but it was clear that he was just placating them with his responses.

Regulus resolved to keep in close contact with the boy over the summer. He had grown worried about his home life over the course of the year and his behavior on the train was even more concerning. Seeing Harry walk off with his Uncle Vernon made Regulus feel vaguely ill.

He waved to the others before Kreacher arrived to apparate him back to Grimmauld. When he was back in the quiet, dusty home, he felt the walls closing in on him immediately. He took a few deep breaths, trying to calm himself before he straightened his shoulders.

“Kreacher,” he said and the elf popped into existence next to him, “bring me tea in the library. I have work to do.”

the soul match.

The weeks of summer passed very quickly for Regulus. Although, Grimmauld Place became like a tomb for him as the days wore on. He did his best to avoid his mother's painting. Since the first time he encountered it, she was constantly simpering at him. She had never been that sickly sweet in life, at least not to him in private. She was never quite as cruel as she was with Sirius, though he had faced his fair share of punishments from her. It made his skin crawl to be in her presence.

He spent most of his time in the Black Family Library, often sleeping in one of the stiff leather chairs in front of the small fire after spending the day reading and researching. He had one goal for the summer: figure out how to destroy a Horcrux.

He only had a few books that mentioned anything about Horcruxes, but he ventured out a few times to Diagon and Knockturn Alley to find books on soul magic. He would wake up and reread his disorganized notes before working through the newest books he had found, then he would spend a few tiring hours trying every spell he could possibly think of on the Horcrux. At first, he tried to be careful, doing a full week of research before he tried so much as an Incendio on the locket, but as the days and weeks passed, he grew more desperate, often throwing the same curses over and over again just to see if it would make a difference.

That morning went much the same. He woke with a sudden gasp in the uncomfortable leather chair, his back protesting at the sleeping position. He knew he'd been having a nightmare, mostly because of his racing heartbeat and the sweat drenching his forehead, but he couldn't seem to remember what it was about.

He took in the room around him. The book he had been reading the night before, an ill-researched book on soulmates that read more like a romance novel than a textbook, was lying splayed open on the floor in front of him. It had most likely fallen when he'd drifted off to sleep the night before. A Soul's Match by Alvina Ackerly was one of his last-ditch efforts to find anything helpful relating to his search, but he should have guessed from the title that it would be useless. He picked up the book and checked the page it was opened to, the beginning of a section on soulmates and death.

"Though a soul is complete on its own, the mate's soul is still colloquially referred to as a fractured element of one's soul. The tie between these two fractures expands beyond distance and time, as we discovered in the past chapter with our discussion of Henrietta and Cyril, the soulmates born one hundred years apart on opposite sides of the world.

However, the string between the two souls also stretches between the worlds of the living and the dead. It is not uncommon to read tales of those with soulmates who have passed on hearing the voice of their love from beyond the grave. In fact, some have even walked to their death following the call of the other half of their soul. Most interestingly, is the theory that the use of a soulmate could be essential in the practice of necromancy, the art of bringing someone back from the dead. In this chapter, we will discuss the possibility of pulling someone from the realm of the dead using their living counterpart."

Regulus threw the book to the other side of the room, already giving up on reading the chapter. He watched as it slid under one of the bookshelves, still open to the page he was on, face down on the floor. He was hoping it would provide context on how someone would use a Horcrux, an object that held a piece of their soul, to come back from the brink of death, but it was clear that this author was nothing but a fraud capitalizing on people's desire for a 'soulmate,' a ridiculous concept altogether.

Regulus climbed out of the chair soon after and called Kreacher to bring his morning tea and breakfast. He paced the room as he drank his tea, eyeing the large circular table in the middle of the room. In the center of the table, lay the cursed locket. As the summer stretched on, Regulus found himself spending more and more time with the item, feeling the need to keep it nearby. He wasn't sure why, but sometimes when he was just drifting off to sleep, he would imagine someone breaking into Grimmauld and stealing the locket out from under him.

Today the locket seemed to mock him. Though it never moved or showed any sign of housing a living soul, some days it seemed to take on a personality. During the first few days in close proximity to it, Regulus felt nothing beyond the first moment when he heard James yelling at him, but eventually, he began to feel a clawing in his chest. After a few weeks, the anger and pain began to seep into all of his thoughts.

He had a much harder time collecting and blocking out unwelcome thoughts while being trapped in Grimmauld, and it was only made worse in the presence of the locket. He would try to use Occlumency to force out the memories trying to swim to the surface in his mind, but it was never quite as clean as it could have been.

"You've ruined us, Reg. You ruined us with this. Why? I don't - I don't understand why you would choose this. Why didn't you tell me this was going to happen? You could have come to me, or Sirius, or anyone. We would have helped you. Aren't you going to say anything?! Are you just going to stare at me? Regulus, please."

Regulus stood up from the table, eyeing the locket with disdain. It was slightly easier to push the memories away when he was moving. He wanted to do something, at least get out of the house, but he felt drawn to the dark magic within the locket. It curled around him when he slept, drawing him in.

He had tried during the first few weeks of summer to get out of the house when he still felt capable of doing so. He ended up apparating to the cemetery in Godric's Hollow, though the pain in his chest seemed to expand the closer he got to it. He knew Godric's Hollow was where James had died, and he knew he was buried there, but he wasn't sure what else he was expecting to find in a place where something so awful could have happened.

In the end, it didn't matter because there was already someone at the grave, a tall man wearing a shabby ill-fitting robe, and Regulus chickened out before the man could spot him, apparating home and collapsing at the entryway of Grimmauld when the excessive magic required for the apparition proved too much for his tiny body.

"You're not my brother. You are just like the rest of them. What? Are you going to go tattle on me to Walburga? Tell her who I've been spending time with, like all your other little friends aren't already doing that?"

Regulus shook his head sharply to dislodge the memory. That one wasn't even the worst fight he and his brother had, but for some reason, those words continued to ring in his ears. You're not my brother, became the sentence that haunted Regulus even till his dying breath.

During one of his worst days of the summer, Regulus attempted to visit Azkaban. Since he was publicly the son of Sirius Black he should have had some visitation rights, but he barely got to the Ministry before he was dismissed. Sirius wasn't allowed visitors. He was one of the highest security prisoners in Azkaban, and he wouldn't be allowed human contact beyond the minimal interactions he had with guards.

"He was quite the cowardly thing, the Regulus Black I knew. He would have never dared to draw his wand against me, too afraid of what might be done to him. Although there was talk..."

"Enough," Regulus spoke aloud to the empty room. He blew out a breath and decided that it would be best to spend a little time away from the library. However, he only made it to the second floor before he felt pulled back to the room, back to the locket. The magic around it seemed to buzz unpleasantly, like a shrill ringing that grew louder as time went on. Regulus had begun to hear the sound in his sleep.

The words the Dark Lord had spoken to him haunted him in the same way the words from Sirius and James did. And why wouldn't they? The Dark Lord was right after all. He was a coward, never brave enough to stand up to the Dark Lord or his family. Never brave enough to go after James like he wanted to, or reach out to Sirius after he left Regulus behind. His one moment of so-called bravery ended in his untimely demise, or sort of did, he supposed. Regardless, he did not enjoy thinking about his cowardly past.

He only managed to stay away from the library for an hour or so before he felt the need to go back and check that the locket was still where he left it, a nervous habit that Regulus was not proud of. Like most days, he pulled out his notes on Horcruxes. Most of the notes now were filled with spells that he was sure would not work to destroy the dreadful things.

Horcruxes: an item that a wizard uses to hide a piece of his soul in order to achieve eternal life. The object becomes impervious to damage and decay. The object will appear completely unscathed and clean even years after creation and multiple destructive spells cast upon it.

Creation: Wizard must split the soul - murder without remorse followed by an unknown ritual to place the soul fragment in the object.

Resurrection? Unknown. Philosopher's stone (destroyed)

Effects on others: Buzzing feeling after long-term interaction. Could feel cool or hot to the touch depending.

Destruction: Anything that could destroy the object beyond repair. Fiendfire? Perhaps opening the locket before casting spells on the item. Locket does not open by normal means. Avada Kedavra on the inside?

Spells that have proven fruitless against object: Aberto and Alohomora will not open the locket

Accio - cannot be summoned or located using Revelio

Avada Kedavra has no apparent effect on the outside of the locket. Neither do other Unforgivables

Diffindo, Bombardo, Reducto, Incendio, and Confringo all have no effect on outside of the locket

Regulus felt more and more distressed as he read through the notes. They were thin and useless. He couldn't find any information on how the Dark Lord would even use the locket should he get his hands on it. Nor did he fully understand how a Horcrux was created in the first place beyond the vague knowledge that murder splits the soul. It was a frustrating research project. Eventually, he gave up reading his short notes hoping they would magically provide the answer, and instead picked up another vague book about soul magic and began to read.

The summer was proving discouraging at least and distressing at best. His research was slow going and he could barely bring himself to cast the repetitive spells on the Horcrux as his body became exhausted much faster than an adult's would. And that was only taking into consideration the normal, neutral magic spells that Regulus knew. He tried to cast a few of the dark magic incantations that he had learned growing up in Grimmauld, but he could barely make it through the entire spell before he slumped with exhaustion. He was worried that soon he would be back on the train to Hogwarts no better off than he was to begin with.

The most concerning thing about the summer, however, was the fact that Harry Potter had not spoken a word to Regulus or any of his other friends. Regulus wasn't one for writing letters to the group of children, but he tried to force himself to keep in contact, especially with Harry whom he worried about incessantly, but Harry hadn't written back even once. At first, he was insulted and a little hurt, before he realized that Ron and Hermione were also faced with silence from the boy.

He had purchased several sets of clothing for Harry at the beginning of the summer. Ordering them from one of his favorite wizard robe shops in France. Harry was a similar size to Regulus, a little too small for his age, so he used his own measurements and then had the employees infuse the clothing with magic that would stretch and shrink the clothing to Harry's exact size. He packaged it up two days before July 31st and sent it off for Harry's birthday, but he never heard back.

Regulus cursed himself for not finding out where Harry lived before he went home for the summer, then he could have just gone and checked on him in person. He should have asked Dumbledore when he'd had the chance. He grew more and more anxious as the summer passed, but finally had a bit of good news when one morning a gray owl was scratching at the window carrying a letter from Ron and Harry.

Regulus,

Last night Fred and George helped me take my dad's flying car to rescue Harry. Did I tell you about the car? I can't remember. Mum says not to tell people, but I don't see the big deal. Anyways it turns out Harry's muggle family was keeping him locked in his room. There were bars on his window! We had to rip them off to free him! But anyway, he's here with us at the Burrow.

We are planning to go to Diagon Alley next Wednesday to get our school supplies, do you want to meet us there? Write me back. I'll tell Errol to wait.

Ron Weasley

A flying car? Regulus had never heard of such a thing. He should have known that people as prone to mischief as Fred and George would have a parent with the same general disregard for rules. He shook his head. At least Harry was all right now, safe for the time being with Weasleys, but the thought of him locked in a room with bars on his window made Regulus clench his teeth in rage. He had known last year that all wasn't right with Harry, but now he was sure he should have done more to watch out for the boy. He would have to do a better job next summer. He pulled out the next letter.

Dear Regulus,

I'm sorry I have not sent any letters this summer. I haven't been getting any from you all. Apparently, a house elf was stealing them to try and convince me not to return to Hogwarts. Can you believe that? I will fill you in more when I see you.

Harry

This child could not have one single moment of peace, could he? He wondered what had happened to all the expensive clothing he'd purchased for the boy. He would have to get Kreacher to find it for him, otherwise, he would need to place another order before school. He was hoping he'd be able to give it to Harry when none of their other friends were around, hoping to not needlessly embarrass the boy, but now he felt like that might not be an option.

Regulus had to work to calm himself after that. He would have to get more details from Harry, and then figure out whom the house elf belonged to. He was sure Kreacher would be able to figure out who he was. He grabbed a piece of parchment and scrawled a quick reply to Ron and Harry telling them that he would meet them at Diagon when they went.

A few days before Regulus was set to meet Ron and Harry in Diagon Alley, he felt like he had reached the end of his rope. He had already moved on to consider the effects a dementor, the soul-eating creatures that they were, might have on a Horcrux. Choosing not to focus on the fact that they were practically uncontrollable and there was no way to access one except to visit Azkaban. He was on the brink of ripping his hair out in frustration when he came across a promising footnote.

He had been sending out feelers to different parts of the world searching for rare texts on soul-related magic and had received a very old book from an unknown sender. The book came with no return letter or reference of who might have sent it, but it was more helpful than expected. Anima Vinculum - soul bond in Latin - by Wesley Lochlannson felt as old as the books that lined the walls of the Black ancestral home. It was barely staying together, and Regulus thought that it was most likely magic that held the pages to the spine. The entire book was written in Latin, which wasn't uncommon for an older book written in the wizarding world. Regulus was grateful for his extensive training in the language he'd had as a child.

At first, Regulus thought the book was going to be another dead end until he noticed a small note at the end of one chapter. He would have grazed right over it except there was a tiny hand-drawn symbol in the corner. It looked like a circle with an elongated t-shape through the center and it was written in red ink. At least, Regulus assumed it was red ink, and he wasn't too keen on questioning that thought.

“The Breiða Sjáflr is a ritual passed on between Master and Student beginning as early as 800 AD. The ritual serves to open a magic practitioner to the knowledge of the world beyond by temporarily removing their soul from their body. Legend has it that the spell itself was incredibly difficult and could result in one's death if the soul was not returned correctly. Not much is known about the ritual's specifics beyond the ritualistic poem used.

“First, the Master would cast a spell on themselves, preparing themselves for the journey. Then, the poem would be used to disconnect the soul from the Student. Finally, after the two had learned all that was available to them, the ritual would be closed with an end. Though there are no written records of what may take place during the ritual, it is theorized that in some instances the Student would sever the ritual by ending the life of their Master, ascending to their place in their stead.”

While this wasn't much to go on, Regulus immediately felt intrigued. A ritual that could remove a soul from someone, or maybe even something, and allow him to physically sever the soul's hold on the person or item. It sounded like the perfect, perhaps a bit complicated, solution to the problem posed by the Horcrux. He flipped through the book, hoping to find another mention of it, but there was none. He was about to move on when he noticed a page at the back of the book was half glued to the book's cover. He pulled it up gently, taking care not to rip it, and found another drawing of the symbol he noticed next to the footnote, except this time, it wasn't the only thing on the page. Written on the page in red ink next to it was:

Breiða Sjáflr

Fyrsta.

Opnask.

Miðr.

Leysaheim í hug.

Verpa skyldr.

Ganga fram dalr dauði.

Léttir.

Heimta önd.

Áðr létti.

Fúinn vili kljúfa Beinlausi.

Regulus read through the ritual again and again. He didn't speak the language used and he wasn't sure how to pronounce most of the words, but he at least had a path to follow. He copied down the text onto a slip of paper and headed out to muggle London. He originally thought of going to one of the bookstores in Diagon Alley, but he didn't want to risk someone else reading the ritual. There was no telling what kind of damage it could do. Instead, he went to a large muggle library near Grimmauld Place.

He wore a casual set of trousers and a button-up shirt, forgoing his robe. He'd never spent much time in the muggle world, but he also didn't want to stick out too much. Before he left, he slipped the locket around his neck, too anxious to leave it behind that day. He only made it a few blocks from Grimmauld when he noticed the odd and curious looks he was getting from strangers. At one point he noticed a group of children pointing and snickering at him. It was only then that he realized how differently he was dressed compared to them. While he wore a clean and perhaps a little too formal outfit, the other kids wore blue denim pants and short-sleeved shirts.

He itched at the skin below the locket, it was already growing irritated even in the short span of time, and headed back home. He needed a way to blend in with the muggles. He already felt far too paranoid about spending time out of the house and if he went to a muggle library and spent the entire afternoon being stared at by strangers, he would probably lose his mind. This left only one solution.

Despite spending months at Grimmauld since he came back to life, Regulus had not once ventured into Sirius's old bedroom. The thought of it lying empty for more than a decade made him feel ill and sad. Though he hated his brother and had for a long time, there was still something that pulled at his chest when he thought about his abandoned bedroom. However, he knew he needed muggle clothing, and there was only one way to get that that didn't include shopping at a muggle store on his own.

The room was covered in dust. Kreacher and Sirius had always hated one another, and it was clear that Kreacher made no effort to clean the bedroom once Sirius left. When he was young, Regulus would often wonder why his mother and father left the room the way it was. After Sirius was gone, he expected them to clean out his stuff or burn it like they always threatened to do, but instead, his mother locked the door and left it as a tomb.

Regulus coughed when the dust collecting on every surface was disturbed by his entrance. He tried his hardest not to let the memories of his brother pull him under, but it was so hard seeing Sirius's still unmade bed.

"What?" Sirius snapped. He was sitting on the floor, his back against the mattress, his legs curled up against his chest.

"Are you okay?" Regulus asked, letting the door shut behind him.

"Like you give a shit," Sirius responded, turning his head violently away from Regulus. Regulus crouched down on the floor beside him despite his reaction.

"Do you want me to clean it?" Regulus asked softly. Sirius looked over at him and Regulus noticed the tears pooling in his eyes. At only thirteen, Sirius had learned how to keep his tears from falling. The punishments were always worse when they let their tears fall. He blinked hard to clear them and looked like he was about to shake his head no before he paused.

"Okay," Sirius conceded finally. Sirius was still shirtless, so his bloody back stained the sheets of his bed when he leaned against it. He turned with his back to Regulus and Regulus grabbed a wet cloth from the bathroom, using it gently to clean the open wounds.

His mother was always more violent with Sirius, more likely to make him bleed. When Regulus disobeyed his punishments were always internal, days without eating, silencing him with a spell so he couldn't speak for a week, using the Imperius curse to make him behave at family gatherings, and when she wanted to hear him suffer, harsh stinging curses. But with Sirius, his mother always left marks. Not that the use of those other punishments didn't make the rotation, but Sirius almost always left bloody.

Regulus shook away the memory. He felt like he was going to vomit for a moment and only barely managed to stop the feeling. He took several deep breaths, trying to push away the thoughts of Sirius and his unshed tears. Regulus must have been the same age that he was now, at least physically. Far too young to be dealing with such things. He wondered if those punishments were the reason for Sirius's ultimate betrayal. He thought about how eventually Regulus stopped coming to help him after Sirius was punished. He wondered how much of Sirius's betrayal was his fault.

He wasn't sure how much time passed, but he eventually managed to remember his purpose for entering the room. He opened Sirius's closet. There were clothes strewn about, some in small piles. The expensive wizard robes were hung up, untouched for years even before Sirius escaped. He made quick work of searching through the piles before he found a pair of dark blue denim trousers and a black shirt with a group of men on the front. Both of the items were too big for him and had a slight smell to them, but he cast a few quick spells to clean and shrink the items.

When he finally left the house again, now in Sirius's old clothing, he felt both more anxious and more relaxed than he did before. At least now there wasn't anyone looking at him oddly. He tucked the locket under the shirt, letting it sit against his bare skin. As he made his way to the library, he wondered if this was how it would have felt to walk around if he'd left with Sirius.

"Hello," Regulus greeted a young woman at the front desk when he entered the library.

"Hi, do you need help?" she asked, a peculiar look on her face. She seemed to be eyeing his shirt closely.

"Yes, thank you. Can you tell me where I might find books about different languages?" he asked. She seemed momentarily confused by his question. "Books for translations."

"Oh," she mumbled. "Yes, third floor to your right. Is there a specific language you're looking for?" Regulus hesitated. He knew he didn't want to show another wizard the ritual he was researching, but a muggle would have no use for the words.

"Yes, I'm trying to translate this," he said, handing her the piece of parchment with the spell copied onto it.

"Where did you get this?" she asked curiously.

Regulus shrugged. "Is that relevant?" he asked, trying his hardest not to be overly rude, but he also did not have an excuse prepared that he could use.

She smirked. "I suppose not." She handed the parchment back to him. "Just an odd piece of paper." Regulus had no idea what that could possibly mean. "Big Black Sabbath fan, are you?"

“I’m sorry?” Regulus asked alarmed. She pointed at his shirt, giving him a sardonic smile. “Oh, erm, yes, love Black-” He looked down again to read the words he had ignored earlier. “Black Sabbath.” Her smile stretched into something more genuine and he got the distinct feeling that he was being laughed at.

“I think that might be an older Germanic language, like Swedish or Danish,” she offered. “I’d probably start there.”

Regulus gave her a smile. “Thank you,” he said quickly before scampering up the stairs. He started in the Germanic languages as she suggested, though it took a while to figure out that the language he was looking for was Old Norse. It made sense given when the ritual was dated back to. The books were slim, with far fewer words for translating than more modern languages offered, but he hoped it would still be enough to figure out the ritual.

“Did you find what you were looking for?” the librarian asked when he walked back down the stairs. Regulus had been planning to steal the book, hoping to sneak out the front door as quickly as possible, but it was clear that she was waiting for him.

“Oh,” Regulus said pausing. “Yes, it was Old Norse.”

“Do you want to check those out?” she asked, nodding to the three books he held under his arm. Regulus looked uncertainly at her. “Do you have a library card?”

“No,” he admitted after a long moment. She gave him the same smirk she had earlier like she knew he was a fish out of water.

“Why don’t we get you signed up for one?” she said kindly. Regulus walked up to the desk, unsure. “I’m assuming you don’t have a parent with you?” she asked though it was clear she already knew the answer.

“Umm, no, I’m alone,” Regulus answered.

“And why is a... twelve?” Regulus gave a small nod. “Twelve-year-old trying to translate an Old Norse poem?” Regulus was not prepared for questions about what he was doing.

“Well,” he said then stopped for a second before continuing. “I’m trying to destroy an evil magical object.” He hadn’t been planning to say that, in fact, he had no idea what he was planning to say, but for some reason, the truth slipped out.

She laughed loudly, only stopping when an old woman gave her a dirty look as she walked past. “You’re funny,” she said. “What’s your name?”

“Why do you need to know?” Regulus asked defensively. He didn’t understand her laughter. He was always told that muggles were terrified of magic. He had expected her to attack him on the spot when he mentioned a magical object. If anything, her reaction made him more nervous.

“For your library card?” she said, a chuckle still in her voice.

“That’s a weird name,” she said. She started moving her fingers along a set of buttons as she looked at a large box in front of her. Regulus felt so out of his depth. He wondered if he should have taken Muggle Studies when he first went to school, though he would have likely been disowned on the spot if he did so.

“It’s not that weird,” he defended, though he knew it was. Even in the wizarding world, Regulus was unusual. She smirked at him again.

“Where do you live, Regulus Black?” She asked.

“Why?” Regulus asked. She looked at him like he was an absolute idiot.

“Right,” he said. He couldn’t very well tell her he lived at 12 Grimmauld Place given that it wouldn’t show up for a muggle. “13 Grimmauld Place,” he conceded.

“Naturally,” she mumbled to herself. “Just a moment.” He heard a loud noise in another room and watched as she got up to check on it. He considered making a run for it, though he didn’t want to make a scene and risk having to use magic on a muggle. She returned just a moment later. She took his books from him and returned them after a brief second. “They’re due back in three weeks.”

“Okay, thank you,” he said and turned quickly away from her.

“Wait!” She called. He turned back nervously. “You’re library card.” He walked out of the library shortly after that, looking down at a small white card. Written just below the name of the muggle library: Regulus Black. He couldn’t explain why, but seeing his name printed on the muggle item caused a small smile to stretch across his face.

He worked long into the night, translating and writing pronunciations down for each word. The dictionaries were limited, so by the time he had translated each word to the best of his ability, he was only mildly confident that he understood the ritual. His translation read:

Stretch the Self.

Beginning.

Be opened.

Middle.

Untie the realm of one’s mind.

Cast out your bonds.

Proceed to the valley of neither life or death.

Last.

Recover your breath.

Before the End.

Rotten will splits the boneless.

He had trouble figuring out which parts of the ritual were meant to be spoken and which parts were just indicators of what came first or last. The words themselves were confusing. He knew that the ritual was meant to temporarily remove the soul from the body, but what did it mean by ‘be open?’ Or ‘cast out your bonds?’

When Regulus would look back on this moment, he would wonder how much the isolation of Grimmauld Place had destroyed his logical mind. In his first life, Regulus never did anything without thinking it through, often thinking things through for so long that the opportunity would pass him by without him acting on it. Even when his parents tortured his brother, Regulus stood frozen in the hallway debating whether he should step in or not. He never did step in, his parents growing frustrated with Sirius’s screams before Regulus could settle on a decision.

He remembered hovering over Sirius’s wrecked form. His teeth chattering from the residuals of the Unforgivable spell his mother had used, blood seeping out of one eye, running down the side of his face, and the smell of piss permeating throughout the room after the torture went on so long that Sirius could no longer control his muscles. He was horrified and knew he needed to do something to help him, otherwise, his brother would die right on top of that expensive rug. But Regulus only sat frozen in fear and indecision, weighing all his options over and over again. It wasn’t until he heard Sirius’s wrecked voice.

So, no, Regulus was not impulsive, even when someone else might benefit from him being that way. The most impulsive thing he ever did was die while stealing the Dark Lord’s Horcrux and even that he wrestled with for weeks before he took action. So there was no reason why he should be impulsive now and yet, Regulus decided that there was no point in waiting around, in researching more, in trying to understand the very complex and dangerous spell he had only discovered a day before. He took one long look at the locket, hearing the light ring that seemed to always accompany the item, and decided to try the ritual then and there.

He decided on his father's drawing room for the ritual. It was the room he liked the least, most likely due to the violent memories associated with his brother's extended torture that were connected to the space, and he had no qualms with accidentally wrecking it while trying to destroy the locket.

He set the locket on the floor in the center of the room and took a deep breath. There was a niggling thought in the back of his mind that perhaps he shouldn't be doing this, but it was quickly drowned out by the buzzing sound that had become his constant companion that summer. He lifted his wand and began the first part of the ritual.

"Opnask."

The effect was immediate. He felt the words pull at the tethers of his magic like someone unraveling his body, separating it from the mind. He felt a headache split his head but it was gone before he could even really register it. His stomach twisted and intense nausea swept through him, but just like the headache, it was only there for a moment. His skin ached and his limbs felt heavy and weightless all at once.

"Regulus," a far too recognizable voice whispered. Regulus shivered. He could feel himself losing his battle with the ritual, it was dragging him under dark waves of magic. The locket seemed to grow louder, the ringing morphing into a hissing sound, like a snake speaking directly in his ear. Regulus vaguely registered his knees collapsing beneath him.

"Regulus, please," the voice whispered. The voice he had tried so hard to forget, to block out of his memories. "Please." Regulus felt like his magic was being ripped from him while simultaneously working its way into his veins over and over again. He couldn't have pulled his magic back even if he had the wherewithal to try.

"James," he choked out right before the waves swallowed him whole and the world was lost.

"Master Regulus must be more careful."

Regulus grunted painfully.

"Is Master Regulus awake?"

Regulus tried to respond, but his mouth wouldn't obey him. He groaned. The feeling of his body came back slowly, so slow that he worried for a moment that he might never move again, but he finally was able to squint his eyes open. The room was thankfully dark, but it took a moment for his eyes to focus on where he was.

"Master Regulus?" Kreacher's scratchy voice interrupted him. He still couldn't make out the elf in the room, but he could hear his voice coming from beside him.

"Kreacher," Regulus tried to say, though his voice was dry and harsh as it ripped through his throat. His eyes finally seemed to adjust and he realized that he was in his bedroom. The curtains were drawn tight across the window so that no sunlight could get through them.

"What happened?"

“Master Regulus almost died,” Kreacher’s voice wobbled with unshed tears. “Kreacher had to make sure he survived.”

“How long have I been in bed?” Regulus asked, not interested in getting into details of what Kreacher might have done to him to help him survive.

“A week, Master,” Kreacher answered.

“A week?” Regulus asked incredulously, trying at once to sit up, though his body protested the move.

“Master Regulus must not move,” Kreacher said frantically. Regulus laid back down and let his muscles relax.

“It is the 2nd of September, Master Regulus,” Kreacher said. Regulus sighed. He could feel the exhaustion settling into his bones, but he fought to stay conscious. He was already a day late to school and would need to do damage control as soon as he was capable of moving, but he felt so heavy and tired.

Eventually, he convinced Kreacher to bring him breakfast as well as all the letters he had missed while unconscious. He had several frantic letters from Ron, Harry, and Hermione, including one from Hermione from the night before asking him if he was with Ron and Harry which Regulus found very concerning. There was also a letter from Professor McGonagall addressed to the fake mother Regulus had created, and one from Dumbledore simply asking if Regulus was in danger. He responded to them all quickly, telling Dumbledore he was safe and would be at the school by that evening. He wrote quick notes to Ron, Harry, and Hermione, just telling them that he would fill them in when he saw them, too tired to write a long-winded explanation.

He wrote with his left hand to make his handwriting different when he drafted the note to McGonagall, signing it Seraphine Bissett, and sending it off. He knew she would require the most explanation, but Regulus decided to keep it to a vague excuse of sickness keeping him from riding the train the first day. He told her that “Regulus will be arriving at the gates of Hogwarts by sundown,” and left it at that.

He sent Kreacher out to purchase his books for school and then had Kreacher pack up his trunk while Regulus limped up to his father’s drawing room to figure out what happened to the locket. The moment he entered the room he nearly doubled over in pain. The ringing sound had dissipated and the soft hissing had completely taken over now. He felt like the locket was speaking to him. He stumbled back out of the room and threw the strongest locking charm he could think of on the door.

“Kreacher,” he called. Kreacher popped into existence next to him. “You are not to go into that room for any reason. The locket should not be touched or moved. If anyone tries to enter the house, come and get me immediately.”

“Yes, Master Regulus.”

Regulus sagged against the wall, the pain he felt in the drawing room finally subsiding enough for him to stand.

“Master Regulus must rest.”

“I’ll rest at school. Is my trunk packed?”

Regulus nodded and stumbled back to his room to get dressed. He opted for a set of plain robes since he wouldn’t be arriving at Hogwarts until after dinner and asked Kreacher to apparate him to the gates of Hogwarts. He wasn’t positive that he could manage the difficult magic of apparition at the moment. The locking charm had been enough to drain him completely. Plus, he didn’t know how he would explain to any professors who might see him how he was managing to apparate as a twelve-year-old.

Kreacher was clearly holding himself back from complaining about Regulus leaving so soon, but Regulus chose to ignore him for the time being. He needed to get to school if only to escape the isolation of Grimmauld, and figure out why Ron and Harry were missing the first night back. At the last minute, he remembered the muggle library books on Old Norse that he still had in his possession. He instructed Kreacher to return them to the library when it was empty, leaving them on the front desk. Kreacher was clearly affronted by the request, appalled that he would have to travel to the muggle world to complete the task, but he eventually agreed.

By the time Regulus made it to the gates of Hogwarts, the sun had set and a slight chill swept through him. He shivered slightly, surprised by how affected he felt by the wind, but it felt like his skin was too thin, like the ritual he tried to do had permanently aged him. Professor McGonagall met him right inside the gates and gave him a stern look.

“Where is your mother, Mr. Black?” McGonagall asked, clearly having seen Regulus be dropped off by an elf.

“She sent me with our house elf, Professor,” Regulus answered. He walked towards her, dragging his trunk behind him. He was so concentrated on keeping his voice steady that he ended up stumbling over his own feet. McGonagall was quick, catching him by the elbow before he fell to the ground.

“Are you quite all right, Mr. Black? Your mother mentioned that you were sick,” she said. Her voice was now painted with thinly veiled worry.

“I’m fine, thank you. Just a bit dizzy still,” Regulus said, straightening up. McGonagall did not look convinced, but she took pity on him. She charmed his trunk to follow them and walked with him slowly up to the castle. It took them far longer than it should with the way Regulus continued to stumble periodically. McGonagall was kind enough not to mention it.

“I think it would be best for you to head to the Hospital Wing tonight,” she said once they made it inside. Regulus wanted to argue, but he was too exhausted from the long walk to think of a response. He merely nodded.

Madam Pomfrey was confused about what was wrong with Regulus, and though she asked several questions, Regulus kept his answers as vague as he could. In the end, she left him with a sleeping draught and a potion she said would help strengthen his magic, though he didn't catch the actual name.

He promised to take them after he changed into his pajamas, but by the time he was changed and settled in bed, Madam Pomfrey and McGonagall had left him for the night. A light rain had begun falling outside and Regulus let the sound lull him into a state of relaxation. For the first time since he woke up, he let himself think of the voice he heard when he tried the ritual. He would recognize James's soft whisper anywhere. He longed to hear it again, even just once.

As he finally drifted off to sleep, he heard the maddening hissing of the locket saturate his bones. It was quiet and he had to focus to really make it out, but it was undeniable. The last thought he had was wondering if the locket had somehow followed him to Hogwarts.

the house elf.

Regulus ate breakfast in the Hospital Wing the next morning. He was too tired to even bother asking if he could go to breakfast with the rest of his classmates. Instead, he just accepted the tray of food from Madam Pomfrey without complaint. He wondered when Harry, Ron, and Hermione would show up, and if they knew he was already at school. Just as he was finishing his meal, Dumbledore came to sit by his bedside.

“Good morning, Mr. Black,” Dumbledore said, as he settled into the seat.

“I must say, you gave us all quite the scare,” Dumbledore’s voice was light, but Regulus was surprised to see real concern in his eyes. “Professor McGonagall said that you were ill.” Regulus nodded and when Dumbledore simply waited he decided to explain. He wasn’t sure how much he trusted the old wizard, but it was clear that he would need to say something.

“I may have tried some experimental magic a few days ago,” Regulus said evasively. Dumbledore nodded understandingly like that was a completely normal explanation from a grown man masquerading as a twelve-year-old child.

“Ah, that would do it. What magic have you tried?” Regulus gave him a long look, but couldn’t decide on what to say. “I understand that you do not want to share, but you should know that your friends were very worried when you did not arrive on the train.”

“I didn’t mean to scare them. I didn’t think it would affect me so much, but I am recovering just fine,” Regulus said.

“You did not take your potions,” Dumbledore replied.

“No, I fell asleep before I had the chance. Really, I am just tired. It should not affect me any more than that,” Regulus reassured him. Dumbledore watched him for a moment.

Dumbledore stood up and began to leave the wing, before turning around suddenly. “Mr. Black, if I might ask a question.” Regulus nodded. “Seraphine Bissett?”

“Oh,” Regulus said, understanding immediately, “Yes, she’s my fake mother. She doesn’t actually exist.” He wondered if he should be more careful about sharing that piece of information out loud and looked around quickly to make sure the Hospital Wing was still empty.

“Ah, I see,” Dumbledore said, a light smile on his face. “I had not realized you would create such a fake life for yourself.”

“Well, it’s necessary for certain things. I can hardly go along as a lone child in the wizarding world,” Regulus explained.

Dumbledore nodded before he bid Regulus goodbye and left the wing. The door had only just closed behind him before it was swinging open and Harry, Ron, and Hermione were running in.

“Regulus!” Ron yelled.

“You’re awake,” Harry said at the same time.

The three of them rushed to his bed and surrounded him. Hermione surprised him by throwing her arms around him in a quick hug. Regulus barely had time to hug her back before she pulled away.

“We were so worried,” she said. “I was so worried,” she corrected and threw a glare at Harry and Ron.

“What?” Regulus asked, but Hermione interrupted him immediately.

“First, Harry and Ron didn’t show up on the train and missed the sorting ceremony. Then, all the professors left the welcome feast. Then, when they finally showed up in the common room, you weren’t with them.” She aimed that statement at Regulus.

“Wait,” Regulus said, throwing his hands out to stop her. “Why weren’t you two on the train?” Ron and Harry looked vaguely guilty, though they both had small, dangerous smiles poking through that put Regulus on edge.

“Well, what happened was-” Harry said.

“It made sense at the time-” Ron said.

Both boys began speaking over each other. Regulus waved his hands to bring their attention back to him. They both fell silent immediately and looked at Regulus with equally guilty expressions.

“One at a time please,” Regulus requested. Both of the boys stared at him for a second before Ron gave Harry a knowing look.

What came next was the most insane collection of events Regulus had ever heard. He couldn’t help thinking that if Harry was an accomplished liar, he would definitely be making them up. Unfortunately for all of them, Harry was a terrible liar and was most certainly telling the truth about his summer. The story about the mysterious house-elf invading his home, showing up in his bedroom to give ominous warnings about something terrible happening at Hogwarts, and confessing that he had been keeping all of Harry's mail from him, before using magic specifically to get Harry in trouble made Regulus's head spin.

"So, wait. What was the name of this elf?" Regulus interrupted when they got to the end of the elf using magic and apparating away.

"Dobby. Do you know him?" Harry asked.

Regulus just barely kept himself from rolling his eyes, did he know him, honestly, did Harry think he just knew everyone's house elves? "No, I do not know him, but my house elf might be able to find out. I'll ask him when I get the chance."

"Cool," Harry said with an easy smile like Regulus had just offered to solve all his problems.

"Go on," Regulus prompted.

"Well, the Dursleys didn't want me to go back to school, but Ron, Fred, and George came to pick me up," Harry said. Ron interrupted him before he could go on.

"Didn't want you to go back to school? Harry, there were bars on your window," Ron said indignantly. A flush crept up Harry's face and Regulus wondered if Harry knew that Ron had already shared this piece of information with Regulus.

"That's absurd. Did they think that Dumbledore would just let you stay home with them?" Regulus asked. Harry shrugged helplessly. Regulus noticed that Hermione had an uncomfortable look on her face and he wondered what the girl was thinking.

"Honestly Harry, they were starving you!" Ron yelled as if he couldn't believe how passive Harry was being about the whole thing.

"They were what?" Regulus asked fiercely. Harry looked at him nervously, like Regulus was about to start starving him as well if he got too upset by how Harry's relatives were treating him.

"Anyways," Harry said, clearly trying to move on from the uncomfortable topic. Regulus glared at him, but Harry looked away and jumped back into his explanation of what had happened. He explained his mishap using the floo network and witnessing Lucius and Draco Malfoy in Borgin and Burkes before Ron jumped in to explain the altercation his father had with Lucius Malfoy.

"It was so wicked," Ron said. "Malfoy's dad was being a prat and he was insulting Hermione's parents, 'cause they're muggles, you know?" Like Regulus could have forgotten that fact.

"Then my dad threw a punch," Ron said as he started mimicking the battle he was describing. Harry laughed loudly and Hermione looked vaguely disapproving, though he could see the corners of her lips twitching like she was trying to hold in a smile.

“Hagrid had to pull them apart,” Harry added through a cheerful laugh. Regulus felt sorry to have missed it. Though he felt indifferent to Draco, he had always disliked Lucius and he would have enjoyed watching him brawl like a muggle in the middle of Diagon Alley.

“Why did you not wait for someone to come and get you?” Regulus asked. Hermione crossed her arms, her face clearly showing the vindication she felt at Regulus’s question. Both boys looked very discomfited, and Hermione looked like she was about to launch into a tirade so Regulus indicated for Harry to keep going.

Harry then explained their poorly planned trip to Hogwarts involving stealing an illegally modified car and encountering a furious Whomping Willow. Regulus knew how dangerous the tree could be, remembering the multiple students who were injured trying to run around out, not to mention Snape’s conspiracy theory about what lay underneath it. Regulus couldn’t remember what he actually claimed though, Snape was never someone Regulus paid much attention to.

There was no doubt that Harry was his father’s son. He wondered if it was something in his blood that made him so impulsive and reckless. He couldn’t help but think that James and Sirius would have loved to know Harry. He imagined them watching Harry crash a flying car into a violently thrashing tree. Sirius would probably howl with laughter. James would look worried, but he would no doubt have a glint of pride and humor in his eyes.

Lily would probably be horrified. Though Regulus never knew her very well, he couldn’t imagine that she would enjoy hearing about the extreme danger her son put himself in. Then again, she did marry James. For all he knew, she was just the same. The thought of them all made Regulus’s chest ache painfully.

“I’m surprised you weren’t expelled,” Regulus said, trying to give Harry a sharp, disapproving look. He wasn’t sure he succeeded.

“You should have been,” Hermione said. “Can you imagine any other student getting away with what you did? You broke the law!” She was edging into hysteria.

“So, what? You wanted us to be expelled?” Ron asked, exasperated. Clearly, they had already had this conversation several times despite the short amount of time that had passed.

“Tell us what happened to you,” Harry said quickly, interrupting whatever Hermione was about to say. Regulus was almost thankful for it, whenever he pictured Ron and Harry in such danger, he felt vaguely dizzy. However, this change of subject also meant that now all three of them would expect a real explanation for where he had been.

“Oh, well, I just came down with a slight cold. My mother wouldn’t let me write anyone so I wasn’t able to tell you before the Diagon Alley trip,” Regulus said.

“You weren't allowed to write at all because you had a cold?” Harry asked incredulously.

“It was a very intense cold,” Regulus offered. Harry looked worried, but Hermione looked suspicious.

“Why did she decide to bring you back now?” Ron asked. “I mean, no offense mate, but you still look pretty sick.”

“Ronald,” Hermione chastised.

“That’s okay, I know,” Regulus said easily, though he hadn’t actually looked in the mirror since before the ritual and had no idea how he looked. “She just figured it would be better for me to heal at Hogwarts.”

“When can you leave?” Harry asked. Regulus noticed for the first time that his shoulders were set with anxiety and had been since he walked in the door.

“Let me ask, I’m sure I can leave soon,” Regulus answered, though he was unsure. It turned out he was right. Madam Pomfrey told him to take the potion she had left for him the night before and to come back if he started feeling weak or unwell again before sending him off.

Regulus left with the other three soon after that and headed back to the Gryffindor tower to change. He was relieved to see his trunk had already been sent up. They still had a few days before classes started so Regulus planned to spend the morning reading through his school books and doing the homework that he should have been doing the entire summer. However, he felt very worried the moment he entered the common room.

He vaguely registered the whispered hissing getting louder as he walked, but the moment the portrait hole opened, Regulus felt a cold sweat break out across his skin. The hissing was louder than he had ever heard it. The noise wiggled under his skin and made a home in his veins. He stumbled and nearly fell to the ground. Harry and Ron caught him easily and kept him on his feet.

“Maybe you should go back to the Hospital Wing,” Hermione suggested worriedly. Regulus shook his head.

“No, no, I’m fine,” he replied. None of them looked convinced. He looked around the room and was relieved that there were only a few students. Some older fifth-years that Regulus vaguely recognized and a first-year with bright red hair. She didn’t even look at him, her eyes were glued to Harry.

“All right, Ginny?” Ron said. “Oh, Regulus, this is my sister.”

“Hello,” Regulus greeted. Ginny gave him a polite smile, before turning back to what she was doing. Regulus wondered if she was already working on classwork as he watched her write in a leather book.

He finally felt well enough to walk and quickly made his way up to the dorm room. The hissing subsided slightly, but it was still much more intense than it had been in the Hospital Wing. He opened his trunk and dug around in it, trying to find the locket that was no doubt making the noise, but he found nothing.

Eventually, he gave up and just collected some clothes and headed to the bathroom. When he looked in the mirror for the first time, Regulus flinched. He looked almost like he had right before he went to the cave with Kreacher, though of course much younger. His skin was sunken, there were dark circles under his eyes, and he was pale and sickly looking. He spent far too much time poking around at his face before shaking himself and jumping in the shower.

The day was easy after that, though the hissing seemed to follow him around the castle. Hermione was kind enough to help him with his work, while Ron and Harry worked idly next to them. Or at least pretended to work, he thought. He was relieved to see that he wasn’t the only one not finished and that the library was full of other students frantically working on classwork. At one point, he left the others and found a tucked-away alcove, giving a quick excuse about looking for a specific book in the back of the library and casting a quick Notice-Me-Not so he wouldn’t draw attention.

“Okay,” Regulus said, suddenly feeling off balance. He was lost in thought about the hissing noise for a moment before Kreacher spoke again.

“Was that all, Master?” Regulus suddenly remembered the other piece of information that he needed from his elf.

“Do you know a house elf named Dobby?” Regulus asked.

“No, Master Regulus. Kreacher does not know Dobby,” Kreacher answered. “Kreacher does not know many other house elves.” Regulus wondered if he was sad about that, it was hard to tell by the inclination in Kreacher’s voice or lack thereof.

“Could you find out who he is? And what family he works for?” Regulus asked.

“Kreacher can try,” Kreacher said uncertainly.

“Thank you, Kreacher. Tell me if you discover this information. That will be all.” Kreacher bowed deeply again and disappeared. Regulus walked back to the library in a daze. The locket wasn’t here, it was still at Grimmauld. So why was he still hearing it?

the chamber of secrets.

Second year was just as easy as first year had been. This wasn't surprising considering Regulus was a fully grown wizard studying with a bunch of twelve-year-olds, but it was still relieving. Regulus didn't think he had the capability to give any more than the bare minimum. His energy still hadn't fully returned since his misguided attempt to complete the Breiða Sjáflr ritual.

He still felt exhausted. Every night he slept like a log, never dreaming or moving once he laid down. During the day, he felt cold and drained. Madam Pomfrey had given him a few vials of Pepperup Potion but she was worried about how his body would react to too much of it and stopped giving it to him after only a few weeks.

The hissing never seemed to leave him. It sounded like a permanent snake was living on Regulus's shoulder. He was sure he was going insane, but he wasn't sure what to do about it. He wasn't ready to tell Dumbledore about the Horcrux, but he wasn't sure that he would have much of a choice if things carried on as they had been.

Regulus was disturbed to hear about the new Defense against the Dark Arts professor, a man named Gilderoy Lockhart. It wasn't until he was reading through one of the man's insane books that he realized he'd met him before. Lockhart had been at school with Regulus the first time around. He was three years younger than Regulus and was sorted into Ravenclaw so the two of them never crossed paths, but he did distinctly remember a small third-year bragging about fighting off the Whomping Willow one night at dinner.

Lockhart had clearly zeroed in on Harry. "Gave you a taste for publicity, didn't I?" Regulus overheard Lockhart say when they were heading to Herbology. "Gave you the bug. You got on the front page of the paper with me and you couldn't wait to do it again."

Regulus listened to Lockhart as he gave Harry 'advice' on how to be famous. It was the most second-hand embarrassment Regulus had ever felt for anyone. Listening to Lockhart refer to Harry's level of fame by saying 'a few people have heard of you' made Regulus outwardly cringe.

"What was he talking about?" Regulus asked Harry after Herbology was over. Harry looked at him confused. "Lockhart, he mentioned getting on the front page of the paper." Harry looked so embarrassed that Regulus thought he might just make a run for it.

"It's not a big deal," Harry mumbled quickly. Regulus continued to watch him stoically, a trick that used to work on both James and Sirius. "Well, it was at Diagon," Harry said, launching into the explanation of Lockhart pulling him into a picture with him when he spotted him in the bookstore. Regulus had missed all the copies of the Prophet while he was unconscious for a week, but he made a mental note to have Kreacher bring him that specific version.

"You really need to learn how to say no to people, Harry," Regulus said. Harry looked mildly offended, but Regulus only laughed.

In Transfiguration, Regulus finally noticed Ron's broken wand. He had reattached it with some Spellotape that he borrowed from another student, but it was clear that the item was broken beyond repair. It kept releasing odd sounds and smells whenever Ron tried to use it. Regulus felt terrible for Ron but wasn't sure how to help him. It wasn't like he could sneak him out of school to take him all the way to Diagon Alley to get a new one. Unless... no, that was not the kind of behavior Regulus was going to follow through on. He had been impulsive enough during the summer, he wasn't about to keep up with that conduct.

On the way to Defense later, Harry was interrupted by a very zealous first-year named Colin Creevey who ask Harry for a signed picture. Naturally, this attracted the attention of none other than Draco Malfoy.

"Everyone line up! Harry Potter's giving out signed photos!" Draco yelled. Harry was furious, angrier than he'd ever seen him. The interaction almost devolved into an outright duel when Draco started taunting Ron. Harry was still just glaring at Draco, his ears flushed red and his fists clenched. Luckily they were interrupted by Lockhart because Regulus wasn't sure Ron's wand could handle casting offensive spells. Not to mention that Harry looked like he was about to abandon magic altogether and tackle Draco to the ground.

Defense against the Dark Arts was just as ridiculous as Regulus suspected it would be. Lockhart gave them a quiz just about his personal life and then let loose a swarm of pixies in the room. Lockhart tried one spell to get them back into their cage after most of the students had run out of the classroom, which of course didn't work, before abandoning them.

"I'll ask you four to just nip the rest of them back into their cage," he said to them. Regulus cast a quick Freezing Charm on the pixies the moment Lockhart was out of sight.

"Can you believe him?" Ron said angrily, grabbing a few pixies out of the air and stuffing them back in the cage.

"He just wants to give us some hands-on experience," Hermione said, a bright blush spreading across her cheeks.

"Honestly, Hermione," Regulus said before he could stop himself, giving her a look to say that he knew exactly why she was making excuses for the man. Hermione's face grew even redder.

"He doesn't know what he's doing," Harry said.

"He couldn't even cast one spell," Regulus argued.

"Look at all the things he's done in his books," Hermione argued.

"He says he's done," Ron said and Regulus was inclined to agree.

Harry had Quidditch practice early that year, Wood, the Gryffindor Captain already running a tight ship, and Ron and Hermione opted to join him. Regulus stayed behind, hoping to catch a few more hours of sleep. This meant that Regulus had to hear secondhand about their run-in with Draco and the Slytherin Quidditch team. Regulus wasn't surprised to hear about Draco's father buying his way onto the team, it was exactly the kind of thing Lucius Malfoy would do. Harry was of course furious.

He vaguely listened as they complained about Draco calling Hermione a Mudblood. It was disappointing, but not altogether surprising. It was likely that Draco had heard that word spoken many times growing up, just like Regulus had. Regulus was not about to judge a child for making the same mistakes he had.

Regulus, Ron, and Harry planned a small birthday party for Hermione. Ron and Harry gave her a collection of candy that they had stored up for themselves having forgotten to get her a gift until Regulus mentioned it a week before. Regulus gave her one of the old Transfiguration books that he found in the library at Grimmauld. He was surprised to see tears well up in her eyes at the gifts. She gave them each a quick hug, and Regulus had to keep himself from laughing as both Harry and Ron ended up blushing furiously.

After her birthday, the days seemed to pass in a blur. He could barely manage to keep up with his schoolwork in his current state, despite how easy it was to complete. He still felt drained from the spell even days and weeks after he completed it. His energy never seemed to fully recover and each time he had to go to class and perform more magic it seemed to drain him even more.

Snape seemed more annoyed than ever, but Regulus continued to ignore the man. He was especially hard on Neville, Regulus noticed. Regulus couldn't help but wonder why. At least his hatred of Harry and Regulus made sense, it couldn't have been easy being reminded of James and Sirius so often, not that that was an excuse for Snape acting like a child, but still. Neville, on the other hand, should not have been a target for the professor. Regardless, Regulus didn't have the energy to pay attention to him.

He could tell that McGonagall was getting worried as the weeks went on, he would catch her watching him with a pinched expression during class. She held him back once or twice, asking him how he was feeling and if he was doing okay, but he was always vague with his answers. He was a regular visitor of the Hospital Wing and he could tell that Madam Pomfrey was growing more and more worried.

He was surprised when he woke up one morning to discover that it was already Halloween. He had a bad feeling about the holiday. It was already such a difficult day with Regulus trying to fight off the thoughts about James's death and Sirius's betrayal, but more than that, he felt like the hissing had grown tenfold. It was louder than ever and at times he missed what his friends were saying because he couldn't hear them over the noise.

They were asked by Nearly Headless Nick to join them at his Death Day party. Regulus wanted to refuse the invitation, but Harry had already accepted on their behalf before he could do so. Regardless, when it was time to head to the party, Regulus was feeling far too weak to join them.

Halloween was on a Saturday and he did his best to join in the library that morning, but by lunchtime, he felt too sick to read. He waved them off when they offered to take him to the Hospital Wing and ended up curled in his dorm bed by the early afternoon. He charmed his curtains closed and silenced them, hoping to buffer the hissing that he almost constantly heard. It seemed to be growing louder by the day. The silencing spells only worked slightly, but it was still enough that he was out the moment he closed his eyes.

He didn't wake until mid-morning. His magic had grown weaker as the weeks went on and so by morning, the charms on his bed had worn off. This was clear when there was sudden sunlight streaming through his open curtains when Ron pushed them aside, easily bypassing the locking charms.

"He's still asleep," Ron said, far too loudly. Regulus grumbled.

"Regulus, wake up, we need to talk to you," Harry said. The worry in his voice made Regulus's eyes shoot open.

"What happened?" He asked. Ron and Harry gave each other a loaded look.

"I'll get Hermione," Ron said, before leaving the dorm room. The room was empty except for Harry and Regulus. Regulus watched as Harry gently sat on his bed.

"How are you feeling?" Harry asked. Regulus took stock of how he felt before answering, surprised that he felt rested. The hissing was still there, but it was much quieter than it had been the night before.

"Better," Regulus said and Harry gave him a quick smile. Ron and Hermione came into the dorm a moment later. Hermione looked flustered and worried, her hair messier than usual. Regulus was immediately worried.

"What happened?" He asked again. Their faces were grave, and it instantly put Regulus on edge.

"What do you know about the Chamber of Secrets?" Hermione said loudly.

"Hermione, let me explain first," Harry said quickly. Regulus's thoughts were already at a full sprint. "Last night we were coming back from the Death Day party," Harry began.

"Which was awful by the way," Ron interrupted. "You should be glad you missed it."

"Ron," Hermione chided.

"Anyways, we were on our way back, and I... well," he looked at Ron and Hermione nervously, but they both nodded, "I heard a voice from inside the walls." Regulus felt his eyebrows shoot up in surprise. "It was saying that it was going to kill someone. So we followed the voice and well..."

"It was outside the second-floor girl's bathroom," Hermione took over. "The whole corridor was flooded and written on the wall was 'The Chamber of Secrets Has Been Opened, Enemies of the Heir, Beware.' It was written in blood! And Filch's cat was petrified and hanging underneath the letters," Hermione said, her voice growing frantic.

"What?" Regulus said stupidly, struggling to process everything they were saying. "Okay, wait, tell me about the voice again." Harry looked supremely uncomfortable. "What did it say exactly?”

“It said ‘rip, tear, kill’ and that it was so hungry for so long and that it smelled blood,” Harry said. His voice had an almost imperceptible shake to it. It was clear that he was trying to put on a brave face, most likely for Hermione and Ron, but it was crumbling in the face of Regulus’s concern.

“Is this the first time you’ve heard this voice?” Regulus asked. Harry paused for a long moment.

“No,” he said. This was clearly news to Ron and Hermione who both looked at him in surprise. “I heard it the night I had detention with Lockhart, but I just thought I was going crazy, so I didn’t mention it.”

“Have you told anyone else?” Regulus asked quickly.

“No, I didn’t think hearing voices was a good sign. I didn’t want Dumbledore or McGonagall to send me to a loony bin,” Harry said sardonically, though there was real worry marring his face.

“Okay, that’s good,” Regulus said, trying to reassure him. It must have worked because Harry’s shoulder’s loosened immediately. “What did the voice sound like?”

“I don’t know,” Harry said and paused to think for a moment, “it was sort of, you know, raspy.”

“Was it a man or a woman speaking?”

“I couldn’t tell,” Harry asked after considering the question for a second.

“Maybe it was Peeves?” Ron suggested. Hermione looked surprised by the suggestion but nodded in agreement after a second.

“Maybe,” Harry conceded. “But it didn’t sound like Peeves usually does.”

“Okay, so you said it led you to this writing on the wall. Tell me the words again,” Regulus said. Hermione repeated them, and Regulus took a moment to mull them over.

“Do you know anything about the Chamber of Secrets?” Hermione asked.

“Not much. It’s a Slytherin legend. Salazar Slytherin didn’t want anyone from non-magical families to study at Hogwarts, so before he left the school he built a secret chamber that stored some kind of monster that would kill all the muggleborns in the school,” Regulus explained. Hermione’s face drained of color and Regulus mentally berated himself. He wasn’t intentionally trying to scare them, just repeating a story he’d heard many times growing up. It was more of a fantastical tale than a horror story when you grew up in a pureblood family like the Blacks.

“It’s real?” Ron asked, a shocked look on his face. Regulus was suddenly reminded of the time he overheard Bellatrix bragging about the Heir of Slytherin and how she knew who it was. There were rumors that the Chamber had been opened before in the 40s, but Regulus wasn't sure if those were true or if it was just a Death Eater fairy tale. Still, he didn't want to worry the kids needlessly if it was false.

"I'm sure it's just a legend," Regulus reassured. "I mean, if that kind of chamber existed, surely someone would have found it by now. It's probably just some kid playing a prank."

"Probably Malfoy," Harry grumbled. Regulus gave him a look.

"Yeah, remember what he said? 'You'll be next Mudbloods,'" Ron agreed loudly. Regulus flinched at the word. It was a word thrown around so haphazardly when he was growing up. He always overheard his parents and other relatives use it. He didn't even realize it was a bad thing to say until he said the word once when he was thirteen and Sirius hexed him so hard that he could barely walk.

"Did he really say that?" Regulus asked. All three of them nodded their heads.

"But even if it was a prank, how did they manage to petrify Mrs. Norris?" Hermione asked, she didn't look any more relaxed than she did a moment ago. Regulus didn't have an answer to that.

"I'm not sure how to petrify someone," Regulus admitted and Hermione got the look on her face that usually meant she was about to spend far too long researching something. Regulus was relieved though, he didn't like seeing the poor girl scared out of her mind, and if she had a task to focus on then at least she would be distracted.

"Oh," Harry interrupted. "Also, everyone in the school probably thinks we did it." He said it so calmly like he was reminding Regulus about classwork they had due that day and not like they were going to be accused of committing a crime.

"Why?" Regulus asked, sighing tiredly.

"Because they all walked up on us after we discovered the writing, and Filch accused us of attacking Mrs. Norris," Harry said. "Or he accused me," he added uncertainly.

"Great." Regulus rolled his eyes. "Why did he accuse you specifically?"

"Well, I found this Kwikspell thing in his office, I wasn't even sure what it meant, but he told Dumbledore that I knew he was a squib and that's why I attacked him."

"Oh, strange," Regulus said. He'd forgotten that Filch was a squib. It was always a nasty rumor that Slytherin kids talked and laughed about, but Regulus didn't believe them until James confirmed it for him.

"What's a squib anyways?" Harry asked.

"It's someone from a magical family who is born without magic," Ron explained. "Most families just kill them."

"What?" Hermione squawked. Regulus gave a light chuckle.

“That is a total myth,” Regulus said. “Even my family has a few squibs and if any family was going to be that crazy, it would be mine.” Ron gave him an embarrassed look. Harry and Hermione looked equally horrified. “It is typically not the kind of information that's spread around though,” Regulus conceded.

“Yes, it is,” Regulus said, “but it’s probably not uncommon for other students to play pranks on him or even attack him if they find out.” Harry looked very guilty all of a sudden like Filch’s mistreatment was somehow his fault.

“I’m going to go to the library, and see if I can find out any more information about the Chamber or petrification,” Hermione said suddenly. She didn’t wait for them to respond before she was out the door.

“Ron,” Regulus said after the door shut. Ron turned to look at him curiously. “Go with her. It’s probably just a legend, but still, if people are going after muggleborns, it's probably best she isn’t left alone.” Ron looked very determined, like a soldier given an important mission, and went to follow her.

“There is something you’re not telling us,” Harry said, a curious look on his face.

“It’s just rumored,” Regulus said. “There is no use sharing it until we know more.” Harry looked vaguely ill. “Will you tell me if you hear the voice again?”

Harry nodded seriously, and Regulus reached out to put a comforting hand on his shoulder. Regulus should have known that this year wouldn’t be a quiet one.

the bludger.

Harry was right when he said that everyone thought it was him, Ron, and Hermione who had written the words. It was clear that everyone was watching them closely, some of them with sneers on their faces. People were especially suspicious of Harry. It surprised Regulus that the other students would be so willing to turn against Harry, but he supposed they all had their own ideas about who Harry was and how he should act.

Regulus was asked by more than one person where he was that night since he, like the other three, was mysteriously missing from the Halloween feast. McGonagall even kept him after class one day.

“How have you been feeling Regulus?” She asked. He was surprised to hear her use his first name. He wasn’t sure that he’d heard anyone else be called by their first name by the professor. He wondered how pitiful he must be looking to garner such a response from her.

“Better actually,” he said honestly, though it was clear she didn’t quite believe him. He knew he was still sickly pale and generally unwell looking, but he at least was feeling better. Since Halloween, he had felt almost like he was on the mend, his energy levels improving slightly. The hissing was still there, but it wasn’t as overwhelming as it had once been.

“I’m afraid I must ask,” she began, pausing slightly as if to fortify herself, “Where were you on Halloween night?”

“Oh, I figured Harry, Ron, and Hermione must have told you,” Regulus said. “I was very ill. I think I slept the entire night.” McGonagall looked relieved by the explanation.

“I only wondered since you were not at the feast,” she explained.

“I understand,” Regulus replied. “I was going to go to the Hospital Wing, but ended up back in the dorm and didn’t wake up until the following morning.” She seemed to accept this, but there was still a twinge of worry to her gaze whenever she looked at him.

She wasn’t the last person to ask, but it seemed that most people were unwilling to accuse him for some reason. When he mentioned this offhandedly to Hermione, she looked at him like he was missing something that should have been painfully obvious. Many students were highly disturbed by what had happened, although Draco and his friends seemed to be enjoying the other students’ nervousness. Ron’s little sister seemed particularly traumatized. Ron told them it was just because she was a big fan of cats.

Lockhart was more nervous after his first class and the issue with the loose pixies, so luckily they didn’t have to face any other live creatures. However, this meant that the class was completely replaced with Lockhart reading sections of his books and making Harry help him reenact random scenes.

In one class, he dragged Harry up to the front of the class and made him howl like a werewolf while Lockhart told an outlandish story about changing a werewolf back into a human by using the Homorphus Charm. Regulus only barely kept himself from laughing out loud at Harry's disturbed face as he was once again forced to act like a monster.

During History of Magic class, shortly after Halloween, Hermione asked Binns about the Chamber of Secrets but he was no more helpful than Regulus had been. "It is a myth! It does not exist!" Professor Binns had yelled at them. Regulus wasn't so sure though. It was clear even the boring, ghostly teacher was unsettled.

"Honestly, the Sorting Hat had tried to put me in Slytherin, I'd have got the train straight back home," Ron complained after class. Hermione agreed with him but Harry got a look on his face as if he'd just tasted something sour.

"Just because Salazar Slytherin was an awful person, doesn't mean that everyone in Slytherin house is," Regulus argued. "There are lots of good Slytherins."

"Oh, really? Name one," Ron challenged. Regulus rolled his eyes at him.

"I don't know, Ron," Regulus said tiredly. Ron looked vindicated, and Regulus just couldn't let it go. It was clear that Harry was still uncomfortable and Regulus couldn't help the urge to protect him where he could. "But my father was in Gryffindor and he turned out to be a stupid coward, so it's not like the houses are a perfect metric for what a person is like."

The words seemed to have an effect on all three of them. Ron looked unsure, Hermione looked suspicious, a typical occurrence for her recently, and Harry just looked sad, like the fact that Sirius was a traitorous prick was something to be mourned. Perhaps it was, Regulus thought, but he'd spent far too long hating his brother to take it back now.

After class, they ended up back on the second floor and discovered scorch marks near where the words were written. Or more specifically, Harry discovered them after getting on his hands and knees to crawl down the corridor searching for clues.

"This is funny," Hermione said, pointing to a bunch of spiders walking in a straight line. It was a bizarre collection of things to find, but it was still largely unhelpful. They ended up in the girl's bathroom after Hermione explained that no one ever went in there, pushing past the OUT OF ORDER sign on the door. Regulus vaguely remembered it from his first life.

Regulus did not have many friends during his first life. Most of the other Slytherins were just annoying purists, like Snape or Mulciber. He had an ill-fated friendship with Barty of course, and Evan Rosier by association, but he would hardly consider them friends in the way Harry, Ron, and Hermione were friends. However, there was one student who seemed insistent on spending time with him. Pandora Burke, or Pandora Lovegood as she would become just before she graduated, running off into the forest to marry Xenophilius Lovegood on the night of the new moon.

Regulus never understood why Pandora spent time with him. He was never very pleasant to be around in those days, and Pandora was far too nice to be friends with a Death Eater. She would often find him alone in the library or around the grounds and would sit wordlessly beside him. Sometimes she would talk to him, but mostly she was just around. As if she knew the Regulus was drowning in constant loneliness. Despite his confusion about why she insisted on spending time with him, her friendship was incredibly comforting when Regulus felt like he had no one else to turn to. It was her that originally told him about Moaning Myrtle. Though Regulus never went to speak to the ghost himself, he remembered Pandora mentioned her friendship with the whiny girl.

Hermione and Myrtle were in an argument before the door even fully closed, and Regulus was on the brink of leaving the bathroom the moment he heard it. This plan was ruined when Myrtle suddenly turned her eyes on him.

“Who are you?” She asked in a simpering voice.

“Regulus,” he responded when he realized she was speaking to him.

“I knew a Regulus once,” she said, drawing closer to him.

“Oh, did you?” He said, taking a small step back. He could see the other three watching the interaction very closely.

“Was he your father?” She asked. Regulus felt extremely uncomfortable. “Well?” She prompted when he didn’t respond.

“Strange,” she said, now circling around him. “You look just like him.” Hermione got an odd look on her face that Regulus did not appreciate.

“Sirius Black is my father,” Regulus explained quickly. It was unavoidable that he looked like his old self, but he’d been trying to be careful about masking his appearance. His hair now grew down past his ears, far longer than he ever wore it as a twelve-year-old, but it was clear that some people still recognized him.

“Oh, Sirius.” She practically giggled at the name. Regulus rolled his eyes. Of course, Myrtle would have that reaction to hearing Sirius’s name. “He was such a flirt.” Ron let out an uncomfortable laugh. “I always heard girls gossiping about him.”

“I bet you did,” Regulus mumbled.

“What does that mean?” Harry asked. “That he was a flirt.” Ron gave him a funny look. Ron had five older brothers, so it wasn’t a surprise that he understood what Myrtle meant immediately. It made Regulus wonder how sheltered Harry had been.

“It means he was, you know, he was,” Ron said, fumbling over his words, “with a lot of girls.”

“Doing what?” Harry said.

“Oh, honestly Ron,” Hermione said at the same time.

“But it was so strange,” Myrtle interrupted. Oh no, Regulus thought. “You know, ghosts can go invisible when we want to. I used to follow him around...”

Regulus desperately wanted out of this conversation. He did not want to hear about his traitor brother’s teenage conquests.

“And not once did I see him do anything except kiss those girls,” she continued. “Strange that they always claimed he did more, don’t you think?” Regulus did not understand what she was getting at, nor did he care to examine it, but was saved from answering when the door slammed open.

“RON!” Percy stood in the doorway and quickly shooed them out of the girl’s bathroom a moment later. Regulus was thankful for the reprieve. He listened to the three of them try to figure out who the Heir of Slytherin might be, but he was too lost in thought to respond. Why would Myrtle take such an interest in Sirius’s sex life? Beyond her general perverted tendencies, he supposed.

The day before the Quidditch game, Kreacher popped into the empty dorm room when Regulus was finally left alone.

“Master Regulus,” Kreacher greeted with grave formality. Regulus was suddenly reminded of the time when he begged Kreacher to stop bowing before him every time they were alone in a room and how his mother had viciously punished them both when she found out.

“Yes, Kreacher,” Regulus said smoothly, prompting him to continue.

“Kreacher has discovered who Dobby’s family is,” Kreacher said.

“Go on,” Regulus said.

“Dobby works for the Malfoy family, Master.” This was not what Regulus had been expecting.

“Are you sure?” Regulus asked.

Kreacher nodded. “Kreacher is sure.”

“Okay,” Regulus said. “Okay, thank you, Kreacher.”

“Will that be all, Master Regulus?” Regulus almost dismissed him before remembering something he needed to do with Dobby.

“Kreacher, Dobby stole a gift for Harry that we sent this summer. His new clothing. I need you to get it back from him. Just put it in Harry’s trunk if you can manage it.”

Kreacher left soon after that but Regulus hardly noticed him leave. Why would the Malfoy family elf be targeting Harry? It must be Draco. Regulus couldn't think of a reason that Lucius would send his house elf to torment the boy, especially in such odd ways. He thought back to the vague warning Dobby had given Harry and wondered if Draco knew about the Chamber of Secrets incident. He didn't agree with the others, that Draco might be the Heir, he was pretty sure that if the Malfoy family was descended from Salazar Slytherin that all the Death Eaters would know because they would never shut up about it. But maybe it was Draco who was pulling the prank?

Regulus was so lost in thought that he barely noticed the increased sound of hissing echoing in his ears. By the time the Quidditch game came around the next day, the noise was so loud that Regulus was desperate for a small reprieve. He felt weaker and weaker as the morning passed, and by the time he was in the Gryffindor stands, Regulus was barely managing to stay upright. Hermione gave him a worried look but he waved her off, deciding to head to the Hospital Wing once the game was over.

Of course, this plan was interrupted when Harry was tagged by a rogue bludger during the game and ended up with his bones vanished by Lockhart. It all happened so quickly that Regulus could barely believe it, but he watched as Lockhart bent back the empty muscle of Harry's arm and nearly vomited at the sight. Colin Creevey, disturbingly, tried to snap a few photos of the damaged limb.

Regulus followed them inside, but he didn't make it to the Hospital Wing. He fell behind the others, struggling to walk with the pain he was feeling in his chest. He thought he heard Hermione asking if he was okay, but the hissing was so loud that he could barely hear her. He tried to wave her off, but she ignored him.

"Come on, let's head to the Hospital Wing," she whispered. "I'll help you."

"Just take me to the common room," Regulus said. "Please." Regulus wasn't sure that Madam Pomfrey would be able to help him without him telling her about the strange ritual he'd tried over the summer. She seemed unsure, but eventually conceded, grabbing onto his arm and helping him walk to Gryffindor Tower.

He was just thankful that he made it to his bed before he collapsed. However, unlike last time, he couldn't sleep. Each time he closed his eyes he felt the pain swirl in his head. He lay there with the curtains closed listening as his dorm mates came back from the excitement of the game and eventually, much later in the evening, settled into bed. Several hours after sunset, the hissing escalated to a point where Regulus thought he might go deaf. Eventually, he struggled until he was standing and decided to head to the Hospital Wing.

When he reached the common room, he sat down in one of the overstuffed chairs in front of the fire. He was already drained and walking was causing his vision to swim dangerously. He decided just to take a break until he felt up to moving before leaving the common room.

He was only there for a few minutes when he noticed Ginny Weasley walk into the common room. She looked wrecked. Her clothes were wet and her hair was disheveled. Her eyes were oddly empty, like someone under the Imperius Curse. Regulus watched her quietly as she walked to one of the tables by the far windows. She didn't seem to notice him. She was carrying her leather notebook and he watched as she set it down on the table before she sat and rested her head down.

He wasn't sure what made him do it, but he felt himself stand up. He couldn't hear a single noise outside of the hissing in his ear. It was loud and furious like it was spitting in anger. It grew to an impossible level as he approached the table. He watched her take several deep breaths, seemingly asleep, and before either of them could react, he snatched the book from the table and sprinted back to the dorm.

Regulus couldn't explain why he stole the notebook from Ginny. Even years later when he looked back, he would struggle to articulate why he'd done it. But that night, with the notebook clutched in his hands, he felt the constant noise in his head settle down into a low buzz. It was still there, the hissing still constant and persistent, but it stopped overpowering him the moment he touched the notebook. He placed it under his pillow and fell into a deep sleep.

The next day, he woke up to find that he was cradling the notebook against his chest. After he dressed for the day, he tucked the notebook into his cloak, so that he could constantly feel it against his body. Maybe all this was why it took him far too long to realize that the school was in chaos. Apparently overnight, the first year Colin Creevey was attacked and petrified while he was trying to sneak up to the Hospital Wing to visit Harry.

Regulus followed Hermione and Ron into the girls' bathroom shortly after they left the common room. "What are we doing in here?" Regulus asked. He thought they were heading to the Hospital Wing to visit Harry, but apparently, he was not paying close enough attention.

"We need a place to make the Polyjuice Potion," Hermione explained. "You agreed to help us make it, remember?"

Regulus did not in fact remember that, but he nodded along regardless. He forgot about their insane plan to illegally brew Polyjuice Potion, so they could disguise themselves and enter the Slytherin common room to figure out who the Heir was. He wanted to protest, but he was pretty sure that they would go ahead with their plans regardless of if he agreed to help or not, and he wasn't about to let a bunch of twelve-year-olds, or thirteen in Hermione's case, make a NEWT level potion on their own. The least he could do was make sure it was made correctly enough that they would all survive their night of hijinks.

Harry joined them shortly after they had begun making the potion.

"It's me," Harry said as he walked in.

"Harry!" Hermione yelled. "How's your arm?"

"Fine," Harry answered quickly. Harry started telling them about Colin before Ron and Hermione interrupted him to tell him they already knew.

"There's something else," Harry said after Ron started complaining about Draco again. "Dobby came to visit me in the middle of the night."

"What?" Regulus asked, alarmed. He filled them in on what Dobby had told him as quickly as he could get the words out.

Regulus was shocked to learn that Dobby had once again shown up the night before. It was difficult to believe that Dobby, the house elf set on maiming or potentially killing Harry Potter, belonged to the Malfoy family. Regulus couldn't figure out what motive the Malfoys would have for sending their house elf after Harry, especially considering he was doing such a terrible job of removing the boy from school. Of course, the others already believed that Draco was the Heir, which Regulus still felt was unlikely, but the connection of Dobby to Draco would certainly not help prove Draco's innocence. Now that a child had been petrified, it seemed dubious that this was only a prank. Either way, Regulus wasn't about to tell them who Dobby belonged to.

"The Chamber of Secrets has been opened before?" Hermione demanded.

"Did he say when it was last opened?" Regulus asked.

"He didn't say," Harry replied. "I don't think he was supposed to. He started punishing himself right after he let it slip." Harry looked disconcerted by this fact.

"He started punishing himself?" Hermione asked incredulously.

"It's common for house elves to punish themselves when they disobey their masters," Regulus explained.

"That's barbaric!" Hermione shouted. Regulus nodded, he didn't exactly disagree with her, he had witnessed Kreacher punish himself enough times to understand how awful it was, but he knew how commonplace it was.

"Lucius Malfoy must have been the last one to open it," Ron said.

"I don't think so," Regulus said. He hadn't intended on sharing this tidbit of information, but seeing as they were already on the track to figure it out, he figured it couldn't hurt. "I remember hearing rumors that it was opened almost fifty years ago now. If that's the case, then Lucius would have been too young to open it."

"Where did you hear this?" Hermione asked suspiciously.

"It's a common Slytherin legend like I said," Regulus answered, aiming for nonchalance. Hermione didn't look assuaged.

"Were your parents Slytherins?" She asked.

"No," Regulus said. "I already told you that my father was a Gryffindor and my mother didn't go to Hogwarts."

"Beauxbatons then?" Regulus often forgot how much time Hermione spent reading about the wizarding world. He nodded vaguely. Hermione gave him a keen look.

"Who do you think opened it last time?" Ron interrupted their discussion.

"I don't know," Regulus answered honestly.

"Dumbledore said something odd last night," Harry said. "He said it wasn't a question of who, but how."

“What does that mean?” Hermione asked.

“No idea,” Harry replied with a shrug. They seemed to be at another dead end, but Hermione had a look on her face like she had a new trail to follow. Ron looked more determined than ever, no doubt still focused on Draco. Harry just looked worried and vaguely annoyed. Regulus for his part was having trouble caring about the Chamber of Secrets at all. He kept brushing his hand against the notebook tucked away, reminding himself it was there throughout the entire conversation.

Regulus spent more time away from the trio after the discovery of Colin Creevey, though it wasn't completely intentional. It was clear that the school was on edge, everyone wondering who might be next. Neville Longbottom was particularly nervous, though Regulus didn't think a pureblood had anything to worry about.

One of the few nights that Regulus was not alone was because Harry specifically sought him out while Regulus was tucked away in the dorm room by himself.

“Hey,” Harry said awkwardly. He was standing in the center of the room while Regulus leaned against the window looking out at the grounds.

“Yeah?” Regulus asked. Harry twisted his hands together, looking uncomfortable for a moment.

“Why did you... I just wanted to say thank you,” Harry said.

“Oh,” Regulus said, turning fully to face Harry. “For what?”

“For the clothes,” Harry mumbled, looking away unconsciously.

“Ah, of course,” Regulus said quietly. “I meant to give them to you for your birthday, but of course, Dobby stole them so I wasn't able to,” Regulus explained.

“How did you manage to get them back?” Harry asked curiously.

“Kreacher,” Regulus answered and at Harry's confused look, elaborated. “He's my house elf, I asked him to find the package and get it back to you. I wanted to make sure you got it.”

“They seem... really expensive,” Harry said. They were, Regulus thought, though he knew better than to say it out loud. “Why did you buy them for me?” Regulus gave him a long look before answering.

“Harry, did your parents not leave you any money?” Regulus asked bluntly.

“No, they did. I just don't usually go clothes shopping,” Harry said defensively. Regulus breathed a sigh of relief. He knew that James would have left anything he owned to his son, but he was worried that Harry's muggle relatives were taking the money and keeping it for themselves. At least he had access to the funds.

"Well, I do like to buy clothes," Regulus said simply. "And I may have noticed that you only ever wore your Hogwarts uniforms, even on weekends," he added quietly. Harry flushed harshly. "It's okay, I just wanted you to have some other options, if you didn't want to wear those things." He hated how embarrassed Harry felt. It made his heart clench painfully in his chest.

"Thank you," Harry said so softly that Regulus almost missed it. His eyes looked suspiciously misty, so Regulus looked away to give him some privacy.

He was pleased to see that Harry wore the clothing he gave him more often. Hermione even commented on it once or twice, but when she noticed how uncomfortable Harry got about it she let it go. Ron didn't seem to notice, which Regulus thought was for the best.

Other than those few interactions, Regulus was alone and the main reason for that was the mysterious notebook he had stolen. It had a draw to him that he couldn't understand. He felt possessive over it, worried about where it was when he wasn't actively holding it, and would spend hours flipping through the blank pages.

It took him a full week with the notebook before he decided to write in it. The only thing he noticed about it was some smudged writing on the first page that read T. M. Riddle. Regulus tried to look for that name in the library, but couldn't find any reference to it. He wondered if it really was just a blank notebook because there was something about it that drew Regulus in. One night, after everyone had gone to bed, Regulus walked down into the common room and pulled out the notebook.

Carefully he wrote, "Who is T. M. Riddle?" at the top of the page. He wondered if he should risk calling Kreacher again to see if the house elf knew anything about that name. It sounded like a muggle name, so it was unlikely that whomever T. M. Riddle was that he was a pureblood. Regulus was so distracted by his thoughts that he almost missed his writing fading into the page.

"Who am I speaking to?" The writing appeared below where his words just disappeared. It was nice handwriting, but not the same as you would see for someone with years of calligraphy training that most purebloods received.

"I asked you first," Regulus wrote. He wasn't aware of any kind of journal that would respond to someone's writing.

"My name is Tom. This is my diary."

"Tom? Tom M. Riddle?" Regulus asked.

"Yes. Who are you? You are not Ginny Weasley." That sent an odd prickle down Regulus's spine. Why was the journal referencing Ginny?

"My name is Regulus," he wrote.

“What an interesting name. What is your last name Regulus?”

“Black,” Regulus answered, though there was something telling him the journal already knew. It was well known in the wizarding world that the Blacks used astronomical objects and constellations to name their children.

“I knew a Black once,” Tom wrote, though he did not elaborate right away.

“What are you exactly?” Regulus asked. “How is your diary writing back to me? Are you trapped?”

“In a way, I am trapped. I am a memory from my time at Hogwarts.”

“Many years ago now, at least for you. I began attending Hogwarts in 1938.” Regulus thought about his parents, or his ‘grandparents’ now that he was Regulus Black III. They must have been the Blacks that Tom Riddle knew. He wondered if his mother’s painting at Grimmauld would have any memories of the Chamber of Secrets.

“Why were you talking to Ginny?” Regulus asked. He wanted to ask about the Chamber of Secrets, but he didn’t want to come right out and say it. He was being impulsive enough as it was considering his recent actions.

“Ginny Weasley was talking to me,” Tom said, though Regulus felt like the clarification was mostly unnecessary. “She was quite lonely when she started school, despite her siblings.” Tom’s words put Regulus on edge, though he couldn’t put his finger on why.

“How did Ginny get your diary?” Regulus asked.

“She said her father bought it for her. It was with her books for school.” It was a non-answer like Tom was avoiding the question.

“How is that possible? Someone was just selling your diary?” Regulus asked.

“I found it confusing myself, but I only know what Ginny told me. How did you obtain my diary?”

“I found it. Ginny must have disposed of it,” Regulus said. He didn’t think telling Tom that he stole the book from Ginny while she was passed out in the Gryffindor common room would go over well.

“You do not have to lie to me, Regulus Black,” Tom’s words appeared. Regulus slammed the book closed. There was a trickle of cold dread working its way down his spine. How could the diary know that he stole it? Or that he was lying? Legilimency perhaps? He didn’t know, but he knew there was something wrong.

“Kreacher,” Regulus called, thankful that the common room was empty this late at night.

“Master Regulus,” Kreacher said as he appeared next to Regulus.

“I need you to speak with my mother’s portrait. Can you do that?”

“Kreacher can speak to Mistress,” he replied, sounding overly pleased with the instruction. Kreacher’s unbreakable love for his mother always made him feel a little unnerved.

“Ask her about a student she went to school with, Tom Riddle, and what she remembers about the Chamber of Secrets,” Regulus commanded. Kreacher nodded so deeply that his long ears brushed the ground, before snapping out of existence.

Regulus wondered how long it would take the elf to speak with Walburga. He also started wondering if the two of them were having conversations when he was away from the house. It seemed unlikely that his mother would waste time conversing with a house elf, but she also seemed unable to leave her portrait frame for whatever reason, and it must grow boring being all alone for so long.

Regulus was about to give up and go to bed when Kreacher appeared next to him again. “Yes, Kreacher?” Regulus said.

“Kreacher has spoken to Mistress,” Kreacher said in his dull, scraggly voice. Regulus nodded for him to continue. “Mistress says that Tom Riddle was a handsome Slytherin boy, friends with Orion while at Hogwarts.”

“That’s all?” Regulus asked and Kreacher nodded. “What about the Chamber of Secrets?”

“Mistress says that a filthy mudblood was killed when the Chamber was opened.” Kreacher gave a nasty smile at that, but Regulus was too distracted to address it. He knew the elf held the same beliefs as the rest of his family, barring Sirius and Andromeda of course, but Regulus didn’t feel like an elf of his age was likely to change anytime soon.

Not that Regulus wanted him to change exactly. He had been too focused on his plan to protect James’s son that he hadn’t spent much time thinking about his own beliefs. He spent a large amount of time with Hermione, a muggleborn, a fact that would have scandalized him in his first life, but now it didn’t feel as important. Regardless, he had more pressing things to focus on.

“Does she know who opened the Chamber? Or who the girl was?” Regulus asked, but Kreacher only shook his head. Regulus wondered if he would be able to get more information out of the portrait himself if he traveled home, but he wasn’t keen on speaking with his mother at that moment.

He dismissed Kreacher and then stared suspiciously at the diary. So Tom Riddle did attend school with his parents, as he thought he did, which meant he definitely was present when the Chamber was last opened. A handsome Slytherin boy wasn’t exactly much to go on, so Regulus felt he had no choice but to continue his conversation with Tom, despite how unsettled it made him feel. He needed to get more information. There was clearly something going on that he was missing.

“Do you know anything about the Chamber of Secrets?” Regulus wrote.

"You're back," was all Tom wrote in reply.

"Yes."

"Are you ready to tell me how you really obtained my diary?" Tom wrote after a moment.

"Will you tell me about the Chamber of Secrets if I do?"

"Perhaps." Tom was no doubt a Slytherin, Regulus thought. The way he withheld information made it clear that he was more cunning than Regulus might have initially thought. Despite being a Slytherin in his first life, Regulus never felt particularly cunning or resourceful. He tried his best to emulate the traits of his house, but he never felt that it came naturally to him like it did to his cousins. Now, as a Gryffindor, he felt even farther out of his depth.

"I stole the diary from Ginny," Regulus finally wrote after a long few minutes. He didn't feel like he had another option but to see the conversation through.

"That was very naughty, Regulus Black." Regulus felt a shiver run down his back. He did not enjoy the way Tom continued to use his full name.

"The Chamber of Secrets?" Regulus prompted.

"Why do you think I would know anything about it?" Of course, he wouldn't offer the answer right away. Regulus felt like he was just being toyed with.

"You went to school with my grandparents," Regulus explained. "My grandmother, Walburga Black mentioned that she knew you."

"Why not ask her about the Chamber?"

"She knows nothing, other than that someone died. Do you know anything more?" Regulus was already growing fed up with the conversation, and he was quickly developing a splitting headache.

"I would be happy to tell you what I know about the Chamber of Secrets," Tom wrote. Finally, Regulus thought, though it was short-lived. "Once you tell me the truth."

"What truth?" Regulus wrote in reply. He felt vaguely nauseous, like if he moved too quickly he would lose his dinner.

"Walburga Black is your grandmother?" Regulus's headache expanded, and he almost lost vision in one of his eyes.

"Yes," he wrote, his handwriting growing shaky.

"It is wrong to lie, Regulus Black. How do I know I can trust you with what I know if all you do is lie to me?" Regulus cradled his head in his hands on the desk, groaning quietly.

"How do you know I'm lying?" His words were barely legible.

“Who are you really, Regulus?” Despite how much he hated Tom using his full name, the usage of his first name only, like they were having an easy discussion between friends, made him dizzy and uncomfortable. He closed the book and leaned back in the chair. He decided to put the conversation aside for now and come back to it when his head felt clearer. He took the diary and walked quietly up to bed. Despite his odd feeling about Tom, he still stuck the diary carefully under his pillow.

It took almost a full week for Regulus to feel well enough to even think about the diary again. He felt weak and ill every time he woke up, and though he had enough energy to go to lessons, he didn't have room for much else. Making the Polyjuice Potion also took up a large amount of his time as he had all but taken over the process. Hermione was anxious to help, but Regulus didn't want to risk her getting hurt dealing with the ingredients that could have dangerous side effects. Ron and Harry were generally useless for the brewing process, but Regulus was fine with this. Better they didn't help and stayed safe, rather than putting themselves in unnecessary danger.

Originally, they had planned to collect the ingredients around the school and then steal everything else from Snape's stores, but Regulus just couldn't be bothered. He ordered the ingredients that weren't heavily tracked and had Kreacher obtain the rest. It was nearly December when he finally started thinking about it again. They all seemed shocked when Regulus told them he just asked his mother to order the ingredients for them, but Regulus was too tired to bother coming up with another excuse.

"Your mother didn't wonder why you were ordering Lacewing flies or boomslang skin?" Hermione asked, appalled. Regulus shrugged.

"What if she tells a teacher or something?" Ron asked nervously.

"She's not going to do that," Regulus replied. Because she doesn't exist, he thought.

"You didn't need to do that, we could have stolen the ingredients," Hermione argued.

"And risked Snape figuring out that we're brewing this potion? I guarantee that he would realize exactly what we were doing once he found out what was missing," Regulus replied. Thankfully, that seemed to settle the argument, though Hermione still looked put out.

It was nearly December before Regulus thought about the diary, the Chamber of Secrets, or the house elf Dobby again. He debated with himself whether he should approach Draco to see if he was behind Dobby's attacks on Harry, but Regulus didn't think the child had it in him to do something so nefarious and then keep it to himself. How he demanded Harry's attention at all hours of the day made it unlikely that he could hide something like that.

He thought that it might be Lucius behind it, but he couldn't figure out a reason that Lucius would risk openly attacking the Boy Who Lived, especially considering how masterfully he weaseled out of his last conviction. Regulus also wondered if Dobby was perhaps acting against his Master's orders. It wasn't unheard of, and based on Harry's descriptions, he did seem very repentant for causing Harry pain.

It was an odd conundrum that Regulus felt ill-equipped to find an answer to. He was still no closer to figuring out who Tom Riddle was, the name barely existed anywhere, and he still was unwilling to ask Walburga himself. Eventually, he decided that he had no choice but to open the diary again.

“Hello Tom,” Regulus wrote in greeting. His fingers grew cold the moment he started writing, but he did his best to ignore it.

“Regulus Black. Are you ready to tell the truth?” Tom wrote, getting right to the point.

“Yes,” Regulus answered reluctantly. Only Dumbledore knew who he really was, and even he knew very little, but when he weighed the risks, he felt telling Tom Riddle’s diary held a low probability of disseminating that information. “You were right, Walburga Black is not my grandmother. She was my mother.”

“Why did you lie?” The words appeared instantly. Regulus vaguely wondered if Tom Riddle’s memory was bored all alone in the diary.

“No one else knows who I really am. I have to keep it a secret,” Regulus explained.

“Your secret is safe with me. It must be lonely when no one knows who you really are.” Regulus felt like he was being watched, the hairs on the back of his neck standing on end.

“And what do you consider important?”

“The Chamber of Secrets?” Regulus wrote, trying to bring them back to the important information.

“The Chamber of Secrets was opened during my seventh year at Hogwarts. I was always interested in it. I was a Slytherin myself, and I spent many years looking for the Chamber to no avail. Once it was opened, there was a string of attacks, students and animals being petrified, before a muggleborn was killed.”

“Was anyone caught for her murder?”

“Yes, a third-year student was expelled, but I don’t know much else about him. After the girl was killed, I abandoned my search for the Chamber, though I have years of notes about my exploration.”

“Will you share them with me?” Regulus asked.

“I would be happy to. Perhaps we could solve the mystery together.” This felt like exactly what Regulus was looking for. Though there was still something off about Tom Riddle. However, Regulus wanted to figure out the location of the Chamber of Secrets more than he wanted to avoid talking to Tom.

“I’ll tell you what I know, if you share what you know,” Regulus wrote, though there was still something else bothering him. “Is this what Ginny was writing to you about?”

“What did you talk about?” Regulus had been unendingly curious about what Ginny Weasley was always writing in the diary.

“I cannot tell you that, Regulus Black. You cannot expect me to keep your secrets if I tell you hers.” That was surprisingly more reasonable than Regulus expected the diary to be.

“I understand. Where did you begin your search for the Chamber?”

“I have a question first,” Tom wrote, though it took longer for the words to appear than it usually did.

“What is your question?” Regulus replied.

“Why are you keeping your identity a secret?” Regulus did not feel inclined to share too many details about this topic, but he figured if Tom was going to help him that he could explain it a bit. What would be the harm?

“I am here at Hogwarts to protect Harry Potter.”

Dueling Club with Lockhart was as ridiculous as Regulus thought it would be. Gilderoy Lockhart was amazingly incompetent. He seemed to mess up even the simplest of spells. So the fact that he was very confidently offering dueling lessons almost made Regulus laugh. But Regulus could hardly enjoy it, he was especially tired that day and had been growing more and more exhausted as winter covered the castle.

He hadn't shared very much about his past with Tom, but his mission to protect Harry Potter seemed to convince Tom to help him and now the two of them were in almost daily contact. Tom was giving him notes on different places in the castle that may have been connected to the Chamber of Secrets, and Regulus was searching each of them. It felt like a fruitless hunt, but it was more than he had done before he started talking to Tom. He once again considered reaching out to Dumbledore, but he didn't feel like he had enough information to bring to the man yet. Regardless, all of his late nights searching the castle were beginning to wear on him and he was struggling to pay attention to the dueling lessons - if one could even call them that.

Snape had always been a proficient dueler, it was one of the reasons he was so sought after by the Death Eaters despite his half-blood status. Regulus remembers watching multiple Death Eaters challenge Snape to a sparring match, and each time Snape came out on top.

“Let me introduce my assistant, Professor Snape,” Lockhart said cheerfully, ignoring the black glare that Snape was shooting at him. “He tells me he knows a tiny little bit about dueling himself and has sportingly agreed to help me with the short demonstration before we begin.” Regulus let out an undignified snort of laughter before he could stop himself.

Hermione gave him a horrified look, though Ron and Harry both looked like they were trying to hold back laughter themselves. Snape glared at him fiercely, but Regulus just looked away.

“Do you think he’s all right?” Hermione asked after Snape hit Lockhart with an Expelliarmus so powerful that Lockhart went flying backward.

“Who cares?” Harry and Ron both said at the same time, Regulus chuckled and Hermione glared at him.

After that, Lockhart dismissed them to practice dueling in pairs. Ron and Harry tried to pair up, while Regulus and Hermione faced each other.

“Time to split up the dream team, I think,” Snape sneered. When Lockhart and Snape decided to pit Draco and Harry against each other, Regulus’s eyes almost rolled out of his skull. Harry looked more determined than he did when he attacked the Dark Lord.

Ron was paired with Seamus, Hermione with Millicent Bulstrode, a large Slytherin girl, and Regulus was paired with a bored-looking Slytherin boy named Theo Nott. Regulus had vaguely known Nott’s father, he was Death Eater like many of the other Slytherins, but he was much older, closer to Regulus’s parents’ age, so he didn’t spend much time with him.

Theo didn’t look much like him, and Regulus wondered if he took after his mother instead. He remembered stories about Nott and his wife, how his wife hadn’t been allowed to leave their house in several years, and how Nott would keep her locked up and hidden away.

Theo gave him an oddly serious nod, making Regulus wonder how much Theo had been told about the Black family. “Ready?” He said, his voice bored and without inflection.

“Go ahead,” Regulus said, though he was far more interested in watching Harry and Draco than he was in this duel. He waited for Theo to make the first move, though it was clear that Theo was doing the same for him, an obvious Slytherin tactic.

“Expelliarmus,” Regulus said lazily. Theo sidestepped the spell and threw a Disarming Charm back at Regulus. “Protego.” Theo’s face morphed from one of disinterest to one of determination, though only for a moment before the mask was back in place.

“Stop! Stop!” Lockhart yelled, interrupting their half-hearted duel. Regulus looked over to see Harry’s feet dancing around as a result of a Tarantallegra. Snape cast a quick Finite Incantatem. Regulus looked around to see Ron apologizing to Seamus, his wand no doubt doing something he hadn’t planned for it to do. Hermione and Millicent seemed to have abandoned their wands as Millicent was holding Hermione in a headlock.

Regulus cast a quick, silent spell that would release Millicent’s arms from their place around Hermione’s head, while Harry ran over to help pull her off. Once they were all reset, Lockhart and Snape went over to give Harry and Draco some actual instruction.

Regulus was watching them and almost missed Theo’s body shifting into a dueling stance. He threw another Disarming spell, but Regulus, barely paying attention, threw up a silent shield to block the spell. Theo's mouth hung open in shock and only then did Regulus realize what he had done. He looked around to make sure no one else had seen, but it seemed most of the room was still focused on Harry and Draco.

"Serpensortia!" Draco yelled, drawing the attention of the room, including Theo. Of course, Draco summoned a snake, Regulus thought. Regulus found it delightful if he was honest. It reminded him of his time in Slytherin during his first life when he and the other first-year Slytherin would summon snakes and let them loose in the castle, their own form of mischief. However, his moment of nostalgia was ruined when the hissing began.

Regulus had grown very used to the constant hissing. It wasn't nearly as loud as it used to be but it was still ceaseless. Now though, the sound was loud and present and it was... coming out of Harry? Harry was hissing at the conjured snake and it looked like the snake was responding to him.

The snake was moving towards a student, but when Harry began to hiss, the snake turned to look at him. The snake sank down to the ground and Harry smiled. Some Hufflepuff child that Regulus didn't know yelled at Harry, and Harry's smile dropped into a face of confusion. There was chaos in the room, but Hermione quickly pulled Regulus after Ron, who was already dragging Harry out of the room.

"You're a Parselmouth. Why didn't you tell us?" Ron demanded once they reached the Gryffindor common room.

"I'm a what?" Harry asked obliviously. It didn't take long for them to find out that Harry had no idea that he was a Parselmouth and in fact, only heard English when he was speaking Parseltongue.

"And now the whole school is going to think you're his great-great-great-grandson or something," Ron said, referring to Salazar Slytherin. Harry looked very distressed.

"But I'm not," Harry whined.

"The Potters aren't related to Salazar Slytherin," Regulus interrupted what Hermione had been about to say.

"How do you know?" Hermione demanded.

"Pureblood families track their bloodline obsessively, if the Potters were descendants of Slytherin, then we would all probably know."

"See? So I'm not related to him," Harry said, waving his hand wildly in the air. This fact didn't seem to relax any of them though. They all knew the rest of the school would believe what they wanted to believe, regardless of the truth.

Regulus, however, had more important issues at the moment. The hissing sound that he'd been hearing for months now was Parseltongue. He didn't know why it never occurred to him, but he hadn't ever heard anyone speak it out loud. Why Parseltongue? He supposed it could have to do with the origin of the locket, with the golden snake emblem on the front, but it did not explain why he was still hearing it constantly while at school when the locket was miles away.

That night he pulled out the diary once the other boys were asleep. "Harry Potter speaks Parseltongue," he wrote. He wasn't sure what made him decide to tell Tom, but it felt important and already his thoughts were becoming too crowded to properly understand what it really meant.

That is a very rare gift, indeed. How did you discover this?" Tom responded instantly.

"Today we had dueling lessons," Regulus explained. "Another student summoned a snake and Harry began hissing at it," Regulus said, giving Tom a shortened explanation of what happened at the Dueling Club.

"How odd," Tom said. "I would not expect someone like him to be able to do that."

"What do you mean?" Regulus asked.

"You said he took down the Dark Lord, did you not? Seems that being a Parselmouth would be an unusual gift for someone known for taking down such a powerful, dark wizard," Tom wrote.

"I suppose," Regulus agreed, though he wasn't sure he agreed. He didn't know what Parseltongue had to do with destroying the Dark Lord.

"What did he tell the snake to do?" Tom wrote after a long pause.

"He says that he was telling the snake not to attack another student, but it was hard to tell. It only sounded like hissing to all of us, some students probably think he was encouraging it rather than trying to stop it," Regulus explained.

"What do you think he was doing?"

"I believe him. Harry isn't one to lie. He says he had no idea he could speak Parseltongue until we told him."

"He cannot hear the difference?" Tom asked, the words appearing almost instantly.

"Apparently not. I wonder if that's common for Parselmouths," Regulus wrote in response.

"I don't believe so," Tom replied. "Though I have never known one, it was my understanding that they could hear the difference and purposefully switch between them."

Regulus pondered that for a long moment, but when he asked Tom another question about it, Tom seemed uninterested. He changed the subject soon after, and Regulus let the matter rest for the time being.

The next morning, Regulus was more exhausted than he had been in a while. The Parseltongue whispers were growing louder as the day went on. They were right in assuming that the rest of the school would now be suspicious of Harry, as they were met with silent glares when they were in the common room. Regulus stuck close to Harry most of the morning, worried that someone might try to hex him when his back was turned. By lunchtime though, Regulus was growing too weak to continue through the day. He pulled Ron aside as they walked to the Great Hall.

“Are you okay, mate? You look a bit peaky,” Ron said before Regulus could say anything.

“I think I just need to lie down for a bit,” Regulus answered truthfully, he was so dreadfully tired. “I want you to watch Harry’s back though. I don’t like the way the other students are looking at him.” Ron nodded seriously.

“Of course. See you later,” he said, giving Regulus a wave as he headed to lunch. Regulus turned and headed up to the common room.

He was having the strangest dream. He felt cold and drained as he walked through the castle like he had been attacked by a vampire and exsanguinated. His fingertips began to turn blue in front of him as he stumbled along. He dreamt of the hissing, except now it came out of his mouth, a noise he had never made and wasn’t sure he could replicate even if he tried.

“How did you find me?” Regulus asked. He was back at the top of the Astronomy tower, a standard place for him nowadays.

“I have my ways,” James said. “I needed to speak to you.” James stood with squared shoulders like he was preparing for a fight. Regulus had noticed James following him around since the start of school only two weeks prior, but up until now, he’d successfully avoided him.

“Are we not already speaking?” Regulus said in a bored voice.

“Why were you fighting with Sirius yesterday?” James demanded. While his voice up until now had been soft, with a drop of mirth mixed in, it now sounded vaguely accusatory.

“Because he’s annoying,” Regulus answered simply. “Besides, it is hardly any of your business what we fight about.”

“It’s my business when he spends all day sulking because his baby brother is being awful to him,” James said fiercely. “Hasn’t he already been through enough?”

Regulus bristled at the implication. “What is that supposed to mean?”

“You know exactly what I mean,” James said, taking a step toward Regulus. “How could you treat him like that after what happened this summer?”

“My argument with Sirius has nothing to do with what my parents did to him,” Regulus said through clenched teeth. “You and Sirius are exactly the same. Always quick to compare me to them.”

James looked shocked but recovered after only a moment. “I don’t think you’re like your parents,” he said.

Regulus rolled his eyes and turned around to look back at the sky. "Whatever, it doesn't matter what you think anyway. Sirius sees me as the same as them," Regulus said glumly.

James was silent for so long that Regulus thought he might have left. "Why didn't you tell him what you did that summer?" When he spoke, Regulus nearly jumped out of his skin, his voice now right next to Regulus. "Or at least let me tell him."

Regulus gave him a warning glare. "Leave it."

"Come on, Reggie. Don't you want him to know? I mean, I hate to say this, but he probably wouldn't be alive if you didn't get him out," James pleaded.

"You said you wouldn't say anything," was all Regulus said in response.

"And I won't," James said. "But that doesn't mean I agree with it." James looked so sanguine that Regulus almost felt bad for him.

"He doesn't need to know. It's better that he doesn't anyways."

"So what? You're just going to keep fighting and bickering with him every moment of the day,"

James said helplessly.

"If I must," Regulus mumbled. James glared at him. "You don't have any siblings. You wouldn't understand."

"Sirius is like a brother to me," James refuted.

"And that's exactly the problem, isn't it?" Regulus spat. "He'd rather be your brother than mine." James sighed. "Listen. Just because I didn't want Sirius to die on the floor of my father's study, doesn't mean that I want to be best friends with him. Besides, he's made it more than clear that he has enough friends without me ruining it for him."

"You both are so stubborn," James muttered. "You would both be so much happier if you would just try and speak to one another."

Regulus let out a long sigh. "I'll think about it," he said, mostly to get James to drop it. James shot him such a blinding smile that Regulus's knees grew weak. He sometimes forgot how beautiful James was. He was always too busy resenting him to recognize it.

"That's all I'm asking," James said happily. He turned to leave, but as he reached the top of the stairwell, Regulus called out.

"Hey James," he said. James turned to him with a look of bright hopefulness. "Don't call me Reggie."

He woke just as tired as he was when he fell asleep. He was shivering under the covers, still wearing his school uniform from earlier. He couldn't remember making it up to the common room, but he figured he was too burnt out to focus on where he was going. It was dark in the dorm room, and he could hear the light snores of his dormmates indicating that it was most likely late at night. He thought about getting up and dressing in his pajamas, but he abandoned the thought quickly, sleep already pulling at the edges of his consciousness.

the polyjuice potion.

Finding out that Justin and Nearly Headless Nick had been petrified should have shocked Regulus more than it did when he found out the next day, but instead, he just felt numb to the news. The rest of the student body was downright panicking and it was clear that Harry wasn't dealing with the negative attention very well. Ron and Hermione stuck close to him though, and Regulus watched the other students carefully, intent on protecting Harry should he need it.

Luckily, the Christmas holidays were just around the corner, and before they knew it the castle was almost completely empty. Draco along with his two friends stayed at school. Regulus completed the Polyjuice Potion the night before Christmas, so Harry, Hermione, and Ron were set on going forward with their plan to sneak into the common room.

"Who are you going to change into? If we're going to be Crabbe and Goyle?" Ron asked him one evening while they were getting ready for bed.

"I'm not changing into anyone, I'm not going with you," Regulus answered distractedly.

"What?" Harry asked. "Why not?"

"You don't need that many people to sneak in. If anything, it will make you look more suspicious," Regulus replied.

"There's no way we could do this without you!" Ron said a little too loudly. Regulus rolled his eyes goodnaturedly.

"Don't worry, you won't be totally alone. I'll help you find the common room, make things a little easier," Regulus offered before he could think better of it.

"How do you know where the Slytherin common room is?" Harry asked.

"Wouldn't you like to know?" Regulus said with an overly arrogant smirk. Harry laughed. "I mean honestly boys, you didn't think to figure out where the entrance is before now? You have an invisibility cloak for Merlin's sake. You could have just followed a student there."

"Oh, right," Harry mumbled.

Christmas morning arrived warm and comforting. Regulus hadn't fully recovered from his last bout of sickness, but he was at least rested enough to enjoy the slow morning of opening presents in the dorm room. Harry received a toothpick from the Dursleys, along with a note asking him to find out if he could stay at school over the summer, and Regulus just about lit the piece of paper on fire. He tried to subtly ask about Harry's family again, but Harry was cagey and clearly embarrassed that Regulus had seen the 'gift' and declined to answer. Regulus let it go for the time being, but he knew he needed to find a way to help Harry during the summers.

They planned to go through with the Polyjuice after dinner. Hermione came up with the plan to give Crabbe and Goyle chocolate cakes with Sleeping Draughts in them. She already had the hair of the girl she wanted to turn into, Millicent Bulstrode, who had gone home for Christmas. Regulus was almost certain they would be caught, but he planned to throw out the potion the moment they left the bathroom and hoped they wouldn't get into too much trouble.

"Sure you don't want to come with us?" Harry asked at the last moment.

"You couldn't pay me to drink Polyjuice potion," Regulus said with a laugh.

"You say that like you've had it before," Ron said, surprisingly perceptive. Regulus had only used Polyjuice a few times, all during his short stint as an active Death Eater, but he had no desire to repeat the uncomfortable process.

"I do read. It says it will be unpleasant," Regulus explained. He separated the potion into three different cauldrons and watched as they all put their hairs in. They each entered a stall for privacy, and Regulus listened as they moaned with displeasure as the Polyjuice changed their bodies. He knew it was uncomfortable, and he was surprised they were managing it as well as they could. It took a long moment before anyone spoke, and he was just beginning to grow nervous, when Harry and Ron came out of their stalls.

"You don't have much time," Regulus said. "Hermione, are you ready? I'll show you where the Slytherin common room is."

"I - I don't think I'm going to come after all. You go on without me," Hermione replied in a squeaky voice. Regulus knew instantly that something had gone horribly wrong with the potion. Harry and Ron were clearly torn, but since they were already running out of time, Hermione shooed them along.

"I'll be right back, okay Hermione?" Regulus called.

"I'm fine," she said in reply. Regulus walked them to the common room quickly. He thought of how revolted he would be if the first-life version of himself found out about this, but at that moment all he could think of was how hilarious James and Sirius would find this plan. The thought caused a pang of sadness to creep into his thoughts, but he did his best to push it away. Now wasn't the time to spiral into depression, he would have to wait till later to do that on his own.

"What's the password?" Ron said.

"You really should have had a better plan for this," Regulus replied with a roll of his eyes.

"Try saying something in Parseltongue, Harry. I wonder if it will work." Harry scrunched up his face in concentration before finally speaking.

"Open," he said in English. Regulus just barely held himself from bursting out laughing. Ron did not have the same self-control, letting out an uncomfortably loud laugh. A blush crawled across Harry's face.

“Try imagining a snake. You said you didn’t know you were talking in Parseltongue, so maybe it only comes out when it’s needed,” Regulus said.

“Okay,” Harry said and closed his eyes. After a minute, he opened his mouth again but this time the haunting hissing sound came out. Regulus was right, Parseltongue worked on the Slytherin common room entrance. There was no way Harry wasn’t going to use this for mischievous purposes in the future, Regulus thought.

“Be careful,” Regulus whispered. “And don’t get caught.” The other boys nodded quickly before heading into the common room. Regulus walked swiftly back to the girls’ bathroom.

“Hermione?” He called when he entered the room.

“Go away!” Hermione squeaked.

“Are you injured?” Regulus walked toward the stall she was closed up in.

“Hello, Regulus,” Myrtle said, appearing through the closed stall door. She gave him a flirty wave and a wink. Regulus gave her a polite smile in return. “Oh, wait till you see. It’s awful,” she added. Regulus did his best to ignore her.

“Hermione, please come out and let me help you,” Regulus said, nervousness creeping into his voice. Hermione finally emerged from the stall in tears. Regulus understood immediately what must have happened, having read enough information about the potion. “It was cat hair, wasn’t it?”

“Yes,” Hermione cried. “It must have stuck to her robes!”

“It’s okay, let’s get you to the Hospital Wing,” Regulus said. Hermione took some convincing but eventually, he managed to get her to leave the bathroom. Madam Pomfrey gave them a few disappointed looks but didn’t ask too many questions and sent Regulus off soon after they arrived.

“Where is Hermione?” Ron asked the moment the two boys reentered the bathroom.

“She had a bad reaction to the Polyjuice potion, she’s fine,” Regulus clarified quickly. “I took her to the Hospital Wing. Now, tell me what happened.”

“Well, we know for sure that Malfoy isn’t the Heir,” Harry said. He sounded so disappointed about this that Regulus almost laughed.

“All he told us was that the last time it was opened a muggleborn died,” Ron explained, “and that the person responsible for it is probably still in Azkaban.”

“I wonder who it was last time,” Regulus wondered honestly.

“No idea,” Harry said with a shrug. “But if it wasn’t Malfoy then we are back with nothing.”

It was clear that Hermione was embarrassed about the half-cat half-human form she had taken on, but Ron and Harry could not be convinced to stay away from the Hospital Wing. The two of them visited her every night, bringing her homework and often eating dinner with her in the weeks after the mishap. Regulus went along with them several times a week but still opted to spend most of his time in the library or exploring the castle on Tom's instruction.

"This is hopeless, I fear," Regulus wrote one evening while sitting in the library.

"Don't give up hope, I think we will find it," Tom wrote in reply.

"Not soon enough. Who knows who else will be hurt before I can find the entrance? I should have gone to Dumbledore way before now."

"If Dumbledore knew how to stop it, would he not have already done so?"

"Yes. I guess that's true. I cannot imagine Dumbledore letting this go on like this. Still, I keep thinking that maybe I should have told him what I already know. Maybe about what's happening to me."

"Are you sure you can trust him?"

"No, I'm not sure. He's intelligent, and more cunning than people give him credit for I would guess, but also he's the only one who knows my secret and he let me stay at the school. He hasn't interfered."

"What would James do?" Regulus shuddered when he read the words. He'd forgotten that he mentioned James when explaining why he was trying to protect Harry. Of course, he'd left out most of the details of their failed relationship, sequestering James to the category of 'old friend.' Though he wasn't sure that Tom really believed that.

"He'd go right to Dumbledore," Regulus answered honestly. "He would probably have contacted Dumbledore the moment he woke up in that rotten cave."

"The cave where the Dark Lord's weapon was hidden?" Tom had been understandably interested in what exactly Regulus was trying to steal from the Dark Lord, but Regulus had done his best to keep it from him. That piece of information was dangerous. If anyone caught word of what he had, his entire plan could come crashing down.

"Yes, that cave," Regulus answered vaguely. He was about to write more when he was interrupted midthought by the loud giggles of a group of girls sitting near him. They looked like first-years and each of them wore a Ravenclaw uniform.

"What's wrong, Loony?" One of them sneered at a girl walking passed. She was making her way down the main aisle of the library, coming directly between Regulus's table and the girls' table. "Are your feet cold?" The girls broke into cruel giggles once again.

“No, I’m quite all right. Thank you for asking, though,” the girl responded. She had a bright head of white-blond hair. She seemed so familiar to him, but he couldn’t quite place her, her face still blocked from his view by a wall of hair. He looked down and noticed that she was walking through the library barefoot.

“Whatever, Loony.” Regulus watched the blonde girl walk deeper into the library while the other Ravenclaw girls went back to their discussion. Regulus waited only a moment before he got up to follow her.

He found her a few rows back sitting at an otherwise empty table. She was already watching him as he approached. When their eyes met, Regulus immediately recognized her. Of course, this was Pandora’s daughter. Her hair was the same color and her eyes, a glassy blue, had the same haunting glitter to them. She smiled at Regulus, like she recognized him, and Regulus found himself smiling back at her.

“Hello,” he greeted. “What’s your name?”

“Luna,” she said with an airy smile.

“Can I sit with you, Luna?” He asked. She nodded. “I’m Regulus, by the way.”

“I know,” she replied in that mysterious voice her mother always used. Regulus felt oddly like he was about to cry. He did his best to swallow down his feelings.

“Of course,” he said quietly. “What happened to your shoes?” He asked. She looked below the table, almost like she’d forgotten that they were missing.

“Oh,” she said, “Some of my housemates have hidden them.”

“What?” He asked, alarmed. “Why?”

She gave him an easy smile. “It’s a game we play. They hide my things, and I find them around the castle.”

“That doesn’t sound like a very nice game,” Regulus said.

“It’s okay,” she said with a shrug. “I’m glad they’re having fun.” Luna was so much like her mother, her voice, her appearance, her knowing glance, but she was also so gentle. Where Pandora was fiery and demanding, though, in an understated way, Luna was soft. “Besides, my mum always said things we lose have a way of coming back to us in the end. If not always in the way we expect.”

Regulus gave her a small smile before the words really sunk in. Said, he thought, past tense. “Your mum is very smart,” he responded gently.

“She was.” Luna nodded. “She died when I was nine,” she said, answering Regulus’s unspoken question.

“I’m sorry to hear that,” Regulus said, trying to swallow the lump in his throat. He hadn’t thought about Pandora much since he came back, only a few times here and there, but he wouldn't have dragged her into this even if he had the opportunity. If Luna was nine when she died, then she must have passed away during the missing years, when Kreacher no longer had access to the Prophet.

"You don't look well," Luna said suddenly. "Are you ill?" Good to know that Luna has the same bluntness her mother had, Regulus thought.

"I have been, but I'm getting better," he responded. "Would you like me to transfigure you some new shoes?"

Luna looked at her feet again for a moment, before nodding. "I think that would be nice, thank you." He smiled at her, and crouched down next to the desk, transfiguring two pieces of paper into two shoes. He stayed at the table with her after that, forgetting completely about the conversation he was having with Tom.

It was nearly February before Regulus had time to write in the diary again.

"I'm not sure that this search is that helpful," Regulus wrote. "I wonder if there is a faster way to find the entrance to the Chamber other than what we're doing."

"Hello, Regulus," Tom wrote in reply. "It has been a while ." Tom was always so petty when Regulus ignored him for too long.

"I've been busy," Regulus said simply. "Any ideas for how else we can find the Chamber?"

"What have you been busy doing?" Regulus rolled his eyes at Tom's words. He looked up to see Luna entering the library. She came to sit across from him, as had become her standard practice since they met. She was still wearing the transfigured shoes he'd made for her, and he gave her a warm smile.

"I'll try to be more diligent about writing to you," Regulus wrote placatingly, "but we have bigger problems right, don't you think?"

"Yes, very well," Tom wrote.

Regulus's hands were bloody. Or at least, he thought they were bloody. The cold winter air was drying out his skin as he stood outside. The warm blood on his hands grew colder and colder by the minute. How did he get out here?

"We have to stop meeting like this." Regulus sighed when he heard the voice behind him.

"Really, James? How is it that you keep finding me?" Regulus said, turning around to see James standing in the grass. Regulus had been sitting out by the forest watching the sunset, though it had been dark for nearly an hour now and he was still outside, letting the October chill seep into his bones.

"I just wanted to bring you this," James said, sidestepping the question. He sat down next to Regulus, their shoulders only an inch apart. Regulus only barely stopped himself from shifting away or shifting closer. James handed over a sandwich wrapped.

"You just wanted to bring me food?" Regulus asked. James smiled at him brightly.

"I noticed you weren't at dinner," James said simply. Regulus rolled his eyes at him. "Actually, I've noticed that you are almost never at dinner anymore."

"Stalking me now, are you?" Regulus thought he might be hallucinating for a second because it almost looked like James's cheeks darkened in embarrassment. He wasn't sure that he'd ever seen James look abashed.

"Not stalking," James said slowly. "Just... looking out for you."

"Why?" Regulus asked before he could stop himself. "Did Sirius put you up to this?"

"No! No, of course not," James said.

"Of course not?" Regulus said with a derisive laugh.

"Stop that," James said firmly. Regulus looked at him in surprise. "Sirius does care about you, he's just... he just has trouble showing it."

Regulus laughed then. 'Having trouble showing it' was a very polite way to describe Sirius's behavior. "It's fine, James. I'm just messing with you," he said.

"Right," James said, "of course." James paused for a long moment. Regulus was about to ask him what he was still doing there when he started speaking again. "So why haven't you been at the Slytherin table then?"

"Worried about me?" Regulus replied, looking over at him.

"And if I am?" James said, looking back, his eyes serious and kind.

Regulus sighed. "I just haven't felt like spending time with my fellow Slytherins much, that's all."

"But you are still eating, right?" James asked worriedly.

"Yes, James," Regulus said. "You guys aren't the only ones who know how to get into the kitchens." James chuckled.

"So," James said after a long moment of silence, "what else is new?" Regulus couldn't help the genuine laugh that poured out of him.

"We're going to make small talk now?" Regulus asked.

"We can talk about whatever you like," James said. He knocked his shoulder against Regulus's, and Regulus just barely managed to hold back the shiver he felt.

“And if I don’t want to talk?” Regulus asked. He looked out at the Black Lake, avoiding James’s eyes.

“Then we can just sit here,” James replied. He knocked his shoulder against Regulus again, but this time he didn’t move away. He just let it sit there. The warmth from his body seemed to radiate off him in waves, warming Regulus to his very core.

Regulus was standing in the common room. His cloak was wet, nearly dragging on the ground as it was weighed down with water. His hands were cold and shriveled like he’d been outside swimming in the frozen lake. He couldn’t remember what he was doing before this, but the common room was empty, and it was clearly late at night. He trudged up the stairs and dressed in a pair of warm pajamas. When he crawled into bed, all he could think about was James’s warm arms and how it felt when they held him the last time.

It wasn’t until the next morning that Regulus realized something. Tom Riddle’s diary, which he always kept hidden under his pillow or cradled against his chest while he slept, was missing.

Chapter Notes

i'm trying to update this fic on mondays, wednesdays, and fridays.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

It's gone. It's gone. It's gone.

The phrase repeated like a chant in his mind. The diary that he had carefully guarded for weeks had disappeared. He scoured the entire dormitory, inspecting every trunk and drawer owned by his fellow dormmates. Despite his efforts, he couldn't seem to locate it and grew increasingly frustrated. He attempted to accio it multiple times but to no avail.

How could it be gone? He couldn't remember how he got back to the common room the night before. He thought he might have been outside, but all he could think about was the dream he had about James. One of their first meetings on a cold October night. Was he actually outside or was the dream just a memory? He couldn't tell.

He left the dorm then. All of his dormmates were up already, the sunny Saturday morning pulling them outside. He made his way quickly to the Black Lake, the same place he'd been in the memory. There were groups of kids out everywhere he walked, and he vaguely wondered where Ron and Harry were, though it seemed likely they were at the Quidditch pitch or visiting Hermione.

He made it to the shore of the Black Lake, the entire time searching the grounds, but there was nothing. When he reached the shaded spot he'd once sat with James, he fell to his knees and only barely stopped the desperate sob working its way up his throat. He'd lost the diary, the only thing he had to help him find the Chamber.

He was doing a terrible job protecting Harry. He thought of how disappointed James had looked the last time he'd spoken to him. He thought of James's heartbroken eyes, silently begging Regulus to tell him it was all a joke, that he hadn't gotten the mark, that he hadn't betrayed him. What would James think of him now? Dragged back from the dead, trying to protect his son, just to fail again and again.

Regulus couldn't do a single thing right. Not in this life or his last one. Every step he took was a misstep. Every time he tried to make a decision, he made a mistake. And when he froze, trying to weigh the odds of each choice, he still failed.

He pulled his knees up to his chest, and wrapped his arms around his legs, trying desperately to hold himself together. He couldn't stop the silent tears that ran down his face. His only hope was that no one would spot him hidden behind the trees. What was he going to do now? He didn't know.

He wished James was here, James would know. Or Lily even. Though he was desperately jealous of her, he knew she would be doing a better job than he was. That was why James chose her in the first place. Where Regulus failed, Lily succeeded. If she was alive, Harry wouldn't be in so much danger. She'd know what to do.

He even wished for Sirius, though the thought surprised him. Of course, he didn't wish for the traitorous murderer who was rotting away in Azkaban. Or maybe he did. He didn't know. But really, he wished for the brother who left him behind. The Sirius that always knew where he was going, who threw off the shackles of rules and authority and blazed through life.

He missed his brother so fiercely that he thought he might crack open. He missed the brother who would sneak him treats after their parents screamed at them. The brother who told him stories the night before he left for Hogwarts. The brother who promised he would always come back, always care about him.

It was a long time before Regulus could get his emotions under control. He was just so tired. He still felt cold from the night before, his fingers still aching from the chill. He felt like he hadn't slept since before he died. Like he was just floating through his second life. When he finally managed to stop crying, he wiped his face and headed back up to Hogwarts. He passed by Hagrid picking up what looked like dead roosters, but he didn't have the emotional capacity to deal with that at the moment. He just kept walking.

By the time Valentine's Day rolled around a few days later, Regulus felt like he was going to crumble under all his inadequacies. Since he'd spiraled by the Black Lake, he'd never quite come out of it. The diary was still missing, and there was nothing Regulus could do about it. He avoided Harry, Ron, and Hermione. Even after Hermione got out of the Hospital Wing, he continued avoiding them. He didn't even go back to the library to sit with Luna. Opting instead to wander the castle until the minute before curfew.

He couldn't figure out why summoning the diary didn't work. It made him think of the locket, and he wondered what kind of magic was in the diary that would react the same way. He wondered if he could destroy the diary, not that he could test that theory. Regardless, it made him feel unsettled. If he was honest, there was something always unsettling about the diary, but he'd still much rather have it in his possession than know it was out there in the hands of someone else.

That morning Regulus decided to finally join his classmates in the Great Hall for breakfast after avoiding them for the past week. He immediately regretted it when he noticed the ridiculous way the Hall was decorated. The walls were draped with eye-assaulting pink flowers and heart-shaped confetti was falling from the ceiling.

On their way to class, Harry was all but chased by a dwarf dressed like Cupid who knocked him to the floor to sing a badly written poem. The hero who conquered the Dark Lord , honestly who wrote this? Regulus was stuck between cringing at the display and laughing helplessly at Harry's bright red face.

He didn't even notice all of Harry's stuff on the ground until Draco sauntered up and grabbed one of the books that fell from Harry's bag.

"Give that back," Harry said quietly, a vicious glare on his face.

"Wonder what Potter's written in this?" Malfoy said loudly. Regulus barely heard him, because in Draco's little pale hands was Tom Riddle's diary. How did Harry manage to get the diary? Regulus searched his trunk when he searched the dorm room, but clearly, Harry had been carrying it around with him. Did he steal it? Why would he do that?

Regulus's thoughts were racing, and he only barely stopped himself from walking up and snatching the diary out of Draco's hands. That would be too suspicious, he needed to ask Harry about the diary when they had a moment in private. Watching another child touch the diary made Regulus feel sick to his stomach, though he couldn't figure out why. There was a possessive feeling clawing its way up his throat. The same feeling he got when he looked at the locket.

"Expelliarmus!" Harry shouted, and the diary shot out of Draco's hands. Ron caught it with a wide grin. Regulus followed them into Charms in a daze, thinking about how to get the diary back from Harry.

Harry went to bed early that evening, clearly annoyed by Fred and George singing "His eyes are as green as a fresh pickled toad" over and over again, and Regulus was about to follow him when another Gryffindor stopped him.

"Hey, Regulus, right?" It was a fourth year boy who spoke to him. Regulus didn't recognize him.

"Yes," he said suspiciously.

"There's a Ravenclaw at the door asking for you," he replied, gesturing toward the portrait hole. Regulus got up and walked out to find Luna hovering right outside the entrance.

"Luna?" He asked. "How did you know where the Gryffindor common room was?"

"Oh, it was easy," she said airily. "I just followed a few students here." Regulus let the door close behind him.

"What's going on?" Why are you here? That is what he didn't ask.

"I wanted to give you this," Luna said with a dazed smile. She held her hands out and Regulus reached up to grab the piece of parchment she was cradling. It was a small, heart-shaped letter made of bright pink parchment. He was worried for a moment about what the letter would contain, he didn't think he could hand an eleven-year-old having a crush on him, but all that was written was:

Regulus,

I'm glad we know each other.

Luna.

"Thanks, Luna," he said. Though the letter was slim in its contents, from someone like Luna he knew it meant a lot.

"I wanted to give it to you earlier, but I think you've been avoiding me," Luna said matter of factly. Regulus opened his mouth to deny it, though it was true, but she interrupted him. "It's okay, I understand. I just wanted to see if you were feeling better."

"Feeling better?" Regulus asked, confused for a second. "Oh, yes, I'm feeling better," he said, though it wasn't strictly true.

"That's nice," she replied. "Well, good night Regulus." She gave him a wave and turned to leave.

"Luna," he called after her. He waited till she turned back around to speak. "Thank you. I'm lucky to have a friend like you."

Her eyes seemed to light up at the word 'friend,' but the dazed smile she always wore stayed unmoving. "I think my mum would be happy that we met."

What? Regulus watched as she walked away without another glance back. What did she mean by that? He wondered if it was just something Luna said, but there was something in the way she spoke to him. Almost like she knew. But there was no way she could know, right?

Regulus was still reeling from his conversation with Luna when he re-entered the common room. He noticed Ron heading up to the dorms and decided to follow him. He still needed to talk to Harry, but he wouldn't be able to if Ron was in the room. He figured he would wait until tomorrow, but he needed to make sure he stole the diary tonight.

Harry was laying spread out on his bed when they entered, he was sweaty and shaking violently.

"Harry? What's going on?" Regulus asked. The diary was laying open on his stomach. Regulus felt the stone weight of dread drop into his stomach.

"It was Hagrid. Hagrid opened the Chamber of Secrets fifty years ago," Harry said.

"What?" Ron said loudly. Regulus didn't reply. How did Harry know that? He looked at the diary again. "Wait, I'm going to get Hermione, she needs to hear about this." Ron practically ran out of the room.

"Where did you get that?" Regulus blurted out. Harry looked down at the diary before looking back up with a guilty expression that Regulus was becoming all too familiar with. Regulus sighed loudly. "Are you going to tell me what's going on or not?"

“Well,” Harry said slowly, he’d finally sat and now was dangling his legs off the side of the bed. Regulus crossed his arms, impatiently waiting for him to continue. “It was a week or so ago. Ron and I were walking past the girls’ bathroom, you know, Moaning Myrtle’s bathroom?” Regulus nodded for him to continue. “Apparently someone tried to flush this down the toilet.” He held up the book to indicate what he was talking about.

“So you decided to what?” Regulus prompted.

“Well, we were trying to figure out what it was. There wasn’t any writing in it, but Ron recognized the name, Tom Riddle. He won an award for special services to the school fifty years ago, you see, so we figured something must be important about it.”

“He did what? What special services?” Regulus asked bewildered.

“That’s what I’m trying to tell you! He got Hagrid expelled after he opened the Chamber of Secrets,” Harry said in a pleading voice.

“Okay, wait, let’s go back,” Regulus said, holding out his hands to stop Harry from his tirade. “Why didn’t you tell me about this before?” The guilty expression was back, Regulus was going to smother Harry in his sleep.

“I was going to tell you, but well, you were so sick, and you’re always so worried,” Harry said. “Plus you weren’t around very much, so we figured we would just wait.” Harry was rambling a bit now, but Regulus didn’t stop him, instead just glaring and letting him flounder for a few more moments. “And I’m telling you now! We’re telling you now,” he corrected. “Besides, we know more. Tom showed me what happened, with the Chamber I mean, and Hagrid.”

“He showed you?” Regulus whispered. Harry’s face paled. Regulus hadn’t intended to speak in such a menacing voice, but he couldn’t keep the worry that was digging its way out of him.

“Yes, I asked if he knew anything about the Chamber, and he said he could show me, then I was... I don’t know... like sucked into the diary,” Harry tried to explain.

“Wait, wait, what’s going on?” Hermione said loudly as she and Ron entered the dorm room. Regulus was ridiculously thankful that Dean, Seamus, and Neville were all still in the common room. He didn’t think this conversation should be overheard by too many other children.

“Let’s all sit down,” Regulus said. “And you three can tell me exactly what happened from the beginning.” It spoke to how annoyed Regulus was that the three of them sat in a row on Harry’s bed without question, quickly launching into an explanation.

Tom Riddle had apparently used some form of Legilimency to show Harry a specific memory, one where Tom was integral in capturing the person who opened the Chamber of Secrets, which was apparently why Hagrid had been expelled but failed to explain why he still lived on the grounds and was allowed to experiment with large, dangerous creatures whenever he felt like it.

“It doesn’t make any sense though,” Hermione said. “I thought only the heir could open the Chamber, surely Hagrid isn’t related to Salazar Slytherin.”

“Maybe there’s another way to open the Chamber,” Ron posited.

“Right,” Harry said, nodding in agreement. “And it’s not completely unreasonable. I mean we know he has a thing for monsters, right?”

“Maybe Riddle got the wrong person,” Hermione said. “It could have been a different monster that was attacking people...” It felt like all three of them were having separate conversations. Regulus said nothing, still trying to make sense of the fact that the diary had actually shown Harry a memory.

“Do you think we should go and ask Hagrid about it all?” Regulus heard Harry say when he tuned back into the conversation.

“Maybe,” Regulus replied. “Though it might be a bit uncomfortable to ask someone about that. I’m sure it’s not a pleasant memory for him either way.” The three of them seemed pensive after this comment, unsure of how to proceed.

“Okay, why don’t we just wait and see?” Hermione finally said. Regulus raised his eyebrows in surprise. “If there is another attack then we’ll ask him.” The other two nodded in agreement, looking relieved that they could avoid the conversation a little longer. Regulus wasn’t sure he agreed with them, but he wasn’t going to argue that now. If anything, he wanted them as far away from this issue as he could get them, and if Hagrid really was dangerous, then it was better that they avoided him altogether.

Regulus waited until Hermione had gone back to her dorm and Ron and Harry were asleep before he took the diary out of Harry’s trunk. He wondered if he should just tell them that he was taking it back, or taking it at all, but for some reason, he felt the intense desire to keep his possession of the diary a complete secret. He closed the curtains around his bed and locked them with a spell before opening the diary.

“Why did you show Harry that memory?” Regulus wrote, too annoyed to waste time.

“Hello Regulus Black,” Tom wrote back. “I see you’ve decided to write in my diary again.”

“Enough with this.” Regulus ground his teeth together. “Why didn’t you show me your memory of Hagrid when I asked about the Chamber? You’ve been lying to me this entire time.” His handwriting was shaky, tinged with anger.

“Why did you throw my diary away?”

“I didn’t. I have no idea who took the diary from me, but I never did that. I’m sure you can tell, you’ve never had a problem seeing my lies in the past. Now answer me about the memory.”

“It wasn’t relevant for you to see.” Tom’s words were slow to appear. “I told you a third year was expelled for it.”

“You told me you didn’t know much else about him.”

“That’s true. I know very little about Hagrid,” Tom wrote in reply.

“You knew his name. You knew enough to get him expelled. You could have shown me the same thing that you showed Harry.” Regulus was growing increasingly frustrated and he could feel a headache forming behind his eyes. Tom didn’t write back for a long few minutes and Regulus was about to give up when words appeared on the page.

“You are right, I should have shown you,” Tom wrote. “But I had to be sure that I could trust you first.” Regulus could feel cold dread working its way down his spine.

“But you could trust Harry?” Regulus asked.

“Harry is not like you.” Regulus closed the book with a snap. Tom was jerking him around, and he couldn’t figure out why. He cradled his aching head in his hands, but the headache only grew worse. As Tom’s words sunk in, another thought appeared to Regulus.

“What did you tell Harry about me?” Regulus wrote.

“I told him nothing. I was not lying when I said I would keep your secrets, just as I kept Ginny’s.”

“I don’t believe you,” Regulus wrote after a long moment’s pause.

“That is disappointing.” Regulus snapped the book closed again before tucking it under his pillow. He would deal with it again in the morning, his head hurt so badly now that it was blurring his vision, and couldn’t deal with Tom again tonight.

“Come to gloat?” His words held a challenge, but they were betrayed by the tender smile on James’s face.

“Yes,” Regulus responded, placing his hands behind his back in a poor imitation of an overconfident child. “That was truly a pathetic display out there.”

“I’m so sorry for disappointing you,” James said, his voice huskier than Regulus expected.

“Who says I’m disappointed?” Regulus said taking another step closer to James. They stood in an unused classroom. Dusty artifacts and damaged desks and chairs lined the walls. The dim light from the half-covered windows made it feel like it was late in the evening, rather than midafternoon. “Maybe I like watching you fail.”

“In that case,” James said. He took a step toward Regulus. They were almost chest to chest now. Regulus used to be so annoyed at James and his height advantage, but now when they stood eye to eye, he loved the way he had to tilt his head just slightly up to look at him. "I will have to lose more often if only to impress you."

"You would throw away the Quidditch Cup? Just for me?" Regulus whispered. Their faces were inches apart now.

"If you asked me to," James mumbled, and Regulus saw the honesty in his statement, he saw the power he held over him. Perhaps that was why he leaned in, or at least that's what he told himself later. It wasn't because those full lips tempted him every time he and James spoke. Or because he would fantasize about James flying down in the middle of Quidditch practice just to kiss him. Definitely not.

It was because Regulus had James just where he wanted him, not the other way around. That's why he leaned in. That's why he brushed his lips against James's. That's why he unclasped his fingers from behind his back to lace them into James's curly, unruly hair. That's why he let James force his lips open with a gasp. That's why he let James explore his mouth with his tongue.

Regulus woke to small hands violently shaking him.

"Wake up!" Harry yelled.

"What?" Regulus murmured.

"The diary," Harry said frantically, "it's gone."

"It's not gone," Regulus responded, rolling over to avoid Harry's panicked gaze. "I took it." He hadn't intended to tell Harry that, but he was too groggy from just waking up to realize it.

"Why?" Harry asked. Only then did Regulus's eyes shoot open.

"I wanted to research it," Regulus said slowly.

"Why not just ask me?" Harry asked.

"I was going to tell you," Regulus said snidely, and yes, perhaps using a twelve-year-old's words against him wasn't the most mature choice. Harry looked both offended and abashed at the same time. "I'm sorry," Regulus said immediately. "I didn't mean that. I just wanted to look at it last night, and you were already asleep."

Harry calmed after that, accepting Regulus's explanation. It wasn't until late afternoon that Regulus thought about the dream again. It had felt so real, more realistic than any dream he'd ever had, almost like watching someone else's memory of the event. But there was something odd about it, something that took him a long time to figure out.

Regulus finally realized it two days later. That memory never took place in an unused classroom. Actually, Regulus had no memory of ever being in a classroom like that. He wasn't sure he could place it if he tried. That conversation, and their first kiss, happened behind the Quidditch stands after a game where Gryffindor lost to Slytherin. A stolen moment before they were both expected elsewhere.

Why would he dream that happened somewhere else? It unnerved him for some reason, though he had trouble figuring out why exactly. All he knew was that something was wrong.

Chapter End Notes

there is a weird glitch on ao3 where if you write something in italics, it will randomly add spaces around the writing. so if you see weird spacing around something in italics, just know that i am doing my best to fix it. if anyone knows how to stop ao3 from doing that please let me know.

cw: some references to sexual content, nothing too crazy but just be aware

With the Easter holidays came the time to choose their third-year electives. Hermione was more anxious than Regulus had ever seen her.

“This could affect our entire future,” she ranted. “You all need to care more about this.” Her hair seemed to be standing on end as she continuously pulled at the roots in stress. Ron and Harry lamented about the classes they wished they could drop, though that wasn’t an option, but beyond that showed no great interest in any particular subject.

Percy, Ron’s prefect brother, gave them a whole speech about ‘playing to their strengths’ that Regulus dutifully ignored. During his first life, Regulus had taken Arithmancy and Ancient Runes, ultimately receiving NEWTs in both courses. He wondered whether he should repeat them now to make it easier on himself. Then he remembered the muggle woman at the library interacting with a strange box in order to give him a library card, and he quickly checked off Muggle Studies.

“Oh, are you taking Muggle Studies also?” Hermione said excitedly. He hadn’t noticed her watching his choice so closely.

“Also? Weren’t you raised by muggles?” Ron asked incredulously. Regulus looked down to see that she had checked off every option for the electives.

“Yes,” Hermione answered, bristling, “but I think it will be fascinating to study it from a wizarding perspective.”

“How exactly do you plan to take every single class?” Regulus asked her.

“Well, it’s not like I can skip them. They all sound so interesting,” she said primly. Regulus only barely stopped himself from rolling his eyes at her.

“What electives are you guys going to take?” He asked Ron and Harry. “You have to pick something.”

“I mean, I don’t mind being outside,” Ron reasoned. “Besides, Charlie took Care of Magical Creatures, and now he works with dragons, so it must be interesting.” Harry nodded along, and Regulus watched as they each checked off the class.

“And what else? You have to take two,” Regulus said. Ron pondered his options again.

"I recon Arithmancy will be too difficult," he mumbled.

"What is Arithmancy?" Harry asked. "Is that like maths?"

"It's predicting the future using numbers," Hermione said. "Isn't that fascinating?" Harry didn't look like he agreed with her, but he also didn't respond.

"How is that different from Divination? Fred and George said Divination is the easiest elective there is," Ron said.

"Well, I read that Arithmancy is much more exact," Hermione began, but Regulus interrupted, knowing she was about to go on a very long, historical lecture about the two topics that would likely bore the other two boys to tears.

"Arithmancy is more for spell work and curse breaking, spending weeks and months figuring out how a certain piece of magic might work before using it. Divination is immediate, but it requires a level of intuitive skill," Regulus explained simply. Or perhaps not simply, as Ron and Harry looked at him as if he'd been speaking in another language.

"How do you know that?" Hermione demanded.

"Probably the same way you know everything, I read," Regulus replied. Hermione rolled her eyes.

"That sounds really complicated," Harry said quietly.

"It is," Regulus said. "Or at least it probably is," he corrected.

"I think I'm just going to take Divination. If Fred and George say it's easy, then it probably is," he concluded. Harry nodded as well and checked it off.

"You're just going to take the same classes as him. Don't you have your own interests?" Regulus asked Harry.

"Well, I'm only really interested in Quidditch, and that's not an option," Harry replied, shrugging haphazardly.

"Harry, you should really take this more seriously," Hermione started, and Regulus tuned her out. Though he agreed with her to a certain extent, he knew that Harry would not be swayed. Besides, Regulus had no desire to force the child into a class he didn't care about.

In the end, Regulus checked off Divination and Care of Magical Creatures as well, taking the max of three electives. Hermione looked annoyed but Regulus shrugged her off. He'd never have been allowed to take those courses. He'd probably be beaten unconscious if he even joked about taking Muggle Studies, and Divinations and Care of Magical Creatures were considered too 'soft' for members of the family to take. He figured he might as well take advantage of the unique freedom that came from all your family being dead or imprisoned.

A few days after the Easter holidays ended, Regulus was in the library by himself. Luna had been with him for most of the evening but had just left to head back to her common room.

Regulus was in the process of packing up his belongings when he saw white blonde hair out of the corner of his eye.

“Forget something?” Regulus asked without looking up.

“I know you’re not who you say you are,” Draco said. Regulus looked up in surprise. Draco’s face was pinched in concentration, his shoulders straightened like he was preparing for a fight.

“I’m sorry?” Regulus asked, confused.

“You will be,” Draco said. “I asked my mother, she said there is no record of you anywhere. She said that you came out of nowhere. You should be worried because they’re going to - ”

“They’re going to what exactly?” Regulus interrupted him. “Whether Narcissa believes I’m who I say I am or not hardly matters. My father is Lord to the family, what exactly is Narcissa planning to do?”

“She’s going to report you,” Draco said firmly.

“Please,” Regulus said. “This is ridiculous. I bet you didn’t even talk to your mother about it. I bet you’re lying.” Regulus put every ounce of pureblood overconfidence he still had in him. Though the thought that Draco had somehow figured him out made him extremely worried, he knew better than to show weakness like that in front of someone.

“I know you’re not really Regulus Black,” Draco said in response. “And I’m going to prove it.”

“You do that,” Regulus said easily, though he knew this would be a problem. How had Draco figured it out? Obviously, he was wrong on one account, he was definitely Regulus Black though not necessarily the one he was claiming to be. He wondered if Narcissa had actually been asked about this. There was no doubt that she would recognize him if she saw him, regardless of how long his hair had gotten, she’d known him through all the awkward stages of his youth.

He tried to brush it off for the time being, but he couldn’t fully shake the worry of what Draco would uncover. From that night on, Regulus noticed Draco watching him periodically, sitting in random places in the castle to keep an eye on what Regulus was doing.

Regulus hadn’t opened or written in the diary since the night he took it back from Harry. He still kept it close at all hours of the day, worried that someone else would be sucked into some memory of Tom’s again like Harry had been. Tom made him especially uneasy, but without confronting Hagrid there wasn’t much else he could do besides wait.

He thought about reaching out to Dumbledore for help, he knew from Harry's retelling of the memory, that Dumbledore had been at the school when Tom was there, so he might remember something, but each time tried to write the man a wave of nausea would overtake him. One night he was on his way to the headmaster's office and ended up waking up out on the grounds, nearly frozen solid in the cold air.

He couldn't figure out for the life of him how he'd gotten out there, but it wreaked havoc on his already ill body, and he ended up spending several days in the Hospital Wing fighting off a cold. Madam Pomfrey was extremely concerned, giving him several potions to help him fight off the illness and bolster his magical core. He wasn't sure how well it was working, but after a few days he was well enough to go back to classes, and by then he'd all but forgotten about his desire to reach out to Dumbledore.

Harry, Ron, and Hermione were clearly worried about Regulus. They all came to visit him while he was in the Hospital Wing, and he kept catching them looking at him with a dull angst that made them frown deeply in perturbation. Luna seemed to be especially distressed by his sickness. She cornered him after he left the Hospital Wing and demanded to know why he was still getting sick, but he didn't have an answer for her. He worried that at this rate he would never fully recover.

He kept thinking about his explanation of Arithmancy to Harry, the usage of numbers to predict how a piece of magic might behave. He kept berating himself for not thinking of it before using the Breiða Sjáflr ritual. There was no reason for him to use it immediately, it was by far the most moronic choice he'd ever made, including letting the Dark Lord mark him.

He was torn from a dream early on Saturday morning by the loud hissing of Parseltongue. He almost threw his pillow across the room at Harry to get him to shut up before he realized that Harry wasn't even in the room. Right, it was the morning of the Quidditch game against Hufflepuff, Harry was probably already at breakfast. He couldn't figure out where the hissing was coming from then. It almost sounded like it was coming from inside his head.

When he tried to stand up to see if he could hear the noise in other parts of the room, he immediately fell to the ground. He felt sick like he was about to lose his dinner from last night. He barely had time to scramble to the bathroom before he was vomiting violently in the toilet. He felt better after he'd thrown up, but he still felt weak and shaky. Still, he didn't want to miss the Quidditch game, so he forced himself to get dressed and head down to breakfast.

Harry was picking at his breakfast as he always did on Quidditch mornings, barely eating more than one egg and a piece of toast. Regulus plopped down onto the bench beside him and the three of them looked up at him.

"You don't look so good, mate," Ron said uneasily.

"Yes, thank you," Regulus answered sardonically. "Just what I want to hear in the morning."

"We're just worried about you," Hermione defended.

"I know, I know," Regulus mumbled. "Are you nervous about the game?" He directed the question toward Harry, trying to move the subject away from him.

Harry shrugged. "Not really, I mean it's just Hufflepuff," he said with a slight chuckle. Regulus and Ron laughed along. The rest of breakfast passed quickly and soon enough they were all heading out of the Great Hall to head toward the Quidditch Pitch.

They were barely out of the door when Harry shouted in alarm. Regulus turned to look at him, already pulling his wand. "The voice. I just heard it again - didn't you?" He said frantically.

"No, I didn't hear anything," Regulus answered. Ron shook his head as well, but Hermione's eyes widened suddenly, and she slapped her hand across her forehead.

"Harry, I think I've just understood something. I have to go to the library," she said. Without waiting for anyone to reply, she took off running.

"What was that about?" Ron mumbled. Regulus shook his head in confusion before leaning up against the wall. He was so tired. He felt like his bones were about to be crushed under his own exhaustion.

"Are you okay?" Harry said anxiously. It was only then that Regulus realized that he was sliding down the wall toward the floor. He straightened out his legs to stay upright, but his vision grew blurry as he did so.

"I'm fine," Regulus muttered.

"You'd better hurry," Ron said. "It's almost eleven. You go, I'll take Regulus to the Hospital Wing." Regulus waved him off.

"You two go, I think I just need to lie down," he said, giving up on his plan to watch Harry play.

"Are you sure you can make it on your own?" Harry asked.

"Yes, yes," Regulus said. "Just go on, you don't want to be late for the game." Ron and Harry watched him as he slowly walked off.

James's hands were so warm against Regulus's bare skin. His lips glided along Regulus's collarbones, nipping with his teeth every few minutes making Regulus squirm in his grasp. His large, warm hands glided up Regulus's sides, gripping him tightly before letting go, so he could go back to exploring. His fingers were rough from years of Quidditch, but they felt soft against his skin. Regulus couldn't believe that only a bit ago those fingers had been inside him. He shook away the thought, just the memory of what they'd just done made him blush.

"As much as I'm enjoying this," he mumbled, "I think we should probably wrap it up soon." James lifted his head to look at Regulus. His eyes were lidded, the hazel color swirling around like a pond of greens, blues, golds, and browns. He had a soft smile on his puffy lips.

“And why is that?” James asked. Regulus gestured to the room around them. They were currently in James’s bed in the Gryffindor dorm. James looked around, the satisfied smile still adorning his face.

“Aren’t you worried that someone might come in?” Regulus asked. “You know, like your very notable dormmate that just so happens to be my disowned brother?” James chuckled and kissed Regulus again.

Regulus was lost for a long few minutes after that. Enjoying the way James rolled his tongue into his mouth, exploring and conquering as he went. James rested his body on top of Regulus, propping himself up by his elbows. James’s skin was always so hot like he’d been crafted by the sun specifically to warm Regulus from the inside out. Regulus felt like he was always cold like there was always a slight chill that ran along his skin, but when James touched him he felt alive, he felt whole.

With James covering him, Regulus was adrift in a sea of sensations. James with his soft, pouty lips, his deft tongue, his strong fingers, all while the rest of his body ground along Regulus’s. Regulus groaned into his mouth, tangling his fingers in James’s hair and tugging on it intermittently. James hummed with approval, letting his hand wander down to the space between Regulus’s legs.

Regulus gripped his forearm to stop him. “Wait,” he said. James froze and pulled back to look at him. “Let’s at least lock the door.”

James looked confused, his brow furrowed questioningly. “Why didn’t we lock the door?” He looked back at the door in question, then back at Regulus. Something was tugging at the strings of Regulus’s thoughts, but Regulus couldn’t quite grasp it.

“I - I don’t remember,” Regulus mumbled. He kissed James again, just a gentle peck against the lips, a soft movement based more on instinct than any real choice to do so. “But we forgot, didn’t we? There was a reason we’d forgotten.” He couldn’t make his words make sense. James watched him carefully.

“This is strange isn’t it?” James said after a long moment of silence. He brought one hand up to dust it over Regulus’s collar bones, a tender and loving motion. After a second, he looked down at his own hand and then back up at Regulus’s face in wonder.

“What?” Regulus asked, too distracted by the feel of James’s hands to remember what they were talking about. James reached up and cupped Regulus’s cheek.

“It feels so good to touch you,” James said softly. “I’ve missed you.”

“Missed me?” Regulus asked. “Where have I been?” James looked lost again, but Regulus leaned forward to kiss the look off of his face. James let him, falling back into their movements with a practiced ease.

He leaned back again after a few long minutes. His eyes were dazed again like he’d just woken up and remembered that Regulus slept over. “Something is wrong, right?” He said then looked confused as if he hadn't meant to say it. It took a second, but his face followed his words, looking more awake and aware. "Something is wrong."

"What could possibly be wrong?" Regulus said gently, reaching up to run his fingers through James's hair again. James stopped him, gripping his fingers tightly. "What?" Regulus asked.

"Why are we here?" James asked. He looked so worried. Regulus hated when he looked worried, it made him feel sick, like he was missing something.

"What? In your bed?" Regulus said with a light chuckle. "I would think you would remember inviting me here."

"No," James said. "I didn't invite you here." Regulus pulled his hand away, disentangling it from James's.

"What do you mean?" Regulus asked, mildly offended.

"To the dorm," James clarified. "I never invited you to the dorm. Why are we in the Gryffindor dorms?"

"I -" Regulus paused. "I don't remember, wasn't Sirius busy with something? You were able to get away?"

"Right, he was sneaking to Hogsmeade with Remus," James said. "But we weren't here, you never wanted to come here. We were in the Slytherin dorm."

"But how?" Regulus said vaguely, looking around the room.

"I imagined you here so many times, wrapped in my bedding," James said, his voice growing husky despite his obvious worry, "but now... it seems off."

"James darling," Regulus said. James turned to look at him. "I don't know what you're talking about. Everything is fine." He tried to sound reassuring, but from the way James's face fell, he wasn't sure he succeeded.

"No, Regulus - "

"Okay, enough is enough. I think we need to get Pomfrey or McGonagall, he's been asleep way too long, and I couldn't wake him earlier when I tried to." A voice cut through his dream like a hot knife, destroying the memory of James lounging on top of him.

"I think you're right," another voice said solemnly. Ron, Regulus's thoughts finally caught up.

"What's going on?" Regulus tried to ask, but all that came out was a muffled groaning noise.

"Regulus?" Harry's voice was suddenly right next to him. The worry was so intense that he sounded almost like he was crying. "Ron, go get someone."

"Wait," Regulus managed to say, "m okay," he mumbled.

“You’re clearly not,” Harry said fiercely. Regulus used every ounce of energy he had to roll over and look at the two boys. They both looked so distraught that Regulus suddenly felt like he was missing something.

“What’s going on?” He asked, doing his best to sit up.

“What’s going on is that you’ve been asleep for two days!” Harry yelled. Regulus flinched at the noise. “And Hermione was... and Dumbledore and Hagrid...” he kept cutting off to take a deep panicked breath. Ron was watching him with a twisted look of distress seeming like he was stuck between trying to answer Regulus and trying to calm Harry down. Harry on the other hand was rapidly heading toward hyperventilation.

“Calm down, okay?” Regulus said gently. He stood up slowly, his legs shaking beneath him. This seemed only to stress Harry out more, but Regulus grabbed him by the shoulders and made him sit on the bed. It took a few long moments, but eventually, Harry got his breathing under control enough to speak. “Tell me what happened,” Regulus said. “Just start from the beginning.”

“Hermione was petrified,” Harry said and Regulus felt the buzz of anxiety that both of them must have been experiencing.

“How? When?” Regulus said quietly.

“It was right before the Quidditch game,” Ron answered as he took a seat on the bed next to Harry. “It was canceled and then McGonagall showed us Hermione. She said it happened right outside of the library, her and another student, Penelope Clearwater.”

“Then we tried to come back here and tell you, because McGonagall didn’t know where you were, but every time we tried to wake you it wouldn’t work,” Harry said.

“So we decided to go and confront Hagrid without you,” Ron said. “You know, because we agreed to ask him if anyone else was petrified.”

“Oh Merlin,” Regulus mumbled.

“But we didn’t get to question him,” Harry said. “Because the Minister for Magic came in and took him to Azkaban!”

“What?” Regulus yelled, looking between them.

“He said that he had to, because of last time, and then Malfoy’s dad came in and had Dumbledore removed from the school.”

“Lucius was here?” Regulus asked. Both of the boys nodded. “Wait, so Hagrid and Dumbledore are both gone?”

“Yes!” Both of them yelled frantically.

“Okay, wait, wait, tell me again what happened,” he said slowly, trying to organize his overwrought thoughts. They both looked stressed and vaguely irritated. “Don’t leave out any details.”

There was something very wrong at Hogwarts. Of course, Regulus knew this and had known this all year, but now Hermione had been petrified and Dumbledore and Hagrid were removed, Regulus was about to lose his mind. He kept thinking about Hagrid's asinine advice to just follow the spiders. Or Dumbledore's vague help will always be given at Hogwarts for those who ask for it.

Regulus couldn't be bothered to decipher either of these things though. He was too frustrated with the situation. They weren't able to visit Hermione after Madam Pomfrey secluded the Hospital Wing off, so only patients were allowed in. Professors were now chaperoning them from one class to the next. The only good thing that came from the last attacks was that everyone seemed to agree that Harry would never purposefully hurt his friend so there was no way he was the heir. They were in Herbology when Regulus overheard Ernie apologizing to Harry for ever suspecting him.

"Look," Harry said suddenly, nudging Regulus in the arm. Regulus and Ron both looked over to see a line of spiders walking away from them.

"Oh, yeah," Ron said uneasily. Harry had become obsessed with finding spiders to follow, but it was clear that Ron was less than thrilled about the prospect. "Too bad we can't follow them now." His voice was deceptively cheery, despite his apparent disappointment.

"It looks like they're heading into the Forbidden Forest," Harry pondered.

"We are not going into the Forbidden Forest," Regulus said fiercely. They both looked at him in alarm. Harry looked slightly peeved, but Ron just seemed relieved. "Neither of you is going anywhere near that forest, do you hear me?"

"Why not?" Harry demanded.

"Do you not remember what happened last time? The person who was hanging around in that forest?" Regulus asked.

"Well, he's probably not still there, right?" Ron said though he looked truly unwilling to argue against Regulus.

"We don't know that. Not to mention there are an immense amount of dangerous and deadly creatures that live in the forest. Promise me you will not go in there."

"We have to help Hagrid," Harry said. "He's in Azkaban right now!" Regulus did his best not to think about Hagrid in that place, locked up in the same prison as his traitor brother.

“Then write a letter to Dumbledore,” Regulus said. Harry opened his mouth to interrupt, but Regulus continued on speaking. “Even though he is not currently headmaster, he can still help, and I doubt he wants Hagrid to stay in Azkaban longer than he has to.”

“Fine,” Harry grumbled, finally letting the spiders go. Regulus wasn’t fooled, he knew they would have to talk about it again soon, but at least for now, Harry didn’t seem like he was planning to sneak out of class and scamper off into the forest.

That evening, the boys went to bed shortly after having dinner. The common room was always packed now with the curfew. Regulus still hadn’t written in the diary, but still kept the item close at hand. That night he tucked himself in early and closed his curtains, before falling asleep almost immediately.

He woke later to an eerie feeling trickling down his neck. Something was wrong, he was sure of it. He opened the curtains to see that it was still nighttime, he’d likely only been asleep for a few hours at most. Upon scanning the room, he quickly noticed that both Harry and Ron were not in their beds. Reacting instinctively, he stood up and started rummaging through his trunk. It didn’t take him long to realize that Harry’s invisibility cloak was missing.

Regulus struggled to contain his frustration, knowing that he couldn’t risk waking the other boys and potentially getting Ron and Harry expelled for being out of bed late. He quickly donned a Weasley sweater and a pair of shoes, determined to sneak out of the castle to locate both of his friends. They were no doubt in the Forbidden Forest and who knows what could happen to them out there. He felt angry and frustrated, but more than that he felt embarrassed, with both of them sneaking out without him even noticing, or realizing they would do such a thing.

Regulus cast a quick Disillusionment charm on himself right before he left the common room, but it was barely necessary considering the corridors were barren this time of night. Regulus made his way urgently through the castle, moving as swiftly and quietly as possible. The weight of anxiety was palpable, threatening to overwhelm him completely. He was nearly at the Entrance Hall when he saw his first person. He heard footsteps echoing not far off and slid up against the wall so that he could blend in. Disillusionment charms weren’t perfect and someone would definitely see him if he was moving around.

While he stood there, his mind raced with possibilities. He thought it might be a teacher or maybe a prefect, though it was well past the time that they would be doing rounds, he was surprised when a little blonde head came around the corner.

“Draco?” He called out without thinking. Draco turned to look at him, and Regulus immediately knew something was wrong.

“Who’s there?” Draco said, his voice was scratchy like he’d been screaming. He almost looked normal if it wasn’t for his eyes. His usually gray eyes were now a molten silver and the whites had an odd sheen to them. It reminded Regulus of the few times he’d seen a corpse during his time as a Death Eater. He remembers when Bellatrix killed a muggle family of three and lined them all up on the floor before lighting their house on fire. Regulus had stared into the face of a young man whose eyes were caught open in surprise, the emptiness haunting Regulus for weeks after that.

Seeing Draco now gave him a similar feeling, though it was clear Draco was still alive, his eyes made Regulus shiver uncomfortably. Draco was looking around frantically, and Regulus finally remembered that he was still disillusioned. He cast a quick finite, and Draco jolted in surprise when Regulus appeared before him.

“What are you doing out here?” Regulus said.

“I’m...” Draco trailed off and a terribly confused look crossed his face. “I can’t remember, I’m...” While he was speaking, the glazed appearance faded from his eyes, but as his sentence trailed off, the odd look came back more intensely than before. Regulus watched as Draco’s face morphed from one of confusion to one of anxiety and worry. He turned on his heel and started walking briskly back down the hallway.

Regulus reached out and grabbed onto Draco’s arm to stop him. “Where are you going?” He said, trying to make him turn around. Draco ripped his arm out of Regulus’s grasp with far more strength than Regulus expected a twelve-year-old to have. “Draco, stop,” he whispered furiously.

Draco turned to look at him and an odd noise came out of his mouth, almost like a hiss, before the confusion was back again. “I have to go,” he mumbled and tried to turn away again, but it was clear that he wasn’t sure where he was headed. “He... I think... something is wrong... I don’t know.”

Draco stumbled then, tripping over his own feet and veering off to the side until his shoulder slammed into the wall. Regulus ran to catch him before he crashed to the ground. His skin was covered in a sheen of sweat and his eyes had gone so white and silver that he looked possessed.

“All right, it’s okay. Let me take you up to the Hospital Wing,” Regulus said quietly. Draco gave a shaky nod and let Regulus help him stand. Regulus threw one of Draco’s arms around his shoulders and started the long trek up from the Entrance Hall to the Hospital Wing. It took them a while to get there, with Draco constantly stumbling or randomly trying to turn and walk in a different direction, but eventually, they made it to the doors.

Madam Pomfrey was on them the moment they walked into the room. Fussing over Draco and casting spell after spell trying to figure out what was wrong. It was clear that the boy had a very high fever and the confusion and frantic mumblings were getting worse. Regulus was hoping that she was distracted enough to not notice him, but as he was trying to slip out of the Wing, she turned to him with an intense look on her face.

“Where do you think you’re going? You can’t walk around the halls without a chaperone,” she said and all but manhandled him back into the center of the room.

“Sorry. I was just dropping Draco off,” he explained.

“Why were you out of bed to begin with?” She asked, which was unusual. Madam Pomfrey was typically no one to pry if she knew you were breaking the rules, but it was clear that the stress of the year was weighing on her. She had dark circles under her eyes like she hadn’t been sleeping, and her deep-set wrinkles seemed even more intense in the dark light.

"I was just, well, I was," Regulus stumbled over his words, not prepared with an excuse. Madam Pomfrey gave him a very long look before shuffling off. She came back with a couple of different potions just in time to catch Draco trying to leave again. She all but forced the potions down his throat and in only a few minutes Draco was sleeping peacefully in one of the beds. The petrified students were tucked behind closed curtains, which Regulus was glad for, he didn't think he wanted to see Hermione.

She came back and handed a sleeping draught to him as well as one of the potions that were meant to help heal his magical core just in time for the doors to open. McGonagall entered looking put out and exhausted, still dressed in her sleeping attire.

"Professor, would you mind escorting Mr. Black back to his common room? I do not have the beds to keep him here tonight, and he is well enough to go back," Madam Pomfrey said quickly. Regulus's eyebrows raised in surprise, he was sure he was about to get in trouble and had not expected her to cover for him. McGonagall looked just as surprised but nodded and motioned for Regulus to follow her.

They walked back to Gryffindor Tower in silence and when he made it to the common room, she said the password and sent him off without so much as a passing goodbye. It was overall a very strange interaction, but Regulus wasn't about to question it. Of course, now he would have to make his way back outside to try and find Harry and Ron, but at least he hadn't been expelled.

There was no need for him to worry about Harry or Ron as he was only in the common room for a short while before the portrait swung open and footsteps could be heard entering. He couldn't actually see anyone, which was more damning than anything really. He heard the footsteps stop the moment they were properly in the common room, no doubt having caught sight of Regulus standing there.

"Ventum," Regulus said quietly. A gust of wind burst out of his wand, causing the invisibility cloak to flutter over their heads. It was evident that neither of them had a firm grip on it. "What in Merlin's name do you think you're doing?" He hadn't intended to yell, but his voice was so loud that it echoed slightly.

The two boys appeared stunned, with pale and drawn faces. Regulus couldn't determine whether it was due to the recent events or his outburst toward them. Regardless, he was too furious to take notice.

"We can explain," Harry said quickly.

"Well then," Regulus said through clenched teeth, "you better start explaining." Both of them were still frozen in place and failed to respond right away. "Now!"

"What's going on?" A voice pulled all of their attention away. Regulus looked up to see Neville walking down the stairs toward them, sleepily rubbing his eyes. "I woke up and all of you were out of bed," he explained. "I heard yelling."

Harry opened his mouth to respond, but Regulus cut him off. "Nothing is going on. Go back to bed." Neville took in his face and must have decided it wasn't worth arguing. With a sympathetic glance toward Ron and Harry, Neville turned tail and ran back up to the dorm. Ron and Harry both looked even more apprehensive now if such a thing was even possible. "Now," Regulus said, "tell me where the two of you have been."

He should have expected this honestly. Both of them sneaking off to go follow a line of spiders into an extremely dangerous, expressly forbidden forest, right after Regulus told them not. He wasn't even sure why he bothered anymore when it was clear Harry was going to do exactly what he set his mind to. Still, Regulus was incensed. He cast the strongest silencing spell around the three of them that he could before opening his mouth to respond.

"I cannot believe you two are this stupid," he said. They had taken a seat on the couch and up until a moment ago, Regulus was sitting on a chair next to them. Now, he was pacing back and forth before them with his arms gesturing wildly. "Actually, no I can believe it. You could have been killed. Do you understand that?"

"Yes, but - " Harry started to say but Regulus sent him a look so venomous that he slammed his mouth closed with a loud click.

"Can you imagine what would have happened if you died? No one would know where you were, no one would have ever found you after your bodies were completely consumed by Acromantulas."

"Oh Merlin," Ron mumbled. His skin was a pale green like he was about to be sick.

"I was the only one who knew you were thinking of going out there, but even I wouldn't be able to find you. Can you imagine Hermione being cured and waking up to find that both of her friends had been brutally killed and eaten?" He was properly screaming now, and yes, perhaps laying it on a bit thick, but he couldn't stop now.

"But we weren't," Harry argued.

"Imagine how your parents would feel," Regulus said, directing the statement to Ron and ignoring Harry's statement altogether. "Imagine how your brothers or Ginny would feel knowing they were sleeping away while you were out dying in the forest. Except they wouldn't even know you were dead, would they? Because you would never be found!" Ron looked like he was about a minute from vomiting.

"Okay, we get it," Harry said sulkily.

"And you!" Regulus responded, turning his angry eyes on Harry. Harry looked more annoyed than anything like this was all just a boring task he had to complete before he was finally allowed to go to bed. "Your parents died to protect you, did you know that?"

Harry noticeably paled, though his facial expression didn't change. "Yes," he mumbled.

"They died so that you could survive, and you were willing to throw it all away so that you could hunt down a few man-eating spiders, just so you could do what exactly?"

“We were trying to help Hagrid,” Harry said, his voice growing angry and desperate. “We weren’t about to just leave him in prison like you were going to.” Harry looked regretful the moment the words crossed his lips.

“What is that supposed to mean?” Regulus whispered, deadly quiet.

“Just that... you always want to stay out of it, but no one else is trying to help. We can’t just sit around and do nothing,” Harry said, looking at his hands the whole time.

“Not everything is your responsibility, Harry,” Regulus said after a long moment. The words had made him think of Sirius, rotting away in Azkaban. He knew Sirius deserved it, he knew he did, but there was always a part of him that felt the insane desire to help him, to help him escape, or at least put him out of his misery. There was no way Harry could know about that, but the feeling was still there when Harry accused him of just leaving someone in prison.

Harry looked at him with a strange misty-eyed expression. “But no one else will help if I don’t,” he said.

Regulus knelt down in front of him, placing his hands on Harry’s shoulders. “Yes, they will. Don’t you remember what Dumbledore said?” Regulus said. He couldn’t believe he was quoting the old man. “You just have to ask. I would have helped you, or I would have found a way to contact someone who was much better equipped to deal with this problem. You don’t need to throw yourself at danger the moment it appears. There are a lot of people who would be very hurt if something happened to you.”

Harry looked miserable for a second, and Regulus was keenly aware that he was struggling to contain his emotions and hold back tears. Ron, too, seemed taken aback by the situation, though he seemed to agree with Regulus.

Regulus had never been a very tactile person in his first life. Even now he tended to separate himself from others, holding them at a distance. The only person he ever felt at ease touching was James, though this sentiment does not extend to anyone he knows presently. However, seeing Harry with his teary eyes like he’d never once had someone confirm they cared about him made Regulus abandon all his typical rules.

He pulled Harry in and wrapped his arms tightly around him. Harry immediately hugged him back, tucking his head in on Regulus’s shoulder. Ron looked on with a gentle smile before leaning in to join them, and the three of them stayed huddled together for a while before finally separating.

“Tomorrow we will write a letter to Dumbledore and tell him what you found out. I think it’s best that we don’t tell McGonagall for now, who knows how she’ll react when she hears about your Forbidden Forest adventures,” Regulus said. Ron and Harry both nodded. “For now, let’s go to bed. It’s already late and I’m sure I’ve permanently scarred Neville.” The other two chuckled as they made their way up to bed.

They wrote a letter before heading to breakfast the next morning and attached it to one of the school owls who came in to drop something off. They weren't allowed to go to the Owlery on their own anymore, so they had limited options. They told him about what Aragog had said, that Hagrid was innocent, at least of opening the Chamber of Secrets and killing a student, though maybe not totally innocent, considering he was keeping a man-eating spider in the castle.

Early in the morning, Harry brought up the idea that Aragog might have been referring to Moaning Myrtle as the deceased girl in the bathroom. However, due to their current situation, they couldn't discuss it with her. It was impossible to escape their chaperones, and requesting supervision to visit the girls' bathroom would undoubtedly draw suspicion.

Harry seemed calmer though which in turn made Regulus feel calmer. Unfortunately, their morning was dampened when McGonagall announced that exams would begin in a little over a week. A few days later, McGonagall announced that the petrified students would be restored that night. Regulus and the other boys were relieved to hear that Hermione would be back with them soon.

Regulus wasn't sure why, but that morning he started to feel ill again. He'd been feeling better, though not completely well, he still felt like his energy was restored. However, after the announcement he started feeling a depletion of his energy.

"I think we can sneak away from Lockhart to talk to Moaning Myrtle," Harry whispered to them at breakfast. "I know, I don't have to do everything, but we're just going to talk to her."

"Yes, fine," Regulus answered. "I don't see the harm in speaking to her."

Harry was right of course. Lockhart let them wander off only a few corridors away from their next class. Regulus was planning to go with them originally, but the drain on his energy had grown to an unbearable weight.

"I think I'm going to sneak back to the dorm," he said.

"Are you okay?" Harry asked worriedly.

"I'm fine, just tired I think," Regulus answered. Harry didn't look convinced, but he was still determined to use their free moment to speak with Myrtle and had no choice but to let Regulus go.

Regulus knew it wasn't the best idea to leave the boys to wander alone given the state of things, but his thoughts were becoming so hazy and sluggish that he was having trouble remembering why. He made it to the dorm in no time and immediately curled up in bed. However, a nagging sensation kept him awake, preventing him from falling asleep.

Why did Tom Riddle tell Harry that Hagrid was the one expelled? Why not tell Regulus? There must have been a reason why he kept that piece of information from Regulus specifically. If Regulus knew that detail, he might have reached out to Hagrid much earlier in the year. By the time Harry learned that detail, he was more worried about keeping Harry away from him than continuing his research into the location of the Chamber. Something was wrong with Tom, there was no doubt about that, and Regulus needed to know what.

“I know that Hagrid was innocent,” he wrote right after pulling out the diary.

“Not all of us have the option of running away,” Regulus spat.

“I would have helped you,” James responded desperately. “I can still help you.”

“It’s too late, James,” Regulus replied. He watched James’s face fall at his words, the regret he’d felt for months now threatening to boil up and drown him.

“Please don’t say that,” James whispered. “Don’t say that. Reg, please, I -” James cut off suddenly, his face transformed into one of bewilderment. “I don’t remember it snowing during this.”

As Regulus turned his head to look behind him, he came to the realization that James was indeed correct - delicate snowflakes were descending down from the sky. They were up on the Astronomy Tower; just as he remembered, but now the snow was slowly falling, already sticking to the lands beyond the castle.

“How odd,” Regulus muttered. He should have realized it was snowing given the way an intense chill was starting to wrap around him.

“This happened in October,” James said behind him. “Too early for snow, wasn’t it?” Regulus suddenly shivered, his body trembling uncontrollably. James came up and immediately wrapped his strong, warm arms around Regulus’s body. Regulus tried to relax back into him, but the cold had settled so deep in his bones that even James’s warmth couldn’t chase it away.

“It’s so cold,” Regulus said. As the words left his mouth, the snow began to pick up, falling harder and pushing into their place of cover, so that his clothes and hair were growing wet.

“I don’t think these are my memories,” James said. Regulus turned in his arms to look at him properly.

“What do you mean?” Regulus asked.

“I thought they were mine at first, that something was happening to me to make me relive these moments. I can’t remember though. I can’t remember what was happening before. But the memories are changing, and it’s not me doing it.”

“How do you know?” Regulus replied. “That it isn’t you changing them.”

“Because I’m not getting cold,” James said somberly. “Or wet for that matter.” Regulus looks at James, dressed in his school uniform still, though he looks older for some reason, and despite the relentless onslaught of snow, James managed to remain completely dry. His attire seemed impervious to the elements, and his hair remained completely untouched.

“So it’s me, I’m affecting them,” Regulus mumbled. He wished James could warm him, could keep him dry too.

“What’s going on? How is this happening?” James asked carefully like he was afraid of the answer. Regulus understood though, he was afraid to tell him, but he felt he had no choice. Besides, if there was anyone he always trusted, it was James.

“You died, James,” Regulus said. James jolted in surprise and pulled back slightly. “No, no please,” Regulus begged, trying to hold onto the slight warmth James still offered. James surrendered and let Regulus pull him back in.

“You’re dead, you died. I don’t know how you’re here, in my dreams, maybe I’m just imagining it.” Regulus tried to explain, but he wasn’t sure how well he was managing it. James was quiet for a long moment, but Regulus didn’t fill the silence, instead, he let James process what he said.

“Oh, that’s right,” James said finally. “It was You-Know-Who, wasn’t it? He came to kill Harry. Oh no, Harry!” James really does pull back now, detaching himself from Regulus completely.

“He’s alive,” Regulus said quickly. James immediately calms. “He survived.”

“Did Lily?” James asked, though he must already know the answer from how he asked the question. Regulus shook his head regretfully.

“I’m sorry,” Regulus said. James nodded and, thankfully, brought his arms back to wrap them around Regulus.

“Are you dead too?” James asked. “I thought... I thought I remembered grieving.” Regulus didn’t think he could manage hearing James recount how he felt after Regulus died. He knew by the time he was gone that James had moved on and didn’t care about him, but he couldn’t bear to have it confirmed.

“No, it’s complicated. But no, I’m alive,” Regulus replied quickly. James seemed to understand his desire not to dwell on it and fell silent. They stood wrapped around each other as the snow continued to fall. It seemed to be growing faster, drenching Regulus more and more. He was shaking, violently now, his teeth chattering together.

“We were in the dorms last time, but to my knowledge, you never visited my dorm. It seems strange that you would know what they looked like in so much detail. Or did I make them look that way?” James seemed to be having trouble articulating his point, but Regulus understood regardless.

"It's very complicated," Regulus said with a laugh, "but I'm in Gryffindor now. I spend most of the year in the dorms." James looked baffled before letting out a loud laugh.

"This is so confusing," James said, though laughter was still in his voice.

"I know, I'm sorry," Regulus said apologetically. He could barely speak now, the cold draining him at an alarming rate. James's face morphed into one of concern.

"What is happening to you, Reg?" James whispered.

"I don't know," Regulus answered honestly. "I think I might be dying again."

"Again?" James asked alarmed. Regulus shook his head in an attempt to clear his mind. He didn't intend to utter those words.

"It's not so bad," Regulus amended. "I don't think I mind as much this time. Last time, I was so afraid and so lonely, but if you're here with me, then it can't be that bad."

"No," James shouted, pulling away. "You can't die, why are you saying all of this?"

"It's okay, James. I'm okay," Regulus said gently. Or as gently as he could given his shivering frame.

"I think..." James paused, looking around frantically like the answer would just appear to him if he looked hard enough. "I think you need to wake up. I think you need to open your eyes."

"Why?" Regulus asked. He was swaying dangerously now and desperately wished James would hold him again. Dying wasn't so bad if James had his arms around him.

"Where are you?" James asked, spinning in a full circle. His eyes moved around wildly like he was seeing something Regulus wasn't. "I don't recognize this place."

Regulus looked around as well, but his location hadn't changed. He was still at the top of the Astronomy Tower. Heavy snow was still falling. It was almost peaceful, if it wasn't for the dreadful cold seeping into him, consuming him whole. It reminded him of his seventh year when he would frequent the Astronomy Tower throughout the winter, just watching the snowfall, wishing he could be like white flakes, wishing he could let himself fall from the sky as they did.

He remembered Pandora finding him more often than not, she always seemed to know when he was feeling at his worst, and she would show up and sit silently beside him just to remind him he wasn't alone. He wished she was still alive. He wondered what she would have to say to him after all these years. He felt oddly regretful that he didn't spend more time with Luna that year. It was clear that Luna didn't have many other friends, yet Regulus still let himself avoid her. It was too late now, of course, with death claiming him.

James was still looking around frantically, but he finally seemed to settle back on Regulus. When he laid eyes on Regulus's shivering form, his face shifted into one of tender worry. He opened his arms and let Regulus fall against his chest. He didn't feel warm anymore though.

He didn't feel like anything. Regulus hadn't expected the sob that crawled its way out of him, so he had no way of stopping it.

"Oh, darling," James said softly. "Just open your eyes, please. Just fight. I don't want you to die."

"I miss you," Regulus mumbled in reply. "I don't want to be alone anymore."

James sighed softly before chuckling slightly. "You're not," James said suddenly. Regulus lifted his head to look at him, but it was too late. James's sweet, soft face was ripped from him, the world around him melting into nothingness.

"Please wake up, Regulus. Please."

"James?" Regulus muttered. He felt like he hadn't spoken in a long time like he'd been sleeping for years and years. His eyes were just barely opened, so it took a long moment for him to realize the kind bespectacled boy he was looking at was not his James. "Harry," he said lightly.

Harry looked disheveled. His curly and unruly hair was partially wet, drenched down, and sticking to the side of his face. The other side was still dry, shooting out in several different directions. His glasses were lopsided and one lens was cracked. He was covered in dirt and what looked like blood.

This last detail brought Regulus firmly back into the present. He shot up as fast as he could, but his head spun, and Harry had to reach out to steady him. They were sitting on a cold, wet stone floor.

"What happened? What's going on?" Regulus asked frantically. He couldn't bring himself to look away from Harry's distraught face.

"It's okay," Harry said. "It's fine." Harry paused for a moment, looking torn, before he threw his arms out and hugged Regulus tighter than Regulus had ever been hugged. Regulus felt the wind get knocked out of his lungs, but reached up to hug Harry back. His frozen fingers were slowly gaining feeling again, and he could tell that Harry was practically drenched in liquid. He pulled his hands away to see they were red and blotchy.

"Is this blood?" Regulus asked, pleased that his voice didn't shake too much.

"It's not mine," Harry said, finally pulling away. "At least, for the most part." He finally gestured off to the side and when Regulus followed his hand, he swore he felt his soul leave his body. The body of a humongous snake was laid out on the ground next to them. They appeared to be in some strange stone room with a huge statue of a man.

Regulus didn't even realize he was moving until he felt Harry fighting against him. "Harry, what?" He said frantically.

"It's fine! It's fine!" Harry shouted. "It's dead, I killed it."

"You killed - you killed it?" Regulus replied. "What is it?"

“A basilisk,” Harry said. “What do you remember?” Regulus looked at Harry and tried his best to search his memories.

“I don’t know. Where are we?” Regulus said, trying his best to organize his thoughts.

“The Chamber of Secrets,” Harry said with a sigh.

“What?” Regulus shouted and now he was properly up on his feet. He felt stronger than he did a moment ago, less tired, and less cold. Harry stood with him. “How?”

“It was Voldemort,” Harry said. Regulus flinched so badly that he almost fell over. “Sorry,” Harry mumbled.

“What was Vo — the Dark Lord?” Regulus asked.

“Tom Riddle, in the diary,” Harry said. Regulus felt like he was going to faint. “He was using you to open the Chamber and release the basilisk.” Regulus looked at him with explicit horror. “I know you said not to throw myself at danger, but you were going to die and no one knew how to find you. I had to come.”

“I’m confused,” Regulus mumbled.

“Tom was using the diary to possess you. He was using you to open the Chamber,” Harry explained.

“I was the one opening the Chamber of Secrets?” Regulus yelled. His voice echoed in the wide-open stone room. Harry cringed slightly, before nodding, though the motion looked like it hurt him.

I am doing a terrible job of protecting Harry, was Regulus's first thought. It drowned out nearly all other thoughts in his head.

“Listen, I’ll explain everything, but I think we should get out first,” Harry explained. Regulus nodded numbly and let Harry drag him from the Chamber. He watched Harry grab something off the ground, but he was too distracted to pay attention.

They made their way through a set of half-crumbled caves before they came upon Ron and Lockhart.

“Regulus, thank Merlin, I’m so glad you’re okay,” Ron said quickly. He was also covered in dirt and was hurriedly shoveling rocks out of the way, so Harry and Regulus could pass through. Lockhart looked like he was half-heartedly helping, but did not acknowledge Regulus.

Ron clapped Regulus on the back when they made it through, and Regulus gave him a wane smile. Harry was still holding tightly onto Regulus’s elbow, and Regulus realized how traumatized he must feel given what he had just been through. He couldn’t even imagine how the boy was feeling. The boy’s hand was steady, but his quietness made Regulus feel ill.

“Where did the bird come from? And where did you get a sword?” Ron said. Regulus hadn’t noticed either of these things but now realized that a large Phoenix was flittering around their heads before it came to land on Harry’s shoulder.

Regulus listened half-heartedly while Ron described a miscast memory charm that seemed to have removed all of Lockhart’s memories. After that, Fawkes, Regulus discovered was his name, flew them out of the Chamber and into Moaning Myrtle’s bathroom in no time. Regulus followed them in a daze to McGonagall’s office. Regulus was both surprised and not surprised to see Dumbledore standing in the office along with McGonagall. He had an indecipherable look on his face.

“How?” McGonagall asked puzzledly. Harry went forward and dropped the sword, and what Regulus now realized was Tom Riddle’s diary on the desk in front of her, before launching into the tale of what happened.

The fact that Regulus had been possessed by Tom Riddle, by the Dark Lord himself, made Regulus feel ill. It explained so much though. He now understood why he was so tired and drained all the time, and why he was losing time. He wondered if Tom had caused the dreams with James to occur. It seemed strange that James would fight back against the memories, but Regulus couldn’t make sense of it one way or the other.

“It was the diary,” Harry said, pulling Regulus from his thoughts. “Riddle wrote in it when he was sixteen.” Dumbledore seemed perplexed and terribly interested in the diary. Something was itching at Regulus like he was missing something, but for the moment he was too overwhelmed to grasp at it.

“Mr. Black, you should go up to the hospital wing right away,” Dumbledore said to him, acknowledging him for the first time since he entered the room. Harry opened his mouth like he was going to argue. “There will be no punishment. Older and wiser wizards than he have been hoodwinked by Lord Voldemort.”

Regulus felt the hot wash of shame move through him. He didn’t want to hear anymore. Harry was safe and for tonight, that was all that matter. He left almost immediately, not even hearing what else Dumbledore had to say. He walked numbly to the Hospital Wing and came in to find Madam Pomfrey bustling around.

“Oh,” she yelped when she saw him. “Thank Rowena, you’re alive. How?”

“It’s a long story,” Regulus mumbled. “Harry and Ron came for me.” She luckily did not make him elaborate further. She set him up in a bed near the door, but Regulus immediately asked for the curtains to be put up.

“May I have a Dreamless Sleep draught?” He asked politely. Madam Pomfrey looked unnerved for a second but nodded. “Would you mind — well, do you mind not letting anyone in to visit? At least for the time being?” She gave him a long, sad look, but eventually said yes.

Regulus dressed in the pajamas she provided, pulled the curtains tightly closed and took the potion. He’d failed worse than he’d ever failed before. For now, he needed to sleep. But when he woke, he decided, he was going to leave Hogwarts for good.

Regulus woke briefly the next morning. The sun was shining through the windows indicating that it was early morning. Regulus felt both more rested than he had all year and more exhausted than he'd ever been. He didn't think he could deal with what had happened just yet, so he pulled his blanket tight above his head and all but forced himself back into a deep sleep.

When he woke again it was nighttime, dark and quiet. The curtains were still pulled around his hospital bed, and he wondered if anyone had tried to visit him while he was out. He was slightly surprised that Madam Pomfrey hadn't bothered to wake him, but perhaps she knew how desperately he needed to not be awake.

He lay awake for a long time after that. It began to rain not long after he woke up, but it was nothing but a light drizzle. He used every trick he knew to keep from thinking about the Chamber and Tom and the basilisk. It was too much, far too much. He knew that at some point he would have to leave this bed and leave the Hospital Wing and leave Hogwarts, but he just wasn't ready to face it. He wondered if he could sneak out of the school without anyone noticing.

It was a long time before he eventually fell back asleep, his stomach rumbling from the many hours he'd spent without eating. He didn't even know how he could still be tired after so much sleep, but it was like his body knew what he was avoiding.

When he woke the next morning, he wasn't alone. The curtains were still drawn but he could sense someone in the Hospital Wing with him as though they were waiting for him to wake up. He lay very still trying to figure out if they would just leave, but he could feel the magic permeating throughout the room. Eventually, he sighed and gave up, standing up to pull the curtains back.

"Ah, Mr. Black, you're awake," Dumbledore said the moment the curtains were open. "How are you feeling?"

Regulus felt uneasy on his feet like he wasn't sure if he should be sitting back down or making a run for it for some unfathomable reason. "I'm... fine," he answered after a long moment's pause.

"I'm glad to hear it. I was hoping we could discuss what happened," Dumbledore said idly.

"I appreciate that you did not expel me in front of the others, but I assure you I am already planning to leave. I know that I've put the school in danger, but it was never my intention," Regulus said, using the highly formal voice that he was taught in childhood.

“That is unnecessary, Mr. Black,” Dumbledore responded. “I did mean it when I said there would be no punishment.”

“There should be a punishment,” Regulus replied, speaking much louder than he intended to. He did his best to lower his voice before continuing. “I put Harry in direct danger, not to mention Ron and whatever happened to Lockhart.”

“I don’t believe that’s a far statement,” Dumbledore said mildly. “As I understand it, it was not your fault that Tom possessed you. Unless, of course, you intended to use his diary to open the Chamber and rid the school of all its muggleborn students?”

“Of course not,” Regulus shouted. “But it’s still my fault. I wrote in the diary even though I could feel that something was wrong with it.” Regulus was trying not to let his voice echo through the empty Wing, but it was hard to fight the tidal wave of emotions he was experiencing.

“I was curious about that,” Dumbledore interrupted. Regulus took a step back, not even realizing that he’d stepped forward while speaking.

“Curious about what?” He asked, suddenly bone tired.

“Why did you write in the diary?” Dumbledore asked.

“It just,” Regulus paused and searched his memories. It was a complicated question to try and answer because even now looking back on it he couldn’t figure out why he’d made such a reckless decision to write in the diary. “I’m not sure. But Tom made it seem like he at least searched for the Chamber of Secrets during his time here at Hogwarts, and I was hoping that he would be able to help me. Of course, I did not realize that the reason he was looking for it was because he had the ability to open it.”

“What did he tell you?” Dumbledore asked after a long moment. Regulus told him everything he could remember, about stealing the diary from Ginny, about asking his mother’s portrait about Tom Riddle and the Chamber, about Tom’s time at school and the mention of the student dying, about losing the diary and Harry finding it in Myrtle’s bathroom, and about the memory Tom showed Harry.

“I should have asked about him, I kept thinking of coming to you. Tom mentioned that you were here at Hogwarts when he attended,” Regulus said. His voice was growing scratchy from use.

“I do believe that, if you had tried to contact me, Tom would have likely stopped you,” Dumbledore replied. Regulus jolted, he hadn’t even thought about that, but in retrospect it made sense. “Is there anything else about the diary?”

“No,” he said immediately but then stopped. There was one other thing that had weighed on him all year, something he’d never figured out. “I think it might have been making a noise.”

“A noise?” Dumbledore asked.

Dumbledore, upon hearing his description of the hissing, had a knowing glint in his eyes. “Do you know what this diary is?” Dumbledore asked in that specific voice teachers used, the kind of voice that said, I already know, but I’m not going to tell you.

“I’m not sure. I don’t know how the Dark Lord could have hidden a memory of himself in a diary,” Regulus answered half-heartedly.

“Tom did not hide a memory,” Dumbledore responded. As he spoke he reached into his robe to pull out something. Regulus watched closely as the battered diary appeared. It had a large hole in the center of it, the sides pulling up in a grotesque imitation of a stab wound. “He hid his soul.”

Regulus gasped. He didn’t intend to, but the sound punched out of him in a hurry when he heard the word soul. Of course, it was his soul. Regulus should have known. Well, he should have done a lot of things. His soul, a Horcrux, Regulus had been writing in a Horcrux all year.

“So, you know what it is?” Dumbledore asked gently.

“I didn’t before, but yes,” Regulus responded, the formality slipping from his voice. Dumbledore gave him a nod indicating for him to go on. Regulus wondered if Dumbledore already knew exactly what the item was and if he knew what they were called. He wasn’t sure that the Horcrux would be shared in the circles Dumbledore ran in. Then again he was a very old and experienced wizard, so it wouldn’t be unheard of for him to already know. “It’s a Horcrux.”

Dumbledore looked surprised and keenly interested. “Destroyed by basilisk venom,” he mumbled. “Of course.”

“Basilisk venom,” Regulus repeated aloud. The solution he needed was at Hogwarts all along, and all he had to do was endanger the entire school and force a twelve-year-old to fight a giant and deadly snake.

“You seem more familiar with this than I believed you would be,” Dumbledore said.

“I have been researching them,” Regulus answered vaguely. Dumbledore gave him a knowing look but surprisingly did not press him.

“I believe it would be prudent for us to work together,” Dumbledore finally replied. Regulus reluctantly agreed. Though there was a part of him that didn’t trust the wizard, he felt he had no choice in the matter now. Not to mention how spectacularly things went wrong when he was on his own.

“I have some research on the subject I can share,” Regulus said.

“Is it still your intention to leave Hogwarts?” Dumbledore asked. He stood and, to Regulus’s surprise, handed off the diary. Regulus grabbed it and cradled it between his hands. It felt so light and powerless. It must have been feeding off of him all year, and he wasn’t even aware. The self-hatred threatened to swallow him again, but he did his best to focus on replying to Dumbledore’s question.

“I think that would be best,” Regulus mumbled regretfully. “I wanted to help Harry, to protect him, but all I’ve done is put him in further danger. I think it might be best if I help him from afar.”

Dumbledore gave him a long look. Regulus thought for a moment that he wasn’t going to respond at all. “I think that would be a mistake,” he finally said. Regulus looked up in surprise. “It is clear that Harry considers you a friend and there are no shortage of dangers that pose a threat to Harry’s life. It may not have been your best year, but taking yourself away from a child who looks up to you would only harm him.”

Regulus tried to respond, really he did, but he couldn’t think of a single word that he wanted to say. Dumbledore gave him a small wave and left the Hospital Wing without another word. Regulus continued to stare after him until Madam Pomfrey finally interrupted.

He was so sure that he should leave, in fact, he thought Dumbledore was going to force him out once they were away from spectators, but he could never have predicted that Dumbledore would all but manipulate him into staying. He thought about Harry’s worried little face and felt his heart clench painfully. Yes, he’d put Harry in terrible danger this year, but at the same time, there were so few adults that cared about the boy and even fewer that could keep up with his day-to-day activities as well as Regulus could. For now, he decided, he would stay.

See the end of the chapter for notes

There was no reason for Regulus to still be in the Hospital Wing. He was no longer sick or unwell, but he still stayed hidden behind his drawn curtains. It had been two days since Dumbledore had come to see him. Madam Pomfrey informed him that exams had been canceled, so there was really no reason for him to remain at school any longer that year, but he also knew he couldn't just leave.

According to Madam Pomfrey, his friends had attempted to visit him several times in the past few days, but she honored his wishes and turned them away. Regulus was grateful for this, but he should have known it couldn't last. She asked him again that morning if he would like to see his friends, but he only shook his head. Mostly, he was surprised that she hadn't kicked him out yet, though he figured that day was coming. He had planned to spend another day sulking in bed, the midafternoon sun already shining brightly through the windows, when suddenly the curtains were violently pulled back.

Regulus looked up in alarm to see Luna standing there, still holding the bunched curtains in one of her hands. Her face was carefully blank, although this was not unusual for the girl. Still, Regulus thought that buried deep beneath her neutral exterior, there was an intense sadness emanating from her.

"Luna," he greeted her after a long moment of silence where the two of them only stared at each other.

"I'm sorry," she said, and then, alarmingly, her bottom lip began to wobble dangerously. Regulus had never seen Pandora upset, nor had he ever witnessed her getting even mildly annoyed, so witnessing her daughter's nearly identical face morph into an expression of anguished sorrow was a frightening experience.

"No, no, it's okay," Regulus soothed. He was up and out of bed before he realized it, his arms coming out to cradle the crying girl. "What are you sorry for? There is nothing to be sorry about."

Luna didn't respond right away, only continuing the cry until her sobs turned into quiet little whimpers. Regulus gently rubbed her back. "It was my fault," she finally said.

"What was your fault?" He asked. She pulled back to look at him, her face blotchy with tears. He sat back down on the bed and dragged her along until she was seated at the foot of the bed facing him.

"I was the one who stole your diary," she confessed.

"What?" He said, confused.

“You were always writing in it,” she explained. “But I thought it might be hurting you. You seemed so sick, and the diary smelled weird.”

“It smelled weird?” He asked.

She nodded emphatically. “So, I tried to get rid of it in Myrtle's bathroom,” she said. “I know I shouldn't have taken it.” Oh, of course. This answered a question that Regulus had all but forgotten he wanted an answer to. The diary had inexplicably gone missing. He'd thought, after he found out about the possession, that Tom had forced him into it, possibly to gain access to Harry. However, he had not anticipated that someone else would take the object and dispose of it in the toilet.

“That's okay, Luna,” he said. He wanted to erase the guilty look from her face. He understood why she did it, although the olfactory aspect still puzzled him. “I'm lucky to have a friend who looks out for me like that.”

Luna gave him a slight smile and then opened her mouth as if to say something. The sound of the door banging open interrupted them. Harry, Ron, and Hermione rushed into the Wing, stumbling together as a group.

“Madam Pomfrey said we could come back,” Hermione explained excitedly. Traitor, Regulus thought. Of course, the matron wouldn't allow him to hide out here for the rest of term. That explained why Luna had suddenly barged in.

“Who are you?” Ron asked, directing the question toward Luna. Hermione elbowed him and shot him a judgmental look.

“I'm Luna,” Luna responded softly. Ron was still looking at her confusedly.

“She's my friend,” Regulus explained. “She's in Ravenclaw.”

“You have friends in other houses?” Ron asked.

“Ronald, honestly,” Hermione said in an exasperated voice.

“How are you feeling?” Harry asked, ignoring them.

“I'm fine,” Regulus answered. “Rested.” Harry did not look satisfied, but Ron and Hermione seemed to be having a silent conversation with just facial expressions. “Hermione, I'm glad to see that you're okay.”

Hermione turned to him, beaming with a smile. “I can't believe they figured it out. I'm so glad you didn't die.” The contrasting sentences made Regulus burst out laughing. It was the first time he'd laughed in days, maybe weeks, but it felt good, better than he would have expected.

“Well...” she said, faltering out like she wasn't sure how to answer. She exchanged an unsteady look with Ron and Harry.

“She already knows about the diary,” Regulus explained, “at least partially. You may as well tell her.” Regulus was also curious about what she meant by them ‘figuring it out.’ Plus, he felt guilty for the distance he had created between himself and Luna. He knew she didn't have many other friends, but he let his own problems prevent him from spending time with her. He figured that now was as good a time as any to include her, especially if it meant that Harry, Ron, and Hermione would get to know her.

Hermione appeared uncertain for a moment before she seemed to come to a decision and launched into a story about her discovering what the creature was based on, which made her realize why only Harry could hear it.

“It had to be a basilisk, they can live for hundreds of years and it’s a giant snake! That’s why it's a creature only Salazar Slytherin and his heirs could control because no one else would be able to speak to it. Except for Harry of course, but he’s not the Heir,” she explained excitedly. Luna listened with rapt attention, asking thoughtful questions every now and then that seemed to stump even Hermione.

Harry and Ron listened and added their own perspective once and a while. Luna seemed thoroughly impressed with what she was calling their “grand adventure.” Harry would cringe slightly every time she said it, but still managed to give Luna a kind smile. Ron only looked proud.

Though Regulus was annoyed at first that Madam Pomfrey had let them all in without asking him, he couldn't deny that the afternoon spent with the four children was healing in a way he would have never expected. He left the Hospital Wing that evening, and by the time he was on the Hogwarts Express back to London, he felt calmer than he had all year.

Regulus knew Harry was stressed about the summer, but he listened carefully as Ron and Hermione talked happily about their own plans. Luna sat with them on the train, mentioning the plans she had to search for some creatures none of them had ever heard of. Hermione looked especially bewildered but didn't question it for the time being.

Regulus made it back to Grimmauld and took a few moments to settle himself. It was raining outside, the sound muffled by the old walls. He had decided not to collect the basilisk venom from the Chamber before the school year ended. The only way he could access it was by asking Harry to go with him, and he was sure Harry would need more time to recover before venturing back down into the Chamber of Secrets.

Besides, Regulus figured the locket wasn't going anywhere, and for the time being, there was another theory he wanted to test. He was almost certain that the diary was causing the bizarre dreams of James, but he wasn't sure how much of it was purposefully done by Tom Riddle. It was possible that it was his own magic's reaction to the diary's power. Furthermore, he couldn't figure out if the dreams were actually dreams, or if they were some sort of visions. They all originally started as memories, but clearly, things were changing in them.

The only way he knew to test these hypotheses was to try and interact with the locket. While the diary usually only affected him while he was actively writing in it, he knew the power of the locket was more prevalent. He was sure this had to do with the Norse ritual he'd attempted to cast on the Horcrux, most likely causing the locket's magic to expand and open in a way that it wasn't there before.

He could feel the dark magic of the locket the moment he reached the floor of his father's study. It seemed to be spreading past the walls at a rapid rate. The nausea that Regulus so often felt in its presence was immediate and dizzying. It made him unreasonably nervous to be in the presence of the Horcrux again, but at the same time, he felt invigorated, as if he was about to partake in an addiction he'd been denying himself all year. He told Kreacher to pull him out of the room if he didn't leave the room in fifteen minutes. Kreacher looked nervous, but merely nodded.

He unlocked the study door and entered the room. It was so much more powerful than the diary ever was. The hissing was so loud and obnoxious that Regulus almost wished he could go deaf permanently rather than continue to hear it. The dark magic emanating from the locket seemed to be warping the world around it. The walls of the study looked like they were rotting, the wallpaper peeling up and turning black. The floor was dented where the locket lay in the center of the room.

Regulus walked slowly toward the locket, but it felt like gravity was increasing with each step he took. By the time he was within reach of it, he was on his hands and knees, shaking from the effort of moving. His joints ached and he felt a headache sharpen behind his eyes. He reached out a quivering hand and with one outstretched finger, touched the locket.

The effect of immediate. He collapsed on the ground, his limbs giving out beneath him. His head slammed into the floor and his vision went black for a few long seconds. His finger hurt from where he'd touched the Horcrux and he hissed out loud as he pulled back to cradle it in his other hand.

"Oh, darling. Not again." Regulus looked toward the sound of the voice. Of course, it was James. Regulus didn't know whether he should feel happy or distressed.

"Am I hallucinating?" Regulus mumbled, unable to even lift his head fully off the ground. James stood above him wearing what looked like pajama bottoms and a ratty old navy blue sleep shirt.

"I'm not sure," James said. He knelt down next to Regulus and ran a comforting hand through Regulus's hair. Regulus leaned into the hand, allowing his eyes to close in pleasure. "I don't think so."

"What does it feel like to you?" Regulus asked, his words slurring dangerously.

James was quiet for a long moment, continuing to scratch at Regulus's scalp softly. "It feels like drifting, I think. It's not exactly clear in moments like these when things get sharp and clear again." Regulus was struggling to keep his eyes open now, but he so desperately wanted to look at James's sweet, soft face.

“I almost got Harry killed,” he confessed, the words spilling from him before he could stop them.

“No, no,” Regulus said, trying to shake his head. His head felt so heavy, like would never be able to lift it again. “You don’t understand.”

“I do,” James said, his voice a soft whisper. “I do.” It was the last thing he heard. He could feel his consciousness slipping away, the last sensations he felt being a small hand curling around his wrist and the squeeze of apparition.

Three days passed before he opened his eyes again. It’s clear that he was at least partially right, the magic from the Horcrux causes the visions. Sixteen-year-old Tom Riddle has nothing to do with the locket to Regulus’s knowledge so it’s unlikely that it was Tom Riddle specifically that was causing Regulus to dream of James.

The vision he had of James in the study couldn’t be based on a memory. For one, James had never been to Grimmauld Place. Though he threatened to break in and steal Regulus away more than once. Regulus is also moderately sure that he hadn’t ever seen James in that specific set of clothing. What Regulus couldn’t figure out was whether the visions were just his unconscious playing tricks on him, creating some sort of fake interaction with the only person who ever made Regulus feel safe, or if he is somehow interacting with James from beyond the grave.

It seems preposterous that Regulus would be able to interact with the real James. Yes, ghosts exist but they are typically visible to everyone, not to mention they’re more like reflections of who the person was in life rather than an actual person. Not to mention that Regulus has never met a ghost who appeared corporeal rather than transparent or a ghost that could change their clothing.

It was odd and made Regulus anxious. Being in the presence of the Horcrux no doubt took a huge toll on his body, indicated by the three days where he was unconscious, so it would not be wise for him to revisit the locket anytime soon. On the other hand, Regulus couldn’t deny the pull he constantly felt or the temptation to put himself in danger just to see James again, if only for a moment.

Kreacher was clearly just as stressed as Regulus was, if not more. He all but begged Regulus not to go back into his father’s study. Regulus eventually agreed though it took several days of discussion before he decided on it, and even then he had to consciously work to keep himself from tiptoeing up to locket in the middle of the night.

Ultimately, he settled on the decision to focus his attention on warding for the time being. He knew now that the Dark Lord had more than one Horcrux which was just about the worst news Regulus had ever heard, but he wasn't sure where to start with finding them. Despite his misgivings about Dumbledore, he couldn't deny that he was thankful to not be solely responsible for finding the cursed items.

Besides, the locket's dark magic was spreading more and more each day and if he didn't want Grimmauld to fall prey to the Dark Lord's warped soul, then he needed to find a way to contain the item. It was because of this that he spent several weeks reading and rereading all the books he owned on warding. He went to Diagon Alley one morning and purchased every book on the subject that he did not already own and even ventured into Knockturn to see if there was anything else he could locate.

Warding, he learned, was much more complicated than he originally thought. There were blood wards on Grimmauld he knew, though he never bothered to learn much of the specifics about it. It turned out they were so old and embedded with magic that anyone without Black blood would struggle to even practice spells within the house without feeling drained. Not to mention the specific wards that kept any Black from being damaged by spells cast by someone outside of the family.

Though he ended the few weeks of research with pages and pages of notes, he settled on a few simple, but powerful wards for the Horcrux. One of them would restrict anyone from touching the object, it acted as a deterrent not just physically, but mentally as well, causing anyone who saw the locket to instantly forget what they were planning to do with it. He added another that would alert him if anyone got within a few feet of the object.

He added several wards to the study itself as well. One which acted in a similar way to the wards on the locket, causing people to forget about the door after looking at it, and one to alert him if anyone even got near it. He also added a few basic wards that would simply stop someone from physically entering the room, even if they managed to get passed the ones causing them to forget, they wouldn't be able to cross the barrier.

The final ward he cast was one of the more complex ones he'd researched, commonly used by Unspeakables and curse breakers. It was actually several wards interwoven together which acted as a wall to keep magic in and out of a specific area. He knew he needed to keep the locket's magic from spreading and this ward definitely rose to that challenge. It took him nearly an hour to work all the wards together into an impenetrable blanket.

He also learned that casting wards was far more exhausting than he had expected. He stumbled downstairs to the kitchen after the wards were all in place and fell heavily into a chair, his body tired and aching. Despite his exhaustion, he felt satisfied that he'd managed to do something. By the time he had the final ward in place, he could no longer hear the hissed Parseltongue spilling from the room.

There was a tinge of regret, of course, that came with restricting his access to the locket, but he did his best to ignore it. He couldn't imagine that James would be happy to see him if it even was James, to begin with if he kept coming back and kept getting hurt. Besides, he told himself, he could always undo them if he was desperate enough, if he could come up with a compelling reason to seek out James once again.

He pushed the temptation away and called for Kreacher to bring him tea and breakfast. He had begun working on the wards the moment he woke up and it was still only a few hours after daybreak now that he'd finished.

Kreacher appeared next to him with his breakfast as well as that day's Daily Prophet. He avoided the paper for a second, opting to fix his tea and settle in. However, the moment he laid eyes on the front page, his whole world stopped. Every thought of warding and Horcruxes left his head faster than he would have thought possible.

He could feel his heart beating frantically in his chest and blood rushing in his ears. There on the front page, it read:

MASS MURDERER SIRIUS BLACK ESCAPED FROM AZKABAN

the leaky cauldron.

The moment Regulus read the headline, he was up and out of the house. He didn't even stop to get properly dressed, only stepped outside and apparated straight to the gates of Hogwarts. He needed to know exactly what was going on. He felt dizzy and disconnected from the world around him, his head buzzing with uninterrupted panicking.

The gates of Hogwarts opened for him easily, as if he was expected, and he all but ran up the trail to Dumbledore's office. The grounds and hallways were empty, the barren wasteland of summer, but Regulus was thankful for it. He did not even have to speak before the statue leading to the headmaster's office jumped aside and let him pass.

"Is it true?" were the first words out of his mouth when he opened the office door.

"I am afraid that it is," Dumbledore replied. He was already standing as if he'd been pacing the floor long before Regulus arrived, though he did not seem surprised to see Regulus enter.

"How did this happen?" Regulus asked, his voice surprisingly steady, given the circumstances. "This should not be possible."

"We do not know," Dumbledore answered evenly. "The guards reported him missing early this morning."

"The guards? You mean the dementors?" Regulus clarified. Dumbledore nodded. "But he was there last night? Did he swim to shore?"

"There have been no sightings of the man," Dumbledore responded. "Do you think he will try to contact you?"

"Contact me?" Regulus asked incredulously. "He doesn't even know I'm alive. I'm not sure how he would even manage to hear about it in Azkaban. I was told he wasn't allowed any visitors."

"But you did try to visit him?" Dumbledore asked.

"Tried might be an overstatement," Regulus responded. "But I did speak to someone about it last summer. I was told that even as family I wasn't allowed to see him."

"Hmm," Dumbledore hummed curiously. "The ministry will most likely want to speak with you, just so you are aware."

"Do we have any idea what he might be after? Why he escaped now?" Regulus asked, though he could already feel the unsteady jump of anxiety at the thought, as if he already knew but was trying his best not to think of it.

"They said he had been speaking in his sleep," Dumbledore answered. He paused for so long that Regulus thought he might not continue. "He was repeating the phrase 'he's at

Hogwarts.””

“What?” Regulus asked, his voice much louder than he intended. Dumbledore nodded grimly. “No.” Regulus shook his head violently. “You don’t think he means...” Regulus trailed off uncertainly.

“It is possible,” Dumbledore responded. “He was responsible for Harry’s parents’ death. Harry destroyed Voldemort that night. He could be out for revenge, or to finish what Voldemort started.”

Regulus felt like he was going to be sick. He was so distressed by this piece of information that he didn’t even flinch at the use of the Dark Lord’s name. He sat down heavily into a chair, blowing a breath out between his teeth.

“Where is Harry?” Regulus asked. “Could Sir— my brother find him?” Regulus couldn’t bring himself to say his name, it felt like ash on his tongue.

“He is protected,” Dumbledore answered. “There is no way for someone intending him harm to make it through the blood wards.”

Regulus nodded in understanding. “What are you going to tell him?” He asked. He already planned to write to Harry the moment he left Dumbledore’s office, but there was no use repeating information.

“I do not think it’s wise to tell him too much,” Dumbledore replied. “I believe he is safe at home, so it may add unnecessary stress if we told him. Not to mention, he has a very strong rebellious spirit. If he learns what Sirius did, I fear Harry may go looking for him.”

Regulus flinched at his brother’s name like he would the Dark Lord’s. “So, you will tell him nothing?”

“For now,” Dumbledore said, looking away and gazing out the window with unseeing eyes. Regulus wanted to argue, but he figured it would only make things harder for himself. He left soon after, having gained the information he came for.

His traitorous brother was out, free from Azkaban, a place that was supposed to be inescapable. Somehow his brother had managed it. Regulus didn’t even know why he was surprised, his brother managed to escape Grimmauld and their parents when he was sixteen. Yes, Regulus helped him out of the house once, but his brother was the one who managed to stay away. Even their unruly Uncle Alphard came crawling back to the family, while his brother did not.

He needed to warn Harry. Though Dumbledore wanted to keep him in the dark, Regulus did not feel that this was the best course of action. Who knew what kind of trouble Harry could get into during the summer? He really just wanted to apparate to Harry’s muggle relatives’ home and make sure Harry was safe, but he knew that would only cause problems.

He wondered if his brother would come to Grimmauld. Though he hadn’t been back since he was sixteen, there was always a chance that he would use it as a safe place to land, now that the entire country would be looking for him. He apparated back to Grimmauld the moment he was outside of Hogwarts and fell to his knees in exhaustion. He couldn't wait till his body was old enough to handle apparition without collapsing, it was terribly inconvenient.

"Kreacher," he called, leaning heavily against the wall, his legs folded beneath him.

"Master Regulus," Kreacher greeted immediately after popping into existence next to him.

"My brother has escaped from Azkaban," he said. "If he tries to enter this house, you are to lock him in a room and come and find me immediately, do you understand?" Kreacher nodded. "It does not matter if I am at Hogwarts, surrounded by people, you come retrieve me right away."

Kreacher did not question him and Regulus was grateful for it. He stood shakily and, once he felt well enough, pulled out a piece of parchment and a quill.

Harry,

I can't tell you much, but you should know that a dangerous Death Eater has escaped from Azkaban. Try to stick close to home this summer. They have no idea where he is and until he's caught, it's important that you stay safe. I will tell you the moment I know more.

How are your muggle relatives treating you?

Regulus Black

It was far more vague than he really wanted it to be, but he was afraid it would be intercepted or read by someone else. For now, it would have to be enough. He sent it off right away.

After that, the summer was quiet, suspiciously so. He receives letters from Ron and Hermione. Ron regales him with stories about Egypt, woefully unaware of what is happening back home, and Hermione tells him about her summer traveling with her parents. She asks very specific questions about what Regulus is doing, but he keeps his answers vague.

One morning he receives an unexpected letter from Luna. It isn't until he opens it that he realizes it's his birthday. He never celebrated it as a child and the only people who ever bothered to give him a gift were Pandora and James. He really shouldn't be surprised that Luna would also send him something, though he has no memory of sharing the date of his birthday with her. This question is answered immediately when he opens the letter.

It is a simple birthday note, written in her small cursive, but included is a small picture of Regulus and Pandora. They are sitting near the Black Lake, Pandora looking happy, giggling in the sun, with Regulus next to her with an unwilling smile on his face. He couldn't be sure why, but the moment he laid eyes on it, he felt the intense urge to cry. He's not even worried about the fact that Luna just revealed that she knows exactly who he is without ever managing to say the words. He sent her a thank you note back.

The days were long and Regulus felt useless and horribly stressed. Occasionally he would find himself in front of his father's study at night, weighing the risks of going in to try and speak to James again. He desperately wanted his advice on what to do about his brother. More than that though, he wanted to know if James knew that his brother had betrayed them. He wanted to know if James knew why he'd done it. One night, Kreacher appeared next to him and all but begged Regulus not to go in again. His scared voice was enough to deter Regulus, at least for the time being.

No one reached out to him from the Ministry. Some mornings he considered going in to ask the Aurors if they'd found anything, but he ultimately decided against it. He wasn't sure who he could trust and he couldn't risk anyone else finding out his secret. Dumbledore promised to keep him updated, but so far the only useful bit of information Regulus received was the news that dementors would be stationed at Hogwarts if his brother wasn't found before school began. It's bad news, Regulus thought, as having dementors around children was probably the least safe plan they could enact, but it seemed to be unavoidable.

He only got one other letter from Harry filled with questions about the Death Eater that escaped, but Regulus kept his response as vague as possible. The only time he left the house was to purchase a collection of absurdly expensive Quidditch attire for Harry's birthday. He decided against sending it off though, opting to wait until they were back at school to give it to him. Regulus did not want to risk another rogue house elf stealing the gift.

He wondered if they would make it back to school without incident that year, but of course, that thought was ruined when a few days into August, Regulus received another letter from Harry.

Regulus,

Don't freak out. I had to leave the Dursleys. I accidentally blew up my aunt. I thought I was going to get arrested, but it was all okay. I'm at the Leaky Cauldron now. The Minister talked to me and told me to stay there until school began. Do you think it has to do with that escaped prisoner?

I should also tell you that I found out who he is. Why didn't you tell me it was your father? Are you in danger? Do you think he's going to come after you? Write me as soon as you can.

Harry

Regulus wondered if receiving so much shocking news in one summer would be enough to re-kill him. He could feel his heart racing as he read and reread Harry's letter. Harry had run away while Regulus's brother was out there possibly trying to hunt Harry down. Thank Merlin he was at the Leaky Cauldron and not out somewhere in muggle London on his own. It was surprising that the Minister himself would arrange it, Regulus didn't think Fudge would be so proactive, but he figured that Dumbledore probably had a hand in that. Although, he did wonder why Dumbledore hadn't told Regulus about what happened.

Regulus packed up that very afternoon, having Kreacher gather all the things he needed for the upcoming school year. There was no way he was going to stay at Grimmauld while Harry was living alone in the Leaky Cauldron.

It was late in the evening by the time he arrived by floo, and the inn was nearly empty, only a few people left drinking and eating their dinner. Regulus didn't even wait to speak to anyone. He headed up the stairs right away, intending to knock on every single door until he found Harry's. He needn't have bothered though, as the moment he reached the top floor he saw Harry opening the door wearing a set of the expensive wizard clothes Regulus had purchased for him the previous year.

"Regulus!" Harry shouted, sounding like a child just caught sneaking out of the house.

"Harry," Regulus greeted.

"What are you doing here?" Harry asked, the surprise fading into happiness.

"My mother dropped me off," Regulus said. "I explained that you were here alone, and she said I could spend the rest of the summer here."

"Great!" Harry said with a wide smile. "Have you had dinner yet?"

"It's after ten?" Regulus responded. Harry looked vaguely abashed.

"Right, well," Harry said unevenly. Regulus rolled his eyes good-naturedly.

"Come on, I could eat," Regulus responded. He put his trunk in Harry's room for the time being and went downstairs to order dinner.

"What'll you be havin' Harry?" Tom, the barkeeper asked, before he registered the other child with Harry. "Who're you?"

"I'm Regulus," Regulus responded confidently. "I need a room please, from now until the first of September."

Tom looked uneasy by the request but gave him a key once Regulus presented prepayment in full. It was clear that Tom was unsettled by Regulus's appearance in the bar. Regulus wondered if he should have cut his hair before coming out into the wizarding world. With his brother's pictures adorning every wall, the long hair meant to make them look like father and son would perhaps work against him.

"How long have you been here?" Regulus asked once they were alone and dinner had been ordered.

"Two days," Harry replied. His voice was level enough, but he was giving Regulus a look like he wasn't going to be distracted from what he wanted.

"Right," Regulus mumbled. Harry continued to stare at him. Regulus had no idea how to explain to Harry why he wanted to keep his brother's name a secret. He knew logically that Harry would find out eventually, likely the moment he returned to the wizarding world, but it still felt like information he did not want to share.

"So," Harry said, breaking the long tense silence. "Sirius is your dad, right?"

Regulus cringed. “Yes,” he answered. “I didn’t want to tell you through a letter. I didn’t want you to think... well, I don’t know.”

“Did you think I would blame you for your dad escaping prison?” Harry asked, looking at Regulus uncertainly.

“No, not exactly. But he’s not a good guy,” Regulus said, stumbling through his half-baked explanation. “There is something you should know about him.” Regulus chewed on his lip nervously.

“What?” Harry prompted when Regulus failed to go on.

“Here you go, boys,” Tom interrupted, setting their food down. He gave Regulus another uneasy look before walking away. Regulus looked around the bar. Despite its emptiness, he expected someone to be watching them, but all the people left were minding their own business. It made him vaguely nervous like his brother could just waltz in and take Harry without anyone noticing.

“What do you mean, there is something I need to know about him?” Harry asked again, starting to shovel food into his mouth.

“Oh, right,” Regulus said, his attention pulled back. “Listen, I don’t think anyone wants you to know this, but you need to be aware because you could be in danger.” Harry nodded for him to go on. “He was friends with your parents, or James at least. I think, well, from what I’ve read, he’s responsible for why they’re dead.”

Regulus couldn’t stop stumbling over his words. He never thought he’d have to explain this out loud. Just thinking about it made him feel ill, but trying to explain to Harry that his brother was the reason his parents were found and murdered, the reason he grew up an orphan.

“Oh,” Harry said. He’d abandoned his dinner for the moment, looking stunned.

“There is no guarantee that he will come after you. I mean, for all we know he could be halfway to South America by now, but it’s why you have to be extra careful. He’s extremely dangerous,” Regulus explained.

“What about you?” Harry asked.

“What do you mean?” Harry’s face was twisted with concern. It struck Regulus as so odd that Harry would look this way when asking about Regulus’s safety, but not his own.

“Do you think he’s going to come after you?” Harry asked. Regulus almost felt like laughing. There was no way for his brother to know he was alive, and even if he did, he couldn’t imagine he would really care.

“No, I doubt it,” Regulus replied. He almost wished that his brother would come after him. The moment Regulus laid eyes on his brother, he was going to kill him, that he knew for a fact.

“Oh, okay,” Harry said, shrugging. He still looked unsure but went back to eating his dinner. They ended the night quickly after that. Regulus’s room was right next to Harry’s, which Regulus was glad for. He wanted to be close by.

Regulus spent nearly an hour after Harry went to bed warding his bedroom door. Some of them were so strong that even the housekeeper would have trouble entering the room, but Regulus knew it was necessary. The others might believe that his brother wouldn’t risk coming after Harry in a place that public, but there was no telling what twelve years spent with dementors would have done to his already tenuous grip on his sanity. They would have to be careful, but at least Regulus was here. He wasn’t going to make the same mistakes that he’d made the year before. He intended to protect Harry, using whatever means he had at his disposal.

Chapter Notes

im posting this chapter early because i have no self control

Regulus and Harry met up the next morning for breakfast, stumbling down the inn still yawning and rubbing sleep from their eyes. Tom trudged over the moment they sat down, providing them helping piles of eggs, sausage, and toast. He gave Harry a toothless grin and Harry gave a half smile back.

“Thank you,” Regulus said politely. Tom ignored him altogether, keeping one shoulder turned so Regulus was always slightly behind him. Harry shot Tom a glare as the man walked away, but Regulus wasn’t terribly bothered.

“Have you purchased your school books yet?” Regulus asked as they tucked into their food.

“No,” Harry said around a mouthful of eggs. “Have you?”

Regulus shook his head. “We should do that today. I haven’t done any classwork yet,” Regulus explained. Harry nodded in agreement.

“Yeah, me neither,” he said, still somehow chewing the same bite of food.

“Ugh,” Regulus said in disgust, “please chew your food before speaking.” Harry swallowed loudly and laughed.

“I’m so sorry, your highness,” Harry said sardonically. Regulus rolled his eyes good-naturedly.

Harry’s smile faltered after a few seconds, and he suddenly looked much too serious. “Why do you think Tom is acting like that?” He asked.

Regulus shrugged. “A lot of people probably aren’t going to trust me as long as my father remains free from Azkaban,” Regulus answered. “I look like him, it must be hard to look at me and not see a mass murderer.”

“Right, but it’s not like you’re a murderer,” Harry argued. “They shouldn’t treat you differently just because Sirius Black is your father. It’s not like you chose him.”

Regulus let out a helpless chuckle. Oh, if only Harry knew that he did choose him as his father. “It’s not a big deal. Please are always judging you for things you can’t help, and it’s always turned out fine.”

“I hate when people do that,” Harry said irritably.

“I know,” Regulus said with a sigh. “But it can’t be helped. I’m sure they’ll catch my father soon and this will all be behind us.” Harry did not look convinced, but he let it go for the time being.

They left shortly after eating and headed straight for Gringotts. It took them a while to get money from their vaults, or at least, it took Regulus a while. He shooed Harry off when they entered Gringotts and he watched as Harry went up to speak with one of the goblins who quickly led him away. Once he was out of sight, Regulus walked confidently up to a goblin and demanded to speak with someone in charge of his family’s vaults.

Much like his first visit to Gringotts a few years ago, he was pulled into a separate room and a smartly dressed goblin entered. “I need to know if anyone has accessed the Black vaults,” Regulus said the moment the door was closed, not bothering with pleasantries.

“You are asking if Lord Black has used his money?” the goblin replied. Regulus bristled. This wasn’t the same goblin who’d helped him hatch his plan of pretending to be his brother’s son, but surely he was aware of who Regulus really was

“Yes, that’s what I’m asking,” Regulus said through clenched teeth. “I’m not trying to stop him, I just need to know.”

The goblin looked suspicious of him but eventually responded. “Lord Black has not accessed the Black vaults yet.”

“Will you stop him if he does?” Regulus asked, though he already knew the answer. Gringotts operated separately from the Ministry, they always had, and Regulus remembered his father telling him multiple times that Gringotts was only safe so long as they did not let the Ministry control them.

“We will not,” the goblin responded, effectively ending their conversation. Regulus wanted to demand that they tell him the moment his brother tried to make a withdrawal, but he knew they wouldn’t. His brother was Lord Black and no one could get between a Lord and his money.

He made a withdrawal himself, though he still had a mostly full coin purse from the last time he visited, and made his way out of the bank. Harry was waiting for him on the steps, and they walked together to Flourish and Blotts. Regulus pulled out his book list for the year. He hadn’t bothered to look at it much when he first got his letter, but it didn’t appear that he needed much.

“The Monster Book of Monsters?” He asked curiously. “Is that for Care of Magical Creatures?”

“Oh, yeah,” Harry answered. “Hagrid sent me a copy of that, I didn’t realize it was for a class.”

“Hagrid sent it to you?” Harry nodded his head. “I wonder why he was the one to send it,” Regulus pondered.

“It what? How is that allowed to be a school book?” Regulus asked, laughing along uneasily.

“Who knows?” Harry said. In the bookshop window of Flourish and Blotts was the book in question. The books were bizarre-looking, covered in fur, with large eyes sticking out of one cover. They appeared to have teeth lining the sides and a ridgeback line of fur decorated the spine. Inside a large cage in the window, there were several books snapping and grappling with each as torn pages flew out. Two books, in particular, looked like they were fighting in an intense wrestling match, with somehow both of them losing.

Harry and Regulus found themselves watching the books fight with morbid curiosity. Regulus wondered how they were ever supposed to do any reading for the class if this was the book they were working with. Perhaps learning how to open the book before their first class was part of the assignment, maybe they had to learn how to calm the beast, Regulus thought with a rye chuckle.

“Come to get your new books?” the manager asked the moment they entered the shop.

“Yes,” Regulus answered. “I believe I need one of those monsters.”

“I already have one,” Harry added. The manager shot him a grateful look.

“Get out of the way,” the manager said, brushing them both aside. He put on a pair of thick gloves before walking over to the cage that held the fighting books. Regulus and Harry watched as the manager fought to draw two books apart. They tried their best not to laugh, but by the time he brought the struggling book back, they were both red in the face. The manager looked more than a little annoyed.

“Thank you,” Regulus said and cast a quick petrificus totalus on it when the manager’s back was turned. Harry raised his eyebrows in surprise, most likely wondering how Regulus managed to use magic outside of Hogwarts. Regulus would need to make sure Harry knew he was able to use magic in populated magical areas, like Diagon Alley or the Hogwarts Express.

“I am never stocking them again,” the manager shouted, launching into a small rant about his past bad purchasing decisions. “Is there anything else I can help you with?”

Regulus and Harry both purchased their book for Divination: Unflagging the Future by Cassandra Vablatsky. Regulus was perusing the table with various Divination textbooks and half listening to the manager tell them about each one when he noticed that Harry wasn’t listening. Instead, Harry was intently staring at the copy of Death Omens: What to Do When You Know the Worst Is Coming. On the front of the book was an image of the Grim, the death omen that took the shape of a black dog.

“Everything okay?” Regulus asked, elbowing Harry lightly in the side. Harry’s face was pale, his eyes shining with paranoia.

“Oh, I wouldn’t read that if I were you,” the manager said lightly, finally noticing what they were looking at.

“Harry?” Regulus prompted, interrupting the manager’s next statement.

“What?” Harry finally looked up at him. “Oh, yeah, I’m fine.” He gave the book one more unnerving look before walking away as if in a daze. He wasn’t sure what it was about the Grim that had Harry spooked, but he made a mental note to ask him the next chance he had.

They purchased their remaining third-year books before heading out. The day was slow and easy after that. They stayed in Diagon Alley, spending most of the day at Florean Fortescue’s Ice Cream Parlor doing classwork. Florean himself kept bringing out free sundaes every half hour and by the end of their first day, Regulus was so sick of ice cream that he had to personally ask him to stop.

That night Regulus and Harry lounged in Harry’s room, double-checking their lists to ensure they had everything. When Harry’s back was turned, Regulus quickly forged a signature on his Hogsmeade permission slip. He’d forgotten about it until that moment.

“Did you send off your Hogsmeade letter yet?” Regulus asked. A disturbed feeling was growing in the back of his head, but he couldn’t quite place why yet.

“No,” Harry answered sullenly. “My family refused to sign it. They were going to, I think, before I blew up my aunt.”

“Oh,” Regulus responded. “I’m sorry, that’s unfortunate.” Harry looked so forlorn that Regulus felt a squeeze of sympathy for him.

“I bet nobody else will have that problem. I’m probably going to be the only one stuck back at school.” Regulus privately agreed, but he knew better than to say that out loud.

It wasn’t until later that Regulus realized how relaxed he felt after finding out that Harry would not be allowed to go to Hogsmeade, the feeling of dread from earlier dispersing the moment he heard it. Though it was a shame that Harry would miss out on the experience that other third-years got to have, he would be much safer staying at Hogwarts rather than wandering around the wizarding village of Hogsmeade where anyone could have access to him.

Regulus also sent off a quick letter to Hermione, Ron, and Luna as well that night, telling them each that he was staying at the Leaky Cauldron for the rest of summer with Harry. He doubted he would see Ron or Hermione before school began given how much their families were traveling that summer, but he figured Luna would be willing to visit them.

The summer days passed quickly. Each day was easy and lazy, they did their classwork together but quickly ran out of assignments. After that, they spent most of their time wandering around Diagon and exploring the various stores there. Harry nearly spent all the money in his vault to buy a new broom, the Firebolt, but Regulus was thankfully able to talk him out of it. He distracted him by giving him his belated birthday gift of various Quidditch attire, which Harry seemed more than pleased by.

They ran into Seamus and Dean one afternoon, as well as Neville more than once. One day Luna joined them for breakfast, coming through the floo on her own, dressed in a purple dress that looked handmade. She wore dangly earrings that looked like pink lizards and mismatched socks pulled up above her knees.

“Hello, Luna,” Regulus greeted.

“Regulus,” she said. “Hello, Harry.” Harry gave her a nervous smile, which Luna returned wholeheartedly.

Regulus had all but forgotten about the birthday note Luna sent to him. He wasn’t even sure how she knew his birthday in the first place, but it was possible Pandora told her. She looked at him the same way she had the previous year, confirming for him that she had probably always known. Pandora was always able to see things that everyone else missed, making her an almost intimidating figure to spend time with.

He remembers one time, a few weeks after James began publicly dating Lily, that Pandora found him sulking at the Quidditch Pitch. He hadn’t told anyone about his secret relationship with James, though he often wondered if Barty knew given how many times he found Regulus sobbing in their dorm room. Regardless, Pandora somehow knew right away. “Just because James loves Lily, doesn’t mean no one will ever love you,” she said before he even had time to greet her. She was always unnerving, but in a way that Regulus found distinctly endearing.

Luna looked so much like her that it was almost painful. Watching her and Harry interact pulled at Regulus’s sense of nostalgia in a way that made him lose touch with reality for a few dangerous moments. Though he never witnessed Pandora and James interact, he always wondered if they could have been friends.

“Are you joining us today?” Regulus asked, gesturing for Luna to take a seat with them.

“Yes, please,” she said. He could tell that Harry was nervous around Luna, though it didn’t exactly surprise him, he figured that most people probably felt nervous around her, but Luna didn’t have any other friends, and he wasn’t about to exclude her again.

He had no reason to be worried though because, by the mid-afternoon, Luna and Harry were thick as thieves. Though Luna had a proclivity to speak almost in riddles, Harry was always kind about it, listening with a smile and asking questions to keep her talking. Luna was clearly overjoyed with having someone to spend time with. He gathered that she was probably very lonely, even during the summer, when she had only her father for company.

Their friendship was definitely helped along when Harry was being pointed and stared at most of the morning by a family that happened to spot his cursed scar and Luna simply said, “That’s not very nice. It must be hard to be famous for the worst thing that ever happened to you.” That statement softened Harry significantly.

Regulus watched them become friends with tender enjoyment. Harry and Luna had the feeling of kindred spirits, both lonely in their own unique ways. It also gave Regulus his first opportunity to let his mind wander back to the plans he had before moving into the Leaky Cauldron.

He had spent the days leading up to Luna’s visit thinking about how he could use the principles of warding to create an object that could protect Harry wherever he went. He was trying to do research without being too obvious, but he’d hit a wall and needed better access to information.

He had discovered a week earlier, in a simple book on protective amulets, that the best way to create protection devices was to use blood magic. Given the legal grey area that was blood magic, there was only one place he would be able to find more information on the topic: Knockturn Alley.

He originally wasn’t keen to leave Harry alone, even in Diagon Alley, but Luna’s arrival gave him a unique opportunity. While Harry had promised to be careful, there was no telling what he would do when left to his own devices. It was clear that he had very little self-preservation instincts. But with Luna present, Regulus knew that Harry would be much more cautious. There was no way Harry would risk putting Luna in danger if he could avoid it, so Regulus finally felt comfortable leaving Harry alone for an afternoon.

“Stay where someone can see you, okay?” He said once again. He aimed the statement at both of them, but they all knew it was Harry he was really speaking to. “Stay in public. Don’t go down any alleys. Do not follow me. If you go back to the Leaky Cauldron, make sure Tom knows you’re there.”

Luna listened diligently, nodding her head after every sentence. Harry on the other hand rolled his eyes and shook his head, though there was a smile tugging at his lips.

“Are you listening? I don’t want to come back and find out you’ve gone missing,” Regulus said. He was unintentionally working himself up into a panicked state, but Harry seemed unbothered.

“Yes, I’m listening. We will stay in public. It’s going to be fine, nothing has happened so far and we’re just planning to stay here the rest of the afternoon,” Harry said, gesturing to the ice cream parlor.

“Okay, okay,” Regulus mumbled. “Just be careful, okay?”

Harry rolled his eyes again, giving Luna a knowing look. Luna smiled back at him like they were sharing a private joke. “Yes Dad,” he said with a chuckle.

“Right,” Regulus said breathlessly. “I’ll just see you later then.” The last sentence was barely out of his mouth before he stumbled away. Dad, Dad, Dad, echoed repeatedly in his head. He was almost positive that he was going to have a full panic attack about that later, but for now, he had somewhere to be.

It was a Monday afternoon, so Knockturn Alley was uncomfortably barren. A few wizards were lingering in dark corners or huddled against the brick walls, but most of them barely paid him any mind. There weren’t any specific shops in Knockturn that only sold books, so he had to settle for the few resellers in the area that specialized in dark or cursed artifacts.

Borgin and Burkes was always a safe choice. The shop had been there since the late 1800s and had always had a reputation for buying and selling practically anything one could imagine. He remembered Pandora talking about her cousin that ran the shop while they were at Hogwarts. Though she was Burke herself, she was always a little distant from her family. The Burkes weren’t as intense about keeping their family in line as the Blacks were, but it was still obvious that Pandora was a bit of an outcast.

He entered the shop, intending to speak with the shop owner right away, but opted to browse the shelves when he noticed a few other people in the shop. He didn’t look directly at any of them, doing his best to not look suspicious. This plan was ruined when none other than Draco Malfoy approached him.

“What are you doing here?” Draco said in a haughty, pureblood tone.

Regulus sighed. Of course, Draco was here. “Wouldn’t you like to know?” He responded, crossing his arms and looking down his nose at Draco.

“Do you really think it’s safe for you to be out and about?” Draco asked, his voice clearly mocking. “What with your father on the loose?” He raised his eyebrows when he said the word father, unsubtly reminding Regulus about his suspicions.

“Oh, I didn’t know you cared so much, Draco,” Regulus responded, sneering at the boy.

“I don’t care,” Draco said furiously. “Black can kill you for all I care.”

Regulus rolled his eyes dramatically. “I’d like to see him try,” he mumbled. “Who are you even here with?” He added, looking around curiously.

“You know,” Draco said, taking a step forward so that he and Regulus were almost chest to chest, “My mother says there is no way that Sirius had a son.”

“What would she know?” Regulus asked.

Draco looked around as if to check to see if anyone else was listening before leaning in. “She said that Sirius was,” he paused and leaned in even closer, “gay.” He said the word in a tight whisper. He made a face like he was delivering a piece of damning evidence while also being proud to share the hottest piece of gossip he’d ever heard.

Regulus couldn't help the laugh that bubbled out of him. Draco looked so much like Narcissa that Regulus almost wished they were on friendlier terms. It reminded him of when Narcissa would pull Regulus aside at family gatherings just to whisper secrets in his ear.

Draco looked very superior despite Regulus's laughter. It was clear that he believed what he was saying, but Regulus just waved him off, leaving Borgin and Burkes before he was forced to interact with Narcissa or Lucius. He would have to come back to Knockturn another day, he decided.

As he made his way back to Diagon Alley, he thought about what Draco had said. He often wondered about his brother, though he would never admit it. He remembered the summer his brother found pictures of nude muggle women in a trashcan near Grimmauld and decided to permanently stick them to the walls of his bedroom. His mother didn't allow him food for a week because of that, and he remembered her desperately trying to pry the images from the wall after his brother was disowned.

It always struck Regulus as gauche and seeing the naked women always made him thoroughly uncomfortable. He hadn't ever been sure of his own sexuality if he was honest. He remembers having a crush on one of his brother's friends when he was in his second year, but that was short-lived, and until he fell in love with James, he never much thought about dating.

It wasn't a privilege members of the Ancient and Most Noble House of Black received, the benefit of dating whomever they chose. No, he always knew that a partner would be chosen for him once he was old enough to marry. Even when he spent days lounging in bed with James, he always knew it would have to end eventually. He had responsibilities and unlike his brother, he wouldn't be able to escape them.

Of course, he had a sexual relationship with Barty after James left him, but that was less about desire and more about his desperate need for comfort in the final years of his first life. He was certainly never the type of person to look at nude women, in fact, he had no memory of ever being attracted to any women, though especially not muggle women like his brother was. Though, perhaps he'd been wrong. He thought back to what Moaning Myrtle said about his brother, about how he only ever kissed girls despite the rumors. He might have been gay, though Regulus would have been the last to know.

He didn't think it was too much of an issue though. Other than Narcissa, he couldn't think of anyone that would have known his brother well enough to be privy to the intimate details of his sexuality. At least no one who was still alive. He was sure James would have known, though he never shared that information with Regulus. Some of his little friends might know, but he doubted that he would be running into any of them any time soon.

Chapter Notes

it will probably be a week or so before i can get another chapter up as i'll be traveling this weekend.

let me know what you guys think of this chapter, im very excited for poa :)

Ron and Hermione joined them on the last day of the summer holiday. Luna had visited them a few more times after the first day she spent with them, but eventually, she stopped showing up. They found out later that she had been sneaking out to see them and her father had finally figured it out.

Ron and Hermione were waiting for them at the ice cream parlor, both of them looking tanned and relaxed from their vacations. They ended up at the Magical Menagerie, a magical creature shop, so that Hermione could spend her last few birthday Galleons on a pet. It was a mess from the offset, with Ron's pathetic-looking rat being chased out of the store by an enormous ginger cat that Hermione ended up adopting only a few moments later.

He could already sense that Hermione's cat, Crookshanks, would be a problem. Regulus was not particularly fond of Scabbers, Ron's rat, but he could at least sympathize with Ron's desire to keep his pet safe from an animal intent on killing it. Hermione seemed unbothered, more interested in pampering the cat than respecting her friends.

They ended up back at the Leaky Cauldron a bit later to find Arthur Weasley reading the Daily Prophet at the bar.

"Harry, Regulus," he greeted in turn. "How are you?" Regulus had been worried about Ron's parents' reactions to him, with his brother now on the loose, but Arthur seemed unbothered, at least for the moment.

On the front of the paper was his brother's screaming face, haunting Regulus's every moment. "They still haven't caught him, then?" Harry asked, shooting Regulus a troubled look. Arthur looked grave as he nodded, explaining that they had been pulled off their normal jobs to help with the search.

"Would we get a reward if we caught him?" Ron asked, though his hopeful statement was shuttered when he looked at Regulus as if just then realizing who the escaped man was to his friend.

Regulus wasn't particularly interested in listening to them talk about it. He was tired of looking at his brother's face, and though he wanted Harry to be safe, there was a small part of him that hoped his brother wouldn't be caught. Regulus wanted the opportunity to kill him himself. It wouldn't bring James back, but if he could make sure that his brother paid the price for his betrayal, then maybe Regulus could feel some semblance of peace.

That night, all of them gathered together to eat dinner and Regulus listened idly as they talked about the plans for the next day. Everything seemed normal except Regulus kept catching Molly watching him with an unsettled look in her eye. Every time he made eye contact with her, she would look away, but the suspicious look on her face never quite departed. It made Regulus feel on edge, though he wasn't sure why.

The next morning was non-stop chaos, each of them trying to pack and get loaded into the Ministry cars to get to the train on time. Regulus barely had time to focus on anything before they made it onto the train. They were so late that it was already slowly pulling out of the station. Luna appeared behind them at some point, greeting them all softly. Harry seemed disturbed and pensive.

"I need to tell you something," he said to all of them. Ron and Hermione shared a look and nodded. They wandered down the train cars before finally settling on a mostly empty cabin. There was an adult man sleeping inside, but given that everywhere else was full, it was their only option. Regulus didn't get a good look at the man before he turned to latch the door behind them.

"Who is that?" Ron whispered. Regulus turned to look just as Hermione spoke.

"Professor R. J. Lupin," Hermione whispered in reply.

"Did you say Lupin?" Regulus blurted out and, for the first time, got a good look at the man sleeping. He was pale and sickly, wearing shabby robes with patches haphazardly sewn onto them. Despite his graying hair and scarred face, Regulus recognized him immediately. "Oh, Merlin," he mumbled.

"Do you know him?" Hermione asked, looking like a bird that just spotted its prey.

"No exactly," Regulus responded, finally taking a seat. Luna was sat next to him, with Harry closest to the window. Hermione and Ron sat across from them, next to the sleeping professor.

Regulus hadn't thought about Lupin in a long time, not in any certain terms at least. He remembered watching him at school, the way his brother would trail after him like a lost puppy. Lupin always seemed slightly divorced from the rest of his friends, as if he needed to keep his distance for his own safety. Given how James and his brother's lives turned out, he was probably correct. That wasn't even considering their other little friend, who'd been obliterated by his brother after James was killed.

Regulus looked up to inspect the case where Hermione read his name. It had Professor R. J. Lupin stamped on the side in peeling letters. The letters struck Regulus as odd. They looked like they had been painted on years and years ago, like the case was a treasured relic rather than something new he purchased for his position at Hogwarts. He wondered if he was a professor elsewhere first, though given the state of his clothes, he didn't think that Lupin had been working much as of late.

He did his best to bury the memories of seeing Lupin in school, they were too painful to look at directly, the way they were intertwined with his brother and James. It was hard to think of their time at Hogwarts, when his brother seemed so free and happy, even as he ignored Regulus and disregarded his familial responsibilities. But seeing Lupin on the Hogwarts Express made this difficult. He wondered how the man felt coming back to the place he met the man who would ruin all of their lives.

That wasn't the only reason for burying the memories though, because even as he stared at the greying man, he couldn't help but remember his misguided childhood crush that he had on Lupin when he first saw him. He wasn't an ugly man, in fact, if Regulus was inclined, he might call him ruggedly handsome, but he felt a twinge of embarrassment when he remembered his eleven-year-old feelings for him.

"I wonder what he's going to teach?" Ron asked curiously, pulling Regulus from his thoughts.

"Defense Against the Dark Arts probably," Hermione answered. "It's the only class available."

"He doesn't look very well, does he?" Luna asked, a troubled frown on her lips.

"Looks like one good hex would finish him off," Ron added with a nod. "Anyway, what were you going to tell us?" He turned to look at Harry.

Harry took a long deep breath before giving Regulus a slightly apologetic look. Regulus shrugged back at him, giving him permission. He knew that Harry still felt uncertain about everything Regulus had told him about his brother, but Regulus believed that Harry would be better off telling all of their friends rather than keeping it all to himself. It was more stress than any thirteen-year-old should be forced to deal with alone.

He launched into an explanation about what Regulus had told him, that his brother was out of prison and possibly after Harry. He added the details he overheard from Ron's parents the night before, the fact that Arthur was especially worried, but that Molly didn't want to tell Harry anything, that he was better left in the dark.

"Sirius Black is after you?" Ron asked incredulously.

"Yes, and that's not all," Harry mumbled before looking at Regulus with a renewed look of guilt. "Mrs. Weasley said, well, okay, what she said was," Harry stumbled over his words painfully.

"It's fine, Harry," Regulus soothed, feeling like he already knew what Harry was going to say. "Just say it."

"She's nervous about us spending time with you," Harry said apologetically.

“What?” Hermione yelled.

“She said that?” Ron yelled at the same time.

“Oh, because you’re related to Sirius,” Luna said, masterfully working in the truth she knew with the lie he was living. “That makes sense.”

“Luna,” Harry gasped, looking like she’d just stabbed him. Regulus understood her though. She wasn’t saying that she agreed with it, but she could see Molly’s point of view.

“It’s fine,” Regulus said. “She doesn’t mean it like that. Besides Molly, er, Mrs. Weasley, is just watching out for you. She just wants you safe.”

“I don’t lecture you,” Regulus said, rolling his eyes, though perhaps Ron was right.

“Do you think Sirius Black is going to try and hurt you?” Hermione asked. She had an unreadable look on her face.

“Surely he wouldn’t hurt his own son,” Ron said uncertainly.

“Well, your dad said that he was mad, so who knows how he might act,” Harry replied.

“Perhaps he will just try to kidnap you,” Luna added. “Or use you to get to Harry.”

“What if he isn’t after me at all?” Harry said, his voice edging into hysteria. “What if everyone is just trying to keep me safe, but he’s really after Regulus?”

“Oh no,” Hermione said, cupping her hand around her mouth in horror.

Regulus felt like the conversation was getting away from him. “It’s fine. I’m fine. I don’t think I’m in any danger,” he said, waving his hands frantically to get them to calm down. “He probably doesn’t even know that I go to Hogwarts.”

All of them seemed inclined to argue with him but were luckily interrupted by Harry’s Sneakoscope going off. Lupin shifted in his sleep a moment later and the conversation was put to rest for the time being. He could tell that none of them were settled though as they each kept giving him worried looks as the afternoon progressed. They narrowly avoided a confrontation with Draco, him and his two friends Crabbe and Goyle only deterred by the presence of the sleeping teacher.

When the sun set, the rain began. It pelted against the windows loudly, the sound so intense that it seemed to echo in the train car. It was nearly impossible to see out into the landscape, the rain and darkness clouding the windows. It was unusually comforting for Regulus, the sounds nearly lulling him to sleep. Luna was way ahead of him, having switched places with Harry, so she could lean her head against the window, dead to the world for the past two hours when the train ground to a halt.

“Why are we stopping?” Hermione asked, looking at her watch. “We can’t be there yet.” Harry, who was now sitting closest to the door, stood up to check the hallway. He was still standing with his head sticking out of the open doorway when the lights shut off. The air was growing cold like winter was seeping in through the walls several months early.

There was a flurry of people in their cabin, Neville and Ginny tumbling in and trying to find a place to sit in the already crowded room. They all bickered back and forth, and Regulus felt Luna jolt awake behind him.

“Mum?” She said quietly, her tiny voice shaking slightly. Regulus wanted to turn and look at her, but he was frozen in place. The cold felt like it was infecting his lungs, pulling each breath from him in a painful attack. It reminded him of how it felt to drown, how the cold water felt infiltrating his lungs, burning and aching all while his vision grew dim and his heart rattled around in a panicked flurry.

Regulus had forgotten that Lupin was there. He felt, for a moment, like he was back in the cave. He looked around the cabin and noticed that each of the children with him were frozen just as he was, looking pale and stricken. Their breath showed in the cold air and Regulus could feel Luna shivering beside him.

Lupin lit up a handful of blue fire and looked around at them, his eyes appearing alert and wary. “Stay where you are,” he told them. Just as he spoke, the door began to slide open. In the doorway was something Regulus hoped he would never see. It was a cloaked figure, so tall that its head touched the ceiling. Its face was covered, but its skeletal hands were visible from beneath the black cloak. The dementor leaned menacingly through the doorway.

Regulus felt like he was choking. He thought about the time when he was nine years old, a few months before his brother was supposed to leave for Hogwarts, when his brother was cursed by their mother, so that he was unable to open his mouth. He couldn’t remember what his brother had done to earn the punishment, all he could recall was the desperate look in his brother’s eyes as he begged for help, help that would never come. Regulus could offer nothing, could only sit next to him in silence as his brother suffered for days on end.

He tried to take a deep breath, but he felt like he had a band curled around his ribs. He thought of James at home with Lily and Harry, the moment when he realized that Regulus’s brother had betrayed them. He thought about how afraid he must have felt, that he was out of options, that he would die without knowing what would happen to Lily or Harry. There was no way Regulus could have experienced that memory, and yet he felt like he was living it, like it was his experience. Like he wasn’t just Regulus any longer, but James too, like they were one.

The dementor took a long rattling breath, looking like it was focused on Harry specifically, though they all gasped in agony together. Regulus watched as Harry’s eyes rolled back into his head, his breath catching ominously in his chest. Regulus reached out to him, trying to curl his fingers around Harry’s clothes, to pull him closer, pull him away from the dementor, but he could barely move. His hands shook dangerously, and as he watched Harry’s limp body was replaced with James's, his eyes wide and vacant, death obvious in his shallow skin.

"No, no, no," Regulus cried. His fingers cramped as he tried to grasp James. "Please, no, please." He couldn't believe this was happening. Why was he seeing this? James had been gone for a long time, and yet it felt like Regulus had just lost him. Regulus never had to live through James's death. He was alive when Regulus died and gone by the time Regulus clawed his way out of the cave. It felt easier to forget that James wasn't just alive somewhere out in the world when Regulus wasn't confronted with his dead body.

"Expecto Patronum." Regulus heard a voice speak, but he didn't look over. His James was dead, right in front of him, how come no one else was as panicked as he was? How come no one else was grieving? A bright light drew his attention and looked over to see a giant glowing wolf chase the dementor away from the doorway.

The air cleared immediately. The pressure on his chest lightened and Regulus sucked in a breath so fast that he nearly choked on it. James melted away before him and an unconscious Harry replaced him, sliding to the side and angling toward the floor. Right, Regulus thought, his James was long gone, but Harry was still here and Harry needed his help.

Regulus supported him as best he could, lowering Harry slowly to the ground until he was laying on his back.

"Oh, what happened? What was that thing?" Hermione said frantically. Regulus knelt next to Harry and gently tapped his cheek to wake him. He'd never encountered a dementor before, he had never even bothered to look up their effects, so he felt completely unprepared for how they would affect him. Harry's response was especially concerning given how clammy and unresponsive he was.

"It was a dementor, one of the guards of Azkaban," Lupin answered, but Regulus did not look up to listen to him. Harry's eyes were beginning to flutter. Regulus kept one hand on Harry's face and the other on Harry's shoulder to steady him when he woke up.

"W-what?" Harry mumbled when he finally opened his eyes. "What happened?"

"You fainted," Regulus answered. "Do you want to get up?" Harry nodded and Regulus, along with Ron, helped heave him into his seat.

"Are you okay?" Ron asked nervously.

"Yeah," Harry looked around the room. Regulus finally took in everyone as well. Neville was sitting with his back against the window, looking like he was a moment away from being sick. Hermione had her arm around Ginny's shoulders. Ron was now seated next to Luna, who had drying tear tracks on her cheeks. Regulus stayed kneeling in front of Harry. "Who screamed?" Harry asked.

"No one," Regulus answered, though he wasn't totally sure. He felt like someone had just scooped out his soul momentarily before giving it back to him.

“But I heard screaming,” Harry mumbled. He was cut off when a loud snap made them all jump. Lupin was breaking a huge piece of chocolate into pieces.

“Here, eat this, it will help,” Lupin said, passing out the chocolate pieces to each of them. Regulus took it without looking up, opting to keep his hair shielding his face. “Excuse me, I need to speak to the driver.”

The other kids talked about how they felt while the dementor was there, but Regulus could hardly listen. It was clear that it had a profound effect on Harry, enough that he had passed out when no one else had. But why? He needed to research the creatures more, he needed to understand why. Like always, he felt like he was missing something like there was something just out of reach.

“We’ll be at Hogwarts in ten minutes,” Lupin said once he returned. “Are you all right, Harry?”

Of course, Lupin would know Harry’s name. He wondered how quickly he had recognized him, given how much he resembled his father. What struck Regulus as odd was the fact that Harry didn’t know Lupin. Lupin was obviously friends with James, one would think that he’d been around while Harry was a child or bothered to stay in touch with his friend’s orphan son. Regulus looked him in the face for the first since the man woke. Lupin looked back with a stricken expression.

“You-you’re — ” he stuttered. Regulus wasn’t sure how to respond but wasn’t given the opportunity regardless, as Harry was on his feet so fast that he nearly knocked Regulus over.

“He has nothing to do with his father,” Harry said fiercely.

“Harry, it’s fine,” Regulus soothed, standing up as well.

“No, it’s not okay. It’s not his fault that his father’s a madman,” Harry replied. Regulus felt an uncomfortable laugh bubble up out of him. He hadn’t realized how strongly Harry felt about the situation, but in retrospect it made sense. Harry was so protective of his friends and Molly had already put him on his guard.

“Your father?” Remus asked, staring at Regulus like he was seeing a ghost, and in a way he was. “Sirius Black? He’s your father?”

Regulus watched in real time as a piece of Lupin’s soul broke behind his eyes. Oh, of course, was all Regulus could think. It all made sense to him now. The rumor about his brother being gay, his brother trailing after Lupin while they were at Hogwarts, the haunted look on Lupin’s face. They had been together, possibly leading up to James and Lily’s deaths, which meant the only way for Regulus Black III to exist was for Regulus’s brother to cheat on Lupin.

“Excuse me,” Remus mumbled and disappeared out the door again. How odd, Regulus thought, that this would be the thing to break the already broken-looking man. Not the fact that his lover had turned out to be a murderous traitor, but the fact that he’d sired an illegitimate son. Of course, his brother never actually did that, but it hardly mattered now. He was still a murderer and a traitor. He wondered what Lupin thought about his brother after all these years, how he could let himself still be hurt by the actions of a man long proved evil.

Harry looked irritated watching Lupin run away, but the others just looked confused. "You don't have to defend me like that," Regulus said quietly. "A lot of people will probably share his opinion, it's not a big deal. They'll catch my father eventually, and it'll all blow over."

Harry did not look convinced but fell onto the bench with a huff. Regulus sat down as well, but he couldn't relax. He noticed for the first time that Hermione's face had turned into one of penetrating awareness, her eyes sharp and discerning. Regulus knew it wouldn't be long before he would be confronted with that specific issue, but for now, he tried to brush it off.

He had bigger problems, most notably, the fact that Lupin was still very obviously and very painfully in love with his brother.

Chapter Notes

i am finally back after traveling. sometimes visiting family is genuinely terrible :)

The carriage ride to Hogwarts was almost completely silent. Ron, Hermione, Harry, Regulus, and Luna all piled into one carriage and sat quietly, listening as the rain heavily drenched the covering. Luna hadn't dried her tears, and Regulus could still see the faint tracks that they left on her cheeks. He already knew that the memory of her calling out for Pandora was going to haunt him for years to come. He wondered if she was there when Pandora died, he'd never asked her and found himself regretting it.

Even worse than that, Regulus felt haunted by his own memories. It was clear that the dementor was pulling them out of him, shoving them in front of his eyes just to torment him. The one of James's last night was especially strange. It seemed like a memory, but that would be impossible and surely it was all just what he imagined James's last moments to be. Regardless, the thought of James being afraid for his wife and child, afraid of death at his doorstep, made Regulus shudder uncomfortably. He wondered if James thought of Regulus in his last moments if Regulus ever crossed his mind, but the thought was almost too painful to consider.

His thoughts drifted unwillingly to his brother. Sirius, he thought for the first time in weeks, his brother, who had been subjected to the dementors for years and years. He was so sure that he deserved it. If anything, when Regulus first learned of what Sirius had done, he felt like Sirius deserved worse than Azkaban, that he deserved to be tortured to death. But now, he couldn't justify the old feelings of anger, rage, and grief.

Sirius had spent years reliving his worst memories and knowing what their childhood was like, there had to be a lot of them. Not to mention all the terrible decisions he'd made as an adult that led to his stint in Azkaban. It made him ache regretfully thinking of Sirius curled up in a cold cell reliving every time his mother beat him until he was unconscious or starved him until his hands shook. Regulus was having trouble imagining the Sirius that was pictured on the cover of every Daily Prophet for the last few months, instead, he could only imagine the Sirius who used to sneak him treats on Christmas morning.

He didn't realize it at the moment, but later he would recognize that the carriage ride to Hogwarts was the moment he made the decision not to kill his brother for revenge, because revenge had surely been had. No, he decided, he would kill him not because Sirius deserved it, but because, after everything, he needed freedom. He would kill him because it had finally been enough, he would put him out of his long-lived misery. There was no hatred, it was impossible to hold onto, only pity and sorrow.

“Is Longbottom telling the truth?” Draco’s voice pulled him back to the present moment. “You actually fainted?” Draco was laughing menacingly, but Regulus was almost positive that he saw a tinge of worry behind Draco’s eyes.

“Shove off, Malfoy,” Ron said, pushing passed the boy.

Lupin thankfully intervened before their petty argument could go any further, but Regulus noticed that Lupin was curiously avoiding his eye. He wondered how the professor was feeling, how the dementors would affect someone like him. He looked bone tired despite having slept the entire train ride to Hogwarts.

“Potter! Granger! I want to see you both,” McGonagall's voice called the moment they entered the Entrance Hall. Regulus waved them off as he pulled Ron into the Great Hall. Luna separated from them and headed to a spot at the Ravenclaw table.

“Wonder what that’s about,” Ron muttered.

“Not sure, maybe Lupin owled ahead about Harry passing out on the train?” Regulus questioned. “I don’t know about Hermione thought.” Ron hummed curiously.

They watched idly as the new first years were sorted. Regulus didn’t recognize any of them, but there were a few names here and there that he thought he’d heard before. It was mostly just boring, and he felt like he was struggling to keep his eyes open by the time the sorting was finished.

Harry and Hermione finally rejoined them once the sorting was over. Hermione looked sad that they’d missed the sorting, but Harry just looked mildly irritated and annoyed.

“What did McGonagall want?” Regulus asked.

Harry explained how she had Madam Pomfrey there to check Harry over. It turned out that Madam Pomfrey and McGonagall were just as irritated by the presence of dementors at the school as everyone else seemed to be. Regulus was inclined to agree, Sirius Black on the loose or not, given how Harry reacted. Dementors were incredibly dangerous it seemed, especially considering the fact that they would attack any person whether it was the person they were looking for or not.

Ron nodded along as Harry explained before looking at Hermione expectantly. A bright red blush spread across Hermione’s cheeks, and she opened her mouth as if to answer but no sound came out. Harry looked curious as well, but before Hermione could come up with something to say, Dumbledore began to speak.

The warning about the dementors seemed pointless given the fact that so many of them had come face to face with the creatures on the train ride here. “Dementors cannot be fooled by tricks or disguises or even Invisibility Cloaks,” Dumbledore said. It all seemed a little heavy-handed, though obviously important for Harry specifically to hear. The idea that they couldn’t be tricked though interested Regulus. How did Sirius manage to evade them for this long if they could not be fooled?

“It is not in the nature of a dementor to understand pleading or excuses. I, therefore, warn each and every one of you to give them no reason to harm you,” Dumbledore added. His ever-cheerful tone paired with the ominous warning made Regulus shiver slightly. He hated the idea of those creatures lurking right outside of the Hogwarts grounds.

After his warning, Dumbledore introduced Lupin as their new Defense Against the Dark Arts professor, not a surprise, though Regulus was very curious about how that would go. He had no idea how he would be able to manage to be in class with a man who knew his brother back in school. It was one thing being in Snape’s class, given how little Snape seemed to care about his students, but Regulus worried that Remus might be too observant. Then again he could be too overwhelmed by Sirius’s made-up infidelity to realize who Regulus truly was.

Snape, Regulus noticed, looked especially annoyed by Remus’s presence. He was staring at Lupin as if Lupin had just slapped him in the face. He knew that Snape coveted the Defense Against the Dark Arts position, but this seemed far more personal. Obviously, Snape hated James and Sirius, but Regulus struggled to remember his feelings about Lupin specifically. Lupin wasn’t loud or arrogant at school, he was quiet and easily overshadowed. He swore that Snape used to complain about Lupin, but Regulus could not for the life of him remember what the subject of those complaints was.

Dumbledore also announced the new appointment of a professor for Care of Magical Creatures, none other than the expelled student, Hagrid. Regulus wondered if the discovery of Tom Riddle’s lies had finally vindicated Hagrid’s existence in the wizarding world. Loud applause filled the Great Hall after the announcement, lead strongly by Harry, Ron, and Hermione. After that, their plates and goblets filled with food and drinks, and they all tucked in.

On their way to breakfast the next morning, McGonagall pulled Regulus aside before he could enter the Great Hall.

“I have some unfortunate news,” she told him once they were in her office. “I know that your mother provided you with permission to attend Hogsmeade with the other third-years, but I, along with Dumbledore, do not believe it would be in your best interest to allow you to go.”

“I’m sorry?” Regulus asked, feeling like he was trying to catch up with a conversation he was not prepared to have.

“Given the present danger your father poses, it could put you and other students in danger if you were allowed to go to Hogsmeade, so until he is caught, you will have to stay on the Hogwarts Grounds.”

“Sirius, my father, isn’t after me,” Regulus argued. “I doubt he would even know who I was.”

“That may well be, but the fact still stands that he could hurt you if he sees you,” McGonagall said, her face firm and unyielding. Regulus could already tell that she would not be swayed. He sighed and did his best not to argue, nodding sullenly and leaving the moment she dismissed him.

“Most of the prisoners go mad in there,” Regulus heard George Weasley say as he walked to join his friends at the Gryffindor table. Regulus swallowed hard, he didn’t want to think about dementors or Azkaban ever again, but especially not first thing in the morning.

“What was that about?” Harry asked the moment Regulus was sitting.

“She was just informing me that I’m not allowed to go to Hogsmeade this year,” Regulus said dismissively, starting to place several pieces of toast on his plate.

“What?” He wasn’t sure who exactly yelled, given that it sounded like multiple people. Ron, Fred, and George all looked shocked, Hermione looked unsurprised, yet sympathetic, while Harry just looked angry.

“She can’t do that!” Ron said loudly.

“Apparently, she can,” Regulus said. “It’s not a big deal. Once they catch my father, then I’ll be allowed to go.”

Finally, their new schedules were passed out and the conversation was abandoned in lieu of discovering what subjects they had first. Ron was busy questioning Hermione about her overloaded schedule when Harry leaned over to whisper in his ear.

“I’m sorry about Hogsmeade,” Harry said sincerely.

Their first class was Divination, which Regulus was extremely curious about. He knew that Divination was a difficult subject to teach and that if a person had no natural talent for the subject, they would most likely have to drop the course, so he was interested to see how he would fair in the class. His last class of the day was Muggle Studies, which Regulus would never admit out loud, but he was very excited for. The only assignment for Muggle Studies had been to read the first chapter of their textbook, but Regulus had read the entire thing front to back in the weeks before schools started.

It turned out that Regulus should have been more worried about Divination, as the first class was a mess. After making several small, ominous predictions, one of them coming true almost immediately, she instructed them to break into pairs to read each other’s tea leaves.

“Where did Hermione go?” Ron asked as they walked back to their table after filling their tea cups. Harry and Regulus shrugged helplessly.

“How does she expect us to drink this? It’s scalding hot,” Harry grumbled. Regulus snickered when Harry gingerly tried to take a sip and pulled back a second later sputtering. It took them several minutes of blowing on the liquid before it was safe enough to drink.

“Right, what do you see in mine?” Regulus asked Ron. They hadn’t bothered to separate into pairs, instead working in a group of three and hoping Trelawney wouldn’t notice.

“Broaden your minds, my dears,” Trelawney interrupted. “Allow your eyes to see past the mundane!” Ron took a deep solidifying breath before blinking hard like he was struggling to focus.

“You have a heart in the center, that’s love,” Ron said, looking back and forth between his book and cup with a curious look on his face. The smell of incense in the room was clouding Regulus’s thoughts, making him feel tired and sluggish. “The heart is under some kind of bridge or,” Ron paused, “like an archway. That’s... a new beginning or an ending. So you’re going find love or end love?” He said the final words trailing off into uncertainty.

“All right,” Regulus mumbled, “good to know.” He resisted the urge to roll his eyes. He knew that Divination was an inexact science, but this was just ridiculous.

“You have worms,” Ron said suddenly.

“I’m sorry?” Regulus asked, his voice just barely loud enough to be heard over Harry's sudden laughter. Ron looked a little embarrassed himself, a light blush spreading across his cheeks.

“I think they’re worms,” Ron corrected. “I think it means you have a secret enemy.”

“It can mean that,” Trelawney said suddenly, appearing beside him. “It can also represent death, renewal, and rebirth. Do you feel close to death?” She asked him, peering into his eyes.

“Not particularly,” Regulus said, though he stumbled over the words in a way that made it clear he wasn’t sure. He often felt close to death. Since he was brought back by some unknown method, he felt like he was living right on the fringes between life and death. Like he was stealing time that wasn’t his and at any moment, magic herself would come to collect.

“Hmmm,” she said with an unsteady nod, her head bobbing from side to side in an uncanny fashion. She moseyed away from them, drifting as if the incense-filled air was carrying her away.

“What about mine?” Ron asked Harry. Harry gave Trelawney one more odd look before pulling Ron’s cup closer to him.

“You have some sort of crooked cross,” he said and Regulus tuned him out for the moment. His thoughts drifted to the heart, archway, and worms in his cup. He wasn’t sure that they meant anything, he doubted Ron had a great talent for Divination, but they still unsettled him for some reason. The archway was tight and boxy, looking almost like a fully formed door. As Regulus stared, it almost looked like the lopsided heart in the center began to beat.

“Regulus,” Harry said, his voice pulling him from his staring. Regulus looked up to see Harry watching him with patient eyes. “What do you see in my cup?”

“Right,” Regulus said, pulling up the cup so he could get a good look at it. It just looked like blobs. He wasn’t sure how Ron and Harry had seen anything in their cup beyond soggy brown leaves. "I think..." Regulus trailed off, turning the cup counterclockwise slowly. "It might be some kind of animal, but I can't be sure."

"Let me see that, my dear," Trelawney said, grabbing the cup out of his fingers without any preamble.

"Go ahead," Regulus said sardonically.

"The falcon," Trelawney said with grave importance. "You have a deadly enemy."

Hermione's shrill voice cut through the eerie silence, declaring that everyone knows that, and though Regulus was inclined to agree, he was too distracted by her sudden appearance to respond. Witnessing Trelawney's next set of predictions was like watching a train derailment in real-time. The club, for an attack, the skull, for danger, and finally, the Grim.

The room erupted into gasps when Trelawney said and though Hermione immediately argued with the woman, it was clear that Harry was shaken. His face had paled considerably and he was looking at his cup with haunted eyes. It reminded Regulus of the moment in the bookstore when Harry was staring at the Grim on the cover of another Divination book.

Things were eased a bit when McGonagall told them that Trelawney had predicted a student's death in her first class every single year since she started teaching. However, Harry still looked odd and unsettled.

"Is everything okay?" Regulus asked as they were leaving their class. "You don't look well."

"Harry," Ron said when Harry didn't reply right away. "Have you seen a great black dog somewhere?"

Harry looked deeply uncomfortable for a moment. "Yeah, I have. I saw one the night I left the Dursleys." This was news to Regulus and though Ron and Hermione quickly devolved into a fight about Hermione's lack of talent with Divination, Regulus continued to watch Harry closely.

"Is that why you were staring at it in the bookstore?" Regulus asked quietly. Harry gave a slight nod. "I'm sure it's nothing."

Harry gave him a disbelieving look. "How can it be nothing? I saw the Grim, and I've almost died the last two years at Hogwarts. Maybe this time Voldemort will finally finish the job."

"Harry," Regulus said, rolling his eyes. He did his best to ignore the way his stomach clenched painfully thinking about the near-constant danger Harry was in.

"Or Sirius Black," Harry added in a harsh whisper, his voice edging into mania before a look of discomfort crossed his face. "Sorry."

"It's fine. You're not going to die. Besides, the legend of the Grim is that the person dies within a day, and since you saw it months ago, I hardly think it's sticking around just to taunt you."

“If you say so,” Harry mumbled, though he didn’t look convinced.

They had Care of Magical Creatures after lunch and it went just as poorly as Divination, with Draco being mauled by a Hippogriff after insulting it to its face. It was so clear to Regulus that Draco was just acting up to get Harry’s attention, and Regulus felt a terrible embarrassment for the boy. The attack didn’t bode well for the rest of the semester, nor for Hagrid’s career at Hogwarts.

By the time Regulus went to Muggle Studies, he’d lost all the excitement he’d felt that morning. He walked with Hermione up to the classroom, tucked away from the rest of the school as if they were trying to hide it, and sat through a very boring introduction to the class. This school year was shaping up to be such a mess that Regulus already felt overwhelmed.

Draco didn’t show back up in class until Thursday and by then they had all settled into their routine, at least for the most part. They still had yet to have a Defense Against the Dark Arts lesson, and Regulus was both nervous and excited to see how Lupin ran his classroom. Their last two Defense professors were so incompetent that they’d barely learned anything. They would most likely struggle when fifth year came around and they had to take O.W.L.s with barely any prep.

Lupin led them out of the classroom right when they arrived and walked them to the staffroom nearby. Snape was sitting in one of the armchairs when they entered and left the room swiftly once he realized that Lupin was bringing the entire class into the room. He strode out with a quick snide comment about Neville and Hermione, that made Lupin raise his eyebrows in surprise.

When Regulus found out that they were meant to be facing a boggart, he just about left the room. He had only come face to face with one a few times, and each time it appeared as something different, his mother, his cousin, and the Dark Lord.

He had no idea what this one would take the shape of, but he worried that it would give him away. If it turned into his brother, then everyone might not question it, but Regulus wasn’t sure that he was really scared of Sirius, even despite how insane he looked nowadays. It could still turn into the Dark Lord, as the fear Regulus felt was still fresh like an open wound. That wouldn’t be terribly suspicious unless, of course, the Dark Lord looked as he did before he was destroyed.

His biggest worry was that the boggart would take the shape of James, eyes wide and vacant, death hanging around him like a cloak. That would be especially difficult to explain away. As the students lined up against the wall, Regulus did his best to stand off to the side, so as not to draw attention.

Lupin began calling out various students to come forward and try the spell, Riddikulus. Regulus needn’t have worried so much though, as Lupin’s eyes seemed to jump over Regulus every time they came near him. It was as if the professor was doing his best to forget that Regulus was in the room. It reminded him of how Snape acted in first year, where he would refuse to even look at Regulus while teaching classes. Of course, Regulus doubted that Snape did this because he was in love with Sirius.

They finished the class without Regulus being called on at all and Regulus breathed a sigh of relief as he left the staffroom. Harry, he noticed, was looking disappointed though. Regulus hadn't realized at the time, but Harry had also been skipped over by Lupin and hadn't been allowed to come face to face with the boggart. Hermione also wasn't given a try but she only seemed mildly disappointed. Harry looked more like someone had just told him that he was getting kicked off the Quidditch team.

Regulus elbowed him and when Harry looked up, he quirked his eyebrow in question. "All right?" Regulus asked.

"Yeah," Harry said, looking away. Regulus thought he might not say anything else as he was quiet for a few long moments. "It's just why do you think he didn't let me face the boggart? Does he think I'm too delicate?" He said the word snidely like it was a personal insult.

"He didn't let me or Hermione face it either," Regulus told him.

"Right, right, of course," Harry agreed quickly, but Regulus could see from the line between his eyebrows that it still bothered him. He understood how Harry felt. For so much of Regulus's childhood, Sirius was the adventurous and talented one. Even after he was sorted into Gryffindor, the family still regarded Sirius as the most promising child as far as magical ability. Regulus, on the other hand, was viewed as an average wizard, and though he received good grades in school, he wasn't seen as a prodigy like Sirius was.

It was difficult to rectify the fact that you might be seen as average or even below average at something. And though Defense Against the Dark Arts was Harry's best class, there was bound to be an ounce of insecurity when he wasn't given an opportunity that his peers received. Regulus felt for him, though he was secretly grateful that Harry wasn't called on. If Harry's boggart turned into the Dark Lord, Regulus was sure he'd have had a panic attack. Not to mention if it turned into Sirius. That would have been far too much for a Thursday afternoon.

the portrait.

Regulus settled into classes as easily as he had the previous two years. After Draco was attacked by a Hippogriff, Care of Magical Creatures became one of the most boring classes Regulus had ever taken, beaten only by Binns and History of Magic. Divination remained a spectacle, but in a way that Regulus found entertaining at the very least. Trelawney almost always mentioned Harry's impending death, and it was becoming almost a running joke among their peers.

Muggle Studies was one of Regulus's favorite classes, though he would never say that out loud. The other classes were all repeats, and Care of Magical Creatures and Divination were too ill-formed to hold any genuine interest. Muggle Studies, on the other hand, was new and fresh in a way that Regulus enjoyed.

Muggles were fascinating creatures. At first, Regulus could hardly believe everything he was learning about them. Refrigerators for instance. They couldn't use magic to keep their food cold, so they invented power just to have a giant cold box in their homes. It was ingenious. Power itself was so interesting. Electricity was such a foreign concept that Regulus nearly talked Hermione's ear off trying to understand it. Hermione, who would usually love an opportunity to explain a topic to someone, had started avoiding Regulus to escape his incessant questions.

They celebrated Hermione's birthday with a small get-together after dinner. Luna met Regulus, Harry, Hermione, Ron, and Neville in the Gryffindor common room, and they ate snacks stolen from the kitchen. Hermione seemed unnerved by Luna, but she was polite enough.

Crookshanks continued terrorizing Scabbers, creating a very visible rift between Ron and Hermione. They were almost always on the brink of bickering with one another, and it was beginning to drive both Regulus and Harry insane. Regulus couldn't care less what happened to Scabbers, though he understood why Ron was upset. Hermione just seemed distracted, and perhaps a little put out that she was in the wrong.

On the sixteenth of October, Lavender received news that her pet at home had died, confirming a prediction Trelawney made at the beginning of the year. Apparently, her rabbit Binky was killed by a fox, and Lavender was practically in hysterics after reading the letter from her mother telling her about the death. Hermione's immediate questioning of both Lavender's worst fear, and the logistics of Binky dying well before the sixteenth made for an ugly scene.

"Don't mind Hermione, Lavender," Ron said, interrupting Hermione's lecture. "She doesn't think other people's pets matter very much." Regulus couldn't help the surprised laughter that spilled out of him. Hermione sent him a fierce glare but Regulus only shrugged.

"He's not exactly wrong," Regulus said, trying his best to keep his voice gentle. "You do let your pet chase after his without any real boundaries." Hermione's eyes immediately filled with angry tears before she turned around in her seat, effectively ending the conversation. Regulus wasn't really trying to hurt the girl, but he did find it uncomfortable that Ron had to practically beg her to get control of her pet, just so his rat wouldn't get killed.

On the day of the first Hogsmeade weekend, Harry was moping around their dorm room as everyone dressed and prepared to go to breakfast. He'd tried to ask McGonagall to sign his permission form, egged on by Ron's insistence, but she had been just as firm with him as she had with Regulus. Regulus knew there was no chance that she would let him go, even if she was willing to break the rules about who could sign the form, not with Sirius Black on the loose.

"There's always the feast," Ron said to Harry, trying desperately to cheer up the sulking boy.

"Yeah, besides, they can bring back stuff from the village. It's a lot smaller than Diagon, but they should be able to get a good candy haul," Regulus said.

"Yeah," Harry said gloomily, "great."

Draco did his best to poke fun at Harry for staying back while the others gathered up to head to Hogsmeade, though he completely ignored Regulus, who had also not been allowed to go. He was extra insistent this year, Regulus realized, the way he attempted to nag Harry at least once a day. Harry ignored Draco more and more, and Regulus could tell that it was beginning to drive Draco insane.

"What are you going to do today?" Harry asked him as they walked up to the common room.

"Probably check out a few books from the library, and then go read them out by the lake," Regulus answered honestly.

"We're not supposed to be outside unsupervised," Harry said, parroting what Hagrid had yelled at them earlier in the year. Regulus shrugged, a small smirk playing at his lips. Harry shook his head good-naturedly.

"What about you?" Regulus asked. "Did you want to do something?"

"Nah, I'll probably just wander around," Harry answered sullenly.

"It's not so bad," Regulus said, bumping Harry's shoulder with his own. "Might be kind of fun to explore the castle when so many people have left."

"Yeah, maybe," Harry said. His voice was still laced with disappointment, but he looked slightly more mollified than before.

They parted ways the moment they reached the common room, with Colin Creevey immediately cornering Harry the instant they came through the portrait door. Regulus climbed the stairs to the dorm and gathered up his supplies for the day. The library was nearly empty when he arrived, only a few first and second years milling about, though they appeared to be mostly talking with friends rather than working.

He wished he'd thought to bring Harry's invisibility cloak. As he'd begun to search the books in the library, he realized that most of them he'd already read, and he desperately wanted to search through the restricted section. He wondered idly if there were any professors who would give him a pass to the restricted section, but since Lockhart obliviated himself last year, there wasn't anyone left that was stupid enough to give him a free pass.

He grabbed the few books he hadn't read yet and headed outside. He did his best to stick to the shadows as he crossed the grounds to the edge of the Forbidden Forest. He knew it was technically dangerous to be outside, and that he would get into huge trouble if he was found, but he just didn't want to spend the day cooped up in the castle. Plus, the last thing he was worried about was running into his insane older brother.

He tucked himself away in the trees just enough that he couldn't be seen from the castle and settled in to read for a while. Since the summer at Diagon Alley, he'd been interested in creating a protective amulet that Harry could wear constantly that would keep him safe.

He feels unprepared and underqualified to make such an object, but he also didn't trust any of the ones that could be purchased on the streets of Diagon or Knockturn Alley. So many of them were just scams, overpriced, and embedded with magic that barely did anything. Not to mention the fact that almost all of the purchasable ones only used spells, charms that fade over time. Regulus was almost sure that if it was possible to create an object of real use, he would have to use a combination of runes and charms.

He knew that there were some similar objects used in old pureblood families, but these were typically made using blood magic and ancestral magic, both of which he wanted to avoid for Harry's sake. Blood magic might be the better of the two options if he had to use one though, however, it would require some level of explanation of why he needed Harry's blood.

Ancestral magic was more unpredictable in this case. He had no way of utilizing the Potter ancestral magic, not unless he could somehow access old family properties. Since Harry was the only living member of the Potters, he would have no way of anchoring the magic to anyone else. Tying powerful protective ancestral magic to an underage wizard was highly illegal and very dangerous. It could cause a continuous drain on their magic that could lead to magical core damage and even death.

All of this is why it took him so long to actually create the object. The books he was working through today all focused on the different types of materials he could use to create a protective item. It was a complicated use of alchemy that might turn out to be exorbitantly expensive, not that Regulus had any problem paying for it, especially when it came to Harry's protection.

He shivered as he read. It was unseasonably cold outside, most likely due to the constant presence of dementors lording around the perimeter of the school grounds. He was aware that it was probably irresponsible to be outside when any of them could veer off course and come after him, but he was willing to risk it.

He dug into one of the books he checked out, losing track of time quickly. It was interesting, though not terribly helpful considering it was such a rudimentary explanation of alchemy. After finishing the book, he opened his next one. This one talked about the alchemical principles intertwined with different types of magic. Magical types had gone out of fashion years ago, so it was no doubt an old book, but he did find one piece of information that he felt could help him. Old magical families often had alchemical substances that meshed well with their specific brand of magic. If Regulus could figure out what substance was associated with the Potters, he might be able to create something of use.

He set the book down and leaned his head against the tree he was sitting next to. He had taken in so much information that he felt like his head was going to split open trying to hold it all in. He wondered what alchemical substance was associated with the Blacks. It wasn't something taught to him in childhood, which in retrospect he found unusual since it seemed the exact type of information that the Black family would love to teach their children if only to show them how important they all were.

He shivered again, pulling his cloak tighter around his shoulders. He should probably go inside, he thought, but just wanted a few more minutes. He was enjoying the quiet of the lake, the slight splashing noises as the water lapped the shore, the wind flowing through the leaves in quiet contemplation. It was peaceful, and if he wasn't so cold, he could see himself taking a long nap in the afternoon sun.

The cold was growing more intense though, becoming more and more distracting as the minutes ticked by. When he felt the first memory of an inferi grabbing his ankle pull at his thoughts, he decided to pack up and head back to the castle. The dementors must have been moving closer, and he did not want to be caught out alone with them.

As he quickly walked back along the shadows, another memory started to pull him under. This time it didn't feel too bad, though there was a deep sorrow that came with it that he couldn't understand. He was in a vault at Gringotts with his father, except it was not his father, not exactly. It looked like Mr. Potter, James's dad, though he never met him beyond seeing him briefly picking James up from the train. But when he looked at Mr. Potter he didn't think about Mr. Potter, no, he thought of the word Dad and safety and love. That was the most unusual of the bunch really. Regulus never dared feel safety and love for his own father, let alone anyone else's.

Mr. Potter was looking through a collection of items in their vault. Regulus was having trouble tracking what he was looking for. He could tell that Mr. Potter, Dad, not his Dad, but he couldn't detach from the feeling, was picking up items before setting them down again.

"Is this really important right now?" Regulus asked, or not Regulus, Regulus thought.

"Of course, it's important. You know your mother and I," his dad said.

"I know, don't remind me," Regulus said sullenly, cutting him off. "What exactly are you looking for? Do you know what it looks like?"

"I can't remember," Dad said. He's confused so often nowadays, and it's clear that it's frustrating him. "It was black I think. Or in a black box. I think you'll want it. Things are getting so dangerous, you need something else to safeguard you."

“Nobody else has anything for protection like this,” Regulus said. “If we don’t find it, I’m sure I’ll be okay.”

“No, James, no. You need to have something to protect you,” Dad said, turning to him with unsettled eyes.

The memory left him when Regulus finally made it inside the castle and managed to shut the door firmly behind him. It wasn’t his memory, that he was completely positive of. It was James’s, James was the one talking to his father in their family vault. They were looking for something, maybe something similar to what Regulus wanted for Harry.

Why would this memory come to him now? He wondered if the dementors had anything to do with it. While it wasn’t horribly traumatic like so many of the other memories pulled to the forefront of his mind by the dementors, there was an intense sadness that made Regulus feel tears prick at his eyes that came with the memory. He wondered if it was the ill health that Mr. Potter was clearly in. He knew that the Potters had died before Harry was born, but he didn’t know much about their deaths. It must have been difficult for James to deal with their illness amongst so much death and destruction during the war.

It made his chest clench painfully, thinking about James’s terrible sorrow and watching his father get confused while looking for whatever it was he was trying to find. But still, as he managed to push the feelings away, something crystalized in his mind. Somewhere in the Potter family vault, there had to be an item Regulus could use to protect Harry. He would need to find a way to get Harry to Gringotts with him. He didn’t want to wait too long and risk Harry coming face-to-face with Sirius before he had the means of protection.

He wandered back to the dorm and ran into Harry just as he was entering the portrait hole.

“Hey, want to play chess?” He asked as a way of greeting.

“Sure,” Harry said, and the two of them sat at the chessboard in front of the fire. Regulus was glad for it. The tips of his fingers still felt overly cold because of the dementors.

“What did you get up to today?” Regulus asked conversationally.

“I had tea with Professor Lupin,” Harry said happily, though there was a slightly uncertain look on his face.

“Oh?” Regulus asked surprised. “Did you go to see him?”

“No,” Harry answered quickly, looking Regulus in the eyes as if he was imploring Regulus to believe him. “He found me and asked if I wanted to join him.”

“That’s nice,” Regulus said unsteadily. “Did you think I would be mad or something?”

“Well, no, not exactly, but you know, he mentioned Sirius on the train, and I thought maybe he made you uncomfortable. He never calls on you in class, and you never talk about him even though everyone else loves him,” Harry explained, shrugging uncomfortably.

Harry chuckled a little and Regulus noticed that his shoulder relaxed slightly. “Yeah, I guess you’re right.”

“What did you guys talk about?” Regulus asked, after a few minutes of comfortable silence.

“He explained why he didn’t let me face the boggart,” Harry replied. He was sitting hunched over with his hand rubbing his chin in contemplation.

“And?” Regulus prompted after Harry was silent for a long moment.

“He said he was afraid it would turn into Voldemort, and he didn’t want to cause a panic in the class,” Harry said.

“That makes sense,” Regulus replied, feeling very proud of himself that he managed not to flinch at the name. “Would it have turned into Vo — the Dark Lord?” Okay, so he wasn’t quite past his fear completely.

“No, I don’t think so,” Harry said with a light shake of his head. “I think it would have been a dementor.”

“Right,” Regulus said, suddenly feeling mildly ill. “Of course.” Harry nodded knowingly. Regulus didn’t ever want to watch Harry come into contact with a dementor ever again. He was pretty sure that the memory of Harry slipping to the ground unconscious was going to haunt him.

“Oh!” Harry yelled out, startling Regulus from his focus. “I almost forgot. Snape came and gave Lupin this awful potion while I was there. It looked like sludge, and it was smoking, it smelled so nasty.” Harry scrunched up his nose in distaste. “I can’t believe he just drank it. I mean, he must know that Snape is interested in the Dark Arts. I’m sure it wasn’t safe.”

“That is odd,” Regulus agreed. He tried to run through his knowledge of potions, but he was struggling to place any that looked like sludge and also smoked. He would have to research it, he thought.

“What do you think it was?” Harry asked.

“Not sure,” Regulus answered honestly. “Maybe I can find it in the library or something. I bet Hermione would know,” he joked. Harry agreed wholeheartedly.

They played the rest of their game in silence and eventually, the others came back from Hogsmeade, Ron and Hermione unceremoniously dropping huge bags of candy in Harry’s lap the moment they entered the common room. Harry laughed loudly, smiling wildly at both of his friends. Regulus watched on, feeling warm from the fire and the comfort of seeing Harry look so pleased. So often he looked like a tiny adult, with the worries of the world piled on his shoulders, it was so soothing to see him look like the child he actually was.

They walked down to the Halloween feast together, Hermione and Ron regaling them with stories about Hogsmeade and the various stores they visited. Harry listened pleasantly, looking far less sulky than he had been that morning. Harry told them about his meeting with Remus, and Hermione got a curious look on her face. Regulus figured she would know what the potion was by the end of the week, he would have to ask her.

The food was delicious as always and Regulus was practically gorged on it by the time he was done. He felt sleepy and happy. Harry and Ron were still joking around, talking about what Harry wanted from Hogsmeade the next time they went. Hermione was talking quietly to Neville, who just seemed happy to have someone to speak to. Luna had come to join them at some point, sneaking over when no one was paying attention, and was resting her head on her hand, her eyelids threatening to close every few seconds, clearly exhausted after eating so much. Regulus felt safe and comfortable in the dim Halloween lighting.

They trudged up the stairs to Gryffindor Tower, their feet dragging beneath them. Regulus waved to Luna when she split off from them to head to Ravenclaw's common room. He was looking forward to going to bed, already fantasizing about curling up under the covers when he heard Percy yelling.

"Let me through, please," he yelled, his voice piercing the crowd in a way that made Regulus want to cover his ears. He continued to lecture everyone, demanding to know why no one was moving, all of them hovering outside the closed portrait. "Somebody get Professor Dumbledore," he finally said, his voice suddenly haunted. "Quick!"

Regulus barely registered the chaos around him. His eyes were locked on the portrait, as people moved and shifted around in front of him, it finally came into full view and he could finally see what was wrong. Along the front were several long scratches, destroying the portrait in a way so indicative of violence that it made him shiver.

He instinctively grabbed Harry's wrist, intent on keeping Harry next to him. Harry let him, looking worried and confused. There was only one reason that someone might attack the portrait like that. Someone had tried to get into the common room and, having been denied entry reacted in violent anger.

"Did she say who did it?" Regulus heard Dumbledore's quiet and serious voice.

Peeves's voice was muffled and difficult for Regulus to hear. It sounded like water was rushing in his ears. He already knew the answer, there could only be one answer.

"Nasty temper he's got, that Sirius Black."

They are all sent to the Great Hall for the night and only a few minutes after they arrive, all the students from Hufflepuff, Ravenclaw, and Slytherin were sent in also. Luna made a beeline toward where Regulus was huddled up with Harry, Hermione, and Ron, Harry's forearm still firmly in Regulus's grasp.

"What's going on?" She asked, her voice was light and airy, but her eyes were distressed.

"Sirius Black tried to get into Gryffindor Tower," Hermione whispered furiously, her hands were shaking. Ron was pale and nervous. Regulus hadn't spoken yet, still feeling too lost in shock to do so.

Dumbledore made an announcement a moment later, letting them all know that they would be staying in the Great Hall while the professors made a full search of the castle. It did not help Regulus relax. If Sirius could get all the way up to Gryffindor Tower, then there was no telling where he could get. Who knew if he could get into the Great Hall? Regulus wasn't worried about coming across Sirius on his own, but with Harry, as well as all the children in the castle, with him, he was anxious.

"Everyone into their sleeping bags!" Percy shouted. They dragged their sleeping bags to the corner. Regulus finally let go of Harry's arm long enough to roll his out. Hermione and Luna were tucked close to the corner, one on each wall, while Ron, Harry, and Regulus crowded around them. Regulus didn't lie down. He was sure he wouldn't be able to sleep regardless, and he felt better facing the rest of the room with Hermione, Ron, Harry, and Luna behind him.

"Do you think Black's still in the castle?" Hermione asked, her voice was barely above a whisper, but it echoed in the large room.

"I don't think so," Luna answered. Regulus looked back just in time to see Hermione roll her eyes at the girl.

"Dumbledore thinks he might be," Ron said, though he sounded a little uncertain. "Maybe he ran after he attacked the Fat Lady." Harry remained quiet, his face drawn in a way that Regulus hated.

"It's very lucky he picked tonight, you know," Hermione said.

"Yes, otherwise he could have followed a student in," Luna answered. Her eyes were closed now, her face calm and relaxed, but Regulus could see where her small fingers were clenched on the end of her sleeping bag.

“Maybe he did it on purpose,” Ron said, he laid his head down heavily, a gust of air leaving his mouth in a huff.

“Why would he have done it on purpose?” Hermione asked, clear annoyance in her voice.

“I don’t know. He could have hidden in the dorms or something, waited for us to come back, and then attacked once we went to sleep.”

“Oh, that’s a cheerful thought,” Hermione responded.

“The lights are going out now!” Percy yelled, interrupting them. “I want everyone in their sleeping bags and quiet!” The candles all extinguished at once as if they were just waiting for a pompous idiot to instruct them. Whisperings could still be heard around the room periodically, but for the most part, everything was silent. Harry never said a word, he was quiet next to Regulus, laying flat on his back and staring unseeing at the enchanted ceiling.

Regulus stayed up, though he doubted there was much actual sleeping happening in the room. Regardless, he stayed sitting, his arms wrapped loosely around his legs, his head propped up on his knees. He watched the room closely, making sure there wasn’t anyone there who shouldn’t be. A teacher would come in to check on the room once every hour, but other than that, all was quiet.

Percy had been stalking around the room and whisper yelling at anyone who was still talking. He came by to tell Regulus to go to sleep, but Regulus simply ignored him. He barely felt like he was allowed to blink given the threat. Around three in the morning, Dumbledore came back and conversed quickly with him. It turned out that Sirius had attacked after the Fat Lady refused to let him in without a password. He’d gone straight to Gryffindor Tower. Was he planning to lay in wait as Ron suggested? Waiting until all of them were asleep before he killed Harry or stole him away?

Regulus clenched his hands into fists and his fingernails dug into his palms, grounding him and stalling his rising panic. Snape came in only a few moments later, his back stiff as he questioned Dumbledore. Regulus could feel the disdain radiating off of Snape as he spoke to the headmaster. Regulus wondered if he was worried. He and Sirius had hated each other back at school, and it was possible Snape was worried about facing his old enemy. Of course, they both ended up on the same side in the end, but perhaps that kind of hate lasts far longer than any war could fix.

“It seems almost impossible that Black could enter the school without inside help,” Snape said, he was speaking so quietly that Regulus almost missed it. Regulus kept completely still, but Snape still looked over at him quickly as if he was horribly aware that Regulus was listening in.

“I do not believe a single person inside this castle would have helped Black enter it,” Dumbledore responded firmly. They were talking about Lupin, Regulus realized. Snape must have been suspicious that Lupin was helping Sirius get in. He wondered if Snape knew about Lupin’s feelings for Sirius, though if he only knew them as having been friends, then the suspicion could just come from that.

Regulus wasn't inclined to agree though. For one, if Lupin was going to help Sirius, he most likely would have done it long ago. Why help him now years and years after James and Lily were killed? For another thing, Harry had spent much of the afternoon with Lupin. Harry clearly liked and trusted Lupin. So why wouldn't Lupin just take Harry straight to Sirius if that was the plan? Additionally, Lupin would no doubt have the password to the Gryffindor Common Room, why not just give it to Sirius if he was already going to go to the trouble of helping him into the castle?

No, Regulus wasn't worried that Lupin and his pathetic feelings for Sirius would culminate in helping Sirius into the castle. Regulus didn't believe that Lupin had any ill will towards Harry. If anything, he just seemed friendly, if not a little distant. Still, Regulus was curious about why Snape couldn't parse out these reasons himself. Was he still so stuck on his childhood rivalry that he couldn't see logic? He guessed that must be the case. He'd seen how Snape treated Harry without provocation beyond a general hatred of James Potter.

"What was that all about?" Ron whispered once Snape and Dumbledore's conversation died down. Regulus looked back to see all of them had their eyes open, still lying unmoving in their sleeping bags.

They were finally allowed back to the common room in the early dawn. Regulus stomped ahead of the rest of them. Luna walked sleepily along with their group, not even bothering to head to her own dorm. None of them had gotten much sleep during the night, and it was clear they would all crash the moment they were in their beds.

When they were up in the dorm room, Regulus stopped them and went in alone. He cast a quick homenum revelio and when that came up empty, he finally allowed everyone to enter. Neville, Seamus, and Dean were still lingering in the common room, but Ron and Harry were waiting patiently at the door, looking completely unsurprised by Regulus's need to double-check the search the professors had already done.

Hermione had gone back to her dorm, but Luna stayed with Ron and Harry, and when he opened the door, she simply walked to Regulus's bed like she belonged there and promptly fell asleep. Regulus couldn't say exactly why it wasn't weird, but it almost made sense to him. Luna was the only one who knew who he really was, and she seemed remarkably comfortable around him and the other boys. Ron and Harry didn't question it either, acting as if Luna sleeping in the Gryffindor boys' dorm was an everyday occurrence.

Regulus didn't mind that his bed was taken, despite his exhaustion, he knew he wouldn't be getting any sleep. Once Neville, Seamus, and Dean came up to bed, and all of them were asleep, Regulus got to work on something he should have done the moment they arrived at school: warding the dorm room. He couldn't believe he hadn't thought to do it before, but he wasn't going to let any more time pass without warding the room.

He originally considered warding the entire tower, but as he mulled it over during the long night awake, he realized it would put far too much strain on his magic. He knew how to restrict a room, so only he could enter, but it was much more complicated to make it so anyone could enter but he would be alert. Ideally, he would ward it so he would only be alerted if Sirius entered the tower, but without Sirius present, it seemed far too difficult to manage.

Instead, he decided to ward the dorm room specifically, so that if anyone other than the people in the room, while he warded it, entered, then he would be alerted. More than that, he made it so they would simply be unable to. They would have to undo the wards in order to get in. This meant that Harry, Ron, Luna, Neville, Seamus, Dean, and Regulus himself would be able to enter and leave the room without issue and without alerting Regulus. Anyone else, even Hermione who was unfortunately not there with them, wouldn't be allowed in, and Regulus would feel the pull on his magic the moment they tried.

It wasn't perfect, but it would keep Sirius out. Of course, this meant Harry would only be safe as long as he was in the dorm room specifically, but Regulus could only hope that Sirius wouldn't try to attack Harry if he was in a crowded common room. He worried about Quidditch practice but just decided that he would have to go with him whenever he was out there. It would dig into his free time, but if it kept Harry safe, then it was worth it.

Once everything was in place, he sat at the foot of his bed on the floor, casting a quick incendio on the fire to keep the room warm. He felt like a soldier on watch, waiting for danger to pop out at any moment.

The next few days were fraught with tension, everyone was talking about Sirius Black. Draco repeatedly tried to taunt Harry about the danger he was in, but Harry simply sighed and ignored him. Regulus could tell Harry was stressed, though he was doing his best to hide it. In Muggle Studies, they finished up their section on muggle cooking, which Regulus found needlessly complicated and very messy, and moved on to the basics of cleaning. He tried to pay attention, but after Halloween, he struggled to keep track of any of his classes.

Care of Magical Creatures was as boring as ever. They now sat through long, rambling lectures about flobberworms, Hagrid looking defeated and disheartened the entire time. Regulus noticed Draco nodding off multiple times in the class, and he had the ridiculous desire to smack him in the back of the head every time it happened. More than that, they could barely prepare for the class, not that they needed to, but still, all of the books had gone missing. The Monster Book of Monsters seemed to have a mind of its own and over time his own copy disappeared from his bag. He wasn't the only one either; he noticed each class that passed had fewer and fewer students that had their copies.

In Divination, they were ramping up to the end of the section on Tasseography, but every class was still spent with them drinking way too much tea, while they were lulled into a slump by the overwhelming incense. Harry was more distracted than ever, he barely even bothered to look at their cups before picking something random out of their book and saying that was what he saw. He tried his best to keep his tea leaves hidden from Trelawney, who was always sniffing around when it was his turn.

"All right, what do you see?" Harry said tiredly as Ron looked in his cup.

Ron looked deeply uncomfortable for a long moment before a look of relief crossed his face. "I see a tree," he said, then hummed as his eyebrows furrowed. "Honestly, it kind of looks like the Whomping Willow. Maybe try to stay away from that. I also see... clouds!" he shouted. "Or at least, I think they're clouds. I think that means rain," he paused then added quickly like he even regretted the fact that he was saying it, "or a bad omen related to weather. I'm sure it's fine."

Harry sighed and looked out the window where the storm that had been building all week continued its torrential downpour. Hermione rolled her eyes so intensely that Regulus knew her head must have hurt.

Ron began twisting the cup in his hands until his eyes widened intensely. He consciously schooled his features before putting the cup down. "That's it, I think," Ron said.

"You might as well say it, otherwise Trelawney is going to come over and do it for you," Harry said sullenly. It spoke to how much Hermione disliked the class that she didn't correct Harry by telling him to call her Professor Trelawney.

"I see the Grim," Ron said, barely moving his mouth as he spoke. "But it could just be a big dog or another animal." Ron's reading marked the end of that round, so they got up to get more tea.

"Just skip this round," Regulus whispered to Harry as they stood to get another refill of tea. At this pace, he would have to use the bathroom five times before the end of class. Harry nodded at him and leaned heavily against the table. Hermione stayed back as well, she had taken to skipping nearly every other turn. She had absolutely no talent for Divination and, worse than that, she refused to even try when she realized she wouldn't be the best in the class.

They drank their new tea slowly, sipping it in silence as they listened to the dull rumblings of the other students attempting to read their leaves. Many of the students seemed just as apathetic about the topic as Harry did, though not for the same reasons. Only Lavender and Parvati seemed to enjoy the subject, talking in gossipy whispered tones, before calling over Trelawney every few minutes to double-check their readings.

"Here," Ron said, handing his empty cup to Regulus. Regulus downed his remaining tea and handed his over as well. Ron immediately looked into it. Regulus couldn't figure out why exactly, but Ron seemed to enjoy the repetitive practice of reading tea leaves over and over again.

Regulus tried to work through what he saw in Ron's cup, but he really felt like he was missing what was needed to master the topic. He had trouble picking out shapes, only seeing them every now and again. He looked up to see Ron focusing on the leaves with glazed, unblinking eyes.

"I see a rat," Ron said suddenly, his voice sounding hollow and distant. Hermione was looking at Ron through narrowed eyes like she thought he was play-acting. Harry just looked curious. "A rat," Ron repeated, his voice a little quieter. "And a dog. And the full moon."

Trelawney had wandered over and was watching Ron with a curious glint in her eye. Harry and Regulus made eye contact, both of them raising their eyebrows at each other. Hermione scoffed quietly and pulled out her Transfiguration textbook so she could read it under the table.

"What do you think it means?" Regulus prompted. Ron hadn't even spun his cup like he usually did.

“It’s not going to turn out how you think it will,” Ron said mysteriously.

“What won’t?” Harry asked.

“It could go either way though,” Ron said. “It all depends.”

“Depends on what?” Regulus couldn’t stop himself from asking. He couldn’t tell if Ron was playing this all up for Trelawney or not, but he still found himself reluctantly interested.

“Oh, please,” Hermione said, her voice irritated and sharp. It cut through Ron’s trance, and he dropped the cup as if it burned him. The sound of it smashing against the ground seemed to make everyone startle. Trelawney tried to ask Ron about what he was seeing, but by then the moment was over.

Lupin wasn’t in their Defense Against the Dark Arts class the next day. Harry and Regulus arrived late after Wood kept Harry in practice too long. Regulus of course stayed with him, still too worried to leave him on his own. Instead of Lupin teaching, Snape stood at the front of the classroom looking disdainfully as they entered.

“Sorry we’re late, Professor Lupin, we —” Harry said as they entered, cutting off when he made eye contact with Snape.

“Potter. Black,” Snape spat his name. “The lesson began ten minutes ago, so that will be ten points from Gryffindor for each of you. Sit down. Now.”

Regulus moved forward immediately, rolling his eyes at Snape. Harry didn’t move at all.

“Where is he?” Harry asked, his voice laced with a dawning suspicion.

“He is too ill to teach today,” Snape said. There was an unpleasant twist to his mouth as if he were holding in some terrible joke that none of them could understand.

“What’s wrong with him?” Harry’s eyes darkened as he spoke. He was looking at Snape like he was about to whip out his wand and challenge him to duel at a moment’s notice.

“Nothing life-threatening,” Snape said regretfully. He took five more points from Gryffindor for Harry’s failure to listen, and though Harry finally took his seat, Regulus could tell it took him great effort to do so without shouting.

The class topic was confusing, to say the least. Snape jumped over weeks’ worth of topics to cover Werewolves, something they weren’t meant to cover until the very end of the year. He lashed out at anyone who questioned this in a way that Regulus found unnerving. It was like he was watching the man have a breakdown right in front of him.

“You will each write an essay, to be handed in to me, on the way you recognize and kill werewolves,” Snape said as they began packing up their things to leave. That was when it finally clicked into place for Regulus.

“Why’s he got it in for Lupin?” Harry asked as they walked out of the classroom.

“Snape hates everyone,” Regulus answered. “I’ll see you guys later, okay?” He added quickly, throwing the words over his shoulder as he walked off.

“That’s odd,” Hermione said. “He hasn’t left your side all week.” Regulus just barely caught the words, but it didn’t matter. Harry, Hermione, and Ron were heading to lunch, there was hardly any danger, and for the moment, he needed to look something up, something he didn’t feel comfortable researching with the rest of them around.

He made his way to the library quickly, tucking himself away in the potions section. The potion Harry saw Snape bring to Lupin, that’s what he was looking for. He’d all but forgotten about it with everything that happened Halloween night, but now he felt almost sure of what it had to be.

He pulled out Uncommon Potions by Victoria Crenshaw, published only a few years prior, and flipped to the page he was looking for. “Wolfsbane Potion created by Damocles Belby.” Regulus scanned the page quickly. With its thick consistency and smoke that was supposed to billow off of a well-made batch, it fit perfectly with the description Harry had given.

Regulus was sure he already knew what was going on, but he needed one more detail, one more thing before he allowed himself to think it. He made his way to the Astronomy books, so quickly that he nearly tripped over two first years who were huddled together in one aisle. He never kept track of the moons himself, though when he was a child he and Sirius used to, always watching the moon through Sirius’s window. Now, he had no idea, but he pulled a book out that documented all the full moons from 1990 to 2020.

He flipped so quickly that he gave himself a paper cut on his forefinger and he found it. It was the day after the full moon. The full moon had been the night before. Lupin was a werewolf. And Snape knew. Did the rest of the staff know? Surely Dumbledore knew. Was he a werewolf while they were at Hogwarts? Did Sirius know? Did James? His thoughts were running a mile a minute. He shut the book and walked in a daze out of the library.

He had no idea what to do with this piece of information. Lupin was a werewolf, and he taught at Hogwarts. Regulus had never given much thought to werewolves. He knew that the Dark Lord worked with werewolves on occasion, though Regulus was never stupid enough to ask questions about it. His family always talked about werewolves with intense contempt, “half breeds” his mother would call them. Regulus would always nod along, though he never thought about it beyond that.

Now though, he wasn’t sure how to feel. Surely the students weren’t in danger. He doubted Dumbledore would allow a werewolf to teach at the school if the students could be killed by him. Although, their last Defense Against the Dark Arts Professor tried to destroy both Ron and Harry’s minds. The one before that tried to kill Harry and had the Dark Lord feeding on him like a leech.

Maybe the students were in danger, he didn’t know. He couldn’t parse out how he was supposed to deal with this information. He almost wanted to stomp right to Dumbledore’s office and demand to know what the old man was thinking, letting a creature like that in the school, but there was one thing that made him stop. Snape tried to out Lupin today, he tried to get all of Lupin's students to understand what Lupin was. Why would Snape do that if not to hurt Lupin?

Chapter End Notes

my friend and i started writing a peter pettigrew/barty crouch jr. fic. it's such a rare pair that there are only like 50 fics in the tag and only a handful of them have peter/barty as the main ship. anyways, if you want to read something unique that is also writing (partially) by me, then please check it out. im sure it will get very few hits lol listen, i tried to have an upload schedule, okay? but i have so much of this written already and i have no self control, so sometimes i just have to upload early.

also we just crossed 100k words?? that's absolutely insane.

The game against Hufflepuff was cursed from the start, Regulus thought. The storm that had been brewing all week was at its peak. The rain pattered heavily against the windows, keeping Regulus up most of the night, so by the time he got out of bed to head to breakfast, he could barely keep his eyes open.

Regulus cast several strong Impervius Charms on himself, Ron, Hermione, and Luna as they walked out to the pitch. However, despite the charms, he could already feel the rain soaking through his cloak. He walked down to where Gryffindor was getting ready to line up, so he could meet Harry.

“Hey,” he called out. Wood was in the middle of another lecture, trying to impart some last-minute wisdom on his team, but Regulus’s shout interrupted him. Harry had already mounted his broom, but looked over at Regulus and relaxed slightly out of his crouched position.

“What’s up?” Harry asked.

“Let me cast some warming charms on you,” Regulus said. The expensive Quidditch gear he’d purchased for Harry for his birthday already had built-in charms that kept rain from drenching whoever was wearing them. The goggles he wore would repel rain expertly, and the gloves would keep him from slipping, but still, Regulus wanted to make sure Harry would be comfortable.

Harry gave a nod. “Go ahead,” he said easily. Wood went back to his lecture, ignoring Regulus. Regulus had spent so much time with the team over the past week that Wood had taken to just disregarding his presence. Regulus cast a few charms that would keep Harry warm throughout the game. Harry shot him a grateful smile.

Regulus headed back up to where the rest of his friends were to watch the game, but it almost felt pointless. The rain was coming down so intensely that he could barely see a thing. It made his skin prickle with worry, imagining Harry flying around in a storm as bad as that one.

Regulus lost track of the game. He could barely follow what anyone was doing and he was distracted by the shivering children on either side of him. He cast several warming charms on all of them, but they kept wearing off faster each time. He wished that Harry would just hurry up and catch the snitch, so they could go back inside.

That's when things started to go fuzzy. He was cold, and he could feel Luna and Hermione getting closer from where they stood on either side of him. They were all crowded together, huddling to stay warm, but there seemed to be an instinctive desire to stay close.

It was the sound of Sirius crying that made him focus on what was actually happening. Regulus was very familiar with the sound of Sirius's screams, the sounds of pain permeated throughout Grimmauld Place often during the school holidays, but his cries were far less common. Regulus wasn't even sure the last time he heard Sirius actually cry. He always worked so hard to keep his sounds to a minimum, not wanting to give their parents any kind of satisfaction.

"He's dead, he's dead, it's my fault," Sirius mumbled. Regulus felt sick to his stomach. What was this memory? Was Sirius talking about James? Regardless of his questions, he knew now that there was only one reason that he would be experiencing someone else's memories. The dementors must be close.

He pulled back from where he was leaning against the railing. "Stay together," Regulus shouted at Ron, Hermione, and Luna. They all look confused, but huddled closer together, filling the gap he just left. After that, he took off running.

He was trying to get to the professors' box, but it took him so long to get down from the stands that he could see the dementors swarming by the time he reached the ground. Sirius was sobbing again, but louder than before. It unsettled Regulus and he desperately wanted to lock the sound away.

The dementors flood onto the pitch like a dark wave, coming to crash on an unsuspecting village, and Regulus could only watch in horror as they all swarmed around Harry, who was already beginning to slip from his broom. Regulus had his wand out before he could even properly think, and he cast the strongest immobulus he could possibly manage. Harry barely made it a few feet below where he let go of the broom before he stopped in midair.

The students were screaming in terror by now, but Regulus ignored it. He ran out onto the pitch, ignoring everything else that was happening. He hoped that the others were doing okay, but he couldn't quite focus on it because the dementors had zeroed in their focus on Harry.

Why? Regulus couldn't help but think. Why are they so focused on Harry when they seemed barely interested in anyone else? Why Harry? He wished that he could cast a Patronus. He'd never been able to, which wasn't terribly uncommon for Death Eaters. He didn't think he knew anyone who could do it during his first life. He wondered if Sirius ever knew how to cast one.

Harry was moving slowly down to the ground, but he was fully unconscious. Regulus vaguely heard Dumbledore cast a Patronus, and he noticed a bright light in the corner of his eye, but he kept his magic focused on Harry, making sure that he would arrive safely to the ground.

After that it was chaos. People swarmed the grounds, Wood was shouting at Madam Hooch and the Hufflepuff Captain, and multiple professors and students ran to get a good look at Harry. Regulus conjured a stretcher, and the Weasley twins began pushing students aside to help him get Harry back to the castle. Despite the insanity, Regulus managed to make out one overly pale, drawn face. Draco, hovering a few feet away the entire walk up to the castle, was seemingly incapable of leaving Harry's side as he was carried off.

Regulus found out later that Cedric caught the snitch and that they'd chosen not to have a rematch, despite Cedric's insistence that Harry should get another chance. Regulus was also told about Harry's destroyed broom as if it should be Regulus's responsibility to break the news to Harry. Regulus couldn't help thinking about Ron's prediction, about staying away from the Whomping Willow.

Harry was unconscious for a long hour before he finally woke up. Draco remained nearby though, out in the hallway and out of sight of the rest of the Gryffindor and Hufflepuff teams. Regulus noticed Draco walking with fake casualness past the opened Hospital Wing doors for the fifth time in twenty minutes and decided to take pity on the boy.

"Harry's going to be fine," he said after following Draco out into the hall, so that no one else could see or hear them.

"What?" Draco said, a little too bewildered by Regulus's statement to show his usual animosity.

"He will be fine, the dementors just take a lot out of him, but he'll wake soon," Regulus said.

"I don't care," Draco said so quickly that Regulus could barely make out the individual words.

"Right," Regulus said slowly. He turned on his heels prepared to leave before Draco's voice stopped him.

"Did Black actually get into Gryffindor's common room?" Draco asked. Regulus turned to look at him and noticed Draco looked a little regretful as if he didn't intend to let the words out.

"No, he couldn't make it in without a password," Regulus said. "He wouldn't be able to make it to our dorm room regardless." Draco nodded a little bit, before crossing his arms tightly over his chest.

"And you didn't let him in?" Draco said suddenly, he looked at the ground, but his eyes were narrowed in a fierce glare. "You're not helping him?"

"I thought you didn't even believe I was related to him," Regulus replied, not quite able to keep the bitterness out of his voice. No one had outright accused him of helping Sirius, but he could feel their suspicion regardless, and it bothered him to no end.

"I don't," Draco yelled, before looking startled by his own volume. "I don't," he repeated in a quieter voice. "I know that you're not his son. But that doesn't mean you don't know him or have some connection to him.” He waved one hand wildly in the air when he said the final few words.

“I’m not helping him,” Regulus said with a tired sigh. “I would never do anything to put Harry in danger, including helping Sirius Black.” Draco’s shoulders noticeably relaxed from their tense position once Regulus finished speaking.

“Fine,” Draco said through clenched teeth. “I believe you.” He spoke the words definitively as if he was the only one capable of passing judgment on the situation. He turned and stomped away before Regulus could even think of what to say in reply.

Regulus was heading back into the Hospital Wing when he overheard Cedric Diggory’s deep voice speaking. “You’re a great seeker. Really, you are. I wish we could play again,” Cedric said, his tone friendly and a little regretful.

“Oh, er, thanks,” Harry replied a little awkwardly. He must have just woken up while Regulus was out of the room. Regulus poked his head around the corner to see Harry propped up in bed, the others lingering a few steps away and pretending like they were not listening to him and Cedric speaking.

“Maybe we could play a pick-up game together another time. Seeker versus seeker,” Cedric added with a small smirk. Harry’s face, Regulus noticed, was so red that he looked like he was about to pass out from exertion, and at Cedric’s smirk, it grew impossibly redder.

Oh, Merlin, Regulus thought. He knew that look. Harry looked just like James did when James used to try and clumsily flirt with Lily Evans. Regulus did not feel prepared to deal with a thirteen-year-old Harry with a crush, especially a crush on Cedric Diggory. Cedric, for his part, seemed either completely oblivious to Harry’s feelings, too polite to acknowledge them, or, Regulus added regretfully, almost against his will, just as interested in Harry as Harry was in Cedric.

Cedric is too old for Harry, Regulus decided. He was a sixth year and much too tall. Harry was only thirteen, there was no reason for him to be dating a sixteen-year-old. Not to mention that there were already rumors around school about Cedric and his dating history. Regulus wondered if this was how parents felt watching their children develop a crush.

“Feeling any better?” Regulus interrupted them. Cedric gave him an odd look before nodding to Harry and leaving the Hospital Wing.

“Er, yeah, I’m okay,” Harry replied. He watched Cedric for a long moment before turning to look fully at Regulus. He still looked too pale and a little sickly, but he was at least awake and talking. “We lost the game,” Harry said when Regulus was quiet for too long.

“Yeah, I know,” Regulus said regretfully. “Are you all right?”

Harry shrugged but Regulus could see how upset he was. “And my broom,” he said, but his voice wobbled a little and he cut himself off, looking away swiftly.

“You can get another broom,” Regulus replied. “I’m sorry about this one though, I know it was your first one. But don’t worry, you can get a new one.”

The others were beginning to leave slowly, and soon it was just Harry and Regulus with Ron, Hermione, and Luna coming up to rejoin them. They were all still wearing soaked cloaks, and Regulus sent a quick Drying Charm at each of them.

“Thank you, Regulus,” Luna said cheerfully. “It was very wrong of the dementors to attack you, Harry. They do seem very interested in you, don’t they?”

“That’s a good point, Luna,” Hermione said, though her statement was ruined slightly by the obvious surprise in her voice. Luna did not seem insulted though, instead just giving Hermione a very pleasant smile. “Why are they so interested in him?”

“Yeah, maybe you have, like, more soul or something,” Ron said.

“More soul?” Hermione asked incredulously. “Your soul isn’t a measurable object, Ronald.”

“How do you know?” Ron asked, sitting heavily in the chair next to Harry’s bed. “I mean, maybe some people just have heavier souls or, like, a bunch of souls.” He chuckled slightly.

“You think the dementors are focused on Harry because he has more than one soul?” Hermione asked, throwing her hands up in the air like this conversation was ridiculous to even joke about. There was something about it though, something that made Regulus feel uncomfortable, like there was something he was missing.

“What?” Ron asked. Regulus conjured two more chairs for Hermione and Luna to sit in.

“I saw the Grim again,” Harry mumbled. Hermione rolled her eyes and scoffed.

“Where did you see the Grim?” Luna asked interestedly.

“In the stands,” Harry answered, he was looking down at his hands like he was ashamed to have seen the creature.

“What, just sitting with the rest of the students?” Ron asked.

“No, he was in one of the empty ones. But it was just a big black dog sitting in one of the stands,” Harry replied. “It threw me off, that’s why Cedric was able to catch the snitch.”

“I thought he was able to catch the snitch because you were attacked by dementors?” Hermione asked. Harry shrugged a little.

“I thought perhaps you let him win because you liked him,” Luna offered. All of them, except Regulus, looked at her with bewildered looks on their faces.

The Weasley twins giving Harry a magical map of Hogwarts that showed him every possible route to get out of the school was the most stressful thing Regulus could imagine happening. Harry pulled him aside the morning of the last Hogsmeade visit before Christmas, his eyes glowing with mania.

“Regulus,” he hissed, waving Regulus over quickly. Regulus abandoned the book he was reading on the couch so that he could walk over to the small alcove Harry was standing in.

“What?” Regulus whispered back.

“Look,” Harry said before pulling out an old piece of parchment from his robe. “I solemnly swear I am up to no good.” He placed his wand against the paper as he said the words, and Regulus watched in fascination as words began to appear.

“Messrs. Moon, Wormtail, Padfoot, and Prongs,” Regulus read aloud as the words appeared. “Why do those names sound familiar?”

“I don’t know,” Harry said dismissively. “But look!” The map showed every single detail of Hogwarts. Harry pointed to where Harry Potter and Regulus Black floated in the Gryffindor Common Room. “And there’s more!”

“More than an entire map of the school that shows where everyone is?” Regulus asked doubtfully.

“Yeah, look,” Harry said and pointed to one of the secret passageways that lead out of the castle. “The twins said it led to the Honeydukes cellar. In Hogsmeade.”

Regulus had to take several deep breaths before he could respond to Harry. On one hand, he absolutely loathed the idea of Harry scampering off in a secret passage to an area where he would be largely unprotected from Sirius Black. But on the other hand, if Regulus did anything to keep Harry from using this insane and very unique magical item, Harry might never trust him again. He couldn’t risk that. Not to mention that Harry would undoubtedly find a way to Hogsmeade with or without Regulus, and Regulus would rather be there if he was going to do it.

“Okay, let’s go. Get your invisibility cloak,” Regulus whispered. Harry gave him such an intense smile that Regulus thought his face might break in two.

Hermione was appropriately scandalized to see them in Hogsmeade, so much so that Regulus vaguely worried if she was about to stomp up to the castle to tattletale on them. Ron seemed mostly bummed that the twins had never thought to tell Ron about the map, which Regulus thought was fair considering he was their actual brother. The twins were unpredictable though.

They ended up at the Three Broomsticks with Harry and Regulus crouched beneath the table and the invisibility cloak thrown over the top of them. Cornelius Fudge, the Minister of Magic, had inexplicably entered the bar along with McGonagall, Flitwick, and Hagrid. Rosmerta was regaling them with her memories of Sirius Black, the nice, if a little bit flirty, young man that he was. Regulus did his best not to gag.

“The worst he did isn’t even widely known,” Fudge replied, his voice scratchy like he desperately needed to clear it.

“The worst? Worse than murdering all those people, you mean?” Rosmerta replied. Regulus strained his ears to listen. He didn’t even realize his hand was shaking until Harry clamped his own around Regulus’s.

They were talking about James. Regulus thought he might be sick. James and Sirius, Potter and Black, the inseparable pair. “You’d have thought Black and Potter were brothers,” Flitwick said loudly. Regulus swayed slightly where he was crouched, Harry gave him a worried look. They talked about the Fidelius Charm that the Potters had, details that Regulus already knew. Hearing Hagrid recount converting Sirius made Regulus squeeze his eyes shut harshly.

The worst detail, the detail that stuck out like a sore thumb in the already terrible tale, was the detail that Sirius was Harry’s godfather. Regulus, of course, already knew this given that Harry was an heir to the Black estate, but Harry had never heard this detail. He gasped when he heard Hagrid mention it and glanced at Regulus with such intensity in his eyes that Regulus could barely look at him.

Harry and Regulus left through the Hogsmeade cellar shortly after they left the Three Broomsticks. Harry had barely spoken since Fudge had departed and Regulus felt just as disinclined to talk. Hermione and Ron just looked terribly worried, but Regulus couldn’t bring himself to comfort them.

“I asked Lupin to teach me the Patronus Charm,” Harry said, after they’d been walking in the tunnel for a few long, silent minutes.

“Did you?” Regulus asked, surprised.

“Yeah, I figure it would be good to know. You know, for Quidditch games and such, in case the dementors attack again,” Harry said quietly.

“That’s a really smart idea,” Regulus said.

“Thanks,” Harry replied, and Regulus could hear the slight smile in his voice, even through the dark tunnel. “You could come with, if you wanted. I’m sure Lupin would be okay with it.”

“Ah, that’s okay, Harry,” Regulus said quietly. “You should take advantage of the one-on-one instruction he’s offering.”

Harry was quiet for a long time, and Regulus thought he might not speak again. “Sirius Black is my godfather,” Harry mumbled suddenly. “That makes us like god-brothers or something, right?”

Regulus chuckled despite himself. “Yeah, I guess it kind of does.”

Chapter Notes

a new chapter two days in a row? i did say i had no self control, didn't i? i just am so excited to get to sirius in this fic so i get impatient with uploading.

also happy pride month! to celebrate, i am writing a short, fluffy fic about wolfstar getting together if you all are interested :)

<https://archiveofourown.org/works/47608939/chapters/119992915>

Christmas was upon them before Regulus could even process it. Harry had been different since he found out that Sirius was his godfather. Regulus didn't quite understand it until he saw the way Harry spoke to Hagrid when they found out about Buckbeak's trial date. It was obvious then. Harry wasn't really upset that Sirius was his godfather, he'd been given enough bad news in his life to be able to take this bit in stride. No, he was upset that Hagrid had known and never told him.

That was the first time Regulus really thought about the fact that he was lying to Harry. It was for Harry's protection that he didn't know who Regulus really was. Or, at least, that's what Regulus thought. But after he watched the betrayal form in Harry's eyes as he looked at Hagrid, he knew that his own excuse wasn't going to cut it.

He hadn't even realized the guilt that had been brewing inside him when it came to his false identity. Not that he cared about lying to anyone else, he had no problems or lingering guilt when it came to that. But Harry was different. Harry was James's son. And more than that, he was Regulus's friend. He trusted Regulus and Regulus was lying to him. And not even for a very good reason.

Regulus was lying to him out of cowardice. He knew, once he really thought about it, that the reason he'd kept his identity a secret from Harry was that he wasn't prepared for Harry to look at him like James had when he'd discovered the Dark Mark on Regulus's arm. When Regulus told Harry who he really was, he would have to tell him the entire truth, including how he'd died and who he'd been in his past life.

All this was to say, that by the time the Christmas holidays were over, Regulus had decided that he would have to tell Harry, at least by the end of the year. However, he also decided that even his guilt couldn't make him tell Harry the entire truth. Yes, he would tell him he was Death Eater, and he would accept whatever judgment Harry saw fit to pass on him. But he would not ever tell Harry about his relationship with James.

Christmas morning dawned with a bright sunny sky. The grounds were covered in snow, but it looked soft and unthreatening. The dementors were most likely lingering farther out from the school now that it wasn't filled with happy students, so the skies had cleared for the time being. Regulus woke feeling warm and content.

"Oi! Presents!" Ron yelled, running around the dorm room and hitting Harry and Regulus in the face with pillows, one in each hand, as he laughed wildly. Harry chuckled sleepily, and Regulus let his face fall into an easy smile.

A small heap of parcels were at the foot of each of their beds. Regulus had gotten each of them a collection of chocolates he ordered from France, writing a note in each to say it was from his fake mother. He also purchased an expensive school bag for Hermione that would lighten her book load and make her days easier, some clothing for Harry (his go-to now), a collection of nice chess pieces for Ron, and a pair of elf-made earrings for Luna.

"Another sweater from Mum," Ron said glumly. "And it's maroon again."

"Want me to charm it another color?" Regulus asked. Ron looked elated for a moment before regretfully shaking his head.

"No, that's okay," he mumbled. "I don't want her to feel bad if she sees it." Harry gave Ron a kind, understanding smile. Ron was a good son.

"Hello, everyone." Luna's dreamy voice filled the room. "Regulus, can you let Hermione in?" Regulus vaguely wondered how Luna had managed to get into the common room at all. He hadn't told her the password, but she was a Ravenclaw, perhaps she figured out a way to get it.

"Oh, of course," Regulus said, jumping up from where he'd sat cross-legged on the ground. He still hadn't had the opportunity to add Hermione into the wards he made around their dorm room, so she was standing right outside the door looking awkward. "Sorry about that."

"What is happening? Why can't I get in?" Hermione asked. She was still wearing her dressing gown, her hair tied up in a bun on the top of her head, just a few loose strands poking out here and there.

"Er, yes, well," Regulus said. "I may have added some wards around the room after Sirius Black tried to break into Gryffindor Common Room. I didn't want to risk him getting to Harry while we were all asleep and I couldn't protect him."

Hermione's face visibly softened and she smiled. "That's an impressive piece of magic," Hermione said, not unkindly, though there was a small note of suspicion there.

"Yes, thank you," Regulus said politely, not making eye contact. He let her in the wards, and they entered the room to find Ron and Harry arguing about who had sent Harry a broom he was holding.

"I can't see Lupin affording something like this," Harry said uncertainly.

“What are you guys talking about?” Regulus asked.

“Did you give this to me?” Harry asked loudly. He looked excited and a little hopeful, like he was praying that Regulus’s answer would be yes.

Regulus inspected what he was holding. A Firebolt. The most expensive broom on the market. So pricey that you had to ask for the cost before you could even try to buy it. “No, I definitely would have put my name on it if I sent it to you,” Regulus said.

“Then who could it be?” Ron asked. “Oi! Don’t bring him in here!” Regulus hadn’t noticed Crookshanks bundled in the front of Hermione’s dressing gown. Hermione wasn’t listening to Ron though, she simply dropped the cat on Seamus’s bed while she stared gawking at the Firebolt.

“Who sent you that?” Hermione said incredulously.

“No idea, there isn’t a card or anything,” Harry said uncertainly, though his eyes were shining brightly, and he couldn’t quite seem to pull them from the broom.

“It’s the best broom there is,” Ron said excitedly.

“Yes, it’s supposed to use Tored Bunklewink Wings in the production of it,” Luna said, running one hand along the broom in awe. “That’s why it’s so fast.”

“What’s a Bored Wunklebink?” Ron asked, causing Harry to laugh loudly.

“But who’d send something that expensive and then not say they sent it?” Hermione asked. “Also those creatures do not exist, Luna. Surely you know that.”

“You don’t know everything, Hermione,” Luna said fiercely. Or at least, as fiercely as Luna could manage to say anything. Regulus chuckled a little.

“Maybe we should do some tests on it,” Regulus said, still looking at the room. “Just to make sure it’s safe. I mean, it could be from anyone. How did it even get through the wards?” He was mostly speaking aloud, but Hermione was looking at him with a very strained expression.

The rest of the morning was spent opening presents, only interrupted by Crookshanks trying once again to attack Scabbers. They went to Christmas lunch together and endured a very awkward interaction between Trelawney plus the rest of the staff before heading back up to the common room.

“Are you coming?” Regulus asked as Hermione split off from the group.

“I just want a quick word with McGonagall,” Hermione said evasively before walking off. Regulus shrugged and followed the others.

“Harry, bring your broom down, let me try a few detection spells on it,” Regulus instructed. Luna and Ron fell right into a game of chess, moving so quickly that it seemed like they had already been discussing moves before they arrived at the board.

“You know, you sound very good at Tasseography,” Luna said.

“Oh,” Ron said, his cheeks growing faintly pink. “Thanks, Luna. I don’t know if that’s true though. Sometimes I wonder if Hermione is right and I’m just making it all up.”

“Do you think you could read my tea leaves today?” Luna asked, instead of acknowledging Ron’s self-deprecation. It was sweet, Regulus thought, the way she encouraged him. Regulus wasn’t sure that he really understood Divination, he doubted he had much of a talent for it, but Ron seemed to at least be trying and succeeding enough to get Trelawney’s attention, so he wasn’t about to question it.

“These spells aren’t going to damage the broom, are they?” Harry asked as he sauntered down the stairs, broom in hand.

“Doubt it,” Regulus replied. “If they do, we can always contact the manufacturer. They shouldn’t damage them and if they do, then something is messed up with the broom.”

Harry still seemed a little uncertain, but he handed over the broom regardless. There was that trust again. Regulus felt his uncomfortable guilt swirling around inside him. Regulus had barely pulled out his wand when McGonagall came in through the portrait hole looking stern and regal, though her cheeks were still a little red from the wine she’d had during Christmas lunch.

“That’s it, is it?” McGonagall asked, nodding to the broom in Regulus’s hand. Ron and Luna had stopped playing and were watching with rapt attention. “And there was no note at all, Potter?”

“No,” Harry said, his face was suspiciously blank

“I see, well, I’m afraid I will have to confiscate this, Potter,” she said, like Harry had been specifically breaking the rules, like it was a punishment.

“What? Why?” Harry asked, his voice rising.

It turned out that Hermione had gone to tell McGonagall about the broom, expressing worry that it was from Sirius Black himself. McGonagall took the broom to strip it down to search for any curses or spells that could cause Harry danger. Regulus wasn’t totally opposed to an experienced professor looking over the broom, but he knew that this did not bode well for Hermione.

“What did you go running to McGonagall for?” Ron yelled the moment McGonagall was gone.

“Because I thought it might be from Sirius Black,” she said, her face red and blotchy like she had already been crying. Ron and Harry immediately started yelling. Luna put her hands over her ears and watched them warily. Hermione angrily stomped away, but Regulus followed her. He felt bad for the girl, but he also needed to know why she thought Sirius might have sent it.

“You have to agree with me, don’t you?” She demanded once they were away from the others. “You’re more concerned about Harry’s well-being than anyone. It’s like you’re his parent or something.”

“Hermione, calm down. Why did you think Sirius Black sent this?” Regulus asked calmly.

“Well, it makes sense, doesn’t it? He would have the money, I looked it up, Gringotts operates outside of the Ministry, and he might know how much Harry loves Quidditch and that he might not question a gift like this.”

“That does make sense,” Regulus said evenly. It really did, he hadn’t thought of it and felt a little dumb for it. But at the same time, it wasn’t exactly Sirius’s style. At least, the Sirius he used to know. Or really, the Sirius who would just try and barge into a castle full of children and then destroy a portrait when he didn’t think his plan out enough and got stuck. That didn’t seem like the kind of man who could come up with such an elaborate idea.

“So you’ll tell them that,” Hermione implored.

“I’ll try,” Regulus said uncertainly. Ron was already on edge with the cavalier way Hermione treated his pet, plus Hermione’s method wasn’t the best way to go about it, he thought. “Why didn’t you tell me about this? About your theory?”

“Well, you were already talking about casting your own spells,” Hermione explained, though she suddenly looked uncertain. “And I just thought that it was better if a professor knew, is all,” she said the last bunch of words all at once making them difficult to understand.

“You know,” Regulus said, feeling annoyed despite himself. “Harry is a very empathetic and caring person, especially about his friends. If you had told him all of this and then said ‘Yes, Harry, let your best friend Ron fly on a possibly cursed broom’ he would have gone to McGonagall with you.”

“I didn’t think about that,” Hermione said uncomfortably. “I just —”

“I understand that your heart was in the right place, but I think you should understand it from their point of view. Now it feels like they can’t trust you without you immediately going to a professor to tell on them,” Regulus explained. “It probably feels like a betrayal. Like you didn’t even trust Harry enough to get his opinion.”

Hermione looked like she was on the verge of tears. “I didn’t mean it like that,” Hermione said.

“I know that, and I think they would understand if you explained it. Maybe just give them an hour or so to cool off, then we can talk about it, okay?” Regulus said. When did he become such a moderator for fights between children? Hermione nodded and, to Regulus’s surprise, hugged him before scampering up to her room.

Regulus spent the next few hours talking Harry and Ron down from their anger. Luna helped significantly in that way that only Luna could manage. Cutting right down to the issue and understanding exactly how others would feel. She used empathy like a superpower, Regulus thought. Hermione came down later and explained how she felt and apologized. By the time the sun had set, they were all friends again.

Harry was still sulky about the broom as they were getting ready for bed, though Regulus could tell he was trying to hide it. “Hey, I need to talk to you,” Regulus said quietly. Ron was in the bathroom so they had a moment alone.

“What’s up?” Harry asked curiously.

“After Ron goes to sleep, I need you to take me down to the Chamber of Secrets,” Regulus whispered.

“What?” Harry shouted.

“Shh!” Regulus hushed him, and Harry looked mildly guilty.

“Why?” Harry whispered.

“I need to get the basilisk fangs,” Regulus answered. “Please don’t ask me why.” He was a little afraid that Harry was going to try and argue, but he finally shrugged and nodded his head. It took only a few minutes before Ron was snoring, and Harry and Regulus quietly tiptoed down to the common room.

Harry had the invisibility cloak in one hand and the marauder’s map in the other. “I doubt anyone will be out in the corridors tonight, there are only a few of us still at school,” Regulus said. Not to mention that most of the professors were no doubt in a drunken slumber by now, Regulus thought, though didn’t say it out loud.

“True,” Harry conceded. “But just in case.” Regulus nodded and the two of them crouched under the cloak to walk slowly to Moaning Myrtle’s bathroom. Regulus thought it was going to be involved, but it only took about an hour to get down there and back. He’d brought dragon hide gloves and a dragon hide pouch to extract and store the teeth. The basilisk had decomposed quickly and was basically just a skeleton by that point, so the teeth were easy to pull out.

“Are you going to tell me what they’re for one day?” Harry asked as they walked back to the dorm. He didn’t even bother to whisper, the corridors were so empty.

Regulus chuckled. “Yeah, one day I will. But for now, you definitely don’t want to know.”

That night Ron and Luna headed off right after breakfast to the Astronomy Tower to read their tea leaves. They hadn’t gotten to do it the day before with all the Firebolt-related drama. Hermione left to go to the library, still feeling a little raw from all the shouting and hoping to get caught up on all her schoolwork that she had due in February. Regulus hadn’t planned to leave the grounds yet, but since it was just Harry and himself, he knew he had to take the opportunity.

Harry was extremely curious about why Regulus needed Harry to get his invisibility cloak and meet him at the passageway behind the statue of the one-eyed witch.

“Now, listen to me,” Regulus whispered fiercely as they walked quickly down the tunnel. “We are going to go to Hogsmeade, call the Knight Bus, and go to Diagon Alley.”

“What? Why?” Harry asked. “Is this about the broom?”

“No, Harry, forget about the broom for a second,” Regulus said. “I need you to focus.”

“Okay, but what exactly am I focusing on?” Harry asked, throwing his hands out in confusion.

“I think there is something in the Potter family vault that we can use to make a protective amulet for you to wear,” Regulus explained.

“What the — Regulus, what are you even talking about? What Potter vault? There are just Galleons in there,” Harry said in an exasperated voice.

“No, Harry, that’s just your personal vault,” Regulus said quickly. “Probably just the ones your parents set up for you to have spending money.”

“What? That’s spending money?” Harry mumbled. “What does that mean?”

“Oh Merlin, listen, okay?” Regulus said, his anxiety buzzing under his skin like a drug, making him feel like he was going to vibrate right out of his body. “All you need to do is ask them to enter the Potter vault when we get there. What I need you to focus on is staying safe. No matter what, keep the invisibility cloak on! Only take it off when I tell you to. And if we run into Sirius Black, then you run. Understand?”

“You think we’re going to run into Sirius Black?” Harry asked.

“I don’t know, do I?” Regulus shouted, then consciously lowered his voice. “Sorry. I’m just stressed. Listen, I doubt we will, but you never know, and I swear to Merlin, I will not let him hurt you.”

“I’m not just going to leave you,” Harry argued.

“Yes, you are. He’s not going to hurt me,” Regulus lied. He had no idea how Sirius would react to him. “Plus, I can take care of myself. If we make it out unscathed then we can go and get a new broom. Not a Firebolt,” he added when Harry opened his mouth to say something. Harry pouted slightly but nodded. “Great, now let’s go.”

They made it out of the Honeydukes cellar easily. It was so empty with all the students at home that Ambrosius Flume was asleep behind the counter. He startled awake at the sound of the bell ringing above the door, but they were long gone by then, running down the cobblestone pathway outside. Regulus stepped out from beneath the invisibility cloak and stuck his wand out.

“Where are you headed?” A man asked as Regulus and an invisible Harry boarded the bus.

“Diagon Alley. As close to Gringotts as you can get us,” Regulus instructed primly. The man nodded before looking at Regulus with an odd glint in his eye.

“You look familiar, what did you say your name was?” The man asked.

“It’s Ron Granger, sir,” Regulus responded. Harry snickered next to him, and Regulus barely kept himself from elbowing the empty space.

“Right, right,” the man mumbled. They made it to Gringotts without any trouble, and Regulus breathed a sigh of relief the moment they were in the lobby. Harry stayed so close to Regulus that Regulus could feel his hand bumping against him every couple of steps.

“I need to talk to someone about the Potter vault,” Regulus said to the first goblin he came across. “In private,” he added. The goblin looked at him with a curious look on his face.

“Right this way,” he said, leading them back to a windowless room with gold walls. Regulus took several deep breaths, only then aware that he had been holding his breath in anticipation.

“Can I take this off yet?” Harry asked.

“No,” Regulus asked, taking a seat heavily in one of the chairs. Harry stayed standing, and Regulus could hear him kicking his feet around.

“Hello sirs,” a goblin said as he entered. It was the same one Regulus had spoken to the last time he’d been in the bank. “What can I do for you?”

“Okay, take it off,” Regulus instructed. Harry shucked the invisibility cloak off his shoulders and gave an uncomfortable smile to the goblin. “We need to get into the Potter family vault.”

“I see,” the goblin said, steepling his fingers together as he took a seat across the desk from Regulus. “Do you have your key?” He directed the question at Harry, but he kept eye contact with Regulus.

“Er,” Harry answered before looking down at his sweatshirt like a key he’d never seen in his life might just appear in front of him.

“No worry,” the goblin said. “We can do a blood test. It will take no time at all.” Regulus knew that was a lie. It was nearly an hour by the time they were able to make it all the way down to the vaults, and by that point, he was crabby and irritated. Harry wasn’t much better off. He seemed to be feeding off of Regulus’s energy and was getting nervous.

“So, what are we looking for exactly?” Harry asked in a clipped voice.

“I don’t know exactly,” Regulus answered. “It should be a dark piece of metal or a crystal, something that is or could be turned into jewelry.”

“Look, I’m sorry for dragging you out here,” he said suddenly. “But I know your family should have this item.” He realized immediately after the words were out of his mouth that they sounded suspicious. There was no way he should know what the Potters had in their family vault. “Every wizarding family has one,” he lied. “I just want you to have something to protect you when a professor or I aren’t around ” he added.

Harry softened. “I know, Reg. It’s fine. Let’s just find it.” The search went much easier after that. It was still an exorbitantly long time to find what they were looking for, but they eventually did. Or Harry did, to be more exact. It was a flat black rock that had gold thread laced around it and braided into an extravagant necklace. It looked almost like it was glowing.

“Sure,” Harry replied, and Regulus wondered if he was thinking about the broom shop already.

“The Black vaults,” Regulus said to the goblin that had been helping them. “Has anyone accessed them recently?”

The goblin looked at him for a long moment before an unfortunate smile grew across his face. “Oh, yes, Mr. Black. Only once though. Paid order to a Mr. Randolph Spudmore.” Regulus felt the floor drop out below him. Spudmore was the producer of the Firebolt. Sirius had used the Black vaults to buy Harry a Firebolt. Was it cursed? Why did he do that?

“Thank you,” Regulus said lightly, his head felt like it was spinning. Even as he and Harry went out to buy a new broom, not a Firebolt thank you very much. They made it back to Hogwarts with only Ron, Hermione, and Luna wondering where they had been, he did not feel any more stable. Even with Harry safely asleep in the dorm next to him, he could not shake the feeling that Sirius was watching him.

Regulus didn't get a chance to test out the necklace until a few days after they got it. He took it into an unused classroom, the school was still thankfully empty because of the winter holidays, and decided to practice hitting it with a few spells. It was difficult to tell if they were being reflected or if the lack of a human body was causing the spells to dissipate before they could cause real damage, so he had to move on to his next plan of attack.

Harry was very unsettled with the prospect of hitting Regulus with dueling spells while Regulus wore the necklace, but Regulus wasn't going to risk hurting Harry. This plan ended up being futile and painful though as it turned out the necklace was useless to anyone without Potter blood. The intricate colors faded to a dull gray the moment that Harry took it off and reignited the moment he grabbed it again.

"It's fine, Reg, just do one that's not going to hurt," Harry said easily.

"I'm not sure that will be enough," Regulus said, gnawing on his bottom lip in concentration. "Rictusempra ." The harmless Tickling Charm went right through whatever possible shield the necklace could offer and hit Harry squarely in the chest. He giggled helplessly. "Finite ."

"Okay, well try something that will hurt a bit," Harry said. "I'm going to be fine. You don't need to worry so much." Regulus wasn't inclined to agree, but he needed to test the necklace. He shot a quick Stinging Hex out and watched in awe as it seemed to veer off course at the last second and miss Harry completely. "Cool," Harry said. They tried a few more tests, but it seemed that the necklace, at least for now, would be enough to protect him.

January arrived with a very awkward interaction between himself and Hermione.

"I need to ask you something," she whispered, pulling on his sleeve so that he would follow her into a small alcove.

"What?" Regulus asked. She looked worried as if she might get in trouble for saying what she was about to say.

"It's about Professor Lupin," Hermione said slowly. Regulus nodded for her to go on. "About why he missed class."

"Ah," Regulus said. He tried to keep his voice level, but something must have given him away.

Hermione gasped and pointed at him accusingly. "You already know, don't you?" Regulus cringed slightly but eventually nodded. "When did you figure it out?" She was looking very suspicious again, as she always did when Regulus slipped up.

"I figured it out after Snape was kind enough to mention it in class," Regulus said truthfully, his voice twinging on Snape's name. He still wasn't sure how to feel about Lupin and his lycanthropy, but he wasn't keen on siding with Snape either way.

"It's not his fault, you know," Hermione said, as if she were reading his thoughts. "Werewolves are terribly discriminated against, I looked it up." With that simple phrase, she was off. Jumping into a lecture that lasted a full half-hour about the terrible lives that werewolves lived.

January also meant Harry beginning his Patronus lessons with Lupin. Harry crashed into the dorm room one night saying, "Lupin knew our dads!"

"Sorry?" Ron mumbled. He was dozing on his bed and had shot up when Harry entered the room.

"Not you, Ron," Harry said quickly before turning to Regulus. "He knew my dad and Sirius. He said he was friends with my dad, with James!"

It wasn't something Regulus thought Lupin would bring up, but now that he had, something simmered up in Regulus that he hadn't realized was right below the surface since he first saw Lupin on the Hogwarts Express. He waited till he saw Lupin at dinner one night to sneak up to his office and wait for him.

"Oh! Mr. Black, what are you doing here? It's almost curfew," Lupin said, his voice laced with uneasiness as he stepped into the room. Regulus was leaning up against Lupin's desk waiting for him, trying to make his body look relaxed and confident, despite the anxiety that was bubbling inside of him.

"I heard that you knew James Potter," Regulus said vaguely. "You told Harry that you knew him."

"Oh, well," Lupin said, before stopping to clear his throat awkwardly. "Yes, I went to school with him."

"You were friends with him, you mean," Regulus corrected. "You told Harry that you were friends with him at Hogwarts."

Lupin gave him a long, unsteady look. "Yes, I was," Lupin said finally. Regulus nodded and looked away, taking a moment to fortify himself. He knew this was risky, that Lupin might figure out who Regulus was the moment Regulus started speaking, but he had to chance it. He had styled his overgrown hair, so it hung looser around his face, more reminiscent of his brother back in Hogwarts, than how Regulus used to wear it.

"Then why, Lupin," Regulus spat his name, looking back at the unkempt man, "does Harry not know who you are?"

"He knows who I am," Lupin defended, though his voice was soft.

“Don’t play games with me,” Regulus said, pushing off the table so that he was standing up straight. He wished that he was taller, though even when he was fully grown, Lupin still would have towered over him. Still, his small thirteen-year-old frame was definitely putting him at a disadvantage.

“What do you mean?” Lupin asked with a sigh, like this conversation was a waste of time for him. It made Regulus furious and he ground his teeth together before speaking.

“Harry doesn’t have a single adult in his life that cares about him,” Regulus said the words quietly, but even he could hear the madness dancing behind them. “He has spent his entire life thinking that everyone connected to his parents was dead and yet here you are, completely capable and alive. Where have you been?”

Lupin was looking at him like Regulus had grown a second head. “What are you talking about?”

“I’m talking about the fact that Harry has grown up neglected and disregarded. He didn’t even know he was a wizard until his eleventh birthday. He needed someone in his life that cared and, considering that you were James’s friend,” he said the word like it injured him, “that person should have been you.”

“I — I wasn’t in a place where I could take care of Harry. I’m a — The Ministry would not have allowed me to adopt him. Besides, he did not need someone like me in his life,” Lupin replied, speaking like their roles had reversed, and Regulus was now his teacher, admonishing him for his bad grades.

Regulus could tell what topic Lupin was dancing around, what words he was leaving out. Lupin was a werewolf and he probably spent the last decade jumping from job to job, living a poor man’s life. At least, if Hermione was to be believed, and in most cases she was. That was what he meant by Harry not needing ‘someone like him.’ Regulus felt unsympathetic.

“This might be news, Lupin.” Regulus couldn’t stop saying his name, his anger so intense that he wanted to run across the room and pummel the professor. “But not everything is about you!” He shouted the last words, and Lupin looked like he’d been struck.

“Who are you?” Lupin asked after a long moment of tense silence. Regulus threw his hands up in frustration. He didn’t care anymore if Lupin figured it out, he couldn’t stand to look at the selfish man even a moment longer. He stomped out of the room, brushing past Lupin in a rage. Lupin didn’t stop him, letting him go like he was glad to see Regulus leave.

In February, when Harry was on the way back from another meeting with Lupin, McGonagall returned the Firebolt, saying that they could find no charms or magic placed on it. Regulus wasn’t sure what to do. He knew that Sirius was the one to purchase it, but if none of the professors could find anything wrong with it, then he couldn’t find a reason that Sirius would have gone to the trouble.

How did Sirius even know that Harry had destroyed his last broom? He had to still be in the area, but where could he be hiding? He wondered if he should tell someone about his discovery at Gringotts, but to what end? He didn’t want the Ministry involving itself in the Black vaults, not that they would have the legal ability to do so. Harry was over the moon that the Firebolt had been returned and Regulus felt at his wit's end trying to deal with everything, on top of worrying about what would happen when Harry finally rode it. It felt like too much and he'd already felt like he was jerking Harry around so much recently, taking him to the Chamber of Secrets and to Gringotts without fully explaining what he was doing.

In the end, he decided to not tell anyone. Perhaps it was a mistake, but for now, he decided to wait and see. If Sirius was keeping tabs on them, then he didn't want to reveal too much. Everything else seemed to be easygoing, but it all went downhill when Ron came down from the dorm yelling about Scabbers' murder. The missing rat, coupled with the blood stain on Ron's sheets, was pretty damning. Regulus watched as Ron and Hermione's friendship crumbled under the weight of the dead pet.

Harry, Regulus, and Luna did their best to stay out of it, though Hermione wasn't too fond of Luna to begin with, so Hermione basically picked a side for her. Not to mention that Luna had begun spending more alone time with Ron, both of them leaving the group to go experiment with tea leaves and crystal balls in the Divination Tower. Harry and Regulus did their best to spend time with Hermione in the meantime, but she was so overwhelmed with schoolwork that she eventually started avoiding them too.

The game against Ravenclaw came up quickly. Regulus and Ron walked with Harry down to the pitch early in the morning and were just about to wave him off when Cedric came sauntering down the pathway from the castle.

"Hey, Harry!" Cedric yelled. Harry turned to look at him, a light dusting of pink spreading across his cheeks.

"See you later, mate," Ron said with a wave, turning to walk back to the castle. Regulus turned to walk with him, though not before shooting a glare at the sixth year. Cedric looked mildly confused, before turning his attention back on Harry.

"I just wanted to wish you good luck," Regulus heard Cedric say, as he and Ron walked away. Regulus did not like Cedric.

The game was quick and the Firebolt gave Harry no trouble, not that Regulus relaxed for even a single moment. He almost threw up when he saw what looked like several dementors hanging out near one of the stands, but in the end, it was just Draco and his friends playing a prank. Harry cast an impressive Patronus at them regardless and caught the snitch only a moment later.

"The dementors didn't affect me at all!" Harry yelled excitedly. Regulus was walking slowly down to the pitch with everyone else when he overheard Harry talking to Lupin.

"That's because they weren't dementors," Lupin said with a laugh, though the noise choked off when he made eye contact with Regulus. Regulus couldn't understand the look on Lupin's face, he seemed unsettled and suspicious, but also pained in a way that Regulus couldn't make sense of. "Come and see," he said, turning his attention back on Harry who was beaming up at him.

There was a raucous party in the Gryffindor common room that night. Regulus did his best to enjoy himself, but he couldn't shake the feeling that something was wrong. He tried to pull Hermione away from her books for the night, but she shook him off and practically sprinted back up to her dorm to work on schoolwork. It wasn't until late that night that something pulling at Regulus's magic woke him.

"What?" he whispered to no one in particular. It felt like someone was trying to enter their dorm. He cast a quick tempus, it was nearly two in the morning. Who would be trying to enter the room at this time that wasn't already keyed into the wards? He was climbing out of bed when the screaming started.

He jumped to his feet, or tried to at least, his ankles tangled in his bedsheets as he tried to stand, and he fell heavily to the ground.

"W'as goin' on?" Harry said sleepily. "Who's screaming?" He sounded much more coherent when he said the second question.

"Stay there," Regulus whispered furiously. He grasped his wand tightly, before swinging the door open. It was a second-year Gryffindor, Regulus wasn't sure of his name, and he was still standing outside the dorm door, screaming at the top of his lungs. "What's happening?" Regulus said loudly.

"Black! It was Sirius Black! He was trying to get into the dorm! He had a knife!" the child yelled. By this point, several older students had come running down the stairs. Harry swung the door of the dorm open. "He ran when he saw me! But he was here!" The child pointed down the stairs, indicating the direction where Sirius had run.

Regulus felt like his head had detached from his body. He was on the move before he could even think about it. He started down the stairs, tripping over his feet but still managing to catch himself before he fell. He rushed out the portrait door and out into the corridor. He didn't know where he was headed exactly, but he kept his eyes peeled. Where could Sirius have gone?

It wasn't until Regulus reached the front door that he was stopped.

"Where do you think you're going?" Lupin's voice cut right through Regulus's hysteria.

"Did you let him in?" Regulus practically growled when he turned to see the professor standing behind him. He brandished his wand out in front of him like he was holding a knife.

"What?" Lupin asked, alarmed.

"Sirius. Did you let him into the castle? I didn't think you would do it, but maybe I was wrong," Regulus said, the words slipping from his lips like fire.

"Of course, I did not let Sirius Black into the castle," Lupin hissed angrily.

"How do I know you're telling the truth?" Regulus said as he took a step toward Lupin. Lupin looked down at him like he was watching a rabid animal.

“I would never put the students in this castle at risk like that,” Lupin said, speaking quietly and calmly. Regulus gave him a long look, he couldn’t decide if he believed him or not. “Why would you think I would help him?” Lupin asked softly.

“I overheard Snape,” Regulus offered, mostly because it was an easy excuse.

“Ah,” Lupin said and, to Regulus’s surprise, rolled his eyes. His body language instantly relaxed like he was prepared for this specific argument, like he’d heard it a thousand times already. “I see. Well, Snape has an—”

“And I know you’re in love with him,” Regulus said just to interrupt him. Lupin was looking far too relaxed at that moment, and Regulus wanted so badly to unsettle him. His words got the job done, that was clear immediately from the way Lupin’s face shifted through a hundred different emotions seemingly all at once.

“How do you—”

“I saw the face you made when you realized who I was,” Regulus said. His teeth ached from the way he’d been clenching them together. His body was so tense that he knew his muscles would be sore the next day. “How could you still feel that way after what he’s done?”

“I don’t know what you’re talking about,” Lupin said, though Regulus could see from his eyes that he’d hit a nerve.

“Mr. Black!” A voice cut through the tense conversation Lupin and Regulus were having. “What is going on here?”

Regulus realized that it must look very alarming to an outside observer, the way he was holding Remus at wand point while he interrogated him. McGonagall was shuffling down the stairs toward them. She was wearing her sleep clothes and looked unusually ruffled. Regulus wondered who had gone to wake her up. Regulus and Lupin looked back at one another but neither of them answered McGonagall.

“Mr. Black, is there a reason I am unable to enter your dorm room?” McGonagall asked sternly when she finally arrived in front of him.

“Er, right, well,” Regulus said, stumbling ungracefully over his words.

“It is against the rules to ward any room in Hogwarts,” McGonagall said. “You should not have been able to do it at all in the dorm rooms.”

“I didn’t want Sirius Black to be able to get to Harry,” Regulus replied, trying to infuse his voice with confidence.

It turned out that even if you had good intentions, warding a dorm room was still something that warranted several weeks’ worth of detention. Although, it was probably made worse by the fact that Regulus refused to remove it, and it had to be taken down by Dumbledore himself. The castle was searched again that night, but Sirius was long gone by the time that happened. Regulus made Harry wear the necklace constantly after that, which Harry grumbled about.

Harry and Regulus stayed up trying to look at the map, but they couldn't spot him anywhere. Regulus did note that Lupin spent most of the night alone in his office, rather than helping the other teachers. Harry wondered if they should tell someone about the passageways into the castle, but Regulus figured that Dumbledore already knew. Besides, he wasn't sure how much faith he had in the professors, given that Sirius had broken in twice without detection.

Neville ended up getting banned from Hogsmeade for his mistake of writing down the passwords since that was how Sirius managed to enter the castle. Regulus felt that was a bit harsh. If anything, he thought that the professors should have been taking more responsibility for their lack of protection around the school so that Sirius couldn't just waltz in. The Howler Neville received from his grandmother a few days later made Regulus feel even more sympathetic. It was hardly Neville's fault.

Regulus having Saturday detention meant that he wasn't able to sneak into Hogsmeade with Harry. "I don't think it's a good idea for you to go on your own," Regulus told him. "I know we went before, but really if Sirius saw you and decided to attack, then he might hurt Ron and Hermione as well as you."

Harry looked serious and solemn as he agreed. Regulus should have known better than to trust him. He was still a teenager, after all. By the time he made it back to the dorm room, just before dinner, it looked like everyone had their crups kicked. "What happened?" Regulus asked, and then regretted it immediately.

It turned out they were all looking so sad because Hagrid lost his case defending Buckbeak, and now the Hippogriff was going to be executed. That wasn't all though. Harry had gone to Hogsmeade, choosing to disregard what Regulus had said, and had been spotted by Draco. All of this culminated in him getting the Marauder's map confiscated.

"I cannot believe that you went behind my back and snuck into Hogsmeade anyways," Regulus all but yelled. Harry looked horribly guilty, but Regulus was so furious that he barely cared. "Sirius could have killed you. We know that he's out there." He gestured in the general direction of the Forbidden Forest. "What if he was just waiting to get you out of the castle? What if you were killed? What if Ron and Hermione were killed?"

"I'm sorry," Harry said. "I know it was stupid."

"Yes, it was stupid. We could have gone to Hogsmeade any other time, plus you've been there before. It's not like this was necessary. Not to mention that Neville and Luna were stuck in the castle too, and you could have spent time with them." Regulus didn't really know what he was yelling about now, he just needed to yell.

Harry looked vaguely on the verge of tears.

"And now you've lost the map," Regulus said. "To Lupin of all people."

“What’s wrong with Lupin?” Harry asked curiously, but Regulus shot him a glare so venomous that he instantly stopped speaking.

It wasn’t until several days later that Harry confessed something else that he’d been keeping to himself. Apparently, one night when he couldn’t sleep, Harry noticed the name Peter Pettigrew walking around the castle. Peter Pettigrew, the supposed dead man who Sirius had killed. Like everything else, Regulus had no idea what to do with this information. He barely remembered Peter from his time in school. “Lupin said it was impossible,” Harry mumbled. “But I’m sure I saw him.”

Chapter End Notes

omg reggie, that was crazy. why did you say all that? lmfao

the rat tail.

In March, they celebrated Ron's birthday with a small party in their dorm room. Ron opened each of their gifts with a happy smile. Regulus was most surprised by Luna's gift, a hand-painted set of tarot cards that she made herself. "Wow, Luna, thank you!" Ron shouted. Regulus found their friendship very endearing, if a little confusing.

Regulus spent most of his time in detention during the month, but he finally finished halfway through March. This meant he had to hear about Hermione slapping Draco in the face secondhand, but he found himself laughing helplessly regardless. Hermione also stormed out of Divination one day when Trelawney made yet another comment about Hermione's lack of prowess in the subject.

"Some day Hermione's having, eh?" Ron muttered after Trelawney moved over to join Parvati and Lavender's table.

"Yeah," Harry said, glancing at the crystal ball, looking unsettled. "Do you think she really saw the Grim again?"

"Maybe," Ron said shrugging. "She's really playing it up though, isn't she?"

"You can say that again," Regulus said, equally annoyed with Trelawney's antics.

"What do you see?" Harry asked Ron. He looked genuinely interested for a moment before saying, "Can you see if we're going to win the Quidditch cup?"

Ron chuckled before looking seriously into the crystal ball as if he might be able to see the answer.

The strangest thing that happened in March was when Regulus, along with Ron and Harry, went to spend time with Luna, only to discover that every single copy of the Monster Book of Monsters was trailing after her like she was a mother hen.

"Er, Luna?" Ron said uncertainly. "What's going on?"

"Hm?" Luna responded distractedly.

"Why do you have all these books?" Harry asked. He and Ron exchanged bewildered looks.

"I don't have them," Luna corrected. "They are just following me."

"And why are they following you?" Regulus said with a laugh.

"I don't think they like being read very much," Luna said with an unhappy frown. "I told them they could stay as long as they behaved." The books circled around her whenever she stopped walking, a few of them snapping, though they looked almost playful, the others looked like well-behaved pets, waiting patiently for a treat.

“Where have you been keeping them?” Harry asked. He was laughing a bit, though Regulus didn’t miss how impressed he looked. Regulus was inclined to agree with the feeling given how Luna had apparently tamed the wild books.

“They usually sleep under my bed,” Luna said. Ron tried to walk up to one of the books, and it snapped unhappily at him. “Be nice, okay?” Luna said gently. The book turned toward her and calmed down.

“And your dormmates are okay with that?” Ron asked curiously.

“Oh, I don’t think they mind,” Luna said happily. “They have actually stopped playing the game where they hide my belongings.”

“They were doing what?” Harry asked incredulously. Luna nodded solemnly.

“Yes, it wasn’t very fun, so I’m glad that they have stopped doing it,” Luna replied.

“I’m sure having a pack of Monster books protecting your bed has helped,” Ron said with a laugh, though he exchanged a bewildered look with Harry immediately after. Luna just agreed.

The Quidditch game against Slytherin came up quickly after the Easter holiday break. Oliver Wood, the Gryffindor captain, was unbearable in the way he constantly badgered Harry over and over again, telling him that he wasn’t allowed to catch the snitch unless Gryffindor was leading by at least fifty points. Harry was constantly repeating, “I know, I know!” every time Oliver spoke.

Harry sat with them at breakfast the morning of the game, looking relaxed despite the dark circles under his eyes. He never ate much before games and only placed two pieces of toast on his plate along with a small pile of eggs, quickly shoveling it all into his mouth. He looked like he was barely chewing, just swallowing the food whole in one go.

“Are you nervous, Harry?” Luna said, as she took a seat next to them. Regulus found himself wondering where she kept the Monster books during the day, if they stayed in her dorm room, terrorizing her dormmates whenever they entered the room, or if they were free to roam the castle like a pack of wild dogs.

“Not really,” Harry said with a shrug, though Regulus could see tension pulling at his eyes. He wondered what was weighing on Harry’s mind. Luna looked equally unconvinced by Harry’s answer, but Harry was up and out of his seat before she could continue the conversation, walking briskly out of the Great Hall in the direction of the pitch.

The game was mostly quick and uneventful, to Regulus’s relief. Gryffindor did win the Cup, which Regulus was excited about, though mostly just because he got to see Harry celebrate, looking like a weight had been lifted from his shoulders.

Exams were approaching quickly, and Regulus spent most of his time in the library surrounded by his friends. He wasn’t really worried about any of them, though he spent a little extra time on Care of Magical Creatures given that he’d never taken the subject before and that Hagrid had barely spent any time on creatures after the fiasco with Buckbeak. He didn't think he would do well on the Divination final, given that he had almost no talent for the subject, but he at least made sure that he knew the basics well enough to pass.

Regulus could hardly believe that the year had gone by so quickly. He had made next to no progress on his search for more Horcruxes. If he was honest, he'd completely forgotten about it with everything that was happening that year. He knew he needed to figure it out, whether or not Sirius was caught, but it felt like such a distant problem when he was at Hogwarts.

He was in the library late one night, reading through one of the advanced books on Divination when Draco approached him. The others had already gone off to bed, burnt out from a long day of studying. Draco didn't wait for Regulus to greet him before he took a seat across from him.

"I figured it out," Draco said. Regulus set his book down slowly, taking in the blonde boy. He looked smug, not an unusual occurrence for Draco, but there was an assuredness about him that put Regulus on alert.

"Figured what out?" Regulus drawled, watching Draco carefully.

"You're not his son," Draco replied, his smug smirk stretching into a genuine smile for a moment like he was unreasonably proud of himself.

"So you said before," Regulus replied, making his voice sound as bored and unbothered as possible.

"Yeah," Draco said. "You're his brother." How— Regulus cut off his thoughts. His Occlumency walls went up without him even trying, though he knew there was no way Draco could access his thoughts. He highly doubted that the boy was a skilled Legilimens. He was sure if Draco had that skill he would know about it, given how annoying he would be no doubt poking around Harry's thoughts.

"What makes you say that?" Regulus asked carefully, doing his best not to give anything away.

"I don't know how you did it," Draco said, casually spreading his hands out in front of him while he leaned back in his chair. "But you've made yourself look younger, using glamours or something I'm guessing."

Regulus scoffed. "Glamours are easily removed," Regulus said. "Surely you already know that. Would you like me to teach you how to do it?"

"I know how to do it," Draco replied, looking momentarily ruffled at being challenged. He pulls out his wand and pointed it directly in Regulus's face. Regulus did his best not to flinch. "Auferotum."

Regulus felt the spell wash over him, but of course, there was nothing to remove. "See?" Regulus questioned easily.

“Well,” Draco said, his shoulders moved up and down like an angry shrug, and his face twisted uncomfortably. “Maybe that’s not how you’re doing it,” he finally said. “But that doesn’t change who you are.”

“What are you even talking about, Draco?” Regulus said. Draco practically growled in frustration before pulling something out of his robe and slamming it on the table in front of Regulus.

“I know this is you!” Draco nearly shouted. Madam Pince shushed them from across the library. He pointed his finger down fiercely at what Regulus now realized was a picture. Regulus peered at it curiously before realizing what it was. It was a picture of the Slytherin Quidditch team from the first year that Regulus was on the team. There he was, dead center next to Slughorn, the head of Slytherin house at the time.

Regulus tried to decide whether it was worth continuing to lie to Draco. He had clearly gone to great lengths to find the image, but how he managed to get it was a curiosity. He remembered them taking the picture, it was unusual for a head of house to stand with the team, but Slughorn always insisted. Regulus was pretty sure that he burned his copy of the picture almost immediately after they lost their first game against Gryffindor.

“Don’t lie, I know that it’s you. You look exactly like him, and there is no Regulus Black III on the family tree,” Draco whispered furiously. “How are you even here? My mother said that you died.”

“How did you get this picture?” Regulus asked after a long empty silence. He looked up to see Draco looking very triumphant.

“My mother had it,” Draco said. “I wasn’t sure at first, but I know now. You’re Regulus Black II, aren’t you?”

Regulus sighed defeatedly. “Yes.”

“I knew it!” Draco said.

“Silence!” Madam Pince yelled. Regulus was almost certain that they were the only two students still in the library.

“Why are you here? Are you working with Sirius Black?” Draco asked quickly.

“I’m not working with him,” Regulus said with an exaggerated eye roll. “I’ve already told you that. I’m trying to stop him from getting to Harry.”

“Did you know he was going to break out? Is that why you came to school with us in first year?” Draco asked. The smugness seemed to have faded into genuine curiosity and concern.

“Sirius isn’t the only person that wants to hurt Harry,” Regulus replied. “I intend to stop them.” Draco’s looked confused.

“Who else wants to hurt Harry?” Draco replied. “You don’t mean—” he looked around conspiratorially, “the Dark Lord, do you?”

“What do you know about the Dark Lord?” Regulus asked sharply. Draco leaned back instinctively. His eyes had grown brighter during their conversation, it was subtle, but Regulus still noticed the oddly inhuman look to them.

“Nothing really,” Draco answered. Regulus was surprised by the honesty, though Draco’s face quickly morphed back into a superior smirk. “I know you were one of his followers.”

Regulus couldn’t stop himself from cringing. “Did your father tell you that?” Regulus asked. Draco looked mildly offended for a second.

“You think I would talk to my father about this?” Draco asked incredulously. Regulus did not understand his reaction, but it hardly mattered as they were interrupted by Madam Pince, who quickly shoed them out of the library.

Regulus worried about what Draco would do with his newfound information and confronted him the next day.

“What do you want?” Draco asked as Regulus pulled him aside.

“You can’t tell anyone,” Regulus said. “At all. Not even your mother.”

“Or what?” Draco replied snidely.

“Or I’ll obliviate you,” Regulus said simply. “I can’t have anyone knowing about who I am.”

“Wait, no one else knows? Harry doesn’t know?” Draco asked.

“No, no one else knows,” Regulus replied. Draco didn’t need to know about Dumbledore or Luna’s involvement.

“I’m not going to tell anyone,” Draco said after a second. “How are you planning to catch Sirius?”

The exams were easy, at least for the most part. Regulus proceeded as he did in the previous years by tempering his magical ability so that he wouldn’t be top of the class. Although, by now he wondered if Hermione would still beat him regardless. He was slightly worried about his Muggle Studies exam, so many of the topics still seemed fantastical and bizarre to him (electricity still made absolutely no sense to him), but it went as well as it could have.

Lupin had continued to avoid Regulus, not even making eye contact with him in class. Even during Lupin's obstacle course style exam, Lupin all but avoided him. Regulus proceeded fine through the exam before he arrived at the old trunk that he had to climb into to battle a boggart.

Regulus had avoided thinking about his boggart. He never considered himself very brave and when he thought back to things that scared him, there were several things that came to mind. He worried about coming face-to-face with the Dark Lord or James or Harry's corpse or any number of things really. He had trouble even conceptualizing it. It wasn't until he was in the trunk and saw what the boggart turned into that he thought, oh, of course.

Inside the trunk was dark and hollow. It had been charmed so that it was almost impossibly wide and open, but it was filled with shadows. The boggart began to shift and change instantly before disappearing. Or at least, he thought it disappeared. But upon closer inspection, he realized what he was seeing was actually a pool of water that seemed to be growing, inching closer to him.

Regulus hadn't even realized that he was backing away before his back hit the wall behind him. He yelped, startled by the sudden contact. Why water? He thought, though he realized the answer only a moment later. His hands were shaking as he raised his wand. What was the spell? He knew it, he did, he just couldn't think straight. The water started to fill his shoes. He couldn't be drowned by a boggart, could he? It wasn't until he felt the cold dead hand circle around his ankle that he remembered.

"Riddikulus," he hissed. The flood before him shifted into a pile of glitter. It reminded him of Luna for some reason and a small chuckle slipped out of him. Not enough of a laugh to defeat the thing, but enough to give him time to scurry out of the trunk. He climbed out with shaky limbs, doing his best to appear unfazed and normal.

Lupin was looking at him with open shock on his face before he steeled himself. "Well done," he muttered. Regulus didn't even spare him a response, instead turning and marching himself right up to the castle. He felt like he was going to be sick. Cold sweat had drenched his clothes, and the wet cloth sticking to his skin made him feel jumpy. He needed to dry off, change and never think about this again.

He heard Harry yelling after him, but Regulus didn't turn. He lost track of where he was going, only coming to when he was back in the dorm and pulling the wet clothes off. He cast a drying spell on himself before following it up with a towel, rubbing his skin until it was red and raw. He still had his Divination final to get to and that was the only reason he was able to re-dress in dry clothes.

"She's seeing us all separately," Harry said when he arrived. All the students ahead of him must have already gone because they were the only two left. "Are you okay?"

"Fine," Regulus said. "Just felt a bit ill, I'm fine," he repeated. Harry looked unconvinced. They both looked up when Ron came down the ladder. "How'd it go?" Harry asked.

"Ah, rubbish," Ron said, but he had an odd look in his eyes. "Probably nothing," he muttered before walking away.

“Harry Potter!” Trelawney called. Regulus sat down heavily in his chair. He tried not to think about the boggart, but his mind kept drifting back to it. It was so obvious in retrospect. The moment of his death was something Regulus worked very, very hard not to relive. He had all but mastered it, but now it was clawing its way to the surface of his thoughts.

Regulus had, unintentionally, created a hard line in his head between his first and second life. James’s death should have haunted him, the grief so intense that he knew if he’d lived through it the first time, it would have gutted him alive. But James had never been alive during his second life, he was already gone, buried in the ground. It made it easy to forget everything Regulus lost.

Now though, with the memory of his last moments as he was clawed by inferi and drowned in the cold water of the cave, he could feel the grief of James’s death boiling up. He took several large breaths, trying to fill his lungs to stop the panic that was wrapping around his ribs like strong arms attempting to crush him.

He needed to get this under control. He couldn’t let Harry see him like this. As if his thoughts had summoned him, Harry came down the ladder quicker than Regulus would have thought possible. He was pale, his eyes opened wide as if he’d just been attacked.

“Harry, what?” Regulus said, standing up, forgetting his own panic immediately.

“Trelawney, her voice, it got all,” Harry babbled.

“Sit down, try to breathe, tell me what happened,” Regulus said, holding Harry by the shoulders as Harry took a seat.

“Regulus Black!” Trelawney’s voice called.

“Shoot,” Regulus mumbled. “Stay right here. I’ll get through it as quickly as possible.” Harry nodded, his knuckles were white where he was gripping the seat beneath him. Regulus did not want to leave him, but he hardly had a choice, unless he wanted to miss his exam completely.

The exam ended up being exclusively on crystal ball reading which Regulus found a little annoying. There wasn’t even a written portion. Trelawney gave him an unimpressed look as he sat down. “Tell me what you can see,” she said.

Regulus looked into the white fog of the crystal ball, but nothing was coming. He almost wanted to abandon it completely and go back to Harry before something moved. He had never, not once, seen something in Divination, but now he was sure, something was moving.

“It’s... It’s a-” Regulus said, trying to make out what he was seeing. The emotions he’d been avoiding for so long were still raw and open inside him. He wondered if they were causing him to hallucinate. “It looks like a rat tail.”

“Excellent,” Trelawney said. “Very good.” After that, Regulus saw nothing else. He was glad for it, not wanting to drag the exam out anymore. He rushed out of the room and came back to find Harry looking calm, picking at a loose string on his shirt.

“Harry,” Regulus said to get his attention. Harry looked up quickly and Regulus finally noticed the tension on his face. “Okay, tell me what happened?”

Harry looked up at the trap door that was still open. “Let’s talk on the way back to the common room,” Harry said quietly. Regulus nodded in agreement. “I think she might have just said a prophecy.”

“Who? Trelawney?” Regulus asked doubtfully.

Harry nodded his head vigorously. “I know it sounds crazy cause she’s always saying ridiculous stuff. But her voice changed, and she didn’t remember it after the fact.”

“Okay, okay,” Regulus said, trying to slow Harry down. “What did she say?”

“I can’t remember it all,” Harry replied, sounding frustrated. “But it was something about the Dark Lord’s servant breaking free of his chain and the Dark Lord rising again. Regulus, she said it’s going to happen tonight! She said he’d been chained for twelve years!”

Harry was full-on shouting and Regulus felt like he might pass out in the middle of the hall. “I think we should tell Dumbledore,” Regulus said and Harry agreed.

They never made it to Dumbledore’s office though. Ron and Hermione interrupted them on their way.

“Buckbeak lost his appeal,” Ron said miserably. “Hagrid just sent this.” The letter from Hagrid was simple, Buckbeak was about to be executed.

“We have to go,” Hermione said, looking very upset. Regulus looked at Harry and Harry nodded. They would go to Dumbledore after visiting Hagrid. Regulus was glad he’d thought to go back for Harry’s invisibility cloak after Harry stupidly left it in the passageway to Honeydukes. Really, anyone could have stolen it, Regulus thought.

They all crowded under the cloak which was just barely big enough to cover them all and waddled down awkwardly toward Hagrid’s hut just before dinner began. Hagrid was a mess, understandably. Regulus felt awful for him and Buckbeak, worse still because he had barely been there for Hagrid all year. It was so hectic with everything going on that it had slipped his mind.

“They’re comin’,” he said. They all did their best to get out of Hagrid’s undetected, but Scabbers was wiggling wildly in Ron’s hands distracting them. They were still in earshot when they heard the undeniable swish and thud of an axe.

“I can’t believe they did it,” Hermione whispered. She looked ill. Regulus gripped her elbow to steady her and started dragging them all up to the castle.

They were almost up the hill when Scabbers bit Ron and went running off. It was chaos after that. Ron ran after the rat, abandoning the group. Crookshanks appeared from Merlin knew where and went after them.

“Crookshanks! No, go away!” Hermione complained. They tried to follow Ron, but it was difficult to move under the invisibility cloak. Regulus pulled it off of them, balling it up to stuff into his robe pocket. They made it to Ron, finding him lying on the ground stuffing a wiggling Scabbers into his pocket.

“Ron, come on!” Hermione began to say, but was interrupted by the sound of heavy paws hitting the ground. Suddenly, a huge black dog came bounding out of the forest toward them. Regulus reached for his wand, but the dog hit him hard in the chest, pushing him to the ground. Regulus tried to get up as fast as he could, but the dog was already dragging Ron under the trunk of the Whomping Willow, Ron’s leg snapping grotesquely as it hooked on the roots.

“We need to go for help,” Hermione yelled. The branches of the tree were waving around violently by that point, and they were having trouble getting past them fast enough to follow Ron and the dog.

“That thing’s big enough to eat him, we haven’t got time,” Harry yelled back. Regulus cast the strongest immobulus that he could manage and though it didn’t fully freeze the violent tree, it was enough to slow the movements so they could follow.

The tunnel opened into a direct slope to the ground below causing them to all slide down ungracefully. Regulus could see the trail Ron’s body had left on the dirt floor down the pathway.

“Come on,” Regulus said. “And stay behind me.” As they walked forward, Crookshanks came up along beside them, walking like he did every day.

“Crookshanks?” Hermione questioned.

“He’s friends with that dog,” Harry muttered. “I’ve seen them together.” Regulus turned enough to look at him.

“That’s the dog you’ve been seeing?” Regulus asked. Harry nodded. “Maybe you both should go back and get a professor.” Regulus felt like beating his head against the wall. Why hadn’t he thought of that before they were in the tunnel?

“I’m not even sure how to get back out,” Hermione reasoned.

“Not sure,” Harry answered. “I’ve seen it on the map, but it just goes off the edge. I always assumed it ended up in Hogsmeade somewhere.”

They ended up crawling up a trapdoor into an old dusty room. The furniture was half destroyed and covered with a layer of dirt that made it seem like no one had been there in years.

“I think we’re in the Shrieking Shack,” Hermione whispered. It sounded very loud in the quiet room. They heard a creak overhead.

“Let’s go, but stay behind me,” Regulus repeated. Hermione and Harry both nodded, looking terribly worried. They made it up to a bedroom with a huge four-poster bed. It was just as dusty as the rest of the house. Ron was lying on the ground, clutching his leg that was sticking out at an odd angle.

Regulus ran across the room, Harry and Hermione just behind him.

“Where’s the dog?” Harry asked.

“Are you all right?” Hermione asked at the same time.

“Not a dog,” Ron moaned. “It’s a trap.” Ron pointed behind them, and Regulus turned around so quickly that it felt almost like he’d apparated. The door behind them closed loudly.

Standing there was a walking corpse. Regulus thought it was an inferi for a moment before his eyes fully focused. No, this man was alive, though he was unkempt with filthy and matted hair that hung well down his back. His eyes were sunken into his skull and his skin stretched so tightly across his face that it looked like it would tear if he moved too quickly.

“Sirius,” Regulus whispered.

“Expelliarmus!” Sirius croaked. He was holding Ron’s wand in his skeletal hand. Regulus felt his own wand ripped from his fingers, as were Harry’s and Hermione’s, and Sirius caught them easily.

“Fuck,” Regulus whispered.

“I thought you’d come and help your friend,” Sirius said, taking a small step toward them, his legs shook beneath him, and Regulus found himself wondering how Sirius was even standing. “Your father would have done the same for me. Brave of you, to not run for a teacher. I’m grateful, it’ll make things easier.”

His voice was scratchy from disuse, or maybe as if he’d been screaming continuously for several hours. His words were odd though. Regulus felt like he was missing something. Well, more than that, he felt like was going to vibrate out of his skin. He’d managed to get cornered without his wand by Sirius the moment he entered the room. Worse than that, he’d managed to do it with Ron, Hermione, and Harry in the room, directly in danger, once again because of Regulus’s incompetence.

He hadn’t realized it before that moment, but he had basically assumed that Sirius would be far less proficient with magic given his twelve years in Azkaban. This was, of course, a completely ridiculous and absurd assumption to make, not to mention an incredibly dangerous one given that Sirius had managed to disarm him within only a few seconds.

All of these thoughts seemed to hit him at once, and he struggled to parse through them fast enough to move on. Really though, it had only been a second since Sirius had spoken. He was speaking to Harry, that much was clear by the mention of James. Harry had been standing next to Regulus, but upon hearing Sirius’s words, he lunged forward as if to attack.

“No, Harry!” Hermione said with a gasp, pulling him back roughly. Her face was pale and scared. Regulus could see the way her fingers turned white when they gripped Harry’s shirt.

“If you want to kill Harry, you’ll have to kill us too!” Ron said fiercely, and to Regulus’s dismay, began trying to stand on his mangled leg. Regulus turned just enough to shove Ron to the ground.

“Lie down,” Sirius spoke at the same time as Regulus moved. “You’ll damage that leg even more.” It was such a strange thing for him to say considering it was his fault that Ron’s leg was broken in the first place.

“Didn’t you hear me?” Ron said, though his voice had grown weak and strained. His breathing was labored, and it seemed like he was fighting against the pain to stay awake.

“Ron, stop,” Regulus whispered. Ron looked at him with confounded eyes for a moment before they went hazy with pain. Hermione crouched next to him, holding his shoulders down, so that he wouldn’t try to stand again.

“No, there will only be one murder tonight,” Sirius said with an unsettling smile stretching across his face. Sirius raised Ron’s wand slowly. Regulus stepped in front of Harry. He would die before he let Sirius hurt him.

“Why’s that?” Harry spat. He tried to run forward again, stepping around Regulus’s frame, but Regulus held him back, gripping onto his clothes tight enough that Harry couldn’t pull away. He continued to yell at Sirius, almost taunting him about the murders Sirius had committed. It made Regulus’s stomach twist uncomfortable.

“Harry, please,” Regulus implored, holding him as tightly as he could. His fingers were starting to hurt from how intensely he was clenching them on Harry’s clothes.

“Harry! Be quiet!” Hermione said at the same time that Regulus spoke. Her voice was equal parts admonishing and pleading, almost as if she thought Harry taunting Sirius about his crimes was against some decorous rule.

“He killed my mum and dad!” Harry yelled sharply, his voice wavering a little on the word ‘mum.’ It made Regulus feel like his chest was concaving on itself. His fingers loosened without his permission, and it was that moment of weakness that allowed Harry to break free.

He charged at Sirius like a wild animal, so quickly that Sirius didn’t even have time to raise his wand. Or perhaps it was the shock that Harry would even think of running at him without a wand in hand. Regardless, he managed to hit Sirius hard in the face, his fist colliding with the side of Sirius’s cheek, so roughly that Regulus could hear the smack it made. Sirius fell backward, crashing into the wall behind him with a loud noise.

Hermione was screaming, standing up straight now. Ron was trying to push himself up, yelling as well. Sirius shot out a charm that looked like a Stunning Spell, an odd choice for a man insistent on murder, Regulus just barely had time to note, as the spell missed Harry’s face by a few inches. Regulus ran forward as well, watching Sirius grab Harry around the throat with his free hand, the other one fighting wildly in Harry’s grasp.

“No,” Sirius grunted. “I’ve waited too long—” Regulus kicked out as hard as he could, his foot crashing into Sirius’s ribs harshly. Sirius gasped in pain and let go of Harry. Ron had somehow crawled across the room and had managed to wrestle Sirius’s wand from his hand.

Sirius fought like a dying animal caught in a trap, throwing limbs out fiercely and desperately. His free hand collided with Regulus’s leg hard enough for Regulus to stumble in pain. Regulus had no idea how Sirius managed to be strong enough to damage him, given the emaciated state of his body. He managed to get a foot between himself and Harry and with a loud grunt he kicked Harry off. Harry lurched backward, falling heavily onto the floor.

Regulus grabbed for the wand Sirius had dropped, it had rolled away from Ron who was panting heavily, his face red with exertion and twisted into an awful mask of suffering. The moment Regulus's fingers circled around the wand though, Crookshanks came through the door and sunk both of his claws deep into Regulus's arm.

"Ah," Regulus gasped in pain, trying to shake the retched thing off of himself. The nails in his skin smarted like hell, and he ground his teeth together to keep from yelling out again.

"Crookshanks! No!" Hermione yelled, running forward to pull the cat off just as Regulus managed to dislodge it. Crookshanks slipped from Hermione's grasp and landed on the floor gracefully. Harry was back on his feet and aimed a kick at the cat who quickly scurried out of the way.

Sirius, now free from interference, scrambled up so that he was standing, just as Harry grabbed the wand Regulus had been reaching for. "Get out of the way!" Harry yelled. Hermione stepped to the side so that Harry could face off against Sirius. Ron, who was nearly helpless on the ground, rolled onto his side with a loud groan. Regulus stepped in front of Harry despite the wand he brandished in front of him.

"Harry, stop," Regulus said, though his eyes never left Sirius.

"Going to kill me, Harry?" Sirius whispered manically. His eyes were nearly black with adrenaline. There was that odd feeling again, Regulus thought. Something about the way Sirius looked, about the way he talked, felt so strange to him. He was sure he was missing something.

Sirius, for his part, did not look like a man afraid of death. Instead, he almost looked like he would have welcomed it. A huge bruise was forming about Sirius's eyes and his nose was bleeding, but he seemed unbothered, just continuing to look at Harry with his fathomless black eyes.

"You killed my parents," Harry said. His voice was wavering dangerously like he was hoping it wasn't true like he was wishing his parents were there in the room with him instead of long dead. Harry moved just enough so that he could point the wand over Regulus's shoulder.

Sirius stared at Harry with a haunted look. "I don't deny it," he whispered. "But if you knew the whole story—"

Sirius and Harry were arguing again, but Regulus could only listen. Sirius still had their wands, but he hadn't pulled them out. He stood like a man waiting for his execution, arms out and against the wall, face shallow and guilty.

"You've got to listen to me," Sirius said, his voice growing urgent and panicked as if he'd just realized what was happening. Harry was responding, but Regulus wasn't listening. He had finally realized what was so odd. Sirius wasn't looking at him. Even when Regulus had kicked Sirius in the ribs, Sirius hadn't acknowledged his presence. None of his words were directed at Regulus, and his eyes never once landed on him.

Crookshanks jumped onto Sirius's chest. "Get off," Sirius said softly, gently trying to push the animal. Harry raised his wand further, and Regulus was surprised to see that it was held steady, aimed directly at Sirius. The tense moment lingered, none of them moving or shifting, all waiting for the next shoe to drop. Regulus wondered if he should intervene, but despite Harry's threat of killing Sirius, Regulus was sure the thirteen-year-old did not know how to cast a Killing Curse. Not to mention that a child that age would probably be unable to do so.

There was a loud creak from the floor below followed by muffled footsteps pounding up the stairs. "We're up here!" Hermione screamed. Sirius began fighting against Crookshanks in earnest. Harry looked dismayed like he couldn't decide what to do, and in his moment of distraction, Regulus took the wand out of his hand.

"Get back," Regulus said, pushing Harry so that he would stumble backward. He moved forward and grabbed Ron from beneath his arms dragging him toward the bed. Ron yelped in pain and surprise but relaxed the moment his back hit the edge of the bed frame. Hermione had just joined on that side of the room when the door burst open.

Lupin came crashing into the room, his face pale and drawn in panic. He looked around at each of them, making eye contact carefully and looking alarmed when he took in Ron with his mutilated leg. He looked at Sirius next, still fighting against Crookshanks.

"Expelliarmus!" Lupin shouted. Though his wand was pointed at Sirius, the wand in Regulus's hand flew out of his grasp as well.

"Argh!" Regulus yelled in frustration. Lupin caught them all smoothly. His face was doing an odd dance between trepidation, relief, and something else that Regulus did not want to acknowledge.

When he opened his mouth to speak, his voice sounded bizarre. It rumbled out of his chest like a thunderstorm. "Where is he, Sirius?"

Sirius was watching Lupin with the same mix of emotions that Lupin held. Sirius's emotions looked horrifying on his thin, waxy skin. Regulus didn't understand how Lupin wasn't actively recoiling from the way Sirius looked. Regulus could barely make out the brother he'd once known under the pile of matted hair and dirty clothes. What could Lupin possibly be seeing there? Regulus did not want to think about it.

Slowly, in response to Lupin's question, Sirius raised a shaking hand and pointed straight at Ron. Regulus looked down in confusion before looking back to see Lupin watching them all with a dazed look on his face.

"But then," Lupin began babbling on. He was making no sense, something about a switch and them not telling Lupin about something. Regulus was having trouble following it, but Sirius was watching Lupin with rapt attention and when Lupin finally fell quiet, Sirius slowly nodded his head, a mild look of disbelief crossing his face.

“Professor,” Harry said loudly. “What’s going on?” Lupin didn’t answer him, instead, he slowly lowered his wand, his gaze never leaving Sirius. Lupin walked forward to where Sirius was half crouched against the wall and reached down to pull Sirius to his feet. Crookshanks fell to the floor as Lupin all but lifted Sirius, embracing him tightly in his arms. Sirius was quivering slightly, but Lupin looked completely steady.

“I knew it,” Regulus practically hissed. Regulus could feel every set of eyes in the room settle on him in shock, even Sirius, who looked completely bewildered. Sirius glanced between Lupin and Regulus rapidly as if surprised that Lupin had reacted to Regulus’s voice at all.

“Mr. — Regulus,” Lupin said, pulling away from Sirius enough to turn toward Regulus.

“I knew you were —” Regulus started to say, pointing at Lupin accusingly.

“Regulus, calm down —” Lupin begged, dropping his arms from where they had been circling Sirius, though he left one hand on Sirius’s arm like he couldn’t bear to let him go.

“The two of you! You’re working together!” Regulus yelled, taking another step forward. He heard Hermione gasp behind him. “I should have —”

“What?” Ron said confusedly.

“I don’t know,” Harry replied quietly.

“Please, just listen,” Lupin said loudly. His voice seemed to jolt Sirius from a strange stupor that he’d fallen into.

“Wha — what’s going on?” Sirius said, stumbling over his words. He was looking incredulously between Regulus and Lupin. His voice seemed to cut through the rising tension mounting in the room. “How —”

Sirius looked at Regulus, but Regulus noticed that every time his eyes fell on him, they would grow distant like his mind was forcing him not to focus on Regulus too hard, as if Regulus wasn’t supposed to be there. “Sirius,” Remus whispered.

“Who are you?” Sirius said quietly, his voice filled with dismay. Regulus could see that he was actively trying to get his eyes to center on Regulus now. He wasn’t letting them drift away like they had been doing since they entered the room. His eyebrows furrowed like he was in pain.

“That’s,” Remus started to say before breaking off with an odd-sounding cough. “That’s your son.” The way he said it was so bizarre that Regulus almost felt like laughing. He sounded like he was stuck between betrayal, heartbreak, hope and yearning.

“My —” Sirius choked. “My what?” He looked at Remus like he’d just pulled out a knife and stabbed himself.

Lupin’s face did something complicated that Regulus couldn’t decipher. It looked almost like he was demanding that Sirius answer for his crimes but at the same time, was begging him to plead innocent. “Your son. Regulus,” Lupin replied. Lupin and Sirius stared at each other for a long few moments. They looked like they were having a silent conversation, but given the way that Sirius’s face morphed into one of incredulity, he didn’t think that it was a very productive one.

Finally, Sirius opened his mouth and said with a scoff, “I would never name my son Regulus.”

Regulus had been surprised by how Harry had charged at Sirius earlier, without a wand and completely defenseless. But now. Now, he understood. The way Sirius said his name like it was a curse, like it was something so far beneath him that he couldn’t believe he was even being made to say it, made Regulus lose it.

One moment he was across the room, standing guard before three teenagers, and the next moment he was knocking Sirius to the floor so roughly that he was surprised Sirius’s head didn’t crack open on the hardwood. He hadn’t hit his brother since he was thirteen when they got into a brawl in the middle of the hallway and had to be pulled apart by Slughorn. He had almost forgotten what it felt like.

His fists cracked against Sirius’s face so intensely that he felt vaguely worried that he might break his hands. Sirius, already bleeding from the earlier assault, could do little else but try to push Regulus off from where he had throttled him. Regulus didn’t know if it was Sirius’s already bloody nose or the skin of his knuckles splitting open, but regardless, his hands were quickly getting covered in blood, making it difficult to land the continuous punches he was throwing.

“You’re such a fucking bastard,” Regulus spat, pulling his arm back just to hit Sirius in the face again and again. Lupin must have been properly shocked by the display because it took him far too long to jump into action. He eventually managed it though and grabbed Regulus around the chest and wrenched him off of Sirius, pulling him back two steps.

Sirius looked up at him dazedly from his place on the floor, his skeletal face bloody and nearly unrecognizable. His eyes though, his eyes looked alive and alert for the first time since they entered the room. He didn’t move to stand up, instead, he brought his hands up to gingerly touch his own face.

“Reggie?” he whispered. He was staring at Regulus with open awe and confusion. He looked like he was trying desperately to take in every single detail of Regulus who, for his part, was fighting hopelessly against Lupin’s strong grasp, aiming to get back to the task of beating his stupid traitor brother to a bloody pulp. “I don’t understand,” Sirius said.

“Regulus?” Lupin said and Regulus could feel Lupin’s voice rumbling in his chest, vibrating against his back. It sounded different than how he’d said his name before. “Your Regulus?” He directed the question at Sirius, the only indicator of what he actually meant by the question. Sirius looked uncertain for a moment before nodding faintly.

“Let me go,” Regulus said angrily, though he was quickly losing steam. He felt wired and angry and exhausted all at once.

“Just listen,” Lupin said. “Please listen.” Regulus writhed weakly, cursing Lupin and his stupid werewolf strength. Not to mention the fact that Regulus was in a weak thirteen-year-old body.

“You killed James,” Regulus spat. “You killed him!” A look of horrible guilt crossed Sirius’s face.

“I did,” Sirius whispered back, his voice raspy and haunted. Regulus pulled roughly away from Lupin, but Lupin held him steady, not allowing him to move. He had to get to Sirius, the rage and grief welling up inside of him. It was becoming unmanageable. He felt a sob wrench itself from his throat.

“No, Sirius, no,” Lupin begged. “Just listen,” he repeated. “We can explain everything.”

“Then explain it! Explain why you killed them. Tell me why,” Regulus said, he wanted his voice to sound firm and commanding, but instead it sounded like he was whining, like a child who just had their favorite toy taken away. Sirius was still looking at him with that hollow gaze as if he still couldn’t quite believe what he was seeing.

Lupin seemed to have had enough of Regulus fighting against him and spun them around, moving so that he could stand between Regulus and Sirius, breaking their eye contact. Lupin crouched down just enough so he was eye to eye with Regulus. “You don’t know the full story,” he said. His voice was pleading and firm at the same time.

“Then tell me it!” Regulus yelled. He tried to shove Lupin’s arms off of him, but Lupin barely budged.

“You have to calm down,” Lupin said. “I will tell you everything. I’ll tell all of you everything.” He directed the last sentence at Harry, Hermione, and Ron. Regulus had completely forgotten that they were in the room still. He wondered why they hadn’t bothered to intervene, but when he looked back he found a Protego shield blocking their way. Ron was still on the ground, Hermione next to him, but Harry had his hands against the shield looking very annoyed.

“Why did you do that?” Regulus asked. Lupin made a noise that almost sounded like a laugh.

“I didn’t,” he answered. Regulus was silent for a long moment while Lupin’s words settled in.

“Oh,” Regulus said, an embarrassed flush warming his face. He didn’t have a wand, so he had no idea how he’d managed to put up a shield so strong that Harry couldn’t even walk through it. He concentrated on his magic and the shield finally fell.

Harry stomped forward immediately and shoved Lupin, causing him to finally drop his grasp on Regulus. Lupin stumbled back slightly, and Harry grabbed Regulus’s arm, dragging him back to their side of the room. “Tell us what happened,” Harry said. “Now.”

Lupin looked unsurprised by Harry's actions, but Sirius, who was still lying completely still on the ground, looked absolutely incredulous. Like he couldn't believe Harry would do something like that, that he would choose Regulus over Lupin. As if they didn't enter the room together, Regulus thought, mentally shaking his head.

Lupin seemed momentarily at a loss for what to do, but suddenly Ron jerked and held onto his pocket again where Scabbers was trying to wiggle free. Sirius's eyes snapped to Ron's pocket and he was on his feet so quickly that Regulus couldn't even track how he'd done it. He lunged at Ron, and Lupin held him back. Crookshanks was hissing loudly, also watching Ron's pocket.

"Sirius, NO!" Lupin yelled. "Wait, we've got to explain." Lupin had his arms wrapped around Sirius's small waist.

"We can explain afterward!" Sirius snarled. He and Lupin wrestled awkwardly, but Lupin easily overpowered Sirius. Regulus watched the interaction closely and something finally clicked.

"This has something to do with Ron's rat?" he asked softly. Both Lupin and Sirius stopped fighting and looked at him with shock. "I highly doubt you're here to kill Ron," Regulus explained.

"What?" Ron shouted. "What's my rat got to do with anything?" He was looking between them all with wide eyes. Hermione looked just as confused, but Harry only looked irritated like he wanted everyone to get on with it already.

"That's not a rat," Sirius said after a long silence.

"He's an Animagus," Regulus said, speaking before he even fully realized what was happening. "Isn't he?" It made sense, given the fact that Sirius was also apparently a secret Animagus.

"Yes," Lupin answered immediately. "That right there," he said, pointing to Ron's pocket, "is Peter Pettigrew."

Chaos erupted again with that statement. Hermione faintly said, "That's ridiculous." While Harry yelled, "Peter Pettigrew is dead! You killed him twelve years ago," while pointing at Sirius's rage-filled face. He was trying to get at Scabbers again, fighting desperately against Lupin who just looked overwhelmed.

"Enough!" Regulus yelled. The room fell into an eerie silence. Regulus waited for a beat before speaking, softly, but through his clenched teeth. "Prove to me that it's Peter and tell me what's going on."

"Just get on with it, Remus," Sirius snapped, finally going lax in Lupin's grasp. "I've waited twelve years for this, I'm not waiting much longer."

"Right, of course. Well, what you need to know about me is that I'm — "

“A werewolf,” Hermione cut him off. “We know.” Harry and Ron gasped.

“I didn’t know that,” Ron said loudly before looking at Remus with thinly veiled disgust.

“Me either,” Harry agreed, though he mostly just looked shocked and confused.

“That’s because you guys never do the homework,” Hermione said with a light air of superiority. Regulus rolled his eyes.

“How —” Lupin started to say, he looked vaguely horrified and ashamed.

“Snape’s class on werewolves,” Regulus said. He felt almost apologetic, he probably would be if he was talking to anyone other than Lupin.

“Snape?” Sirius interrupted harshly, finally looking away from Ron’s pocket and glancing up at Regulus. “What’s Snape got to do with this?”

“He’s here, Sirius,” Lupin replied with a heavy sigh. “He’s teaching at Hogwarts.” A look of disgust and anger crossed Sirius’s face.

“Can you please get to the point?” Regulus yelled.

“Right, of course,” Lupin finally said, taking a long deep breath. “I was bit when I was a young boy...”

“Oh for the love of Merlin,” Regulus mumbled, but Lupin continued to talk and Regulus settled in for what he was sure would be a long explanation. He didn’t want to listen; he wanted to go back to hitting his brother repeatedly in the face, but Harry, Ron, and Hermione were watching intensely. Regulus leaned against one of the posters of the four-poster bed and waited.

The story that unfolded was completely ridiculous. Apparently, Lupin had been a werewolf throughout his entire Hogwarts career, having been bit long before he started first year. Regulus wasn’t sure how to feel about the fact that he’d gone to school with a werewolf. And Sirius, along with Peter Pettigrew and James had decided to become illegal Animagi so that they could help Lupin during the full moons.

“My dad too?” Harry had asked, but Regulus remained silent. James had been an Animagus during their entire relationship and had never bothered to mention it. Regulus felt hurt, despite the fact that it had happened years ago. Still, he wondered what else James kept from him. Regulus supposed that he couldn’t really blame James for not trusting him, given how Regulus’s turned out, but still, it felt like someone was silently gutting him.

Regulus also learned that James helped create the Marauder’s map that Harry had been using that year. How Fred and George had managed to get their hands on it was a mystery to him. It made sense though that it was James, along with the others, who made it. He had thought that the names on the map sounded familiar and now that it was confirmed, he thought he remembered hearing Sirius call James ‘Prongs’ more than once.

The story about Sirius playing a prank on Snape that nearly got Snape killed explained so many things, but most notably, the weird falling out that Regulus had witnessed the year before James and he started dating. He remembered watching Sirius grow pale and skinny, no longer attending meals or spending time with his friends. Regulus had been growing worried about him, the thought of Sirius starving himself was keeping him up at night, but one day he finally came back to the Great Hall, Lily Evans at his side.

That was the main reason that made Regulus understand why James chose Lily over him. Lily did something that Regulus spent weeks pondering and worrying over uselessly. She simply reached out and helped Sirius as if it was the most natural thing in the world, despite the fact that Lily had openly hated Sirius and James for her first several years at Hogwarts. By the end of that year, Sirius and his friends were all chummy again, and it seemed like it all worked out. It was strange to hear Lupin mention that time so off-handedly like it didn't even bother him anymore.

"So that's why Snape doesn't like you," Harry said. "He thought you were in on the joke?"

"That's right," Snape's voice cut through the room. He suddenly appeared in the doorway, removing a strong Disillusionment Charm he'd been wearing. Hermione screamed in shock and Lupin looked at Snape in horror. "You're wondering how I knew you were here?" Snape started to say, but Regulus cut him off.

"Snape!" Snape looked at him in surprise. "Shut up!" Regulus turned back to others. "Finish the stupid story! Did you kill James or didn't you?"

"Why you —" Snape began to say, his lip curling angrily.

"He didn't," Lupin interrupted.

"But you were their secret keeper," Regulus practically snarled, jumping ahead in the story. It had taken Lupin far too long to get to the point. He glared at Sirius with such overt hate and hurt that Sirius actually flinched.

"No, I — I convinced them to choose someone else. I thought I would be too obvious of a choice," Sirius said quietly.

"Enough of this," Snape said loudly.

"Shut up!" Regulus yelled again, though he wasn't the only one. Both Harry and Sirius spoke at the same exact time as Regulus. Snape sneered at them and raised his wand, pointing it at Sirius. Lupin stood between them.

"Please, can you just listen?" Lupin begged.

"No," Snape spat, opening his mouth to continue his sentence.

"Who was the secret keeper then?" Regulus said, addressing Sirius. "If it wasn't you."

"Peter Pettigrew," Lupin answered, though he didn't take his eyes off of Snape.

“Prove it then,” Regulus said. Sirius looked down at the wiggling rat again. Regulus looked down at Ron who was watching him like Regulus had lost his mind. “Ron, let me see Scabbers.”

“No! You’re crazy. I’m not going to let you hurt Scabbers!” Ron yelled. He looked like he was trying to stand on his damaged leg again, but Hermione moved to hold him still.

“Ron, please, you’ll hurt yourself,” Hermione pleaded.

“Scabbers won’t be hurt if he’s actually a rat,” Regulus explained. “You know the spell to change an Animagus into a person?” He asked Sirius who nodded. “Please, Ron.”

Ron watched him warily for a moment, before finally taking the rat out of his pocket. Sirius made a scuffling noise like he was fighting the desire to launch at the rat the moment he saw him. Regulus was glad he managed to hold himself back. Lupin and Snape were now both watching, though Snape was still holding his wand up, pointing it at Lupin and Sirius.

Scabbers was fighting against Ron’s firm grasp as hard as he could. Ron looked like he was struggling to hold the rat still. “Now,” Regulus said to Sirius. He forgot that Sirius didn’t have a wand, Lupin still holding all of them, but Lupin listened regardless and raised a steady wand. Snape just watched, to Regulus’s surprise, as if he couldn’t believe what was happening in front of him.

Lupin shot one last look at Sirius who simply nodded before he whispered a spell that Regulus couldn’t hear. One moment, there was a wiggling rat held tightly in Ron’s hands, and the next, a short man with thin, blonde hair and a large bald patch was standing in his place.

“Hello, Peter,” Sirius growled.

Chapter Notes

When Regulus would look back on that night, he would wrestle with his own choices, going over again and again how he could have done something different. How he could have prevented Peter's escape. How he could have freed his brother that night. In the end, things happened the way they did. Peter escaped, and Sirius stayed a wanted man. Because Regulus failed to prevent that rat's escape, terrible, awful things came to pass.

Sometimes he would take solace in the fact that Trelawney gave her second of only two official prophecies about that night, that it was fated in a way that Regulus could have never changed even with the unstoppable and indecipherable magic that had brought him back to life. Most of the time though, this solace barely lasted. It was much more comfortable for Regulus to blame himself. He'd had years of practice doing so, and he fell back into it like it was muscle memory like he was exactly where he was meant to be, crucified among the guilty.

After Peter was changed from his Animagus rat form into his dilapidated human form, he immediately jumped into a cowardly dance of begging and arguing. Regulus barely remembered what all was said, what Peter argued, what Sirius or Lupin responded. It didn't matter, not really. He vaguely remembered Peter trying repeatedly to convince the room of Sirius's guilt. ("He's come to try and kill me again!" he pleaded with Lupin). It was to no avail though, Lupin could not be swayed against Sirius. Not again.

Despite Peter's arguments that Sirius was under the Dark Lord's thumb, that the Dark Lord was the reason Sirius managed to break out of prison, ("Voldemort taught me tricks?" Sirius had yelled back. Regulus was enterally grateful that he didn't flinch when Peter and Snape did), Lupin still looked at Sirius with awe and dreadful contentment as if a piece of himself had been missing for years, and he'd just managed to find it and wedge it back in place.

Peter even tried to argue that he was harmless. He had, in fact, lived in the same dorm as all of them for three years at that point and had never once made a move against them, even though it would have been easy. They were so vulnerable in that room. ("You see, Remus? I have never hurt a hair on Harry's head!" Peter said, his voice was so whiny that Regulus wanted to rip out his vocal cords so that he never had to hear him speak ever again).

Lupin was unswayed, as was Regulus, though he never said as much. Peter was nothing but a coward, he could never make a plan on his own, it made sense that he would never hurt Harry when someone wasn't directly instructing him to do so. He could feel that that was true the moment he heard Peter speak, and his opinion never changed. If anything, in the years that came after that night, his opinion was only reaffirmed.

Hermione asked tentatively how Sirius managed to get out of Azkaban, which Peter used as an opportunity to once again accuse Sirius of using dark magic. Regulus chuckled at that, and Hermione gave him a very odd, unsettled look. He didn't bother explaining that Sirius, the ultimate Gryffindor, the one who ran from their family's dark magic, would be the last possible person to use such a thing, even to escape the torture prison that was Azkaban. Regulus wished he had realized that earlier, he wished he'd understood that Sirius was innocent before that night.

Sirius explained that he managed to slip past the dementors because of his Animagus form. Snape watched him with a sneer, but Sirius spoke as if he'd forgotten Snape was in the room at all. Lupin looked at him with that same smitten smile as if escaping Azkaban to try and commit the murder one was originally imprisoned for was the most romantic and gallant thing a person could do. Sirius told the story directly to Harry as if only Harry's opinion mattered. Regulus didn't disagree exactly, but he found it peculiar nonetheless.

"He's at Hogwarts," Harry repeated. "That's what Mr. Weasley told me you said." Sirius looked shocked at that but nodded, explaining that he noticed Peter in the Prophet, published with a story about the Weasley family's trip to Egypt. Ron looked guilty and like he might be sick.

Sirius kept imploring Harry to believe him. "I would never betray James and Lily. I would have died before I betrayed them," Sirius said. Regulus did not miss the odd look Lupin gave him when Sirius said James's name, but he staunchly ignored it. He didn't care what Lupin thought. Harry seemed to finally be convinced, and Regulus could see the way his features softened, before hardening back into the look of determination that Regulus had seen so many times before.

After that Peter went on a tour of begging and pleading. "Sirius, it's me. It's Peter, your friend," he implored. Sirius only sneered at him, looking disturbingly like their father, though a deathly skinny and very dirty version of him. Regulus wasn't even sure why Peter bothered to beg Sirius. The man escaped prison just to kill him, one would think the forgiveness train had long since left the station.

"You don't believe this. Wouldn't Sirius have told you they'd changed the plan?" Peter said when he turned to Lupin. Oh, that was so devious, Regulus thought. If he didn't want the man dead so much, he might have been impressed. Trying to drive a wedge between Sirius and Lupin, he must have been very familiar with their unending love for each other. Regulus wondered if that was what Peter had done the first time. If he turned them against each other so that Sirius would be the one presumed guilty.

It didn't work, of course. Sirius and Lupin looked at each other with such forgiveness and grace. Lupin already looked so soft despite everything. Sirius, the horrifying skeletal figure that he made, looked like a man finally offered a drink of water after years of drought. They forgave each other, despite everything, despite the fact that they had apparently both believed that the other was a spy and that it had been more than a decade since they had seen each other. Forgiveness stretched farther than everything and wrapped around them like a soft blanket. Peter never stood a chance.

Peter turned to Snape next, begging him to understand. "You never trusted them. You remember what Sirius was like in school," Peter said. Snape shook Peter off from where Peter had grabbed onto the end of his cloak. He just looked mildly disgusted although there wasn't much difference between the look Snape gave to Lupin and Sirius and the one he gave to Peter.

Peter tried to beg each of the children as well. He crawled to Ron first, reminding him of what a good and loyal pet he had been. This was without a doubt the wrong plan given the way Ron's face twisted into a horrified mask. "I let you sleep in my bed!" Ron yelled, trying to inch away from the awful man. His nails were so long after years spent as a rat and when they reached out toward Ron's face, Ron looked like he might vomit the second he was touched.

Hermione was equally horrified. "Sweet girl, clever girl," Peter whimpered and cried. Hermione took a step backward, her back hitting one of the posts of the bed though she hardly seemed to notice. It was clear that she did not appreciate the way Peter looked at her. Regulus didn't appreciate it either. He shouldn't be talking to any of them, to begin with.

"Please, Regulus," Peter said and Regulus jolted. Regulus had felt so disconnected throughout the entire performance that Peter was putting on that he'd almost forgotten that he was a real person in the room. "You know I would never hurt Harry. You've been protecting him, I've seen it. You have to know..."

Regulus had to keep himself from spitting on the man. That would be terribly unbecoming of someone like him, but he still felt the strong urge. The fact that Peter had been watching Regulus try, and ultimately fail, to keep Harry safe from harm made his skin crawl. He felt so revolted when he remembered all the conversations Peter must have overheard between Harry and Regulus. Regulus wished he had his wand so he could put an end to all of this, so he could just kill the man himself and get it over with.

Peter went to Harry last. It was a mistake, without a doubt. "You look just like your father," Peter said and that was the moment Regulus reached the end of his rope. He pulled his foot up and kicked Peter directly in the face with the bottom of his shoe. Harry jumped back slightly at the sound of Peter's nose crunching beneath Regulus's foot.

"How dare you?" Regulus practically hissed. He heard Sirius say nearly the same thing, but he wasn't paying attention. Sirius began to shout and Lupin pulled Peter away from them so that he was on his knees before Lupin and Sirius, both of them pointing a wand at the man. The carnage that remained of Peter's nose was almost hard to look at. Regulus wished he could make it worse.

Ultimately, Sirius and Lupin agreed to kill him together. It was almost comical the way they gazed into each other's eyes with love and adoration as they raised their wands to commit murder. Regulus felt a ridiculous jealousy while looking at them. He didn't think anyone had ever looked at him like that, and it was difficult knowing no one ever would. A moment before the Killing Curse could leave their wands, Harry intervened.

"You can't kill him. You can't!" Harry said, stepping forward. Nearly everyone in the room looked at him in surprise. Even Snape seemed shocked that Harry had stopped them. Really, it was bizarre that Snape hadn't done anything the entire time beyond watching the proceedings with mild curiosity and repulsion.

Still, Regulus couldn't believe Harry was stopping them. Or at least, he couldn't believe it at first, but in retrospect, it made perfect sense. Harry was very pragmatic, and if Peter was dead then that meant the truth died with him. More than that, Harry was kind in a way that few people were. Sirius and Lupin must have seen this too as they let Harry make the decision, giving him the same deference that they would have given James.

With the decision to take Peter to the dementors settled, Lupin moved forward and cast a few quick spells to tie up the man. Sirius reluctantly gave them all their wands back, though when he handed Regulus his he didn't look up, clearly avoiding his eyes. Regulus wondered what was going through his head, but now wasn't the time to ask. Snape came forward and Ron flinched so badly that his head smacked against the bed frame with a loud crack.

"Relax, boy," Snape said with a sneer before crouching next to Ron. "Ferula," he said, and suddenly Ron's mangled leg was wrapped in a tightly wound bandage. Ron breathed a sigh of relief, no doubt from the pain finally subsiding enough for him to relax a bit. Snape stood back up to look around the room, he looked as if he was trying to figure something out.

"Two of you should be chained to this," Sirius said, giving Peter a less-than-gentle kick. Sirius had his arms crossed tightly over his chest. He looked deeply uncomfortable and nervous for the first time since Regulus had laid eyes on him, though every time his eyes swept over Peter's tied-up frame a look of intense hatred marred his face.

"I'll do it," Regulus replied. Sirius's head snapped up to look at him. Every time he and Sirius made eye contact, it was like Sirius was seeing him for the first time. Regulus could track the appearance of surprise and realization on Sirius's face.

"Me as well," Lupin agreed. Regulus walked to Peter who was looking around with false resignation on his face. It seemed like he was trying to hide the intense fear and nervousness that he was experiencing, though he wasn't doing it very well.

They made an odd group heading down the tunnel back to the Whomping Willow. Crookshanks, whom Regulus had completely forgotten about, was leading the way. Regulus and Lupin followed close behind, Peter tied between them. Harry and Hermione had each lifted Ron, putting one of his arms over each of their shoulders so that they could practically carry him back to the castle. Sirius walked next to Harry. Snape brought up the rear, lagging behind them several steps. He hadn't said anything in a long while. It was making Regulus nervous.

Regulus kept watching Lupin out of the corner of his eye. Peter was completely silent between them, which Regulus was definitely happy about. He didn't want to hear that stupid rat talk. He thought that if he heard one more word out of him, especially if it was about James, he was going to disregard Harry's mercy plea and strangle Peter with his bare hands. Lupin, on the other side of Peter, looked like he wanted to say something, though he was just as silent as Peter. Regulus could see him looking at Regulus out of the corner of his eye every couple of steps though he never spoke.

Behind them, Regulus could hear Sirius and Harry talking quietly. Ron and Hermione said nothing but Regulus was sure that they were listening. Snape was like a vampire in the way he haunted behind them, sulking in the darkness. It was a bizarre line of people, without a doubt. It was awkward trying to get out of the entrance to the tunnel, but Crookshanks jumped out ahead of them and managed to freeze the Whomping Willow. Lupin and Regulus had to turn sideways to pull Peter out of the tunnel, as did Hermione and Harry to pull Ron. When Snape came out they moved away just enough to make sure they were out of reach of the tree's dangerous and violent branches should they start swinging again.

"Let's head up the castle," Regulus said after they paused just long enough for Harry and Hermione to resettle Ron in their arms. They never made it up though. They were out of the tunnel for only a few minutes before the moon's light started to shine through the clouds. It must have just risen, Regulus thought, the way it was just barely over the horizon.

"Oh, no!" Hermione gasped. "He didn't take his potion tonight!" Oh, Regulus thought. He had forgotten. He hadn't been keeping track of the full moons, but it was clear from the light shining on them that tonight it was full. Lupin dropped his wand, and Regulus just barely had enough time to look at Snape. He looked vindicated and triumphant. It was clear he was completely aware of what tonight was and had let them all walk out together regardless. Regulus was going to kill him. How dare he knowingly put Harry in a werewolf's path?

Speaking of werewolves, he thought, turning to see Lupin who violently trembling. Sirius looked absolutely horrified. "Run," he whispered. "Run, now!" Sirius turned toward Lupin and transformed into a dog in midair, already trying to push Lupin away from their group.

In the confusion, Peter managed to shimmy the few inches he needed to grab Lupin's wand. Regulus raised his own wand to stun Peter but it was too late, Peter spun around and hit Regulus with a spell that knocked him to the ground. Regulus's chest felt like it was caving in for a second, the air whooshing from his lungs when his back hit the dirt. He wondered if the spell was meant to fully knock him out but hadn't quite done the job because his limbs felt like they were heavy, and it was difficult to move, yet he was still fully awake.

"Expelliarmus !" Regulus heard Harry shout and Lupin's wand went flying out of Peter's hand. It was too late though. Regulus watched in horror as Peter began to shrink, transforming before their eyes into a small brown rat.

"Get back!" Snape was yelling, but Regulus wasn't listening, too busy removing the ropes still attached to himself. "Get back to the castle!" Snape continued. Regulus glanced at him and saw that he was raising his wand, pointing in the direction of Lupin. He wondered if Snape let Lupin transform in front of them specifically so he could kill him and get away with it.

Regulus looked to where Lupin stood only a few dozen feet away from them. Though the Lupin they knew was gone now. In his place was an oversized tawny-colored wolf. Regulus could feel his heart pounding in his chest. Sirius's giant dog form was dwarfed by the wolf, though Sirius was fighting the wolf as if he could overpower it. He was barking and biting at the wolf's ankles and face trying to draw his attention away. The wolf, however, was watching all of them, his lips pulled back to reveal his sharp teeth.

Regulus finally managed to get the ropes off and stood up. He threw one quick spell at the wolf, but he could tell it didn't do anything. It didn't matter though because a moment later the wolf was howling and running off deep into the forest. Regulus glanced back just enough to check that everyone was in one piece before making up his mind and running into the forest as well, following the path that he'd seen Peter run.

Peter had a head start, but Regulus was faster and after only a few long sprints he could see the rat's tail gliding on the forest floor ahead of him. "Stupefy!" he yelled, but the spell missed by just a few inches. "Flipendo!" he shouted. This spell missed as well, though dead leaves and dirt went flying out of the way, clearing the path, and making it easier for Peter to run.

Regulus could hear footsteps behind him, but he ignored them. He had to catch Peter, he had to. "Bombarda!" he yelled and fire erupted from his wand. It missed the rat's body but was enough to slow him when he was almost engulfed in flames and had to turn sharply to the right. Regulus yelled in frustration, nearly falling when he turned as well. The person behind him tried to grab his arm, but he dodged them enough to slip out of their grasp.

Peter was gaining ground and it was so dark. He felt adrenaline course through him. This was the man who had killed James. He was the reason that James would never take another breath, or ever laugh again. The hatred welled up inside of him like an immovable mountain. "Crucio," he hissed, the hatred behind the spell spilling out through his wand. When it missed he followed it up with the spell he wished he had cast earlier. "Avada Kedavra." A green light shot from his wand.

It didn't matter, no matter what he cast, Peter managed to scurry away, and when the last spell finally left him, Regulus slowed just enough for the person chasing him to catch up. Arms came around his chest and pulled him back. With that, Peter was lost, disappearing into the dark forest to safety.

"Let me go!" he screamed, but the arms around him only tightened.

"There is a werewolf out here." It was Snape that spoke, which shocked Regulus enough that he stopped fighting, though he remembered a second later that he was furious at the professor.

"Because of you!" He yelled and shook free of Snape's grasp. "You did this! You knew it was the full moon tonight! You were coming to bring him Wolfsbane, weren't you? You let him transform!" Snape watched him yell, but his face never changed. He did not look impressed or angry or surprised by Regulus's accusation.

"You should not have been able to cast those spells," Snape said instead, his voice dull like he was using Occlumency to hide his emotions.

"I'll show you spells I'm not supposed to be able to cast," Regulus mumbled. He thought he still had enough hatred to cast those spells on Snape. Snape surely deserved it, regardless. However, the moment he pointed his wand, Snape and Regulus were thrown apart when Lupin jumped between them, growling fiercely. There wasn't any time after that, both Snape and Regulus took off running in opposite directions from the werewolf.

Regulus ran as hard as he could, sure that at any moment he would be taken down by the rabid creature, but when he finally ran out of breath and had to stop, bent over and leaning against a tree, he found that he was alone in the forest. Lupin must have followed Snape. Regulus viciously hoped Lupin killed Snape.

He needed to get back to the castle, and as he began walking, trying to keep his steps silent against the forest floor so as not to draw attention, he saw the oddest thing. Harry, looking disheveled and manic, sprinted through the forest, and behind him, Hermione, looking equally unkempt, ran after him with Buckbeak, the Hippogriff that Regulus was sure had been executed earlier that evening, dragging behind her.

the escape.

Regulus felt like he might be losing his mind. Where did Buckbeak come from? He was chasing after Hermione and Harry, neither of which seemed to have noticed him behind them. Regulus wondered if they had left Ron by himself. It's not like he could have walked back to the castle on his own, and Regulus knew that Snape was somewhere in the forest with them. It didn't seem like the kind of thing Harry, or especially Hermione, would do but he couldn't think of another explanation for how they were in the forest with him now.

Harry arrived at the side of the lake and skidded down onto his knees, so that he was crouched behind a bush, peering sneakily through the leaves. Regulus could see the tail end of glimmering lights extinguishing on the opposite side of the lake. Hermione stopped behind a tree, Buckbeak coming to stand beside her, knocking against her shoulder like he was trying to get her attention. Regulus stopped just a few paces away, also hidden behind a bush.

It was then that he felt them. He didn't notice before with the way he was running, his body temperature rising with exertion, but now he felt the deathly chill settling over his body. He hated the way his stomach lurched when dementors were nearby. He looked up to find that it wasn't just a few, but dozens of dementors that were crowding around the lake.

"He's dead, he's dead, my fault," he heard Sirius say. Regulus just barely remembered experiencing this before. It was the same memory he'd felt during the Quidditch game against Hufflepuff when Harry fell from his broom after being swarmed by dementors.

Regulus could hear Sirius's choked sobs. It made him feel sick to his stomach. His chest clenched painfully, and Regulus had to bend over at the waist to keep from falling over completely. It seemed weird that he might be experiencing Sirius's memory, but he couldn't figure out who else it could belong to. He could feel a painful pitch of despair covering him, a feeling that came only with intense and overwhelming grief. Who was Sirius mourning? Was it James?

He looked across the lake, taking a few deep breaths so that he would be able to stand up straight again. On the shore of the opposite side, was Harry and Hermione, as well as Sirius in his human form. What? Regulus thought incredulously before looking to his right. Sure enough, Hermione and Harry were still standing there watching themselves.

Regulus had gone mad, that much was clear. The dementors were crowding in quickly now and Sirius, Harry, and Hermione — the versions on the opposite side of the lake — had fully collapsed, and Regulus could see them losing their grips on the last shreds of consciousness that they had.

Sirius looked the most feeble, his thin body looked like it was barely breathing. He lay flat on the ground, unmoving. It almost looked like he was dead. Regulus didn't know what to do. He wasn't capable of casting a patronus, and he didn't know how to help his brother.

"Sirius, who's dead?" Regulus heard a woman's voice say. It took him a long moment to realize that it was Lily. One second he was in the forest and the next he was in a living room that he didn't recognize. The intense cold still lingered, but it was disconnected now as if a problem that had been shoved into the back corner of a closet, out of sight and nearly forgotten.

"What's wrong?" James said. Regulus watched him walk into the living room, having witnessed Sirius curled up on the floor sobbing with Lily hovering over him worriedly. So it wasn't James that Sirius was mourning unless this memory was some bizarre hallucination in and of itself.

"James," Sirius croaked. His eyes were rimmed red and his lips were pulled down into a painful frown. "It's Regulus." Regulus jolted upon hearing his own name. He felt a flood of panic that he was sure didn't belong to him.

"What happened?" James asked. Sirius's face twisted and another sob forced its way out of his throat. Regulus didn't think he'd ever seen Sirius that upset, even as children Sirius was unusually good at tucking away his emotions when Regulus was in the room. Like he didn't want Regulus to have to suffer along with him.

"He's dead," Sirius finally said, his voice barely understandable with the way his body was trembling. James stared at him in horror. Regulus felt like his chest was cracking open, like someone had reached in and wrapped their fingers around his heart, just to rip it out of him.

"How?" James whispered back. Sirius didn't answer at first, but James didn't press him. He crouched down next to him. Regulus could feel the way James was working to keep control of his emotions, burying them beneath his need to take care of Sirius.

"EXPECTO PATRONUM!" Harry yelled and the memory disappeared. Regulus looked over in just enough time to witness Harry — the one next to him — cast a patronus so strong that a fully formed animal leapt from his wand. A stag, Regulus realized. Prongs, Sirius and Lupin had called him. It was James's Animagus form. He was galavanting across the lake, dispersing the dementors so quickly that Regulus wondered if a few of them didn't die in the process.

Prongs came galloping back once the dementors were gone, walking up to Harry who was watching it with a face of awe. "Prongs," Harry whispered, lifting his hand as if to touch the creature.

"What did you do?" Hermione said loudly. "You said you were only going to keep a lookout!" Regulus stomped over to them. He still wasn't sure if he'd been imagining them or not, but they seemed real enough.

"I just saved all our lives," Harry said.

"What is going on here?" Regulus shouted. Harry and Hermione jumped so badly that they nearly fell over.

"Regulus!" Harry said, his voice high and squeaky. "What are you doing here?"

“What am I doing here?” Regulus said incredulously. “What are you doing here? Where is Ron?” Regulus asked while also vaguely gesturing over toward where the other Hermione and Harry were out cold on the opposite side of the lake. They gave each other an uneasy look.

“I think we have to tell him,” Harry said. Hermione looked unsure for a second, and Regulus was about to demand they tell him what was going on when she finally sighed with resignation.

Slowly she pulled something from the inside of her sweater. It looked like a tiny golden hourglass attached to a necklace. “Do you know what this is?”

“Just tell me,” Regulus said impatiently.

Hermione sighed again. “It’s a Time-Turner. It’s how I’ve been getting to my classes all year. It allows me to go back in time up to five hours. That over there,” she said, gesturing to their other selves, “is us from the past. We came back to try and save Sirius.”

“Okay,” Regulus said slowly, it felt like far too much information to take in all at once and he was doing his best to understand it, but his head was reeling. A Time-Turner? Hermione had been using a complicated piece of time magic to go to classes? That was the most insane thing Regulus had ever heard. Who would give a child this kind of magic?

“Harry, look it’s Snape!” Hermione gasped. Both Regulus and Harry turned to see Snape, disappointingly uninjured by Lupin, walk out of the forest and begin conjuring stretchers, lifting the limp bodies of Harry, Hermione, and Sirius onto them.

“That bastard,” Regulus growled and began stomping toward him. He was pulled back almost immediately.

“No, you can’t,” Hermione said. “I think this was supposed to happen.”

“I’m not just going to let him take Sirius,” Regulus said. Given the danger Snape had put them all in just by allowing Lupin to transform, he didn’t have high hopes that Snape would get Sirius to safety. No, he was pretty sure Snape was going to take Sirius right to the dementors.

“That’s what we’re trying to tell you,” Hermione said. “We are here trying to rescue Sirius, but we can’t be seen. We didn’t know where you were the first time. Snape said you disappeared in the forest, but no one would elaborate. They’re going to lock Sirius up in Flitwick’s office, and we’re going to rescue him.”

In the time it took Hermione to say everything, Snape had walked off, the stretchers floating behind him. Regulus could still see him in the distance, a fourth stretcher floating next to him now, no doubt carrying Ron.

“We have forty-five minutes until Dumbledore locks the door to the hospital wing,” Hermione whispered. “We should hurry up and rescue Sirius.”

Regulus relaxed enough that Harry finally let him go. There wasn't anything he could do now except go along with the plan Hermione and Harry already had. He was still having trouble wrapping his head around everything though. The fact that Hermione had been time-traveling all year was completely bewildering.

On top of that, Regulus now had to contend with the memory of his brother desperately mourning Regulus's death. If he was honest with himself, he had never expected that Sirius would have felt that way. He figured that Sirius would have felt disdain and ultimately relief that Regulus was gone. The fact that Sirius was not only upset but apparently considered Regulus's death his own fault was baffling.

Regulus didn't think he could even begin to process the feelings he'd experienced from James. It made sense, in retrospect, that the memory was James's. Regulus had only experienced his own and James's memories in the presence of dementors. But that didn't make any of James's feelings about Regulus's death make sense.

"Look! Someone is heading back out of the castle!" Hermione's voice interrupted Regulus's internal thoughts.

"Macnair! The executioner! He must be going to get the dementors! We have to go!" Harry said, his words spilling out of him so quickly that Regulus could just barely understand him.

"We can't all fit and pick up Sirius," Hermione said. "I'll stay back and wait for you near the hospital wing. Remember, you can't be seen. The minister is here and will be looking for us, especially after Sirius disappears."

Harry nodded seriously and the two of them climbed onto Buckbeak's back. Harry climbed up in front and Regulus wrapped his arms around him. They took off straight up into the dark sky. The wind was cold despite the time of year and it whipped through Regulus's hair so quickly that he felt like he was falling.

"Whoa!" Harry shouted, pulling backward from where he was holding onto Buckbeak's neck. They stopped moving, or stopped climbing at least, considering they were still jolting up and down several feet while Buckbeak beat his wings to remain in the air.

They moved slightly slower as they began flying by the windows in the West Tower before Harry managed to stop Buckbeak again.

"He's there!" He shouted. Regulus looked in the window to see Sirius sitting in a chair staring down at his hands that were shaking slightly. He seemed to catch the movement in the window and looked up so quickly that Regulus wondered if his neck hurt. He jumped up from the chair and tried to open the window, but it was clearly locked.

Regulus pulled out his wand. "Alohomora," he said and the window popped open.

"How — how — ?" Sirius said weakly, looking from Buckbeak to Harry to Regulus.

"Come on, we don't have a lot of time. The dementors are on their way," Regulus said. Sirius didn't need to be told twice. He grabbed the edge of the window with both hands and lifted himself up out of the room. His thin frame slipped through the window easily, and he quickly flung his leg over Buckbeak's back, pulling himself so that he was sitting behind Regulus.

They flew up and away from the window immediately and landed on the top of the West Tower a moment later. Harry and Regulus slid off at once.

"You'd better go quickly," Harry said. "They'll reach Flitwick's office any minute now, and they'll know you're gone."

"What happened to the other boy? Ron?" Sirius asked.

"He's fine. He's still out of it, but he's going to be okay," Harry answered. "Quick! Go!" Sirius looked torn. He was back to only barely glancing at Regulus like he wasn't sure if Regulus was real or not.

"Go to Grimmauld," Regulus said. Sirius looked surprised before his eyebrows furrowed distastefully. "It's empty except for Kreacher. No one will find you. I'll meet you there." He gave Sirius a look that he hoped conveyed the sentence we can talk later, though he wasn't sure how well Sirius understood him.

Sirius finally nodded after a long, silent moment. He gave Harry one last look before wheeling Buckbeak around to face the sky and taking off. Regulus watched him as the hippogriff's wings rose higher and higher until they were covered by a cloud drifting by.

"Oh, shoot. I only have ten minutes to make it back," Harry said suddenly.

"Go," Regulus said. "I need to do something." Harry gave him an odd look but nodded and took off through a doorway. Regulus waited for a second before pulling out Harry's invisibility cloak that he'd stored in his robe earlier. He threw it over himself and started down the long journey on the small spiral stone staircase.

He passed Snape walking with Fudge on his way through the castle. "The Kiss will be performed immediately?" Snape asked. Regulus could see a small smirk on his lips as he listened to Fudge's reply. Regulus's hands clenched into fists. Bastard, he thought.

He walked in the opposite direction from where they were headed, moving swiftly toward the dungeons. He wondered if anyone was out looking for him. If Snape had mentioned that he had run off into the forest, then surely someone would be wondering where he was. He wondered if they would blame him for Sirius's escape.

He was glad that he knew where Snape's office was. He remembered seeing it on the Marauder's map. It wasn't the same one Slughorn had, but a much smaller version that was only a few hallways away from his classroom. The door to his office had one simple ward on it, Regulus doubted Snape thought anyone would be brash enough to break into his office while he wasn't there. Regulus undid the ward quickly, well-prepared after his months of research on the topic.

He pulled the cloak off the moment he was inside. He reinstated the ward so that Snape wouldn't notice it missing right away. Then he leaned against Snape's messy desk, waiting patiently for the man to come back into the room. He would have to go through his office to get to his bedroom. And when he did, Regulus would be ready.

Now that he had a moment alone, he decided to take the opportunity to deal with an issue that would surely pop up the moment Sirius tried to enter Grimmauld.

“Kreacher,” he called. Kreacher popped into existence next to him instantaneously.

“Master Regulus,” he said with a low bow.

“Sirius is coming to Grimmauld. I told him to. You are not to do anything to him. I’ll be home in a week, until then just make sure he has food and that no one else gets into the house, do you understand?”

Kreacher looked very, very unhappy, but nodded his head slowly regardless. “Yes, Master Regulus.”

“Thank you, Kreacher,” Regulus said. “That’s all.” Kreacher gave him another unhappy frown before popping back out of existence. Regulus relaxed a bit then. As long as Sirius made it to Grimmauld without getting caught then, at least for now, he would be safe. The memory he’d experienced by the lake kept threatening to overtake his thoughts, but Regulus kept pushing it away. He had more important things to deal with tonight, and he could not afford to break down before he did them.

It didn’t take nearly as long as he thought it would for Snape to make it back to his office. Snape stormed into the room in a flurry of anger and irritation. He didn’t notice Regulus right away, which Regulus was grateful for. The moment the door was closed behind Snape, Regulus lifted his wand.

“Expelliarmus,” Regulus said lazily. Snape’s wand that had been tucked in his cloak pocket flew directly into Regulus’s waiting hand. Snape whirled around to look at him.

The surprise on Snape’s face only lasted for a second before it was shuttered behind thick Occlumency walls. “What do you think you’re doing?”

“Give me one good reason that I shouldn’t kill you,” Regulus said calmly.

“You — ” Snape snarled.

“You let Lupin transform around those kids,” Regulus interrupted.

“You don’t include yourself in that group?” Snape snapped back. Regulus rolled his eyes.

“Let’s not play games, Severus,” Regulus said, his voice like ice. Snape looked like he was just a second away from flinching.

“Lupin shouldn’t be here to begin with. Why Dumbledore let that beast in the school as a professor — ”

“Enough,” Regulus said. “I’m not here to listen to your dissertation. You could have killed them.” The words were forced from him through clenched teeth. He could feel the dark magic itching at his fingertips. He wondered if he could cast crucio again. He felt like he could.

“Lupin was —”

“You know that Sirius is innocent,” Regulus interrupted. He wasn’t interested in hearing a single word out of Snape’s mouth.

Snape’s face changed, just slightly, going from his blank mask to one of vindictive hatred. It was gone in the blink of an eye, but it was enough for Regulus to catch it. “He’s hardly innocent .” Regulus nearly let the spell slip from his lips, he nearly cast an unforgivable on the man.

“I know you hated them in school, but we are hardly schoolchildren anymore, Severus,” Regulus spat.

“You’re one to talk,” Snape replied snarkily. Regulus wanted to hit him with a stinging hex, just enough to make the man hurt, but he was afraid that if he cast any spell, that he would kill the man by accident.

“He spent twelve years in Azkaban,” Regulus said. He had to work to keep his voice even, but suddenly the idea of Sirius stuck in that place, surrounded by dementors, made him feel like he might shatter into a thousand pieces. “Don’t you think that’s enough punishment?”

Snape didn’t reply right away. Instead, he stared at Regulus with an unfathomable expression.

“I doubt Lupin ever even did anything to you in school,” Regulus continued. “Besides, you were hardly an innocent little flower as a teenager yourself. They don’t deserve this and you know it.”

“Deserve?” Snape yelled, his mask finally cracking enough for Regulus to see the incredulity beneath it. “They deserve to —”

“You are a grown man,” Regulus said. “Why are you acting like a child? You think throwing a tantrum makes you in the right?” Snape looked at him with so much hatred that Regulus was almost worried that Snape might attack him.

They stared at each other in silence for a long few seconds. “I should not have allowed Lupin to transform,” Snape finally said. Regulus felt some of the tension seep out of his body. He’d had enough of staring at the man. He’d come down there to make sure that Snape would keep everything that happened in the forest to himself, but he was sure Snape wouldn’t bother to tell anyone. Snape knew who he was now, and Regulus had no doubt that Dumbledore would get an earful about it, but Regulus hardly cared about that.

He brushed past Snape and headed to the door, throwing Snape’s wand on the ground as he went. He paused right as he was about to leave. “If you ever go after Sirius again, I’ll kill you,” Regulus said quietly. He didn’t bother to look back to see if his words had any effect. He knew that Snape understood that he would follow through.

the understanding.

Chapter Notes

the chapter is short cause i just needed to get from point a to point b.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Regulus snuck back into the Gryffindor dorms after his confrontation with Snape. He knew that the others would be in the Hospital Wing all night and luckily, Neville, Seamus, and Dean were all fast asleep when he crawled into bed. He let his walls down just enough to think about the memory he'd experienced, but the night had drained him far more than he realized, and he fell asleep almost immediately.

He woke to an empty dorm. It was the last Hogsmeade visit of the year, and all his dormmates were no doubt taking advantage of the outing. It took him a long time to gather the energy to get out of bed. He felt lethargic and exhausted, his limbs heavy and difficult to lift. The sun warmed the room to the point where it was almost uncomfortable in the dorm. He found himself wondering where the others might be, so eventually pulled himself out of bed and dressed.

He walked toward the Hospital Wing slowly, or at least, he intended to. He felt like he was in a daze and when he finally looked up, he wasn't in the Hospital Wing at all, but instead in the Defense Against the Dark Arts classroom. It was empty, of course, but there was the sound of someone moving around and listening to music in the office. Regulus entered the office slowly to find Lupin slowly packing his belongings.

"Are you leaving?" Regulus asked. Lupin startled at the sound of Regulus's voice and dropped the item he was holding, an old book that skidded across the ground.

"Regulus," Lupin said. His voice was faint and shocked. Regulus watched his face travel through an array of emotions, so quickly that Regulus could barely decipher them. Lupin opened his mouth and closed it several times like he couldn't decide what to say.

"What do you remember from last night?" Regulus prompted. Lupin looked horribly tired. The circles under his eyes were so dark that they looked as if they had been drawn on with ash.

"After forgetting to take Wolfsbane and transforming in front of a group of children, you mean?" Lupin asked, the corners of his mouth tilting down into a frown.

"No, before that," Regulus said. "I believe that was Snape's fault anyways. He wanted you to."

"I highly doubt —"

“You shouldn’t underestimate the lengths he would go to hurt you and Sirius,” Regulus interrupted.

“Right,” Lupin replied, though he did not look convinced. “Regulus,” Lupin began to say but cut himself off.

“Just ask,” Regulus said. He’d been unsure of the man all year, but now he just felt bad for him. Yes, he’d left Harry in the hands of his muggle relatives when he should have stepped up and taken care of him, but it wasn’t all his fault. It was clear he’d had a very difficult twelve years since James and Lily died. Besides, Regulus was more inclined to turn to him now knowing that Sirius was innocent and that Lupin wasn’t painfully in love with a mass murderer.

“Who are you?” Lupin asked. “I mean, how are you here? Well, I know you’re not his son. You’re the first Regulus, right?”

“I don’t understand,” Lupin said faintly, though he looked distinctively relieved upon confirmation that Sirius didn’t actually have a son and hadn’t cheated on him. He was leaning heavily on his walking stick and finally seemed to give into the pain in his legs, falling heavily into the chair behind his desk.

“It’s complicated, but I’ve been pretending to be Sirius’s son so that I could go to school here. Harry is still in danger,” Regulus answered.

“Danger from what?” Lupin asked, looking shocked.

“So many things,” Regulus muttered. “Why are you leaving?”

“Ah, well, Snape may have let it slip what I was to all of Slytherin house,” Lupin said looking deeply ashamed and embarrassed.

“He’s such a dick,” Regulus said, and to his surprise, Lupin laughed. It barreled out of him in a loud jostle of noise. Regulus couldn’t help the chuckle that he let out in reply.

“Yes, he always has been,” Lupin answered with a nod. “Though I suppose you already know that.” Regulus nodded.

“Where will you go?” Regulus asked, he felt awkward standing and gingerly took a seat across from Lupin.

“Back home for now,” Lupin replied. “I might try to — they told me that Sirius —”

“He escaped,” Regulus said. “He’s safe, as far as I know at least. You want to find him.” Lupin gave him a long, uncertain look, before finally conceding with a nod. “Have you ever been to the Black ancestral home?”

Lupin laughed again. “Of course not,” Lupin said while chuckling. “I’m pretty sure your mother would have skinned me and turned me into a rug had I tried to enter the place.”

Regulus cringed. Lupin wasn’t exactly wrong, but it wasn’t a very pleasant image nonetheless. “She’s dead,” Regulus said. “You wouldn’t have to worry about her.”

Lupin sobered immediately. He seemed to understand what Regulus was trying to say. “I see,” he mumbled.

“I think — Sirius is going to need help. I can’t imagine how he’s even well enough to speak in complete sentences after so long in Azkaban, but that doesn’t mean he’ll be okay,” Regulus said. Lupin looked for a moment like he might start crying, though he managed to get a grip on himself before the tears spilled over.

“Professor Lupin!” Harry’s voice interrupted their conversation. He came sprinting in through the office door. “I just saw Hagrid. Oh, Regulus,” Harry said, surprised. “What are you doing here?”

“Hagrid said you’d resigned. It’s not true, is it? You can’t leave!” Harry seemed to gain back the momentum he entered the room with.

Regulus was walking out of the classroom when he came across Dumbledore, who was slowly making his way toward Lupin’s office.

“Good morning, Mr. Black,” Dumbledore said. “I hope you had a restful night’s sleep.”

“You shouldn’t let Snape continue working here. He’s a terror,” Regulus said. “Honestly, outing Lupin to his entire student body. How can you allow that?”

“Professor Snape is a complicated man, that’s true,” Dumbledore responded kindly. Regulus barely kept himself from rolling his eyes.

“Sirius is innocent,” Regulus said. “I won’t allow Snape to come after him. I don’t care what the Ministry says.”

“I understand, Mr. Black,” Dumbledore replied. “I believe that I would be interested in what actually happened last night, though perhaps it’s best I don’t know.”

“Perhaps not,” Regulus said. “That’s not all. We need to talk about Horc—”

“Yes, I have discovered something but now is not the time. You and your brother require healing. I will contact you over the summer,” Dumbledore said. “Excuse me.” Regulus stepped out of his way, so that Dumbledore could walk past, heading into Lupin’s office.

Regulus was heading outside shortly after when he was accosted by a very angry Draco Malfoy.

"I demand to know what happened last night," Draco said in his haughtiest voice. Regulus rolled his eyes so hard that it hurt.

"I have no idea what you're talking about, Draco," Regulus replied.

"Buckbeak escaped," Draco said angrily. They were tucked away in an alcove, but Draco's voice still echoed loudly in the corridor. Regulus laughed incredulously.

"That's what you're upset about?" Regulus replied.

"What else would I be mad about?" Draco demanded. Regulus gaped at him before helplessly laughing again. "I don't care about Sirius escaping or Lupin being a werewolf."

"But a hippogriff escaping execution? That's the hill you're preparing to die on?" Regulus asked.

"He mauled me! He nearly took my arm off! I could have died!" Draco shouted.

"Yes, only after you insulted it directly to its face after Hagrid explicitly told you not to," Regulus argued.

"Still!" Draco said. "I know you know what happened to it."

"How do you figure that?"

"Because you and Potter are always involved," Draco whispered furiously. "Your little do-gooder crew. You must have done something, intervened or something."

"You know, Harry was in real danger last night. What if Sirius Black had gotten to him?" Regulus taunted, unable to help himself in the face of Draco's tantrum.

Draco paled so quickly that Regulus worried he might pass out. "I didn't feel anything," he said.

"What?" Regulus asked.

"Nothing," Draco replied, jolted from his momentary panic. "It's not important." He left immediately after muttering the words. Regulus shook his head. He did not understand what was going on with that boy.

He found Ron and Hermione out by the lake shortly after he made it outside, sitting in the hot, summer sun. Ron waved cheerfully at him, but Hermione merely pursed her lips, giving him a long look.

"Feeling better?" Regulus asked Ron as he took a seat next to them.

“Yeah, Pomfrey fixed me right up,” Ron replied. “Good as new.” He rolled his ankle around as if to demonstrate.

“Did you hear about Lupin?” Hermione asked.

“I did,” Regulus answered. “I’m sorry to see him go. He was the only competent Defense professor we’ve had.” Hermione nodded vigorously. They sat in silence after that, enjoying the sunshine and the sounds of the lake. Harry eventually came out to join them, but he was quiet, seemingly in deep contemplation.

“I’m starved,” Ron said suddenly. “Let’s go to lunch.”

“Sounds good,” Harry agreed, jumping to his feet.

“We’ll meet you in there,” Hermione said, reaching over to hold Regulus’s arm. Regulus was immediately on his guard, but he did his best not to show it, giving Ron and Harry encouraging smiles as they walked off.

Hermione was quiet for a long time after they left, but Regulus wasn’t sure if he should prompt her or not. Eventually, she sighed. “You’re his brother, aren’t you?” she finally said.

Regulus laughed uncomfortably. “I am really not doing a good job hiding this secret, am I?” Regulus said.

Hermione, despite the serious look on her face, laughed. “I think I just notice more than most. Ron definitely doesn’t know. I don’t think Harry does, though my guess is that he does suspect something.”

“How did you realize?” he asked.

“It was a lot of things. You knew stuff that you shouldn’t have known, mostly. But also... you acted older, somehow. Like you were an adult rather than a kid,” she said with an easy shrug. “The way you watch out for Harry, it’s not like any of us do, it’s like a professor would. Almost like a parent.” She watched him closely as she said the last thing like she wanted to see how the words would land. Regulus did his best to not let them affect him. He’s not sure that he succeeded.

“Then Sirius?” he prompted.

“Then Sirius,” she said with a sigh. “He didn’t know who you were, and Lupin sounded weirdly suspicious. Then he said the thing about not naming his son Regulus and I knew. I had looked up your family tree, and I figured you had to be someone else. There are a lot of magical protections for the Black family. I don’t think you could impersonate one if you weren’t blood-related.”

“Very clever,” he replied. He still wasn’t sure how she felt about her discovery. She was holding all of her emotions close to her chest.

“Who else knows?”

“Dumbledore,” he answered automatically, then shrugged. “Luna, Draco, and Lupin as well. And Snape.”

“Malfoy knows?” she asked incredulously. Regulus couldn’t help laughing.

“Yes, he figured it out. His mother is my cousin. He had some inside knowledge. Luna’s mother was my friend in school, that’s how she knew. Although, Luna just seems to know things sometimes,” he conceded. Hermione scoffed quietly.

“Why are you here?” she asked, uncertainly.

“To protect Harry,” Regulus answered immediately. “I knew that the Dark Lord was still alive and that he would be after Harry. I wanted to try and protect him.” He shrugged helplessly. “Not sure I’m doing that good of a job,” he added, almost against his will.

“I’m glad Harry has someone looking out for him that’s not just Ron and me,” she said, her voice kind and soft. “I think you’re doing a fine job.” He looked over to see her smiling at him.

“Thanks,” he said quietly.

“You should probably tell him though,” she said after a moment. Regulus nodded. He knew he needed to, but just... not yet.

The rest of the school year flew by. The last few days were spent lounging outside and playing chess and exploding snap in the common room. Lupin had returned the Marauder’s map to Harry, so they spent a while investigating all the secret entrances now that Sirius wasn’t posing an active danger. Luna joined them more often than not. She was enthralled by the story of what happened with Sirius. When they first told her that Sirius was innocent, she wiggled happily like she’d known all along and was happy they’d finally caught up.

Harry pulled him aside to mention that Sirius wanted Harry to come live with him before Peter escaped and his plans were ruined. It was clear that Harry felt vaguely guilty about receiving the offer, but Regulus offered only congratulations. Regulus wanted nothing more than for Harry to leave his muggle relatives to live with Sirius. Regulus spent a lot of the time grappling with his own guilt over Peter’s escape.

He decidedly did not think about the memory from James. He had been operating under the assumption that James wouldn’t have even bothered to mourn Regulus after his death, and though that was a terribly sad thought, it was also comfortable and safe. It made it easier to accept his death. But now, with the knowledge of how James felt when he first heard of Regulus’s death, Regulus struggled with his own grief over James’s murder.

Every day Regulus woke up intending to tell Harry the truth, but time passed and he never built up the courage. They received their grades back, and though they all did well, Hermione decided to drop several of her courses for the next year, so she wouldn’t be so overloaded, returning the Time-Turner to McGonagall.

Sirius sent Harry a letter that arrived on the last day of term. He included a signed Hogsmeade permission slip so that Harry would finally be able to go. Regulus couldn't help the warm feeling that filled his chest upon seeing it. The letter also included a confession from Sirius that he was the one to send him the Firebolt.

"Ha! See! I told you," Hermione said.

"Yes, but he didn't jinx it, did he?" Ron replied. Hermione looked disgruntled, though there was still a quiet vindication on her face.

Sirius also gifted Ron a new pet to make up for Peter's reveal and subsequent escape. It was sweet, though Regulus could tell that Harry was worried that Regulus wasn't mentioned at all in the letter. Regulus wasn't worried though, at least not for the reasons Harry thought. He was, however, vaguely worried that he would get to Grimmauld to find Sirius missing or only for Sirius to not remember that Regulus was alive. It kept him up most nights.

He boarded the train, feeling both relieved and nervous for the summer. Harry was sulking, but Regulus already had a plan to deal with his muggle relatives that summer. He wasn't going to let any more time go by with Harry unprotected, even if it was from muggles.

this chapter is kind of dark so cw for mentions of child abuse, mentions of past character death, and depictions of someone recovering from twelve years of torture and starvation.

Sirius was in Grimmauld Place again. He usually hated being in Grimmauld, but this specific memory comes with a warmth he almost never experiences. While it may not be considered warm by typical standards, for someone in Azkaban, it felt like paradise. Being in Grimmauld always made him nervous, though he wouldn't categorize it as the worst memories he could be forced to endure - stepping over James's cold dead body topping the list - it still meant he would have to relive through some form of torment.

The door opened to the room he's in - his bedroom, he realizes belatedly - and a young Regulus Black entered. Of course, it's Regulus. He's in Grimmauld after all, he should just be happy that it's not his mother again. The last time he could remember being in Grimmauld, he had to relive the time his mother discovered one of his muggle t-shirts in his room and had spent nearly three hours cutting up his back with dark magic. So all in all, seeing Regulus was at least a bit of a relief.

It's a little unsettling to see Regulus at this exact age though, but it's nothing compared to when he appears in his prison cell, looking like a walking skeleton, begging for his life. The first time he saw Regulus, he looked like the surly sixteen-year-old that Sirius remembered seeing at Hogwarts, that wasn't so bad, but then he remembered Regulus's untimely death and it all went downhill from there.

Even when he's in better shape, Regulus usually appears as a younger version of himself, crying after one of his mother's cruel punishments, like the time he had to relive comforting Regulus after his mother broke two of his fingers for misbehaving at dinner. It wasn't even Sirius's pain, but he felt it like it was his own. Regulus was so small then, his little fingers twisted in a way that was hard to look at and the only source of comfort that he had was Sirius, who could do little more than hold him close and shush him when his crying got too loud.

Dealing with a thirteen-year-old Regulus Black could be challenging in its own way — at least, he thought he looked thirteen, but it was difficult to tell. It had been so long. Despite not having fully outgrown his baby fat, he'd become lanky and awkward, signaling the transition toward the dead teenager he would eventually become. He looked frightened of Sirius, that was unusual, Sirius noted. Usually, Regulus displayed either anger or sadness, with no in-between. The caution in Regulus's expression made Sirius feel uneasy in a way he couldn't quite articulate.

“Sirius, you need to eat,” Regulus said. His hair was longer than Sirius had ever seen it, hanging loosely around his neck. There were dark circles under his eyes like he hadn’t been sleeping well. It reminded Sirius of the last time he saw Regulus, when Sirius was leaving Hogwarts for the last time, Regulus had looked so disassociated and disconnected. He remembered trying to catch his eye, though he wasn’t quite sure why he wanted to. However, when Regulus caught his glance, he merely scowled and turned away.

“Sirius,” Regulus said again, drawing his attention back. Sirius’s thoughts always drifted nowadays. Regulus held a tray with food on it. Sirius knew it was a trick. During his first year in Azkaban, he often experienced flashbacks of food. They weren’t the best-formed memories, but they usually had happy feelings attached to them. However, this only drew the attention of the Dementors, who were always eager to snatch away any sliver of happiness, even if it was simply a figment of his imagination. So, when a thirteen-year-old Regulus came in holding a tray of food, Sirius was quick to remind himself that it wasn’t real, that the food would bring no happiness. Regulus took a small step toward him.

No, he didn’t scream until he’d been there for months, well over a year if the full moons could be trusted, and the thought of Moony out all alone, believing Sirius was a spy and a murderer. He thought about Remus having to go through the full moon without anyone to care for him, to spend time with and distract the wolf, to patch up his wounds, to make him tea and dinner the next day. That was when he started screaming, and once he started, he was not sure that he ever really stopped.

“It’s happening again, isn’t it?” Regulus asked, drawing Sirius’s attention back to him. He looked so worried and stressed. Sirius vividly remembered this period in their lives, when their relationship was already strained, but they still shared moments of camaraderie. Regulus would sometimes sneak into Sirius’s room late at night to talk to him, or occasionally heal his wounds, after Sirius inevitably attracted the ire of his parents.

He wishes he could escape the memories of Regulus’s desolate face when Sirius started to turn against him. He knew that Regulus wasn’t kind to him either, that Regulus began acting like the rest of his family, but Sirius could barely remember that now. He could only remember his own mistakes. He couldn’t actually place the awful things Regulus had said to him, though he was almost certain Regulus must have done something awful, but he could recall every single time he pushed Regulus away. He wondered how responsible he was for Regulus’s death. If his memories were to be believed, then it was completely his fault. Sirius was good at that though, killing people, he’d killed James and Lily. Their deaths were his fault, so why wouldn’t Regulus’s death be his fault as well?

“Sirius, please,” Regulus responds. “Let me take you outside, I think you’ll feel better in the fresh air.” Regulus’s voice is soft and gentle. It reminded Sirius of how he used to talk to Regulus when they were children, back when Sirius was kind and good.

“I’m sorry, I’m sorry,” Sirius babbles, he thought he might be crying, but it was hard to tell. Tears so rarely accompanied crying in Azkaban, not after months and years of dehydration. He knew how he must sound, but he can’t seem to stop himself. He had heard every individual torment of all of the other prisoners, why would he care if they heard yet another one of his? “I shouldn’t have left you behind,” he says again.

Regulus sighed deeply and looked away from Sirius for a long moment. His long hair swept to cover his face when he turned his head. It looked so strange on him, so unlike the Regulus Sirius could remember. “I deserved it,” Regulus finally said, clenching his jaw tight as he looked back to meet Sirius’s eyes.

“What?” Sirius responded, baffled.

“I deserved to be left behind,” Regulus said, staring back at Sirius with a naked expression of regret on his face. “I don’t think you can remember right now, but I deserved it. It wouldn’t have changed anything, Sirius. Even if you had dragged me away after you, it wouldn’t have changed anything.”

Sirius felt out of his depth. Regulus never said things like this, not once in all the time he’d been locked in a cell had Regulus appeared and told him that he had deserved to be left with their awful family. “I’m confused,” he said aloud because this memory just kept going, but he was having trouble placing the actual memory it belonged to. He wondered if his brain was fully fractured now after so long with the dementors.

“I know,” Regulus said gently. “I’ll be right back, just stay here.” Like Sirius was able to leave at all, Sirius thought. Regulus left the tray of imaginary food and swept out of the room. Sirius watched him go. He expected the walls of Grimmauld to fade as they typically did after a long memory, but they stayed firmly in place, refusing to melt away like they usually did. Sirius stared and stared and stared.

Regulus was in over his head. He came back down to the kitchen after taking the tray of food to Sirius, his hand shook violently as he braced himself against the dining table. He hung his head, letting his hair shield him from the empty room. He took a deep breath in, then pushed it out through his teeth. Then he did it again. Then again.

It had been a week and a half since Regulus returned to Grimmauld Place. Sirius was waiting for him, pacing the hallways and checking the clock like he still knew the exact time that the Hogwarts Express arrived in London. He found out later from Kreacher that Sirius had been doing that for four days straight without stopping to sleep or eat.

“It was real,” he said the moment he laid eyes on Regulus. He took an aborted step forward before stumbling back into the wall. It was like his body was betraying his thoughts without him even realizing it. Regulus was vaguely worried that Sirius might try to hug him at that moment, and he was disproportionately grateful that he didn’t. Mostly because Regulus and Sirius hadn’t hugged since before Sirius went to Hogwarts, but also because Sirius clearly hadn’t bathed despite being in the house for days at that point.

“Sirius, you didn’t bother to shower or change clothes?” Regulus said. “Kreacher would have gone out to get you anything you needed.” Sirius’s face twisted when he heard Kreacher’s name, but he didn’t respond. If anything, he just looked terribly lost, remaining quiet for far longer than was appropriate in any conversation. “Sirius!” Regulus shouted when Sirius’s eyes began to glaze over, losing focus and tilting off to the side.

“How are you alive?” Sirius asked. He looked like he was stuck halfway between aware and unaware. It was unnerving like watching an animal pretend to be human. It reminded Regulus of how boggarts looked when they imitated a person.

“It’s complicated. I’ll tell you,” he said, holding up his hand to stop Sirius when he opened his mouth to interrupt him. “But first, you need to bathe. Have you eaten dinner yet?” Sirius made a face like dinner might be a foreign concept to him. Regulus reckoned that was probably the case, then cringed when the thought crossed his mind. He had been doing a good job of not focusing on the awful years Sirius had endured in Azkaban and thinking about starvation was getting too close to crossing that line.

Sirius wasn’t looking at him again. His eyes had drifted off like he was trapped in his own thoughts. It took Regulus nearly half an hour to get Sirius to focus enough to drag him into a shower. At first, Regulus just shoved him into the bathroom and shut the door, but when the lights remained off and the room stayed silent, Regulus reopened it to find Sirius just standing in the center of the room staring off into the darkness.

Regulus started the shower for him after turning on the lights. He tried not to think about the way Sirius flinched when the water sprayed out, but it was impossible to miss. “Do you still remember how to take your own clothes off?” Regulus asked. He had intended the words to sound snide, but they mostly came out soft, as if he was too afraid to hear the answer. It took Sirius a long time to pull off his filthy Azkaban uniform. His fingers trembled like he was perpetually freezing, and they kept slipping on the buttons of his shirt.

Regulus stayed next to him, waiting as patiently as he could for Sirius to finally disrobe. He didn’t necessarily want to be in the room with him, but he didn’t feel like he had much of a choice. He had told Lupin that Sirius would need help, and he meant it. He had read that people in Azkaban eventually lost the ability to speak and function. He knew that Sirius would be struggling.

Once Sirius was naked, he stepped under the water before shying away from it immediately. It turned out that it was too hot for him because, despite his constant trembling, Sirius was unable to shower in hot water without it feeling like hot needles. Regulus helped him adjust it until it was lukewarm and finally, Sirius let himself stand under the spray.

Because of Sirius's incessant pacing and lack of food, he grew weak almost immediately and had to sit only a few minutes after entering the shower. Regulus had stayed in the room with him, averting his eyes to give the man the most privacy he could manage given the circumstances. When he sat down, he curled his spindly arms around his thin legs like he was waiting for the water to drown him. Regulus felt lightheaded with pain. He hated seeing Sirius like that, so helpless and tired, so drained of the life he had once been so full of. Regulus swallowed harshly, pushing away the guilt and grief and anger that he felt, and decided to help Sirius with his hair.

It had grown out past his elbows and was heavily matted in place. Regulus wondered if Azkaban prisoners were ever given the opportunity to bathe. Regulus remembered how much pride Sirius used to take in his hair, but now it was nothing more than a black rat's nest forming on the back of his skull. He used his wand to cut off most of it, trying his best to retain the parts that were unaffected by the matting. It was a delicate process, and it took a long time, but he eventually cut most of it and began running shampoo through his remaining hair.

Sirius never spoke during the process, not a single word. He sat in complete silence, unmoving and seemingly unaffected. When the heavy matted hair was removed from his head, Sirius sighed in relief and his shoulders relaxed a little, but that was about it. Regulus had to shampoo Sirius's hair four times before the water ran clean, but he managed it eventually. His fingers were wrinkly and tender after the process, but he ignored it. He helped Sirius stand shortly after and did his best to help Sirius clean himself. It was a painful and embarrassing process, but Regulus could see the way his brother relaxed as the layers of dirt were scrubbed off.

Finally, after a ridiculous amount of time, Sirius left the shower looking much more human than he had going in. He wrapped himself in a towel that Regulus handed him, but his eyes were still distant, his body nearly catatonic in the way it only moved when Regulus instructed it to. "Kreacher," Regulus called. It was perhaps a bit shortsighted to call the house elf in the presence of Sirius because Sirius jumped so badly that he fell heavily into the bathroom wall. "Please bring Sirius a set of clean clothes. Anything that will fit him."

Kreacher popped away without saying anything and Regulus looked back to see Sirius now gazing in the mirror and running his fingers through his poorly shorn hair. It was still slightly long, though there were parts that were clearly shorter than the rest. Regulus wasn't known for his ability to cut hair, but for now, the important thing was that it was clean. Sirius was able to dress himself, thank Merlin, and they finally settled in the kitchen to eat dinner, a hearty stew that Kreacher cooked.

Sirius barely ate that night, he stared at the food like it was about to jump up and bite him, and he only managed to take a few bites. Regulus expected more questions but they didn't come. Sirius looked exhausted and worn around the edges. "Your room is mostly untouched, if you want to stay in there?" Regulus asked. Sirius didn't look at him, but he nodded like he understood.

The days after that were bizarre. Sometimes Sirius would be up before Regulus was even out of bed, moving around the house, talking to himself, yelling at his mother's portrait, shouting at Kreacher, while other days he wouldn't leave his room at all. It took Regulus only a day to realize that those days were the worst. Regulus would find Sirius sitting on his bed staring off into space, his eyes empty and distant. Sometimes he would talk to Regulus, if he specifically engaged him, but Sirius was rarely capable of remembering what Regulus was doing there.

He didn't ask about how Regulus was alive, even on the days when he walked around chattering to himself. He greeted Regulus with a polite smile and went about his business. What business was that? Regulus had no idea. It seemed to just include Sirius wandering from room to room, moving objects around, and randomly cleaning things.

A week and a half in was another one of the bad days, Sirius was staring off again, not moving or eating. He apologized again. Crying and choking on his words as he told Regulus that he shouldn't have left Regulus behind. All this culminated in Regulus's current feeling, that he was way, way in over his head. He entered the sitting room and pulled out a piece of parchment, scrabbling a quick note.

Lupin,

Where are you? I thought I was clear before, but perhaps you did not understand what I was saying. You are needed at the Black Ancestral home. Now.

R.A.B.

"Kreacher," he called. Kreacher had been silent and sullen since Sirius moved in, but Regulus didn't have the time or energy to deal with it. "Find Lupin and take this to him." Kreacher bowed and left immediately. Regulus fell heavily into a chair by the floo, rubbing his temples to try and disperse the headache that never seemed to fully leave him. He wondered if Lupin would even bother to come. He was sure that Lupin was in love with Sirius, but maybe that wasn't enough, maybe he would choose to stay away.

He needn't have worried because, within an hour of Regulus sending Kreacher off, Lupin came tumbling out of the floo, brushing off his cloak and setting down a packed bag next to his feet.

"Finally," Regulus said lazily.

"I'm so—"

"Save it," Regulus replied. "I need your help."

“The Ministry has been at my house,” Lupin said the moment he settled into a chair across from Regulus. “They were there when I arrived, and I’ve seen them sniffing around for days. I had to wait to make sure it was safe before coming here. They aren’t exactly inclined to trust a werewolf’s word when he says he doesn’t know where Sirius Black is.”

Lupin spoke the words with bitterness and a self-deprecation that Regulus was inclined to believe, but there was something else, something simmering below the surface that Lupin wasn’t saying. If Regulus had to guess, Lupin was probably grappling with the complicated feelings from just being reunited with the man he loved after spending more than a decade thinking he was a murderer. Regulus was sympathetic, but at the same time, Lupin hadn’t been the one in Azkaban and Regulus had seen firsthand what its effects were like.

Regulus watched him with a raised eyebrow, but Lupin just started back, unflinching. “Sirius isn’t doing well,” Regulus said finally after a long, tense silence. Lupin looked away and the muscles around his mouth tightened in a way that Regulus struggled to understand at first. “And there’s something else.”

Lupin looked back at him, his eyes were hollow and empty for a moment, it was a look of insurmountable grief, Regulus thought. “What else is there?”

“It’s about Harry,” Regulus answered. Lupin still had that guarded look on his face, but it seemed to soften just slightly at the mention of Harry. “His family, the muggles, I need you to go check in on them. I can’t go and make sure Harry is being treated well, and take care of Sirius and,” Regulus paused, unsure of how to finish his sentence, “deal with my other responsibilities.”

“What responsibilities are those?” Lupin asked anyway, zeroing in on what Regulus had left unsaid. “Homework for classes you’ve already completed.” Regulus genuinely could not tell if Lupin was joking or not, but he bristled all the same.

“At least I’m here,” Regulus snarked. Lupin cringed slightly. He rubbed his hands together like he was cold though it was unseasonably warm in the Grimmauld. He was hunched in on himself, dressed in the same poorly made clothing that he’d worn at Hogwarts. There were dark circles under his eyes and Regulus wondered how much sleep the man was getting. “Do you want to see him?”

“Harry?” Lupin asked without looking over.

“No,” Regulus replied. “You are going to see Harry regardless. It makes more sense for an — an adult to go.”

“Right,” Lupin said, looking hunted. “Where is Sirius then?”

“He’s in his room,” Regulus said. Lupin made to stand. “He’s not well. Azkaban — it’s not a good place, he’s doing the best that he can.”

Regulus wasn’t sure what made him feel the need to defend Sirius and his well-being to Lupin of all people, but he felt a pang in his chest when he thought of the way Sirius shivered and stared as Regulus washed and cut his hair. If it was Regulus, he wouldn’t want James to see him like that. He didn’t actually know what happened between Sirius and Lupin, though it’s clear that they have feelings for one another. He had no idea if they were ever like him and James.

Lupin looked like he might start crying at the words, but he swallowed harshly and nodded. His mouth pulled into a tight line. “Where is his room?” Regulus told him. As Lupin walked out of the room, Regulus wondered if he should have told Sirius that Lupin was coming first. It was too late though, and besides, Sirius was still having so much trouble remembering who Regulus was. At least Lupin looked the correct age, if a little older given his graying hair.

Regulus didn’t hear from either of them for two hours, and he was just beginning to grow worried, when he heard footsteps descending down the stairs.

“Hey, little brother,” Sirius said. He sounded more present than he had that morning, though he was not quite his usual manic self. He was still wearing the thick pajamas that he tended to wear most days, but he had straightened them like he was trying to look nice. Lupin came down after him, looking slightly less stressed, though the hollow sadness was still there.

“Sirius, Lupin,” Regulus greeted them.

“Can you tell me what’s going on with Harry?” Lupin said. Regulus had moved to the kitchen, feeling less alone at the empty table than he did in the sitting room. Lupin took a seat across from him and Sirius settled into the chair at the head of the table. Sirius had a vague smile on his face, it was a strange relief to see.

“What’s happening with Harry?” Sirius asked. Regulus had to keep himself from rolling his eyes. He worried about how Sirius might respond to what Regulus had to say about Harry’s living situation. Sirius wasn’t ever the kind of man who thought things through before making decisions, and Regulus highly doubted that his decision-making skills had gotten better after all the years in Azkaban.

Still, Sirius seemed aware of what was going on and at least he was sitting and talking like a normal human being. Regulus couldn’t help but wonder what Lupin had said to him in those two hours. He hated the way his stomach hurt at the thought that Lupin was the only one that could bring Sirius out of his post-Azkaban haze, rather than Regulus himself. Regulus hadn’t been that person for Sirius in decades, but he couldn’t stop the feelings of rejection that swam through him when he remembered it.

“Lily’s sister?” Sirius interrupted. Regulus nodded.

“I don’t think — they aren’t the best guardians,” Regulus said vaguely. “It took me a while to figure out where they lived. I wanted Lupin to go and check-in. Just to make sure Harry is being —”

“What do you mean they aren’t the best guardians?” Lupin asked. Regulus glared at him, but Lupin seemed totally unbothered.

“They don’t like magic,” Regulus answered. “At least, that’s what Harry said. Ron and his brothers had to rescue him two summers ago because they weren’t letting Harry out of the house.”

“What?” Sirius shouted. This was exactly what Regulus was trying to avoid.

“I think it’ll raise suspicions if I go on my own, since I look like just another one of his classmates. I don’t want to risk Harry getting in trouble,” Regulus explained, he kept eye contact with Lupin only, doing his best to cut Sirius out of this conversation.

“Where do they live?” Lupin asked, his tone grave.

“Little Whinging,” Regulus and Sirius said at the same time.

“How do you know that?” Regulus asked. Sirius shrugged.

“Lily mentioned it, before she died,” he said. Regulus had forgotten Harry mentioned seeing Sirius’s animagus form near the Dursleys’ house. Of course, Sirius would know where it was.

“I’ll go,” Lupin said, standing so quickly that the chair behind him clattered to the ground. “What is the address?”

“Four Privet Drive,” Regulus said. He had finally managed to wrangle the information out of Harry. It was clear Harry didn’t want anyone to know, but Ron had insisted on sending him a letter in the muggle mail so Harry had finally given in. Regulus had thought Ron already had Harry’s address given he had been to Harry’s house, but it turned out he and his brothers had only followed their owl and had no idea where Harry actually lived.

“I’m going with you,” Sirius said, standing as well.

“No,” Regulus and Lupin spoke over each other. Regulus shot another loaded glare at Lupin. Lupin had the decency to look a little chagrin.

“Why not?” Sirius asked loudly.

“You are a wanted criminal,” Regulus answered. “And I can’t trust you not to do anything rash.”

“I was able to avoid them for an entire year,” Sirius argued.

“Sirius, I think it’s a good idea for you to stay here,” Lupin said softly. Sirius looked like he might back down but only for a moment before his face hardened.

“I’m not just going to let them mistreat my godson,” Sirius said fiercely. A look of hurt crossed Lupin’s face so quickly that Regulus would have missed it had he blinked.

“Sirius,” Regulus said, drawing his attention. “Please. I can’t — I really don’t want you to get hurt. I just —” Regulus’s words got trapped in his throat, desperation and sadness squeezing around him in a deathly grip. Sirius finally softened.

“Fine,” Sirius said. “Fine, I’ll stay.” Lupin nodded and headed out the door. Sirius watched him go with a forlorn expression.

“He’ll be back,” Regulus said. Sirius bit the inside of his cheek before looking over at Regulus.

“I know,” he said, though his voice didn’t sound quite sure. They sat in silence. Regulus wasn’t sure where to go from there. He hadn’t expected Lupin to go right away, though he had to admit that he was glad for it. The thought of Harry in his muggle family’s house being mistreated made him itchy.

“Reggie,” Sirius said with a sigh. Regulus wanted to protest the nickname, but he was also so relieved to hear Sirius address him with any semblance of sanity that he couldn’t bring himself to do it. “I really don’t understand why you’re here or how you’re alive. What happened to you?”

Regulus felt a cold sweat break out across his skin. “It’s not a very pleasant story,” he replied. Sirius shrugged as if to say, mine isn’t either. “Can I tell you when Lupin gets back? I figured I would just tell you both at the same time.”

Sirius looked like he might argue, but he finally nodded his head. Regulus blew out a breath through his teeth.

“Did you eat?” Regulus asked, remembering the food he’d left in Sirius’s room several hours before.

“No, wasn’t hungry,” Sirius mumbled.

“You have to eat, Sirius,” Regulus said, suddenly exasperated. “You have to eat if you’re going to get better.” The sun was just starting to set outside, the perfect time for dinner. He called Kreacher and asked him to make them something, which Kreacher begrudgingly agreed to, though he shot Sirius a nasty look before he popped away.

“That elf is going to poison me,” Sirius said matter-of-factly.

Regulus rolled his eyes at Sirius’s dramatics. “He’s not going to poison you,” he replied. “Or at least not enough to kill you.” Sirius chuckled.

They didn't speak again until there was the sound apparition from outside the house. It was much louder than it had been when Lupin left. If anything, Lupin was skilled enough not to make a single sound when he apparated, so the sound caused the hair on the back of his neck to rise immediately.

"Transform," Regulus said to Sirius quickly before getting to his feet. His thoughts were running wild. What if the Aurors had found out that Sirius was hiding here? What if they followed Lupin? They wouldn't be able to enter the house, but Regulus didn't know what they would do.

He jogged to the front door and swung it open quickly. Standing on the street, trembling slightly, was Lupin, his hand outstretched where he was holding the wrist of Harry Potter. Lupin looked like he was on the edge of feral, like he was one step away from losing himself. Harry, on the other hand, looked completely relaxed and happy.

"Hey Reg!" he shouted when Regulus walked far enough away from the house so that he could be seen. "Where did you come from?"

"Harry, what?" Regulus said. Lupin still hadn't let Harry go. His eyes were so luminescent that it made Regulus nervous. Loud barking came from behind him suddenly.

"Sirius!" Harry shouted before looking left and right like someone might hear him. Sirius, in his Animagus form, came bounding out of the house and nearly tackled Harry to the ground. Harry just barely caught himself, stepping back with one foot to keep his balance. He scratched Sirius's ears while Sirius wagged his tail violently.

"Lupin, what is going on?" Regulus demanded, though he couldn't deny how happy it made him to see Harry and Sirius reunited.

"Let's go inside," Lupin responded. His voice was grave and unnerving. Sirius stopped grinning at Harry, his dog face slipping into one of seriousness. He walked around Lupin's legs, snuffling at him worriedly.

"Right, fine," Regulus said, adjusting the wards to let Harry in. The house slid into place, and Harry released a small gasp before hurrying in the front door after Lupin, who still hadn't let go of him. Harry didn't seem to have anything with him which Regulus found odd.

"This is where you live?" Harry asked. "Is your mom here?" Regulus just barely stopped himself from cringing.

"Harry, I'm so glad you're here," Sirius said, transforming once the door was shut, thankfully distracting Harry from his question, at least for the moment.

"Me too," Harry said with a wide smile.

"Lupin," Regulus said, before nodding pointedly toward where Lupin was gripping Harry's wrist. Lupin finally dropped it. He pulled out Harry's school trunk and Hedwig's cage from his pocket, then unshrunk them.

“We’re going to need to clean out a room for Harry,” Sirius said. “You can take mine for now though.”

“Sirius,” Regulus reprimanded, he definitely felt like Sirius was getting ahead of himself. “Lupin, can I speak to you?”

Lupin did not look like he was managing his emotions very well. His eyes weren’t glowing as much anymore, but they still looked odd and inhuman. Sirius was giving him a very uneasy look, like Lupin might just spontaneously transform in the middle of their entryway. Regulus didn’t think that was a possibility, but he didn’t exactly want to test it.

Kreacher popped into existence next to them. “Dinner is served, Master Regulus,” he said before popping away.

“Sirius, take Harry into the kitchen,” Regulus said. “Lupin.” He nodded toward the sitting room, and thankfully everyone listened, though Harry shot him a few perturbed looks before following Sirius. Lupin closed the door to the sitting room slowly. His back was still to Regulus, but Regulus could see him trembling.

“Why did you bring Harry here?” Regulus asked slowly.

“They kept him in a cupboard,” Lupin responded, through gritted teeth.

“I’m sorry?” Regulus said, not sure if he had heard Lupin correctly.

“The cupboard under their stairs, it had a lock on it. They used to keep him in there,” Lupin said. He finally turned around, and Regulus had to keep himself from taking a large step back. Lupin was furious, his eyes glowing, his canines on full display. “There were locks on his room, Dudley’s second bedroom, Harry called it. They lock him in, during the summer.”

Regulus felt like he was going to be sick. “What?” he asked, mostly because he couldn’t force any more words out of his mouth.

“I could not leave him there,” Lupin said. He spoke as if Regulus was the person who placed Harry with the Dursleys. Regulus just nodded though.

“He’ll stay here,” Regulus said definitively. “I knew I shouldn’t have let him go back. I knew something was wrong.” Lupin clenched his hands into fists, he was taking deep breath after deep breath trying to get himself under control.

“Agreed,” Lupin said finally. He sounded more like himself, but now his voice was laced with an intense self-loathing that Regulus felt ill-equipped to deal with. Regulus only nodded at him and headed out toward where Sirius and Harry were sitting at the kitchen table.

Dinner that night was odd, to say the least. Sirius kept shooting him looks like he wasn’t sure how much Harry knew, and he didn’t know if Regulus was going to bring it up. Regulus felt an uncomfortable guilt swelling inside him. He should have told Harry the truth before now, but he’d been too much of a coward to face it. Now that Harry was living with them, there was no other choice but to tell him. Regulus only hoped that Harry would forgive him.

There was also the issue of Dumbledore. There was no way Harry could just go missing from the Dursleys without anyone noticing. Harry retold the story of Lupin arriving and making polite conversation with Petunia before storming around the house in a rage, packing up all of Harry's things, and apparating him away to safety. Harry was clearly elated with the way things had gone, and Regulus couldn't exactly disagree with him. He was free from the Dursleys, and Regulus intended to keep him that way.

"Where will you sleep?" Regulus asked Sirius. "If Harry is taking your room, I mean. Going to reclaim Walburga and Orion's room?"

Sirius cringed before chuckling a little. "Actually that room is already occupied."

"What do you mean?" Regulus said slowly. Lupin looked like he was trying desperately to hold in a laugh.

"Didn't you wonder what I did with Buckbeak?"

Regulus had forgotten about Buckbeak, but he supposed it made sense given his wanted status that he would be hiding out in Grimmauld along with Sirius. He had not expected Sirius to set him up on his mother's bed though. The giant hippogriff had made a nest out of the room and squawked unhappily when Regulus looked in on him. Harry found it so hilarious that he nearly choked on his spit. Lupin and Sirius laughed as well, sending each other fond looks that made Regulus feel vaguely ill.

"Whatever," Regulus mumbled to himself, shutting the door behind him as he left the room. They had plenty of guest bedrooms for Sirius and Lupin to sleep in. He almost worried about having them both in the house before Lupin excused himself to a room Sirius hadn't chosen. Sirius watched him go with sadness and regret, though he didn't argue.

Regulus went to Sirius's old bedroom, Harry's new room, shortly after seeing Buckbeak.

"Odd decorations," Harry said, his cheeks blazing red, when Regulus entered.

"Oh, right," Regulus said with a laugh. He'd forgotten about all the naked muggle women on Sirius's walls. "Sirius had quite a decoration style when he was a teenager."

"No kidding," Harry said. He still looked embarrassed, and Regulus could see that he was actively avoiding looking at the pictures. Regulus figured that they should have given him a different room, but it seemed a little late for that now.

"Listen, I wanted to talk to you, before you went to bed," Regulus said. Harry's face fell slightly and he nodded seriously. He could clearly tell from the change in tone that Regulus wasn't joking around.

"Okay," he said, taking a seat on the bed. Regulus wanted to sit next to him, but he also wanted to pace. More than that, he wanted to leave the room and never explain to Harry anything about his past and who he was.

"I'm not — I'm really — I'm — " Regulus said, placing his hand on his hips.

“It’s all right,” Harry said kindly. He had a look in his eyes like he almost knew what Regulus was about to say.

“I’m not who I say I am,” Regulus said simply. Harry nodded for him to go on. “And I’m not really thirteen.”

“Okay,” Harry said. He still sounded calm, which Regulus thought was a good sign.

“My name is Regulus Black, but I’m not Sirius’s son. I’m his brother. And I’m —” he paused to do some mental math, “twenty. I think. Give or take.” He finally looked up to see Harry watching him with raised eyebrows.

“How?” Harry asked.

“I died when I was eighteen. I came back to life shortly before we started first year, but I had been de-aged. I’m not sure how, but... I wanted to make sure you were safe. I knew the Dark Lord would be after you. So I decided to pretend to be a different Regulus so that I could infiltrate the school.”

“Wow,” Harry said. He looked surprised, but not as surprised as Regulus thought he should look.

“I was going to tell you before, but... well, there’s more,” Regulus said. Harry nodded again. His hands were sitting relaxed and open in his lap. It calmed Regulus enough that he could go on. “I wasn’t a good man in my first life. I died betraying the Dark Lord, but I wasn’t... I was a Death Eater.”

Harry gasped, but Regulus wasn’t looking at him anymore. He couldn’t bear to see the disappointment on Harry’s face.

“Who else knows?” Harry asked quietly.

“Dumbledore, Hermione, Luna,” Regulus paused on a deep breath, “and Draco.”

“Draco found out before I did?” Harry said, sounding deeply offended. Regulus cringed and nodded.

“I don’t think Hermione knows that I was one of the Dark Lord’s followers. Dumbledore probably knows, Luna I’m unsure about. Draco definitely knows.”

Harry was quiet for a long time, and Regulus wondered if he should just leave the room. He didn’t know what to say. He didn’t know if there was anything to say.

“You said you died while betraying him?” Harry finally asked.

“I found out one of his secrets,” Regulus answered. “He would have killed me if he realized. I was trying to... I was trying to kill him.”

“Okay,” Harry said. “That makes sense.” Regulus peaked up at him to see that Harry was looking calm and unbothered.

“You don’t seem very surprised,” Regulus said.

“I — I guess I’m not,” Harry said. “Though I wasn’t expecting this exactly. But Sirius didn’t recognize you, in the shack. Plus you’ve always seemed older. I don’t know.” Harry shrugged.

“Are you upset?” Regulus asked.

“Why would I be upset?” Harry asked looking genuinely confused.

“I just told you that I was once a Death Eater,” Regulus said. “That doesn’t bother you at all.”

“You just said that you betrayed Voldemort,” Harry said. “You’re not still a Death Eater.” He didn’t say it like a question, he spoke it like he was sure of the truth. Regulus answered him anyways.

“Of course not,” Regulus said a little too loudly. Harry shrugged again.

“Then I’m fine,” Harry said. “I’m glad you told me. Lupin mentioned that you were the one who sent him. I’m — I’m just happy to be here.” Harry looked deeply uncomfortable all of a sudden, like talking about his emotions was too much to bare.

“I’m happy you’re here too,” Regulus said softly. “I wanted you to be safe from them. It’s not fair that you should have to grow up with people who don’t treat you well.” Harry gave him a grateful, if a little awkward, smile.

“Wait,” Harry suddenly. “Does this mean that you knew my parents?”

Chapter Notes

posting this a day early bc, as we all know, i have no self control.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

It took only three days for Dumbledore to figure out Harry was gone. He sent an owl to Remus, which luckily made it through the Grimmauld wards, and delivered the polite, yet stern note from the headmaster. They were all eating breakfast at the time.

“Well, Ron was really my first friend. We met on the train. Draco was there, acting like a knob as usual,” Harry was saying when Kreacher arrived.

“A letter has arrived for the wolf,” Kreacher croaked. Regulus cringed slightly at the verbiage.

“Kreacher,” Sirius said sharply. “You will not call him that.” Kreacher gave him a withering glare, before disappearing again. “I can’t believe you let him talk like that still. Or actually, I can believe that.”

Sirius was having a bad day. While Regulus could see the active improvement caused by Harry’s arrival and continued presence, Sirius was clearly still struggling. The only difference was that instead of forgetting who Regulus was and thinking that he might be another hallucination, Sirius would instead turn his anger and pain on the easiest target. Regulus didn’t blame him. It was oddly cathartic to fight with his brother after so long apart.

“It’s from Dumbledore,” Lupin said, before Regulus could snap at Sirius. Regulus glanced at Harry quickly, the smile had slipped from his face and he had paled slightly.

“I’ll speak to him,” Regulus said. “I’m not going to let him send Harry back there.”

“No,” Lupin said. “I think it would be better if I handled this. I’m the one who took Harry from the Dursleys. I’ll talk to Dumbledore.”

Regulus wanted to argue, but at the same time, he felt oddly relieved. While he was technically an adult, he had never actually had the opportunity to live his life as one. He still felt sheltered most of the time. Sirius was similar, only living an adult life for a few short years before he was sequestered off to Azkaban. Lupin was different though. He had a maturity that both Regulus and Sirius lacked. He had been living as an adult wizard for more than a decade, and though Regulus didn’t agree with his decision to stay away from Harry, he couldn’t deny that Lupin was truly an adult.

“Fine,” Regulus agreed. Harry still looked very concerned, though he kept any comments to himself.

Having Harry in the house was a huge improvement. Regulus hadn’t even realized how much stress he was holding in his body thinking about Harry spending the summer with his muggle relatives. Not to mention the improvement his presence had on Sirius’s health. There were downsides of course. The first one was Harry’s question.

“Does this mean that you knew my parents?” Harry had asked. Regulus had noticeably cringed at that. Harry’s eyebrows raised in question.

“Not well,” Regulus lied. “I never really interacted with them, but obviously we all went to the same school.”

“Were you in Gryffindor with them?” Harry asked. Regulus chuckled.

“No, Harry,” Regulus answered. “I was definitely not a Gryffindor.”

“Slytherin?” Harry’s mouth gaped open in shock. “I can’t believe it.”

“I just told you I was a Death Eater, but me being in Slytherin is what surprises you?” Regulus asked with a chuckle.

“But they’re all so awful,” Harry said firmly before a look of chagrin crossed his face. “Er, no offense.”

Regulus laughed loudly at that. “None taken.” Regulus had to take a moment to get himself under control. “They could be awful, but so could Gryffindors honestly. Peter Pettigrew was a Gryffindor and look how he turned out.”

Harry scrunched up his face. “Yeah, suppose that’s true,” he said. “Still. It’s hard to imagine you in Slytherin. Did you ask to be in Gryffindor this time around?”

“No, honestly I was surprised that the hat placed me there. I’m not sure I really embody bravery,” Regulus said.

“That’s not true,” Harry said. “I think you’d have to be pretty brave to betray Voldemort.”

“Or pretty stupid,” Regulus countered. Harry shrugged a little.

“Maybe,” Harry said with a laugh. “I’m glad you’re in Gryffindor though. I feel like we wouldn’t have been friends otherwise.”

Their conversation petered off after that, and Harry didn’t ask about Regulus’s relationship to James and Lily again, which Regulus was thankful for. It’s not like he could say yes Harry, I actually did know your father. In fact, he took my virginity in the middle of an unused classroom. That would just be absurd. However, there was still some lingering guilt there. There were memories Regulus had of James that Harry would never get to know, and Regulus felt bad hoarding them. Not bad enough to confess his secret relationship with James, but still.

The other bad thing about Harry being at Grimmauld was discovering the details of how Harry had been treated. He was so hungry that first night, scarfing down dinner so quickly that Regulus wondered how he didn't manage to get sick while eating. Regulus didn't even want to think about how little the Dursleys had been feeding him.

The following day though Regulus woke to find Harry in their kitchen cooking breakfast. Sirius joined them only a moment later before Regulus could speak a word.

"Good morning, Harry. I didn't know you cooked," Sirius said cheerfully. He hadn't changed clothes, but he at least looked like he'd slept.

"Oh, morning," Harry mumbled, looking a bit surprised to see them. "Yeah, I know how to cook." Harry was avoiding their eyes.

"Did you cook a lot at home?" Regulus asked carefully.

"Most mornings, yeah," Harry answered. He was still staring down at the food in front of him, his back muscles tense. Sirius shared an uncertain look with Regulus.

"You cooked most mornings?" Sirius asked. Harry shrugged and nodded at the same time. That seemed wrong to Regulus. Given how skinny Harry was when he first arrived at Hogwarts and after the summers.

"Harry," Regulus said. Harry finally turned to look at them, his face carefully blank. "Did the Dursleys make you cook for them?"

Harry shrugged one shoulder awkwardly. "I had to earn my keep," he mumbled. He looked between Regulus and Sirius as he spoke, carefully watching their reactions. Regulus tried to stay calm, not wanting to agitate Harry who already looked on edge. Sirius, on the other hand, flew off the handle right away.

It was a long morning after that. Once Regulus managed to calm Sirius and Harry down, in that order, they had to sit down and have a long conversation about how Harry did not have to do chores in Grimmauld.

"You're not allowed to do chores," Sirius said. Harry looked shocked. Regulus rolled his eyes.

"You can do whatever you want as long as it's not unsafe," Regulus corrected. "If you want to cook, then we aren't going to stop you, but you are by no means expected to do those things. Do you understand?" Harry looked like he wasn't sure if he believed them, and Regulus could see the tension he still held even days later like he expected to be sent back if he made one wrong move.

Regulus had softly mentioned to Sirius that he filled Harry in on who he was once breakfast was finished. Later that afternoon, when Harry went to his room to work on some of the school work they had been assigned for the summer, Lupin and Sirius pulled Regulus into the sitting room.

“Tell us what happened to you,” Sirius demanded. Regulus took a long deep breath. Sirius was watching him with a look of determination. Lupin merely looked curious.

“Not long after I graduated Hogwarts, the Dark Lord came to me and asked to borrow Kreacher,” Regulus said.

“Ugh, don’t call him the Dark Lord,” Sirius said superciliously.

“What would you have me call him, then?” Regulus snapped.

“Just call him Voldemort,” Sirius said. Regulus had gotten a lot of practice not flinching when he heard that name, but there was something about the way Sirius said it that turned his stomach.

“I’m not going to call him Vo— that,” Regulus said.

“What? Too afraid?” Sirius taunted. “I thought you were a Gryffindor this time around.”

“Sirius, please,” Lupin said tiredly.

“Yes, I am afraid of him,” Regulus snapped. “You would be an idiot not to be, though I suppose that just comes naturally to you at this point.” Sirius sneered at him.

“Regulus,” Lupin said calmly. “Why did Voldemort ask to borrow Kreacher?”

Regulus huffed waiting to see if Sirius would interrupt again, but when he stayed silent, Regulus went on. “He didn’t say at first. He just asked to borrow him. I told Kreacher to return to me the moment he was done though. However, when Kreacher returned, he was sick and half-dead.”

Sirius mumbled something that sounded suspiciously like, “Good riddance.” Regulus nearly snapped at him again before Lupin interrupted.

“What happened to him?”

“The Dark— You-Know-Who,” Regulus corrected, “took him to a cave and forced him to drink a potion known as the Drink of Despair.” Lupin cringed, but Sirius just looked confused. “It causes extreme pain and thirst, plus it makes you hallucinate, infecting your thoughts with uncontrollable fear. He made Kreacher drink this and left him there to die. However, since I told Kreacher to return to me, he made it back alive.

Regulus had to take a moment to reel in his emotions. He remembered how angry he’d felt seeing Kreacher in that state. It was torture in its own right. “Then what happened?” Lupin asked kindly.

“Kreacher told me what happened. He said that The— You-Know-Who was hiding something there, beneath the potion, a locket. It took me a while to figure out what he was hiding, but I finally realized.” Regulus paused to take a breath. “It was a Horcrux.”

“No,” Sirius breathed, his mouth dropping open.

“A what?” Lupin asked, his eyebrows furrowed.

“You don’t know what a Horcrux is?” Sirius asked curiously.

“I’ve never heard of it,” Lupin said.

“It’s an item that someone hides a piece of their soul in,” Regulus explained. “A way to extend someone’s life should they get hit with a Killing Curse or die in some other way.” Lupin looked horrified.

“How did he even manage to do that?” Lupin said quietly.

“You have to kill someone,” Regulus said. “It’s the only way to split the soul.”

“So, you went back to try and steal it?” Sirius asked. Lupin was still reeling from the new information, but Sirius was clearly thinking ahead.

“Yes, essentially,” Regulus said, swallowing harshly. “I knew that You-Know-Who couldn’t die as long as the locket existed, so I decided to steal and destroy it. However, I knew that I would likely not survive the trip.”

Sirius’s face paled slightly. “You knew you were going to die?” he asked. Regulus nodded.

“The locket was protected by the potion that had to be drunk and the cave it was hidden in was filled with inferi,” Regulus said, avoiding eye contact.

“That’s what your boggart was,” Lupin said, the sudden realization making him sound airy and disconnected.

“What was your boggart?” Sirius asked confused.

“It was water,” Lupin explained. “I didn’t understand it at first, but I thought I saw a hand come out at the last second. I had been trying to figure out what it meant. Your boggart turns into the inferi in that cave.”

“Yes,” Regulus said through gritted teeth. “Thank you, Lupin.” Lupin had the decency to look a little embarrassed. “Anyway, I knew the cave was filled with them, and I wasn’t about to make Kreacher drink that potion again, so I decided to do it myself and send Kreacher off with the locket once I’d taken it.”

“What?” Sirius said, his eyes looked far too bright all of a sudden. “You can’t do that!”

“I assure you, I can,” Regulus said. “Or I did,” he corrected. “Stop interrupting me.”

“Go on,” Lupin said. Regulus sighed.

“Well, I’m assuming you know what happened next. I went into the cave, drank the potion, and drowned after giving Kreacher the locket.” Sirius looked like he was going to be sick for a moment. “I thought — I figured it was the end, but then the next thing I knew I crawled out of the water. Kreacher apparated back in and brought me back here.”

“What? How?” Sirius asked.

“I don’t know exactly,” Regulus said. “I didn’t even realize any time had passed. It wasn’t until later that Kreacher told me I had been gone for more than a decade that I realized. More than that, I was somehow de-aged and I have no explanation for it.”

Sirius looked mildly distrustful, but Lupin just looked bewildered.

“And you decided to go to Hogwarts,” Sirius said blandly.

“When I came back, Kreacher informed me that he was unable to destroy the locket. No matter what he did, the locket couldn’t be affected by any magic.”

“So Voldemort is still alive,” Lupin said solemnly. “Even though everyone believes him to be dead.”

“Exactly,” Regulus said, nodding his head. “I knew he had to be out there somewhere and, given how famous Harry is, I knew You-Know-Who would be out for revenge.”

“Were you ever able to destroy the locket?” Sirius asked, uncertainly.

Regulus shook his head. “That’s not all,” Regulus said quietly. “The locket isn’t the only one.”

“No,” Sirius gasped. “That’s impossible.”

“Wait, what?” Lupin asked.

“More than one Horcrux,” Sirius said to Lupin. “Right, Reggie? That’s what you mean?”

“Yes, he made several,” Regulus said.

“He’s a madman,” Sirius breathed. Regulus nodded in agreement.

“Is that what you meant by your other responsibilities?” Remus asked.

“Yes, I need to find the rest. I think I might have a way to destroy the locket. Harry was able to destroy another Horcrux,” Regulus said.

“Harry was?” Sirius shouted. Regulus shushed him.

“In second year, the Chamber of Secrets was opened,” Regulus began to say.

“I’m sorry?” Sirius yelled. Lupin shouted as well, but Regulus couldn’t make out what he was saying over Sirius’s loud voice. That sidetracked them for a while. Regulus collapsed onto the couch across from where Sirius and Lupin were sitting and tried his best to recount the events of second year. It was a lot, even when it happened, but trying to explain it to an outside person made it sound even worse.

“You were possessed by Voldemort?” Sirius said loudly. He basically hadn’t stopped shouting since Regulus began to speak.

“Is everything okay?” Harry’s soft voice drifted into the room, the door cracking open as he poked his head in.

“You fought a basilisk?” Lupin said faintly. He looked vaguely ill, his skin sallow and his hands gripped tightly onto the chair beneath him. Harry cringed a little.

“Reggie, how many times have you almost died?” Sirius said. He was trembling now. Standing with his back so straight that he looked stiff and uncomfortable.

“Not that many,” Regulus said. He had a terrible headache forming behind his eyes, and he hadn’t even gotten around to explaining the basilisk fangs he had taken.

“That’s not — I’m not happy about that,” Sirius said robotically. The words seemed to fight him on the way up and the moment they were spoken, he exited the room. Harry wore an expression as if he had personally put Regulus in danger and upset Sirius. He watched Sirius go with an unhappy look.

“Harry, how is your schoolwork going?” Lupin said. That seemed to distract Harry, which Regulus was grateful for. He felt so drained and he honestly found Sirius’s response completely bizarre. He didn’t understand why he was so upset.

Dumbledore ended up visiting them the same afternoon that Lupin received the letter. Regulus wasn’t completely happy about it, but he also felt like it was unavoidable. More than that, he knew at some point he would need to meet with Dumbledore to talk about the Horcruxes. Lupin had spent back a quick note telling him to come by and at about three in the afternoon, Dumbledore came walking out of the floo into the Grimmauld sitting room. Regulus couldn’t even imagine how his parents would feel knowing Dumbledore was in their house.

The conversation Dumbledore had with Lupin went on for a long half hour. Regulus could practically hear the strong silencing charm that Lupin had thrown up over the room the moment the door closed behind him. Sirius had his eyes glued to the silenced door, his hands were shaking slightly. Harry was incredibly anxious during it, he was sitting with Sirius and Regulus but kept frantically standing up only to sit back down again. Sirius eventually rested a firm hand on Harry’s shoulder and that seemed to calm them both down.

When Lupin finally came out of the room, he looked both angry and relieved at the same time.

“Dumbledore wants to speak to you,” he said to Regulus. Regulus nodded and headed into the room.

“Hello, Mr. Black,” Dumbledore said.

“If you are here to convince me that Harry needs to go back, then I am not interested. I am not just going to stand by and let those muggles mistreat him. He is perfectly safe and well cared for here. Besides, James and Lily would have wanted Sirius to be the one taking care of Harry.” The words spilled out of his mouth in a large jumble, and he had to stop to suck in a breath at the end.

“I have already spoken to Remus,” Dumbledore said. “I’m sure he will fill you in, but we have agreed that Harry will be safe here. As long as he stays within the wards, he will be fine. I trust all of you to watch out for him.” Regulus watched Dumbledore’s facial features closely as he spoke, trying to see if there was any crack in the calm facade that Dumbledore always wore. When he could find none, he relaxed.

“Okay, good,” Regulus said quietly.

“That is not, in fact, what I wanted to discuss with you,” Dumbledore said.

“Oh,” Regulus mumbled. “The Horcruxes?”

“Yes, I have begun to compile memories about Tom Riddle’s past in an effort to discover where he might have hidden additional Horcruxes. In my search, I came across a possible location.” Regulus looked at him surprised. This was great news. Regulus had done next to nothing with his search for the Horcruxes.

“Okay, where do you think it is?”

“It might be easier if you come back to Hogwarts with me. I can share the memory with you,” Dumbledore said. “Unless you have a pensive here?”

Regulus didn’t. Luckily it wasn’t difficult to travel to the headmaster’s office. Dumbledore had adjusted the floo system so that he could travel in and out quickly during the summer months when the need for security was lowered. It had been a long time since Regulus had used a pensive. He had only used it once or twice during his first life. It was an uncomfortable experience free falling into the memory.

The memory began with a much younger Dumbledore. His hair and beard still held their auburn color, not yet faded into gray. Regulus caught on quickly to what was happening, watching Dumbledore walk into an orphanage to speak with a Mrs. Cole about Tom Riddle’s place at Hogwarts. Mrs. Cole, it turned out, was a heavy drinker who loved to share secrets. She talked about Tom Riddle’s mother arriving at the orphanage to give birth to Tom before she died.

“He’s a funny boy,” Mrs. Cole said. Regulus wondered how much of an understatement that was. It was clear that Mrs. Cole was holding something back, though the amount of gin she drank in only a few short minutes was sure to loosen her tongue.

“Odd in what way?” Dumbledore prompted her. He spoke in the same kindly, soft manner that he does now. It caused Regulus to wonder when Dumbledore had perfected that voice or if he was just born that way.

“You’ll be taking him away, whatever?” she said, giving Dumbledore a keen look. Clearly, she wouldn’t tell him if she thought the offer to take Tom Riddle away might be rescinded.

“Whatever,” Dumbledore agreed gravely.

“He scares the other children.” Well, isn’t that a surprise, Regulus thought sardonically. She went on to detail some of the odd things that happened, things she suspected Tom was responsible for, ending with a description of a cave Tom visited and explored with two girls. “He swore they’d just gone exploring, but something happened in there.”

Regulus pulled out of the memory so quickly that he went sprawling on the floor behind him. Dumbledore stood watching him with a curious glint in his eyes.

“Curious, is it not?” Dumbledore asked. “You didn’t see the full memory, but there is something important there. He clearly enjoyed collecting trophies.” Dumbledore moved about the room, summoning a fresh cup of tea that floated over to where Regulus was sitting.

“The cave,” Regulus choked out. He lifted his trembling fingers up to grab the tea, the warmth grounded him.

“Ah,” Dumbledore said simply, and to Regulus’s surprise, sat down on the floor next to Regulus. “That one you already have?” Regulus nodded.

“There is a replica there,” Regulus explained.

“Have you destroyed it yet?” Dumbledore asked.

“Not yet,” Regulus answered. “It has some protections on it, and Horcruxes are nearly impossible to destroy, but I have a plan. Have you found anything else?”

“I haven’t, though I have some ideas. I’m trying to find more memories. It seems that they would be hidden somewhere related to his past. He wouldn’t put them somewhere random,” Dumbledore said, his voice oddly faint. It almost seemed like he was talking more to himself than to Regulus, but Regulus nodded in agreement anyways.

“The item in the cave, it’s a locket. I’m not sure about the significance though,” Regulus said.

“A locket?” Dumbledore hummed curiously. “Would it be possible for me to take a look at it?”

“I don’t think it’s a good idea,” Regulus answered quickly. “It’s been damaged, and I think anyone close to it would be in danger.” Regulus could tell that Dumbledore wanted him to explain, but Regulus wasn’t going to wait around for that. He didn’t need to recount his stupidity with the old man. “Let me know if you find anything else. I’m going to tell Sirius and Remus about the search.”

“I don’t think it wise to share this information with too many,” Dumbledore said cautiously.

“I agree, but I — I need them to know what I’m doing,” Regulus said simply. Dumbledore gave him an odd look but didn’t argue.

He went back through the floo thinking about how he needed to test the basilisk fangs on the locket. He didn’t feel comfortable doing it while Harry was in the house though. He needed to figure out a good time to try it first.

the dream.

About two weeks after Harry began living at Grimmauld Place, Regulus sent letters to Hermione, Ron, and Luna to let them know that Harry was with him. Hermione seemed very relieved, though she made sure to ask if Regulus had told Harry who he was yet. Luna sent them a letter that was just a piece of parchment with only her name written on it. The envelope was packed full of dried flowers that Regulus didn't recognize, but he set them aside to investigate later.

Ron sent a thrilled letter to Regulus and Harry about the possibility of going to the Quidditch World Cup. Regulus had forgotten about the World Cup. Ron had mentioned it a few times over the previous year, but there was too much to worry about to give it any thought. Though he had played Quidditch during his first life, he was never a Quidditch diehard like his brother or James had been. He enjoyed playing but wasn't much interested in following the professional leagues.

However, this presented the perfect opportunity. Regulus sent back a quick letter telling Ron that he wouldn't be able to go, but that Harry definitely should. It would be the ideal time to get Harry out of the house for a few days so that he could safely destroy the locket. Sirius looked like Christmas had come early when he heard about it. Jumping up and down excitedly before launching into a very long and detailed conversation about the various teams that he and James used to follow. Harry listened with rapt attention, but Regulus and Lupin just tuned them out.

The day after Regulus had met with Dumbledore, Sirius had another bad day. He had foolishly hoped that Harry's presence would offset some of the trauma Sirius had endured, but when Regulus was woken early in the morning by the sound of Sirius screaming at his mother's portrait, he knew it would be a long day. Sirius was banging around in the kitchen when he walked downstairs.

"Sirius, what are you doing?" Regulus said tiredly. The sun wasn't even fully up yet. He wondered if Harry and Lupin were awake. Sirius whirled around to look at him.

"NO!" he shouted. "I'm not doing this with you again."

"Sirius," Regulus said with a sigh. Sirius backed up until his lower back hit the counter.

"I'm not — just go away, okay? I don't have anything. I didn't do anything," Sirius rambled nonsensically.

"What's going on?" Lupin said cautiously, entering the kitchen behind Regulus. Sirius looked at him, and his eyes immediately went vacant and unfathomably sad.

"Oh," Sirius mumbled. Regulus was struggling to understand what could possibly be happening in his head. "Is James here too?" Regulus flinched.

“No, Sirius,” Lupin said gently. “It’s just us and Harry, remember?” Sirius shook his head. “Why don’t we go back to your room? Were you looking for something in here?”

“I saw James, but I couldn’t be sure,” Sirius said quietly. “I saw him. He asked me — he asked me why —” Sirius couldn’t seem to finish his sentence. He was avoiding looking at Regulus again. Regulus understood now. Sirius had already been dealing with hallucinations that morning, and he probably wasn’t capable of understanding Regulus’s presence at the moment. Lupin came forward and wrapped an arm around Sirius’s shoulders, leading him back to his bedroom.

“Kreacher,” Regulus called. “Will you make breakfast and bring some to Sirius?” Kreacher nodded. He didn’t look as spiteful about it as he usually did. Regulus thought he looked a little sad.

“What was the screaming about?” Harry poked his head out of his room to ask when Regulus came back up the stairs.

“Nothing to worry about,” Regulus said, though he could tell that Harry still looked concerned.

Regulus spent the day with Harry, finishing up the last of their assigned summer work. Lupin came down in the late morning. “He’s sleeping,” he said. Regulus nodded.

“Is he okay?” Harry asked, a deep frown on his lips.

“He’ll be fine,” Lupin said kindly, but Regulus could see the tight lines of tension around his eyes.

“Is he —” Harry started after Lupin left the room. He cut himself off and was clearly avoiding eye contact.

“Is he what?” Regulus prompted.

“Is it ‘cause I’m here?” Harry asked. He spoke so quietly that Regulus almost couldn’t hear him.

“Why would you think that?” Regulus said, startled. Harry shrugged a little helplessly.

“Harry, Sirius spent twelve years living with dementors. I promise you, his suffering has nothing to do with you.”

“If anything, I think being around you gives him something to focus on,” Regulus said. “It’s a good thing, I promise.” Harry gave him a relieved look finally and Regulus felt something untighten in his chest.

Sirius felt better the next day. He and Harry spent the morning playing chess and chatting about Sirius’s time at Hogwarts.

“That was the year James came back with his hair charmed bright red. He said it was because he wanted to show house spirit,” Sirius said with a loud laugh. “But we were pretty sure it was just a miscast Crinus Muto. He never could get that spell right.”

“How did he manage to cast it before school started?” Harry asked curiously.

“What do you mean?” Sirius replied, tilting his head slightly.

“Well, we’re not allowed to do magic outside of school. Or was that not the case for you guys?” Harry asked. Sirius still looked mildly confused.

“The trace doesn’t really work inside a lot of pureblood homes,” Regulus explained. “The locations are so steeped in magic that it’s difficult for the Ministry to track when underage wizards use magic.”

“Wait,” Harry said, putting down the chess piece he was in the process of moving. “Does that mean I can practice magic here?”

That revelation seemed to be the only confirmation Harry needed and nearly every day after that Regulus caught Harry practicing various spells all around the house. Sirius was overjoyed, talking Harry into letting Sirius teach him how to duel. Lupin gave them a disapproving look, but it only took a day before he was also instructing Harry on how to use different spells.

“For educational purposes only,” Lupin said, but Regulus just rolled his eyes.

Watching the three of them interact made Regulus feel warm and content, as well as a little empty and mournful. There was always a piece of him that saw Harry with Lupin and Sirius and thought, “It should have been James and Lily.” They loved him so much, and it felt like such a tragedy that they didn’t get to see him like this, that they didn’t get to watch him grow and learn.

Even if it hadn’t been James and Lily. Even if it couldn’t. Even if their deaths were somehow always locked in place, unmovable and unavoidable, then it should have been Sirius and Lupin. The two people in the world that were perfectly ensconced to care for and raise Harry and they, just like James and Lily, were robbed of the opportunity.

Something cold like death swirled inside him as he watched the three of them together. While it felt like they were finally getting a second chance, there was also the glaringly obvious reality of how little Regulus fit into this family. He didn’t belong with them. The man he’d been, the boy really, in his first life, he never deserved this life. He deserved the death he got and the fact that he was offered another chance felt like robbery.

For the first time in a while, Regulus felt the grief over James’s death creep in like an insidious smog. It clung to his clothes and hair and skin, dragging around behind him and filling any space he entered. He hadn’t intended it, but he ended up avoiding everyone in the house for a full three days.

He woke up on the fourth morning and lay in bed watching the room slowly fill with light. He was just beginning his debate on whether he should spend another day rotting in bed when he heard his door crack open.

“Reggie, Reggie,” Sirius said in a mischievous voice.

“Sirius?” Regulus asked.

“Oh good, you’re awake,” Sirius said, before busting his bedroom door wide open and entering with Harry and Lupin right behind him, a white cake floating next to his head.

“Oh, Merlin, no,” Regulus groaned.

Blacks never celebrated birthdays, it just wasn’t done in most old pureblood families like theirs. Regulus was pretty sure that the first birthday Sirius celebrated was when he turned thirteen during his second year. James, a big believer in celebrating birthdays, had no doubt explained the custom to Sirius. This meant that the first birthday Regulus ever celebrated was when he turned twelve the summer after his first year. Sirius and his relationship was only a little bit tense then, and Regulus distinctly remembered Sirius stealing a bunch of chocolate from the kitchen, so that he could give it to Regulus.

It was terribly embarrassing then and it was terribly embarrassing now.

“Oh, Merlin, yes,” Sirius said, back before the three of them launched into a birthday song that grated on Regulus’s eardrums. Harry was laughing wildly by the time they finished. Sirius was looking at Harry with such unconditional love that Regulus felt strangely like crying. Lupin just looked a little sheepish, giving Regulus a small apologetic smile.

“Why didn’t you tell me your birthday was the fifth?” Harry said. “I hadn’t even thought to ask.”

“Blacks don’t celebrate birthdays,” Regulus said and annoyingly, Sirius said the same thing at the same time, doing an uncomfortably good impression of their mother.

“That’s weird,” Harry said simply.

“Exactly,” Sirius agreed. They spent the day together, the four of them, eating a little too much, and when Harry eventually passed out, drinking a little too much. Regulus hadn’t even had any alcohol since he began his second life, but it was nice to sit back and let himself go a little fuzzy, it eased the grief-filled burn inside of him.

“I’m glad you’re both here,” Regulus said before immediately cringing. He hated the way his words escaped him when he was drunk.

“Me too,” Sirius replied genuinely. “Bit weird though. Never imagined that this would be what the future held.” Lupin nodded in agreement. He was much drunker than the two of them, having downed glass after glass quickly. He also kept looking at Sirius out of the corner of his eye in a way that made Regulus feel distinctly uncomfortable, like he was about to be intruding on a very private moment.

“I’m knackered,” Regulus said. “I’ll see you in the morning.” He heard them whispering quietly to each other as he went off to bed.

They celebrated Harry’s birthday at the end of the month. They weren’t able to go out into the wizarding world, but Regulus managed to order some clothing to replace the clothes he had already purchased for past birthdays. When Sirius asked about the gift, Regulus explained in a hushed voice that he didn’t think Harry’s muggle family provided very good clothing for him. Sirius had to leave the room for nearly two hours to get himself under control after that, but by dinner, he was happily talking away again.

Two days before Harry was set to travel to the Weasley’s house for the World Cup, Regulus was woken by a strange shout. He was up and out of bed before he even fully processed it, sprinting across the wall quickly and shoving open Harry’s bedroom door. He was sweaty and shivering, his hand cupped around the scar on his forehead.

“Harry? What’s going on?” Regulus said, coming down to crouch next to the bed.

“My scar, it burns,” Harry hissed. He groaned in pain, curling in on himself as if he could protect himself from the pain coming from within.

“What’s happening?” Lupin said suddenly. He had his wand held out in front of him like he was expecting an attack. Harry groaned again before Regulus could answer. “Harry?”

It took a long couple of minutes for the pain to subside enough for Harry to speak.

“I was having a dream,” Harry explained. “Or it wasn’t really a dream. It felt real.” He detailed his bizarre vision about the Dark Lord in a house with Peter Pettigrew and his snake. “They were talking about something related to the Quidditch World Cup and... Bertha Jorkins.”

“What about the Quidditch World Cup?” Regulus asked, a cold sweat breaking out against his skin.

“I — I don’t know,” Harry explained. “But Voldemort was talking about, well, me. He wants Peter Pettigrew to get me for him.”

Regulus felt like he was going to be sick. “That’s not going to happen,” Lupin practically growled.

“Of course not,” Regulus agreed. They moved down to the kitchen shortly after. Lupin’s animalistic anger was making him tetchy, and he needed them to be in a more open space. Sirius joined them the moment they walked through the door.

“What are you guys doing up so early?” he asked blearily.

“Do you remember a Bertha Jorkins?” Lupin asked, rather than responding to Sirius’s question. Sirius looked confused for a second before he seemed to remember something.

“Oh, yeah. She was a couple of years older than us, wasn’t she?” he asked, though the question seemed rhetorical. “She was such a gossip. Do you remember when she was hexed after spreading a rumor about what's-his-name kissing that girl in the greenhouses?" Sirius said with a chuckle.

"No," Lupin responded uncertainly. "I don't remember that. How do you remember that?"

Sirius shrugged a little. "Guess she made an impression?"

"Don't tell me you had a crush on her," Lupin replied, though there was clear mirth in his eyes. Sirius flushed a little and gave Lupin a look that only the two of them could decipher.

"Lupin, we have more to worry about than Sirius's schoolyard crushes," Regulus interrupted. Harry was watching them with a small smile on his lips. It was a welcome sight after the pain he had just endured. His scar was clearly inflamed, so red and swollen that it looked like it could have been a fresh wound.

Regulus summoned a towel and cast a quick aquamenti to wet it. "Here, put this on your scar," he said. Harry gave him a grateful look before doing as he asked.

"What's it that's happening?" Sirius asked confusedly.

"We think Harry had a vision of Voldemort," Lupin answered. "Peter was with him." A look of uncontrollable rage crossed Sirius's face.

"They were talking about Bertha Jorkins and the Quidditch World Cup," Regulus explained. "They're after Harry." Sirius looked like he was about to snap, but Lupin walked across the room so that he could place a firm hand on his shoulder.

"What should we do?" Lupin asked.

"I don't know," Regulus answered. "I'm not sure if Harry should go to the World Cup, given everything."

"What?" Harry gasped, his face crestfallen.

"It's just not safe, especially if they are going to come after you there," Regulus said.

"No, that's not fair," Harry whined.

"It's such a huge event, you could get separated or attacked. I mean, who knows what could happen?"

"I'm going to be with Mr. Weasley. He'll keep me safe."

"I don't know," Regulus said, dubiously. He looked at Lupin and Sirius for help, but both of them were just watching Regulus and Harry with incredulous looks on their faces. "What?"

Sirius shook his head as if to clear it. "I think Harry should go," Sirius said while he looked up at Lupin. Lupin looked thoughtful for a moment, and Regulus noticed Harry giving Lupin an unmistakable pair of puppy-dog eyes.

“I think it’ll be okay,” he replied. “They’ll probably have a lot of security around.”

Regulus sighed. He looked back at Harry to see Harry already watching him, the same pair of puppy-dog eyes still firmly in place. “Please?”

“Okay, but please, please stay with the Weasleys. Don’t wander off, even for a second,” Regulus said exasperatedly.

“Yes,” Harry cheered. He left the room shortly after that, heading back to bed to catch a few more hours of sleep after the disturbance he’d had.

“What?” Regulus asked when he noticed Lupin and Sirius watching him.

“Nothing,” Sirius mumbled. Lupin didn’t answer though, he just kept looking at Regulus with an odd and keen look in his eyes.

Harry left the next morning. Lupin took him through the floo to the Weasleys’ house and came back only a little bit later. Sirius and Regulus were already sitting around a table in the library when he came in.

“We need to figure out where the remaining Horcruxes are,” Regulus said. They had agreed to work on the hunt for Horcruxes the moment Harry was out of the house. There was no reason to burden a kid with that kind of information, and they planned to keep that search as far away as possible.

“What about the one you stole?” Sirius asked. “It’s still in the house?”

“Yes, I was able to get the basilisk fangs. I plan to use one on the locket,” Regulus replied.

Sirius shook his head a bit. “Still can’t believe the Chamber of Secrets was real the whole time. I wish we could have added it to the map,” Sirius said to himself.

“The Horcruxes need to be destroyed beyond repair, but the magic that holds the soul fragment within them creates some sort of protection. I was only able to find a few ways to destroy them. Basilisk venom is corrosive enough to do it though.”

“You said the other one was with Lucius Malfoy?” Lupin asked. Regulus nodded. “I wonder if Voldemort gave anyone else one to hold onto.”

“Yeah, that would make sense,” Sirius said. “Was Lucius Malfoy the closest to Voldemort?” He looked to Regulus for the answer.

Regulus shrugged. “I don’t know. I was hardly in his inner circle at the time, but if I had to guess I would think Lucius was well-regarded because of his money and his access to the Ministry. I don’t think the Da — You-Know-Who really trusted anyone, so I doubt Lucius even understood what he was given.”

“Who else did he trust at the time?” Lupin asked.

“Snivellus,” Sirius answered automatically.

“That’s true,” Regulus answered. “But Snape already betrayed him, if he had something like that I feel like he might have told Dumbledore.”

“Dumbledore is a fool for trusting him enough to teach at that school,” Sirius said. Lupin gave him a disapproving look but didn’t vocally disagree.

“We shouldn’t rule it out,” Regulus conceded.

“Who else?” Lupin prompted after a moment of silence.

“I’m not sure,” Regulus answered. “If he was going by families, he would definitely choose someone from the Black family. Father was never marked though.”

“No,” Sirius said, his mouth falling open a little. “But Bellatrix was,” he said the words with a gasp. “That’s it! She was always talking about her Dark Lord in Azkaban. Ranting and raving about him coming back. She has to have one.”

“Of course,” Regulus breathed. “But where would it be now? Lestrangle Manor?”

“Doubt it. I’m pretty sure that was raided after they were all arrested. We could probably check though. I doubt anyone is there,” said Lupin.

“Where else would it be other than the Manor?” Sirius pondered.

“I think I know, but it’s not good,” Regulus muttered. Sirius and Lupin looked at him expectantly. “The Lestrangle Vault at Gringotts.”

Sirius’s eyes widened in shock. “How are we going to get into a vault?” Sirius asked. Regulus shrugged.

“I have no idea.” He stood and began pacing back and forth.

“For now, at least we can destroy one of them,” Lupin said. “In the meantime, I think we should tell Dumbledore. He might have an idea of how to… break into Gringotts.” Sirius laughed humorously.

“So, how do we destroy the Horcrux we have?” Sirius asked.

“There is no we,” Regulus said. “It’s not safe for anyone else to go in there. I will do it.”

“What exactly did you do to it?” Sirius demanded.

“It’s not important,” Regulus said, but upon seeing that Sirius wasn’t backing down he elaborated. “It was this old spell I found in a book, I thought it might separate the soul fragment from the item. It didn’t work.”

“Can I have a look at the spell?” Lupin asked, his voice suspiciously polite.

“No you may not,” Regulus replied. Sirius gave him a suspicious look and Regulus was sure this wasn’t the last he would hear of it.

They worked late into the afternoon, going over Regulus's previous research and exploring what they already knew. He already felt an odd relief knowing the location of at least one other Horcrux. He could only hope his brother's presence would help him figure it out faster. He refused to acknowledge the part of himself that felt oddly relieved to have Sirius around helping him. They had never worked together before, and Regulus was sure this alliance wouldn't last forever.

Lupin agreed to talk to Dumbledore on their behalf the next morning while Sirius began going over the notes Regulus had taken two summers before. Regulus was glad that he hadn't included all his notes on the Norse ritual with the rest of it. He was, for the most part, embarrassed about his choice to use the ritual after very little research. But more than that, there was a part of him that felt protective over it, like sharing it would ruin something.

"Kreacher," Regulus called. It was still early. Kreacher had stopped serving breakfast first thing in the morning, opting to wait until it was specifically requested after the summer destroyed Grimmauld's inhabitants' sleep schedules.

"Master Regulus," Kreacher greeted.

"I need you to go and watch over Harry today. If anything happens, come back and get me, Sirius, or Lupin," Regulus said. Kreacher nodded. It had been the oddest thing, but Kreacher seemed to have warmed up to Harry over the course of the last few weeks. While he still vehemently hated Sirius and Lupin, he seemed to always give Harry the best food at breakfast and dinner. Regulus didn't understand it, but he couldn't deny that he found it endearing.

With Harry's safety taken care of for the time being, Regulus finally made his way to his bedroom to pull out a basilisk fang. He wore dragon-hide gloves, but he could only hope that the venom wouldn't get through the hide and injure him. It was a dangerous game he was playing but there was no possible way he was letting Sirius and Lupin into the room with him. In the past, he had insisted on Kreacher waiting to rescue him when he went in the room, but he felt positive that the fang would work this time. However, he didn't know how the Horcrux would react, and he didn't want any magical backlash from the locket to injure anyone, especially Kreacher.

With that, he finally made it back to the parlor and slowly opened the door.

the locket.

Chapter Notes

The last time Regulus had entered the study to inspect the locket, he had immediately felt its effects. It was like being crushed under an unfathomable amount of weight. He remembered crashing to the floor before losing consciousness. When he entered the room this time, it was like nothing was wrong. It felt like any other room in the house.

He worried that the locket might be gone, but no, it was exactly where Regulus had left it, in the middle of the room, laying on the floor. He couldn't even hear the ringing that he used to hear. There was simply no effect at all. It might as well have been any regular locket, left on the floor like a piece of garbage. Regulus wondered if perhaps the Norse spell he had cast had begun to wear off. This was a good thing, he thought, although he wondered if the ringing sound might have come in handy in the future when looking for more Horcruxes.

Regulus still approached it slowly, despite its benign appearance, tiptoeing forward like he was sneaking up on a wild animal. Nothing outwardly changed though. With every step he took, however, his anxiety crawled higher and higher, but still, nothing happened. He dropped to his knees before the locket, basilisk fang grasped firmly in his hand. He was surprised they didn't shake.

He paused for a moment, consumed with the knowledge of what he was about to do and overwhelmed by the magnitude of it. Regardless of the fact that another Horcrux had already been destroyed, it felt monumental and terribly dangerous that he was about to destroy another one. He wondered if the Dark Lord, wherever he may be at the moment, would be able to feel it when it was destroyed.

It made him think of Harry's vision, of the Dark Lord sequestered away with Peter Pettigrew, planning to capture Harry, always Harry. He knew it would be incredibly dangerous if the Dark Lord discovered his Horcrux hunt, it might even mean that they would never find them, that the Dark Lord would collect them and make them impossible to locate, but on the other hand, he desperately wished that the Dark Lord would feel it. A vindictive part of himself wanted the Dark Lord to know someone was coming for him, to know that his days were numbered.

It felt like he had been approaching this moment his entire life as if every step and misstep he took in his first life was leading him to the locket. The object he had died to steal was finally going to be destroyed. It was all so much, he felt like he needed to really take it in. He couldn't help but feel a little dramatic though. Get on with it, he thought to himself with a shake of his head.

He brought the fang above him, grasping it between his two gloved hands, and brought it down as fast and as hard as he could. He had hoped that it would cut right through any protections the locket had, that it would destroy it the moment he brought it down, but of course, that didn't happen.

He could feel magic pushing against him, holding his hands just a little bit above the locket. The magic couldn't be seen, but he still felt like it was visible somehow. He felt like he could just make out the place where the protective magic was parting, dissolving below the corrosive effects of the venom. He was so close, just a few more centimeters and it would penetrate the front of the locket, and the soul fragment would be gone.

He felt the magic give way beneath him, and he pushed out a breath through his gritted teeth. Finally, he thought. It's gone. It has to be.

One moment, he was kneeling over it, and the next moment he was flat against the opposite wall. His back and head aching from where he had slammed into the wood. He dropped the fang and could only watch as it rolled out of reach. He couldn't lift his arms, it felt like they were glued down like some force was holding him there.

He blinked and the room was back to normal, no force, no weight, just an empty study. He was standing in the center of the room now. Everything was normal. It was normal. Right? He turned in a full circle to take in the room. Everything was where it was supposed to be, but then why did it feel wrong? He looked down and gasped. The locket was gone.

"Oh, you're back," a faint voice said behind him. He would recognize that voice anywhere, but he wasn't sure he had ever heard it sound so sad.

"James?" he said, turning slowly. James was now standing against the door, leaning casually against the wood, his arms crossed over his chest.

"Has it been a long time? It feels like it's been a while," James said. He looked distracted, almost like he was looking through Regulus rather than really seeing him. Regulus took an aborted step closer. James had been so tactile the last time he'd been here, running his fingers along Regulus's scalp and through his hair, but now, he seemed so far away.

"James," Regulus breathed. He couldn't seem to make himself say anything beyond his name. James finally looked at him, really looked at him. One second James was across the room and the next he was directly in front of him, his strong arms wrapped around Regulus. Regulus sank into him.

Regulus felt taller. He had never noticed before, but he wasn't a fourteen-year-old here. He was an adult. How strange. He let it go. For the moment, all that mattered was that James was here, he was with him, his arms firm and warm.

"I miss you so much," Regulus said. He choked on the words, a sob crawling out of him at the same time.

"I know," James said, rubbing Regulus's back as he spoke. Regulus stayed there, comforted for the first time in a while. He let himself relax, his eyes sinking closed as he rested his head against James's shoulder, his face tucked into his neck.

Something was wrong though, something he couldn't quite put his finger on. It was when he moved his face a little, when his nose rubbed against James's skin, that he realized. James didn't have a smell. This was distinctly odd because James's scent had always been one of Regulus's favorite things about the man. He wasn't even sure that he could name it exactly, but it was almost like a mixture of the woods and mint leaves. But now, there was nothing.

Regulus pulled back a little. James looked down at him with a sad smile. "You're not really here, are you?"

"I'm not sure exactly," James replied with an apologetic shrug. "I keep getting stuck places."

Regulus gave him a long look before something occurred to him. "Why didn't you tell me about Peter?"

"Peter?" James said, looking shocked. "What about him?"

"That he was the one who betrayed you, that he was a Death Eater," Regulus said. "Why didn't you tell me?"

"Oh, Peter," James said regretfully, like the loss of Peter's friendship was some great tragedy and not the direct result of that evil man's choices. "He was always complicated."

"Complicated?" Regulus demanded, pulling away so that James was forced to drop his arms. He didn't look very happy about it. "He's the reason you're dead. He betrayed you to the Dark Lord. He's the reason that Sirius —"

James tilted his head. "What about Sirius?"

"How can you not know? I thought — I thought you knew everything I knew. I don't understand how any of this works. Are you some kind of ghost? Are you just a figment of my imagination?" Regulus was full-on shouting now.

"I don't know," James said. He was still perfectly calm. "I'm sorry, Reg. I'm sorry."

"Don't call me, Reg," Regulus spat, though he regretted it immediately when James's calm face fell into one of hurt. "Sirius spent twelve years in prison because of your friend Peter."

"He what?" James asked faintly.

"Peter's the reason that Harry grew up in a house full of people who kept him locked in a cupboard. It's all his fault. He isn't complicated. He's a monster," Regulus said furiously.

"Sirius didn't do anything wrong," James said. "Why was he in Azkaban?"

"Because Peter framed him," Regulus replied. "He's had his entire adult life stolen from him because of that stupid rat."

"Oh, Sirius," James said regretfully.

"And another thing," Regulus said, the word rat reminding him of another bone he had to pick. "You're an animagus?"

James looked shocked. "Did Sirius tell you that?"

“He didn’t have to,” Regulus said. “I watched him drag a kid down the passageway under the Whomping Willow trying to get to Peter.”

“This is so confusing,” James admitted.

“Ugh,” Regulus growled in frustration. “Peter was hiding out as Ron Weasley’s pet. Harry was in danger for three straight years, and I had no idea because you never bothered to tell me about your stupid secret ability.”

“Er, well, it wasn’t just my secret to tell,” James said.

“I don’t care!” Regulus shouted. “I wish — I know I didn’t deserve it, but I wish you would have trusted me.” Regulus immediately regretted saying that.

James looked crestfallen. “I’m s— ”

“Just don’t,” Regulus said, throwing his hand up to stop James from speaking. “I shouldn’t have said that.” James gave him a long silent look.

“Where is Sirius now?” James asked with fake casualness.

“Of course, that’s what you’re worried about,” Regulus muttered. “He’s with me at Grimmauld. Don’t worry, Lupin is here taking care of him.”

“Oh, that’s good,” James said with a funny little smile on his lips. “How are they? Are they, you know?”

“Together?” Regulus said, filling in the blank.

“You know about that?” James asked, his mouth hanging open a little bit. Regulus rolled his eyes.

“Lupin wasn’t exactly subtle,” Regulus mumbled. “But I’m not sure if they’re really... things are different now. Sirius still has a long way to go I think. I don’t know. I don’t really care either way,” he said honestly.

“Lily was always jealous of them,” James said quietly. Regulus’s eyes snapped to James’s so quickly that it almost injured him. James looked away, his face a little guilty.

Right,” Regulus replied, a sharp pain blooming in his chest. “I’d like to leave now. Is this a dream? Can I just wake up?”

“I’m sorry I didn’t tell you about my animagus form,” James said. “I’m not sure if I would make a different decision now, but I’m sorry I hurt you either way.”

Regulus sighed. “You don’t owe me an apology, James,” Regulus admitted. “Whatever you did to me? I deserved it.”

James’s mouth gaped open. “How can you even say that?” he said.

Regulus blinked and the weight holding him to the wall was back. James was gone, but for once, that was a relief. The locket was still stuck to the ground in the center of the room, and Regulus needed to get to it. The locket, he noticed, had the beginnings of a dint on its face, but it wasn't enough to destroy it. The soul fragment must have still been intact, that was the only explanation for the effects he was feeling on his body.

He shimmed down the wall until he could drop to his knees on the floor. It took a while, and he could feel the exertion draining him as he went, but he had to keep going. There was no other choice. He dropped all the way to the floor, his chest hitting the ground with a loud thunk. The fang had rolled just out of reach, so he began dragging himself toward it.

When his gloved fingers finally wrapped around the fang, he breathed out a sigh of relief. He was panting heavily from the strain. He desperately wanted to succumb to the exhaustion rattling through his body, but he couldn't do it. He couldn't give in. He had failed so many times before and he wasn't going to give up now.

It was when he turned his full attention to the locket that things shifted. Though the locket was clearly fighting back, pushing him away, and draining him of all his energy, it clearly hadn't given its all yet. Thick black smoke started gushing from the locket, swarming up to the ceiling like a tornado.

"You're too late," James said. Regulus hadn't noticed him in the room. He looked around as best he could from his place on the ground, but he couldn't see him. "You had your chance to destroy this years ago and you blew it."

"What?" Regulus breathed. He looked back at the locket, finally finding James. He stood in the center of the smog, towering over Regulus like an angry god.

"If you had been better, if you hadn't died trying to steal the locket, maybe I wouldn't have paid the price," James said. He spoke in a dull, empty voice, his eyes hollowed out with cruelty. Regulus choked on a breath. "I was murdered because you weren't good enough."

"I know," Regulus whispered. "I'm sorry."

"Do you think I care that you're sorry?" James said. Regulus couldn't understand why James was saying all these things, but there was a part of him that knew he deserved to hear them. It was almost satisfying to hear James say the words he had been carving into himself for years. "I died because of you. Lily died because of you."

"Please," Regulus said. He didn't want to hear it anymore, and he definitely didn't want to hear about Lily.

"Do you know how I felt when I found out you died?" James asked suddenly. Regulus shook his head. "Relieved." Regulus felt like he might vomit. "Not a day went by that I didn't regret being with you."

Hopelessness spread through Regulus like a deadly disease. He wasn't surprised. He knew that James regretted dating him. He had known that for years. James had never outright said it, but he didn't have to. Regulus understood.

“I never wanted you,” James snarled. “You were my biggest mistake.”

He couldn't stop picturing the way James had looked at Lily when they finally began dating. There was so much love there, so much easy happiness. When James was with Regulus, he always looked like he was in pain, as if spending time with Regulus was torture. He never looked like that with Lily. With Lily by his side, he looked relaxed and happy and so deeply in love that nothing else mattered.

Regulus had wanted that love so badly, but he knew he didn't deserve it.

“Don't listen,” James said as gentle fingers touched Regulus's cheek. His voice was soft now, tender. “It's not me.”

“No one could ever want you,” James said coldly.

“You have to destroy it,” James said, the soft voice speaking over the cruel one. “Just a little farther.”

Regulus didn't understand what was going on. His vision was blurred from tears, and he could barely make out the room around him beyond vague shapes and colors. Still, the soft words from James made him push on. It didn't matter that James hated him, it didn't change anything, he already knew.

Instead, Regulus thought of Harry. The kind and gentle boy who had spent years being neglected by the people who were meant to love him, who finally had a chance at a family with Sirius and Lupin. James might have hated him, but James was dead and there was nothing Regulus could do about that. Harry, however, was alive and he deserved safety. Regulus dragged his body forward.

“That's it,” James said, his voice elated. The cruel James was saying something else, but every time he spoke, the kind James would talk over him, speaking directly into Regulus's ear. “You're so close now.”

Regulus's body ached. His arms hurt so badly that he wished he could simply remove them from his body to escape the torment. His chest felt torn up from where he had been dragging it along the ground. His hips and legs felt bruised and damaged. He wondered if he would die again, if this Horcrux would kill him.

He was almost there, the locket just barely out of reach, but he was so, so tired.

“You're pathetic,” James growled. “You should have stayed dead.”

“That's enough from you, I think,” James replied. He stepped out from where he must have been kneeling next to Regulus. He looked normal, Regulus realized. He hadn't noticed how uncanny the James in the smog looked until he saw the other James next to him. “I think if I just...” James trailed off, stepping into the smog and disappearing from sight.

“No,” Regulus choked out.

Regulus reached forward, he just needed to be a little closer. As if on cue, James's long fingers emerged from the smog once again and touched the locket, pushing it slowly toward Regulus. It was finally close enough.

"Destroy it," James said. He still sounded gentle, but there was a little urgency there now. "You can do it."

Regulus lifted the fang up as far as he could and brought it down onto the already damaged locket. He felt the metal crack beneath his weapon and heard screaming. It was a horrific noise, so loud that Regulus wondered if his ears would begin to bleed. The smoke swirled around the room in a violent storm.

It consumed Regulus. He was drowning all over again, choking and sputtering as the smog covered him. He thought he might be screaming, but he couldn't be sure.

"Oh..." James said, his voice growing faint. "I see Sirius now."

"REMUS!" Sirius was screaming. Regulus felt like his head was about to crack open, there was so much pressure behind his eyes.

"Floo Madam Pomfrey," Regulus heard Lupin say.

Regulus was a soul without a body. He couldn't lift his arms or open his eyes or turn his head. He couldn't even feel anything, no pain or exhaustion or cold. He simply drifted listening to Sirius and Lupin speak, their voices growing fainter and more garbled by the second. He almost felt peaceful, it was just that tiny little knot of jealousy unfurling in his stomach — James saying Lily's name over and over and over.

By the time Sirius figured out something was wrong, there were already two foreign wards thrown up around the room, so thick and impenetrable that he wasn't able to tear them down. He had noticed wards around his father's study only a few days after arriving at Grimmauld. They were unusually made as if sown with anger and desperation.

He had never encountered anything like them before, though he could feel right away that it was laced through with Regulus's magic. Sirius had grown sensitive to magic since becoming an Animagus, and it was especially easy for him to pick out the magical signatures of his blood relatives. He had asked Regulus about them on one of his good days but it took a while to get the truth out of him.

"It's the Horcrux," Regulus said, pointedly avoiding eye contact. "The one I stole."

Sirius hadn't been doing particularly well since he arrived at Grimmauld, but no day was worse than the one where Regulus told him how he died. Sirius had been living with guilt over his brother's death as a constant companion for nearly fifteen years. It was already bad before Azkaban, but it became a favorite of the dementors. He had been forced to relive every single moment when he could have reached out to Regulus, could have tried harder to save him, to connect with him. He had to relive all the times he failed to do so. The guilt was eating him alive.

Now, his brother was somehow miraculously alive. He looked like a teenager for some reason that none of them could figure out and he was spending all of his time with James's son, that had been bizarre to think about, but he was alive. Not only that, but he was letting Sirius near him, he wasn't sneering — usually, that is — and he was telling Sirius things, including him in his plans and taking care of Sirius on his bad days.

Sirius, for the first time in more than a decade, felt some of the rotten regret and pain ease in his chest, but with that removed came the bitter annoyance he always felt with Regulus. However, he at least knew how to deal with that feeling, he had dealt with it for years, but the new worry that accompanied it made it much more difficult to swallow. The worry regarding Regulus's continued safety consumed him like a gaping wound.

When Regulus offhandedly mentioned the fact that he had been possessed by Voldemort and nearly had his life and magic drained from him, Sirius nearly ripped his fingernails out. He was shaking so badly, that he had to leave the room to keep from losing it. Regulus just watched him with a bewildered expression, clearly not expecting Sirius's reaction. Sirius hadn't been expecting it either if he was honest.

The only person who seemed unsurprised by this turn of events was Remus. Remus, who Sirius was trying very hard not to think about. He had been so happy when Remus finally learned that Sirius was innocent, but with that came the knowledge that Sirius had once lied to Remus because he worried Remus might be a Death Eater spy. Sirius wasn't sure Remus would ever forgive him for that. They hadn't talked about it, they hadn't talked about anything actually, but Sirius was sure it was weighing on the man.

It's not that Sirius thought they would just pick up where they left off, so much time and suffering had separated them, but he had felt a spark of hope that first night in the shack, when Remus had looked at him with love, forgiveness, and relief. He thought there might be a chance. Sirius had always been a fool though. It took only a few weeks into the summer for him to realize that Remus could never feel that way about him again.

Though Remus was there at Grimmauld, working with Regulus, stealing Harry from his awful relatives, and taking care of Sirius when his grip on reality started to slip, he was distant. He kept Sirius at arm's length, giving him worried, soft looks like they were still something other than a tragic story, but never coming close enough to the decomposing life Sirius lived to mean anything.

Sirius nearly laughed at the fact that even after all the suffering he had endured, knowing Remus had moved on from him was somehow the worst of all of it. It wasn't like he spent all those years in Azkaban thinking Remus still loved him, he wasn't that naive, but he had stupidly thought that after Remus learned the truth that some of those feelings might spark up again.

But Sirius could see the way Remus was quick to look away, the way he avoided being alone with Sirius, until Sirius was too unwell to function on his own, the way he never lingered anymore like he had years ago. Sirius felt like he was mourning Remus all over again.

At the same time though, he understood why Remus didn't want him. Azkaban had wrecked his body. Years of starvation and lack of bathing and general care had left him scarred and boney, with sagging skin in odd places and teeth that might never recover. It was horrifying to perceive. Sirius had to work to stay away from any mirrors in the house. The thought that Remus, a man who had grown into his thirties aging like a fine wine, would want someone like Sirius was laughable.

Not that Sirius could ever laugh about it, not anything more than a bitter snicker that he offered himself while he viciously scratched and tore at the parts of his body that he hated. It was just another thing Sirius had to mourn, another thing offered as payment for his stupidity. He had made so many mistakes, sometimes it felt like he was drowning in them.

Things improved with Harry around. Harry was like a golden light brightening every room he walked into. He looked so much like James that Sirius sometimes had to do a double take to remember who he was talking to, but the moment Harry opened his mouth it was unmistakable who it was. He was so much himself, though he had Lily's pragmatic kindness. He was snarky and funny, though a little reserved at times. He laughed easily, and when he cared about a subject, learned with a viciousness that rivaled even Remus's bookishness.

Most bizarrely though, was Harry's unending loyalty to Regulus. They had an odd dynamic that Sirius didn't understand at first. Though they were clearly friends, Harry treated Regulus with a kind of deference that most thirteen-year-olds didn't even treat most adults they knew.

It took Sirius nearly all summer to realize that he treated Regulus like he was his father. He trusted him implicitly and obviously looked to him for support. It was sweet in a weird sort of way. Sirius thought he should probably feel jealous that Regulus got to experience that relationship with Harry when it should have been him or Remus or especially James instead, but those feelings never came.

If anything, Sirius loved seeing the strange soft side of Regulus. It reminded him of what Regulus had been like as a child, quick to tears and so gentle that Sirius worried he would be crushed under the darkness of their family. He had been, Sirius reminded himself often, he was crushed under it the moment Sirius left him alone in the dark hallways of Grimmauld Place. He did his best not to suffocate himself with those thoughts, instead, he resolved not to make the same mistake again.

That was why he was going upstairs to check on Regulus. He had left the library several hours before and had never returned. It was already evening when Regulus went to destroy the locket, and Sirius had ended up dozing off at a desk once Remus went to bed. Sirius had expected Regulus to come back though, he figured Regulus would at least update him once the locket was destroyed.

When Sirius jolted awake, his neck hurting due to his poor sleeping position, it was nearly four in the morning. He grumbled slightly as he stumbled up the stairs to check on Regulus. He had expected to find him in his bedroom, most likely asleep, totally unaware that Sirius had stayed up waiting for him, or tried to at least. He gave a cursory knock before busting the door to his room open. It was a bit rude, he would admit, but he was tired, cranky and his neck hurt.

It was empty. His bed was still made, and it looked untouched. He headed to the study next, but as he got closer, he could feel that something was wrong. If anything, seeing the empty bed at four in the morning, made the hairs on the back of his neck stand up. Once he reached the study door, he was swallowed whole by panic.

There were powerful wards keeping him out, wards he didn't recognize. While they felt like they were made of Regulus's magic, they weren't quite right. It was like some foreign entity had invaded a spell Regulus had cast. He thought back to Regulus's causal mention of being possessed by a different Horcrux. What if that was happening again? What if Regulus was being drained and killed at that very moment?

He didn't think any more than that. Hysteria took over, and he began clawing at the ward with everything he had. His magic wasn't affecting them at all. He tore and tore but nothing happened. Worse still was the fact that the wards were fighting back, and it wasn't just hurting him magically, but physically as well. When he pushed too hard in one specific spot, the ward seemed to reach out and cut him.

Blood was running down his arms by the time he grew too tired to keep fighting. He was breathing heavily, the panic still coursing through him, but now it was paired with dread. His brother was probably dead or dying right that second, and he couldn't do anything.

He slipped down into his Animagus form almost on instinct. The ward felt different when he was a dog. Most wards weren't meant to keep out animals, so it was unusual to encounter one that was still intent on excluding him. The oddest thing though was the fact that Padfoot could practically see the ward.

It looked almost like three different wards mixed together. He could see the one Regulus had originally placed on the room, they shimmered and sparkled like a river made of melted silver. Another one looked like mold. It had a rotten scent to it that would have repelled any normal animal, their instincts telling them to run the other way. The last one moved like black sludge, intertwining with the other two. That one was the most insidious, the one that had attacked him.

He tried to push through as Padfoot, but the black ward pushed back so violently that he was thrown against the opposite wall. He pushed back to his feet, but it was a struggle. He could already feel a bruise forming along his ribs. He walked back to the door but could find no solution. The thought of losing Regulus again began to swirl in his head like a venomous snake. He took a labored breath in, his ribs twinging in pain, and collapsed outside of the door.

"Sirius, what's going on?" Remus asked him a few minutes later. He must have been making a lot of noise if he had woken Remus from several floors away. He shifted back, and Remus immediately gasped. "What happened?"

Sirius looked down in confusion at himself. He had forgotten about the cuts on his arms and chest caused by the black ward. Physical pain like that, especially cuts, barely bothered him anymore. It was like he was permanently disconnected from his corporeal body.

"It's the wards," Sirius mumbled, gesturing toward the study door.

"The wards Regulus put up did this to you?" Remus asked, already pulling out his wand and casting quick, wordless healing spells on the gashes. Sirius sighed in relief, the tightness from the wounds easing.

"No, there are other ones up. I can't get through them, and Regulus is trapped in there. It's been way too long," Sirius replied.

"He hasn't come out all night?" Remus asked. He started poking around the wards, but gently, making sure not to incur any injuries.

"No, I don't think so," Sirius replied. "Remus, I don't know what to do. What if he's — what if —" Remus's arms were around him in a second, grounding and comforting him.

“We will find a way to get him out,” Remus said assuredly. “I think we should call Dumbledore.”

“Yeah, I was about to head there anyway to talk about Bellatrix’s vault,” Remus said.

“At four in the morning?” Sirius asked, lifting his head so he could look at him. Remus’s eyebrows furrowed.

“Ten?” Sirius asked. He hadn’t even realized that he’d fallen asleep. That meant that Regulus had been stuck in that room for nearly twelve hours. Sirius didn’t even notice his breath speeding up before Remus placed a palm on his chest encouraging him to calm down.

“I’ll go get Dumbledore now,” he said quietly and was gone. Sirius fell heavily against the wall and slid down to sit on the ground, hanging his head down between his knees. He tried not to let the thought of Regulus alone and drowning fill his head again, but it was nearly impossible to avoid the thought.

He hadn’t stopped thinking of the way Regulus had died since Regulus told him the story. He kept wondering if he ever would have known what happened to Regulus had he not come back. Would Sirius have lived out the rest of his days thinking Regulus was an unredeemable Death Eater? Would Sirius have died never knowing about the sacrifice his brother had made? The thought haunted him worse than anything else.

“Dumbledore is heading over,” Remus said, his voice was like opening a window to clear out the dust of Sirius’s thoughts. Sirius looked up to find Remus crouched next to him. “Have you eaten?”

“No,” Sirius said, shaking his head. “Not sure I could.” Remus looked unhappy about his response, but for once, didn’t argue. Sirius still hadn’t recovered his pre-Azkaban appetite. Most days he ate only because Regulus, Remus, and occasionally Harry would remind him. They always did it gently, asking him to sit with them while they ate dinner and quietly offering him a plate, but it wasn’t as subtle as they probably thought it was.

If Sirius was alone, he probably wouldn’t eat at all until he grew too tired to move. That’s how he had lived in the year he was hunting Peter, only eating when he absolutely needed to, and even then it was mostly just hunting animals and eating without really tasting them.

“Hello,” Dumbledore’s soft voice said. He was making his way up the stairs of Grimmauld, wand already drawn. “Remus mentioned you had a problem with one of your wards.”

Sirius got the bizarre, overwhelming urge to change into Padfoot and dig his teeth into Dumbledore’s throat. He knew the man was there to help them, but there was something about the impotent feeling of being incapable of helping Regulus himself that made him snappy.

“Yes,” Remus answered when Sirius remained hauntingly silent. He gestured toward the study door, and Dumbledore began casting complicated spells on it. Sirius wasn’t familiar with warding or curse-breaking, but it was clear Dumbledore was. Unsurprising given how old he was, Sirius would guess that he was nearly an expert in many magical topics.

The spell Dumbledore cast on the door eventually made the wards visible to the naked eye. They were like the ones Sirius could see as Padfoot, except with more color and detail. The silver lake one was actually glittery gold, so beautiful that it made Sirius’s eyes hurt. The mold was a mixture of greens, purples, and blues. It almost looked like a bruise. More than that, it looked textured, made of hills and valleys that traversed its length.

The last one, the black one, wove around the other two like vines. It reminded Sirius of devil’s snare. It gripped around the others like it was trying to strangle them. Every now and then a flash of red would spread along the black vines. Dumbledore continued to cast diagnostic spells that Sirius didn’t recognize, but Sirius couldn’t tear his eyes away from the black vine.

He kept picturing that vine working its way around Regulus, crushing him beneath its tight grip. He imagined his face growing red then purple, his lips blue from lack of oxygen. He imagined his silver eyes rolling back in his head as he choked on air, his ribs collapsing around his lungs. Sirius wasn’t even aware that he tried to attack the black ward again until Remus was pulling him back, already healing the fresh wound that had bloomed on his chest.

“Sirius, stop,” Remus said, his voice faint and panicked.

“It’s killing him,” Sirius argued, trying to fight against Remus’s strong grip. Dumbledore was watching him with concerned eyes.

“Do you think so?” Dumbledore asked, his voice giving away nothing.

“We have to get through,” Sirius begged.

“Yes, I believe we do,” Dumbledore said and began casting offensive spells against the black ward. He kept having to throw up shields to keep them from getting hurt as the ward fought back. Sirius’s breaths turned shallow again. It wasn’t working. Regulus was dying and there was nothing they could do.

“Breath, Sirius,” Remus implored as Sirius’s vision started to go black. He did his best to suck in air, but it felt like it had no effect on the tight feeling in his chest.

“Please,” Sirius said, though he wasn’t sure who he was speaking to or what he was even asking.

Dumbledore stopped, just long enough to pass his wand from his right hand to his left, but in that split second the black ward fell. Sirius didn’t understand how, but it was there one minute and gone the next.

“What?” Sirius breathed. Remus was still holding him back, refusing to let him go.

“I still cannot get through these other two, but at least they won’t attack us,” Dumbledore said. Sirius wiggled out of Remus’s grasp and transformed back into Padfoot. The black ward kept his Animagus form out, but the other two shouldn’t put up any resistance.

He rammed into the door so roughly that he felt it break as it swung open and in a split second he was inside the room. Regulus was laying in the center of the room, choking and coughing as the remnants of a dark, smog circled him. Next to Regulus was James, crouched at his side, watching as Regulus suffocated. Sirius ignored him. He had had more hallucinations of James than nearly anyone else, and he wasn’t going to let this one stop him from helping his brother.

Sirius transformed just as Regulus began to lose consciousness. “REMUS,” he yelled. The moment Regulus’s eyes shut, the wards around the room fell. The James hallucination stood up before disappearing as well.

“Floo Madam Pomfrey,” Lupin said to Dumbledore, his voice commanding. Dumbledore, a man that was certainly unused to being bossed around, didn’t even argue. “Is he breathing?”

“I don’t know,” Sirius sobbed. He leaned in close to Regulus and waited with bated breath. It was a long second before Regulus pulled in a shuddering breath through parted lips. Sirius placed his shaking hands on Regulus’s chest, his head falling forward as relief washed over him.

Remus placed a comforting hand on his back. “He did it,” Remus breathed.

“Did what?” Sirius responded. Remus reached over and very carefully lifted the destroyed locket that lay on the floor next to him. Sirius hadn’t even noticed it in his panic to get to Regulus.

“Another one down,” Remus said grimly.

It took Regulus nineteen days to wake up after destroying the Horcrux. He wasn't aware that so much time had passed at first. He didn't even feel rested when he first woke up. He felt like he had just gone to sleep after drinking too much, like a hangover had dragged him into unconsciousness.

When he first opened his eyes, his bedroom was filled with soft afternoon light. His eyes ached as he opened them, they felt dry and swollen. He blinked against the light, a headache already forming at the base of his skull. He lifted his hands to rub them, his arms protested the movement, twinging with pain, and he gave up. Every part of his body ached. He blinked blearily.

"Hey," a voice said. Regulus looked over to see James, fully dressed, sitting on the bed next to him, propped up against the bed frame with his long legs stretched out in front of him, one ankle crossed over the other.

"Potter?" Regulus asked, his voice scratchy from lack of use. James gave him a sideways smirk, though there was a sadness to it.

"Back to Potter, am I?" he asked, one corner of his mouth turning down into a frown.

"What's going on?" Regulus responded rather than answering his question.

"You've been asleep for a while," James responded. "Sirius has been so worried. He's like a mother hen." James chuckled softly, reaching two of his long fingers up to scratch his face. "I thought Remus was going to pull his hair out trying to take care of all of you."

"Sirius?" Regulus asked, his head still felt too heavy to lift off the bed, so he had to stay watching James from the odd angle. "What? Are you... here?"

"Not exactly," James said, that slight frown was back, though it was only visible for a second before James schooled his expression. "But I'm not stuck anymore I don't think. I don't understand it really, but I can see more." He looked down then, making direct eye contact with Regulus. His hazel eyes seemed to drill into Regulus's as if imploring him to understand what he was really saying. "But only if it's you."

"What?" Regulus repeated, his head felt like it was full of cotton, his thoughts fighting their way to the forefront of his mind and failing.

Suddenly the door to his bedroom cracked open. “Reggie? I heard talking,” Sirius said faintly. He was looking at Regulus when he opened the door fully, but Regulus swore he saw Sirius do a double take to where James sat, before looking back at Regulus as if nothing happened.

“That’s new too,” James whispered. “It’s not all the time, but... it’s something.”

“Can you speak?” Sirius asked, his voice laced with worry, walking forward to stand next to the bed, placing a hand on Regulus’s forehead as if he was checking for a fever. Regulus wondered where he learned to do that.

“What happened?” Regulus asked, doing his best to ignore James propped up next to him, watching the entire exchange with a small little grin.

“You destroyed the locket, but it fought back. We thought you might not wake up,” Sirius said. He pulled out a wand that Regulus recognized as Lupin’s and began casting a few basic diagnostic spells.

“It’s really gone?” Regulus asked. He tried to sit up again, but Sirius laid a heavy hand on his shoulder, holding him down.

“Let me call Pomfrey,” Sirius said, his voice unsteady in a way that Regulus found unnerving. Regulus suddenly understood what James meant by Sirius acting like a mother hen with the way he was flittering around the room, his hands moving erratically like he didn’t quite know what to do with them. “You’ve been out for a while. I’m not...”

“How long is a while?” Regulus asked him, but Sirius was already striding out of the room. “How long is a while?” he repeated to James. James cringed slightly.

“I’m not sure exactly,” James said. “I can’t see everything, but it’s been long enough for Sirius to start losing his mind.”

“That happened way before now,” Regulus said.

James chuckled, though Regulus didn’t think he meant it as a joke. His head hurt so badly. “I - I saw Harry,” James said, his voice dropping to a whisper again. Regulus smiled at him, though James’s eyes suddenly looked distant, a few unshed tears fighting their way out.

“This is the strangest dream I have ever had,” Regulus mumbled suddenly.

“Surely not,” James said with a lighthearted laugh, seemingly relieved to avoid talking about his son even though he was the one to bring him up. “You never had a dream where you could turn into a cat or something?” Regulus squinted his eyes at him.

“I did use to pretend to be a cat when I was little,” Regulus said. James laughed loudly.

“You never told me that,” James said, grinning down at him. Regulus smiled a little.

“Didn’t really mean to tell you now,” Regulus replied. “But it hardly matters, does it? It’s not like a hallucination can spill my dirty little secret.” Regulus laughed and only barely caught sight of the way James's face fell a little. He didn't have the time to ask about it, because suddenly the door opened and Sirius and Pomfrey were entering the room.

"Did I hear laughing?" Sirius asked confusedly. Pomfrey gave him a slightly odd look before she began casting spells on Regulus. It turned out that Regulus was both physically and magically fine, just exhausted. Sirius was sure that he had been attacked by the Horcrux, demanding multiple times in a row that Pomfrey check again to make sure nothing was wrong, but nothing was found. She gave him a potion for pain, and Regulus finally felt his headache recede.

"It's good to see you awake," Pomfrey said quietly. "I look forward to seeing you back at school." Regulus's eyebrows raised halfway up his forehead.

"What does she mean?" Regulus asked the moment he and Sirius were alone again. James was still in the room, though now he was lingering near the window, idly looking out on the street.

"It's September," Sirius said softly. Regulus thought about when he had last been awake, he was pretty sure Harry left on the twenty-fifth of August.

"I've been asleep for six days?" he demanded loudly. He was finally feeling well enough to sit up, but it was a struggle. Sirius reached back to prop up the pillows so that he could lean on them.

"No," Sirius said slowly, actively avoiding eye contact. "It's the fourteenth. You've been asleep for nineteen days." Regulus's mouth hung open in shock.

"Nineteen?" he asked faintly. "How is that even possible?"

"It was the Horcrux," Sirius shouted suddenly, finally looking Regulus dead in the eyes. "I don't think you should be alone the next time you destroy one." Regulus rolled his eyes. "I'm not joking," Sirius said solemnly.

Regulus sighed. "Yes, fine," he said, more intent on ending the conversation than actually agreeing to demands. "How is Harry? What did you tell him?"

"Oh, well, Harry's..." Sirius suddenly seemed very interested in the cobwebs in the corner of his room. He wondered when the last time Kreacher cleaned was.

"What?" Regulus asked, his heart rate climbing erratically.

"Let me just," Sirius said, trailing off before practically sprinting out of the room.

"What's wrong with Harry?" Regulus said loudly, trying to sit up more so that he could climb out of bed. Suddenly there were light fingers against his chest, lightly pushing him back down. "How?" Regulus mumbled as he looked up at James's unhappy face.

"I don't think you should move too much," James said seriously.

“How are you touching me?” Regulus asked. James just shrugged. “What happened to Harry? Is he okay?” He thought of the tears he saw earlier. What if Harry had been hurt?

“You need to calm down, you’re going to hurt yourself,” James said firmly. Regulus hadn’t even noticed that he had started hyperventilating.

Sirius came back in the room a few seconds later with Lupin in tow. Lupin had dark circles under his eyes like he hadn’t slept in days. He was holding a cup of tea in one hand, his other hand scratching at the scruff on his face.

“How are you feeling?” Lupin asked politely when he and Regulus made eye contact. He even sounded tired.

“Fine,” Regulus answered quickly. “What’s happening with Harry? Is he okay?”

“What happened?” Regulus answered, trying once again to fully sit up. He wanted to stand, he hated laying in bed like a dying Victorian child while Lupin and Sirius looked down at him. His chest ached though, and he ended up collapsed back on the pillows instead.

“It was at the World Cup,” Lupin said, his voice calm and collected.

“Oh no,” Regulus groaned, rubbing a hand across his eyes. “I knew he shouldn’t have gone.”

The explanation that unfolded made Regulus feel like he was going to stretch out of his skin. He was so stressed just hearing about it, even though he knew Harry and the others were completely fine. He couldn’t even imagine what it must have been like to learn about it in real-time. He was pretty sure he would have spontaneously combusted from anxiety had he been awake to hear Kreacher come back and tell them what was going on. He was glad that he had sent Kreacher to watch over Harry though, because Kreacher was able to apparate the kid back to Grimmauld with only minimal side effects when things started to go wrong.

Of course, this stressed Arthur and the others out so much that there was almost a full panic. According to Ron, Harry was standing with them in the middle of the woods looking for his wand when Kreacher showed up and apparated him away. Apparently, Kreacher had come back to tell them something was wrong, just as Regulus had instructed him to, and Sirius had told him just to bring Harry home immediately.

Apparating that far was nearly impossible for most wizards, not to mention that there were anti-apparition wards all around the area for the World Cup, so when Harry arrived he lost all the food he had eaten that day, vomiting all over the floor in the entryway before promptly passing out for several minutes. He was fine when he woke up, but Regulus doubted he would be inclined to apparate anytime soon after that.

They brought his wand back later that morning. Someone had stolen it from him and used it to cast Morsmordre. Just hearing about the spell made Regulus shiver uncomfortably. Clearly, the Death Eaters were in motion again if they felt comfortable casting that old incantation, especially somewhere like the World Cup. They still hadn't discovered who was involved, though Regulus had a few guesses given which Death Eaters were still around. So many of them had narrowly avoided prison sentences.

Overall, it was a horrible night, but at least Harry was safe. It didn't even seem like anyone was trying to abduct him, as the Death Eaters came just to cause a riot before scampering away like a bunch of cowards. Still, the thought of the Dark Lord out there planning attacks again, made Regulus feel vaguely ill. It was all happening again and there was still so much to do.

"Any updates on the Horcruxes?" Regulus asked. They needed to get a move on and make some headway into killing the Dark Lord. He was coming after Harry and the rest of the Wizarding World now.

"Dumbledore doesn't know how to get into the Lestrage Vault," Sirius answered. "Besides physically breaking in, which would be incredibly risky and nearly impossible."

Regulus nodded in understanding, already playing out different options for how they could break in. He had spent too much time waiting around, and if he had to risk dying or getting arrested after breaking into Gringotts, then that's what he would have to do.

"Technically you both could have access to the vault," Lupin said. Sirius and Regulus looked at him curiously. "There are no other heirs to the Lestrage vault beyond Rodolphus and Rabastan, and Bellatrix used to be a Black, so if all of them died, the Black family could lay claim to the vault."

"How do you know this?" Sirius asked curiously.

"I've been doing some research on the family," Lupin answered. "I needed something to do since you never let me sleep." The last words were spoken irritably, and Regulus noticed the flash of hurt on Sirius's face before he shrugged like he wasn't bothered. Lupin either didn't notice it or didn't care.

"So Rabastan, Rodolphus, and Bellatrix have to die in order for us to have access to the vault without breaking in?" Regulus clarified. Lupin finally dragged his eyes away from Sirius and nodded.

"So what? We have to kill them?" Sirius asked incredulously, though Regulus could already see him thinking about it.

"With all of them in Azkaban, we don't have access to them. Breaking in there isn't exactly any easier than breaking into Gringotts," Regulus said with a sigh. "So what do we do?"

"For now, I think we should focus on finding the others," Lupin said. "Leave the Lestrage Vault for last. We don't want someone to realize what we're after before we have time to find the rest of them."

Regulus sighed heavily throwing his head against the pillows twice in frustration. They didn't have any other leads on where to find them, which meant the Dark Lord would still be coming, he was out there planning on kidnapping Harry to do Merlin knows what with him, and Regulus couldn't do anything about it.

"I need to get to the school," Regulus said.

"Are you sure?" Sirius asked. "You're still pretty weak."

"Yes, I'm sure," Regulus said, rolling his eyes.

It turned out that he really didn't have enough energy to go right then. Lupin brought him dinner, which he was almost positive had some sort of sleeping draught mixed in, and Regulus slept for another twelve hours before he was finally able to get out of bed on his own. He made sure to call Kreacher the next day and thank him for rescuing Harry. He was beyond grateful that the elf was looking out for him.

Kreacher packed his trunk for him the next day and apparated him to the gates of Hogwarts. He had sent a quick owl to Dumbledore to let him know. The floo was closed at Hogwarts now that the new school year was in session. The gates opened for him automatically and he walked alone up to the school. It was midafternoon on a Thursday, so the grounds were completely empty as he traversed them.

It was oddly nice to walk up to the school in such a peaceful environment. He felt weirdly relieved to be out of Grimmauld Place. Sirius and Lupin were making him anxious. There was clearly something going on there, some mixture of complicated feelings that Regulus didn't care to know about. He certainly didn't want to be there when those feelings bubbled over. Somehow a castle filled with children was less dramatic than two emotionally stunted men orbiting each other.

He went straight up to the Gryffindor dorms, unshrinking his trunk and unpacking his stuff slowly. He would have to start his classes tomorrow, but for today he was planning to just take it easy. His energy had luckily returned, and he didn't feel as tired as he had the day before, but he still wasn't overly inclined to push himself too much.

He was only alone in the dorm for about an hour before classes must have let out.

"Regulus!" a voice called behind him. He just barely had time to turn around before Harry and Ron were hugging him. Regulus chuckled lightly.

"Hey, guys," he said, an easy smile on his face. It felt good to be back with his friends.

"I'm so glad you're okay!" Harry practically yelled when they both pulled away.

"They told you he would be," Ron said with a little laugh.

"Still," Harry said to Ron. "Did you just get here?" He directed the question to Regulus. Regulus nodded.

“We have so much to update you on,” Ron said. Harry immediately agreed. They headed out of the dorm, having a few free hours before dinner, and walked down so they could lounge by the lake. The weather was still nice, only halfway through September, and the sun was warm on their skin as they lay out in the grass. Hermione and Luna joined them just a moment later, walking down from the castle together to Regulus’s surprise.

It was interesting seeing them all together again. Ron had already shot up in height. It wasn’t exactly a surprise given how tall his brothers and father were, but he looked odd and gangly next to the rest of them. He was a bit too skinny for his lanky frame, and it was clear certain parts of his body were growing at different rates. His hands, for instance, looked huge compared to his arms, like a puppy who had yet to grow into his paws.

Regulus still felt short, but he didn’t hit his growth spurt until fifth year during his first life, so he didn’t feel too bad about being shorter. Luna was tiny compared to the rest of them, but Pandora had always been small, and Regulus doubted Luna would outgrow her by much, though he had never met Luna’s father. Harry and Hermione were still basically the same height, Hermione only an inch taller. Regulus wondered if the malnutrition Harry had dealt with would affect him in the long run or if he was just a late bloomer.

James was already taller than most of his friends by fourteen, Sirius being the exception. Sirius was the tallest of his friend group until partway through their fourth year when Lupin shot up and was suddenly towering over most students in his year and the years above. James outgrew Sirius by the time he started his fifth year. Pettigrew stayed the same height though, always the shortest among them. Regulus didn’t really notice at the time, but having seen Pettigrew as an adult he could suddenly remember how the boy looked trailing after his friends.

“All right,” Regulus prompted. “What do you have to update me on?” They all looked at each other like they weren’t sure who was supposed to start before breaking into laughter.

“Okay,” Harry said once he had calmed down. “What do you know about the Triwizard Tournament?”

It turned out that Ron was definitely not kidding about having a lot to update them on. He hadn’t had the time or inclination to talk to Lupin or Sirius much before leaving Grimmauld, but he was sure they already knew about the tournament. The tournament hadn’t taken place in more than a century, yet Fudge had decided that now was a good time to reinstate it. Regulus didn’t know much about it, other than the basic information he had learned in History of Magic during his first life, but Hermione was quick to fill him in.

The last tournament had taken place in the late 1700s and had been discontinued due to its high death toll. Apparently, there was very little regulation present during the last games, not surprising considering how wizards acted. Hermione went on a long rant about the possible safety issues this time around and what they would change to make sure no one died. Ron and Harry seemed terribly bored by this, clearly only interested in how exciting each task would be. Luna listened politely, nodding along with all the suggestions Hermione was making.

“We get to meet students from other schools too,” Harry said, his eyes wide with enthusiasm.

“Yeah, but you have to be seventeen to enter,” Ron said disappointedly. “It sucks, I would have loved to compete.”

“Ronald,” Hermione chastised. “It’s incredibly dangerous for a fully grown adult, it would be completely irresponsible for them to let an underage wizard participate.” Ron rolled his eyes.

“Maybe you can predict who's going to compete,” Luna suggested lightly. Ron’s disappointment evaporated on the spot.

“That’s a great idea!” he said. Hermione pursed her lips contemptuously but didn’t say anything.

“What schools are joining us?” Regulus asked, trying to distract them before the conversation was derailed.

“Beauxbatons and Durmstrang,” Hermione said cheerfully. Regulus raised his eyebrows in surprise. He didn’t know too much about the schools. There were a few distant members of his family that had gone to Beauxbatons, but he had never met them. His parents had talked about Durmstrang a few times when he was a child — mostly in relation to sending Sirius there as a punishment, but he didn’t think any members of the Black family had ever attended that school.

“Who is the new Defense teacher?” Regulus asked a few moments later.

“Oh, he’s so cool,” Ron said immediately. The others didn’t seem to agree with him quite as much, but Ron kept talking before any of them could interject. “He used to be an Auror.”

Hermione gave Regulus a curious look before speaking. “His name is Alastor Moody.”

“Moody?” Regulus breathed.

“Have you heard of him?” Ron asked interestedly.

Regulus had forgotten about Moody. The moment he heard the name leave Hermione’s mouth, he was suddenly transported back to the night Evan Rosier died. Barty, who was already living life on the edge of mania, had lost his mind, nearly lighting his father’s manor on fire in his rage and grief. Regulus didn’t even have the space to deal with his own feelings about what happened until weeks later.

He had never been overly close to Evan. Evan was a year older than them and Regulus spent most of his time by himself. He hadn’t really made friends until his third year, and even then it was just the kind of people that he studied with, rather than real friends. It wasn’t like his second life, where he spent every waking moment with Harry, Ron, Hermione, or Luna. Even outside of them, he had tons of peripheral friends, who he didn’t mind spending time with. Gryffindors really had it so easy.

It made Regulus think of Draco with a feeling of melancholy. Draco had his two friends, Crabbe and Goyle, but Regulus would bet everything in the Black vaults that those two weren’t actually friends and were instead borderline strangers whose fathers had told them to follow Draco around like a pair of goons. They were probably closer to each other than they would ever be to Draco. Regulus wondered if that loneliness contributed to his continued obsession with Harry.

The other Slytherin boys seemed just as lonely. Regulus had seen Nott lurking by himself numerous times. Zabini seemed to get along with the Slytherin girls, but even then, he was usually seen alone. Regulus pitied them. He had been them in another life, and he knew how intense that isolation could be.

He remembered seeing Sirius with his band of idiots, full of rage and rejection and grief for the brother who abandoned him. There were times when he was so angry that he would think Sirius wasn’t really friends with them, how it was all just an act. It wasn’t until James started his slow descent into Regulus’s life that Regulus realized what his brother had every single day. It was never for Regulus though, he was always an imposter. Even now, in his second life as a Gryffindor, he was nothing but a charlatan.

Evan Rosier had been just as lonely. He was a quiet kid, even by Slytherin standards. Regulus wasn't sure he heard him talk during their first few years of school. Barty was loud and obnoxious, but he still avoided the other Slytherin boys, opting to spend his time with the girls or people in other houses. It wasn't until Barty zeroed in on Evan in his fourth year that things started to change. Evan had been a fifth year, but he seemed more accessible than the other fifth years.

Regulus had barely been aware of it at the time, too wrapped up in his own life to notice what was going on, especially when he watched Sirius get shunned by his friends and nearly starve himself to death. Regulus remembered the desperation he felt during that time, the fear that one day he would wake up to find that Sirius had done something stupid and that Regulus would never see him again, even from across the Great Hall.

While all of that was happening, Evan was starting to sneak into Barty's bed every few nights. Regulus started dating James the next year and couldn't have cared less about Barty and Evan. They were usually gone anyway, sneaking off together to do Merlin knows what. When things imploded with James, and Regulus was left alone all over again, he finally realized that Barty and Evan had progressed far past the hook-up stage of their relationship.

Regulus didn't think that Barty was really capable of that kind of relationship, but he could see that he was trying for Evan, who turned out to be quite soft once Regulus got to know him. Barty was always haunted by a general lack of empathy and fiery energy that swept him up with every action he took. Barty was always on the edge of madness, but he tempered that madness as best he could for Evan.

When Evan was killed by Aurors, Moody specifically, Regulus was sure Barty was going to torture and kill every Auror he could get his hands on. He was going to kill them, then Regulus just because he happened to be around, and then himself. Regulus tried his best to keep him from losing his mind, but by the time Regulus died, he had cut Barty off completely. He was too young and inexperienced to deal with a person like that.

The grief that Barty felt was like nothing Regulus could understand. Even when Regulus discovered that James had died, he didn't think he felt like that. With James, it was like Regulus knew deep in his soul that he was gone, and he felt a quiet emptiness, a hollow feeling that consumed him the moment he let it. He never felt violent though. He wondered if it was because James had left him long before he died. He wondered how he would feel if he lost James while they were still together and if he would feel differently.

All this was to say that finding out that Moody, the man who had killed Evan and destroyed Barty in the process, was teaching at the school was not exactly good news. Though Regulus wasn't under some false idea that Evan was the epitome of moral rectitude, he was a Death Eater just like Regulus and Barty were, he still didn't like the idea of having to interact with his killer. Not to mention the fact that the few things Regulus had heard about Moody weren't very good.

"Yeah, it's so wicked," Ron said with excitement. "He's really been there, you know?" He spoke with clear awe and amazement.

"He's a little..." Harry trailed off uncertainly.

“Intense,” Hermione supplied. Harry nodded.

“Yes, exactly!” Ron nearly shouted, though Regulus was sure he didn’t mean it in the same way.

“Intense how?” Regulus asked. He tried to appear as relaxed as possible, to not give away that worry was beginning to prick down his spine.

“Well, for one,” Ron began, “he turned Malfoy into a ferret.” Harry burst into laughter just as Ron finished speaking, covering his mouth as his eyes crinkled with delight. Hermione looked like she was fighting laughter herself, the corners of her lips upturned slightly.

“Oh, yes,” Luna’s light twinkly voice interrupted. “I bet that was very scary for poor Draco.”

“Poor Draco?” Ron said incredulously, even as laughter continued to spill out of him.

Luna nodded seriously. “He did not look happy after the fact,” she said solemnly.

“Why did Moody turn Draco into a ferret?” Regulus asked, trying to reel the group back in so that he could get answers. Ron and Harry did their best to explain, though the laughter made it difficult to follow the plot. While Regulus understood that Draco could be a stuck-up and spoiled little shit, he couldn’t help but feel for him. Being humiliated by a professor like that had to be traumatizing. Regulus doubted Moody had anything good to say about the Malfoys.

“There was also his first class,” Luna said once they had finished their story.

“Yeah,” Ron said, nodding emphatically. “He went over the three Unforgivable Curses.”

“He did what?” Regulus said, now sitting up straight, earlier relaxation forgotten. “Even in your class, Luna?”

Luna nodded. “Yes, he said that we were very behind, that we should have already known.”

“Not just that,” Hermione said, an unhappy frown taking over her face. “He demonstrated the spells.” Hermione’s face grew vaguely ill as she spoke, and Regulus noticed that Harry also paled significantly. Ron seemed woefully unaware of their reactions, still processing how impressed he was by the professor.

“That’s insane,” Regulus said. “Does Dumbledore know he’s doing that?”

Ron shrugged. “My dad said that Dumbledore specifically asked Moody to come and teach this year. Maybe he was the one who told Moody to show us the curses,” Ron said.

“I doubt that,” Regulus muttered. He would have to look into it more, but there wasn’t much he could do at the moment. “Anything else?”

“Well, Snape is in an extra foul mood,” Harry said.

“Yeah, he’s been taking it out on Neville specifically. Moody hates Snape, which is brilliant, but it also means that Snape keeps threatening to poison someone at random this year,” Ron added.

“It’s so sad for Neville,” Luna said, looking off into the distance. “Herbology and Potions are important subjects to each other, you would think he would be better at the topic.”

“He probably would be if he had a competent teacher,” Regulus said, though he wasn’t one to talk. He had been taught by Slughorn, just as Snape had, and that man was far more interested in schmoozing with students than actually teaching. He would have never guessed that Snape would be even worse of a teacher.

“Oh, that reminds me,” Hermione said, taking out a small box from her bag. Ron groaned loudly.

“Not this, please,” Ron said. “Don’t drag Regulus into one of your schemes.”

“What’s happening now?” Regulus asked when Hermione opened her mouth to shout at Ron, a blotchy, unattractive blush already spreading across her face.

“I’ve decided to form a group,” Hermione said. “The Society for the Promotion of Elfish Welfare or S. P. E. W.” She spoke proudly, her shoulders squaring with determination. Ron rolled his eyes but didn’t interrupt again.

“What is this about?” Regulus asked curiously.

“Now you’ve done it,” Ron muttered, but Regulus’s question was all Hermione needed to launch into her explanation.

Regulus had never given much thought to house elves. He had been practically raised by a few, though Kreacher was the only one who was still alive, but as a child, he saw them more like furniture than actual beings. It wasn’t until he was about eight years old that he and Kreacher became friends. It was after his father yelled at him for something or other, he couldn’t remember, and he ran down into the kitchen, trying with all his might to keep his tears from falling. It was always worse when they actually cried.

Kreacher found him down there, in a place he wasn’t supposed to be, curled up under the kitchen table. Sirius had been taken to an event with his mother so he wasn’t home, and Regulus was feeling especially lonely. Kreacher told Regulus to go back to his room, which Regulus did and he later brought him a warm bowl of freshly made stew. It was strange what small gestures meant so much to a child faced with emotional neglect. Regulus was so comforted by it, that Kreacher started becoming his go-to elf whenever he needed something.

They had been through so much by now, especially given Regulus’s death and rebirth under Kreacher’s watchful eye. Despite that, Regulus still had never considered Kreacher the same way he considered his friends or even other wizards. As he listened to Hermione rant and rave about house-elf treatment and her plan to free them all, he couldn’t help but think about his mother and what she would think.

When he first started his second life, he had felt so indifferent to the woman, but somehow, now that he had witnessed her portrait screaming at Sirius over and over again, he felt a strange vindication knowing that he would be disappointing her. He would have hated it during his first life, but she was long dead now and he wasn't a kid anymore.

"All right," Regulus said. "Can I have a badge?" He reached his hand out, his palm flat in the air. Hermione seemed beyond shocked by his question, but that was nothing compared to the others.

"You actually agree with her?" Ron asked incredulously.

"Wow," Luna said, her voice more surprised than he had ever heard it.

Hermione shook herself out of her shock and placed one of the badges in his waiting hand. He took it and immediately charmed it to stick to his jumper. He wasn't sure that he agreed with what she was saying, he was sure he would need to think about it more, but it was clear that it was important to the girl, and he wasn't about to deny her.

They went to dinner later and Regulus looked around curiously for Moody, but he wasn't there. The thought of seeing the man made his stomach churn, and he felt an uncomfortable prickle at his skin. Later that night, after the others had gone to bed, Regulus and Harry stayed up by the fire.

"Did Sirius tell you about my scar?" Harry asked.

"No," Regulus responded. "What about your scar?"

"It's been hurting again. I told Sirius about it, but he kind of... freaked out. I thought he was going to come storm the school and get himself caught again," Harry said.

"That does sound like him," Regulus said. "You've been talking to him since you got back?"

"Yeah," Harry said, smiling all of a sudden, "he gave me this mirror so we can talk to each other. He said the mirrors used to belong to him and James."

Regulus raised his eyebrows a bit. "Oh, well, that's great," Regulus said. "I'm glad you're able to talk to him. When was your scar hurting?"

"Since the world cup, basically on and off," Harry said, the corners of his lips turning down slightly. "I don't know what it means."

"Me either," Regulus admitted with a sigh. "I really don't know much about cursed scars, but I'll do some research and see what I can find. In the meantime, do you want me to get you some pain potions?"

"Yeah, that would be great," Harry said with a little smile. "Thanks, Reg."

"Of course," Regulus said, smiling right back. He felt comfortable being back at Hogwarts. It was strange how much the Gryffindor common room had become home for him in the last few years, but he found himself oddly content being there.

“I think I’m going to head to bed,” Harry said, standing up and stretching. “You coming?”

“I’m going to stay up a bit longer,” Regulus said. “Night.” Harry left a moment later, and Regulus let himself sink further into the large, comfy armchair. He let his eyes unfocus, staring into the fire as the flames jumped around. He was tired, but he also felt oddly restless, like he wasn’t ready to sequester himself off to bed.

“That was always my favorite chair,” James said suddenly.

“Ahh!” Regulus shouted, nearly jumping out of the chair. “Oh, Merlin. Don’t do that!”

“Sorry,” James said. He was sitting where Harry had been a moment earlier. It was the oddest thing because the last time Regulus had hallucinated James, he had been dressed in jeans and a t-shirt, like he was just lounging around the house, but now he was wearing a Gryffindor Quidditch sweater and black pants. Regulus wondered if his memories of James were affecting the hallucination. “What’s with the badge?”

Regulus followed James’s eye line and looked down at the S.P.E.W. badge. “Ah, Hermione gave it to me,” Regulus said.

“Who’s Hermione?” James asked, tilting his head.

“You don’t know who — she’s a Gryffindor in Harry’s year,” Regulus explained, feeling confused. “She’s trying to free all the house elves.”

“Oh,” James said with a chuckle. “That’s a noble cause.”

“Do you think so?” Regulus asked, genuinely curious.

James shrugged. “Li — err, someone else I used to know mentioned it a few times, that it was crazy that we owned house elves like that,” James said, looking chagrin at his misspeak.

Regulus rolled his eyes a little. “You don’t have to censor her name,” Regulus said.

“You didn’t appreciate me mentioning her before,” James said.

“She was the love of your life, James,” Regulus said. James’s face did something bizarre that Regulus didn’t understand so he powered on. “And she was Harry’s mum. I don’t dislike her. I’m — I’m glad that you found a way to be happy, even if it wasn’t with me.”

“You’ve changed so much,” James said quietly after a long beat of silence. “But you’re still so sad.” Regulus let out a chuckle against his will.

“Yeah, well,” Regulus said with a helpless shrug. “You always saw the worst of it.”

“Did I?” James said, his eyebrows furrowing. Regulus looked at him for a long moment.

“No, I guess not,” Regulus said. “Barty probably saw worse.”

“Barty?” James said, looking offended for a split second. “Why Barty?”

Regulus shrugged. “He was around,” he answered honestly. “And after Evan, he was just as sad.” He had never spoken about those months, but now they weighed heavily on his mind, thinking about Moody and Evan and Barty.

“Did you and him —” Regulus looked at him when he trailed off, but James couldn’t seem to finish his question.

“Yes,” he finally answered. James’s offended look was back.

“You and Barty?” James shouted, he didn’t sound angry, but there was a hurt there that Regulus found unbelievably funny.

“You had a wife and a kid without me,” Regulus said. “I hardly think you have any reason to be upset.” Regulus couldn’t stop giggling as he spoke, the little pout on James’s lips was just too funny.

“I just can’t believe it,” James said shaking his head. “I mean, I guess he was always sort of — I could see the appeal.” James seemed to be talking more to himself than to Regulus as he said it.

Regulus burst out laughing again after just getting himself under control. “Please,” Regulus begged. “The thought of you having a crush on Barty —”

“I never said I had a crush on him!” James yelled. “He was just, you know, tall. I can understand.” Regulus felt like his stomach was cramping from laughing too much. “I’m still not happy about it though.”

“Your unhappiness is noted,” Regulus said through one last laugh.

They were quiet after that, just enjoying the fire and each other's company. Regulus was so comfortable that he almost forgot that he had basically been talking to himself.

Regulus had a lot to catch up on. He was already very behind in all of his classes. The professors intent on preparing students for the workloads they would face during fifth year O.W.L preparation had already loaded them up with classwork. There wasn't anything for Defense Against the Dark Arts beyond reading up on the Unforgivable Curses. Regulus felt like he was already knowledgeable enough about the topic without doing additional research.

Surprisingly, the class he had the most work for was Divination. They were studying Oneiromancy, a form of divination that involved prophetic dreams, and Regulus was already two weeks behind on keeping a dream journal. Harry read a few of his entries to Regulus while Ron and Hermione listened in, each of them doing their best to hold back laughter at Harry's ridiculous, made-up predictions.

Regulus didn't usually remember his dreams, and given that he had been unconscious for more than a fortnight, he didn't have much to work off of. He idly wondered if he could use his hallucinations of James as fodder for the dream journal, but he thought that might be pushing his luck a little. Whether or not Trelawney was a fraud, he still felt like she was capable of figuring out that he wasn't who he claimed to be, and having dreams about Harry Potter's dead dad was probably not the best way to protect his secret.

Ron joked with them about making up his own predictions, but Regulus could tell that he was lying. He was clearly very into Divination and Luna, when she was around, was always asking him about it and encouraging him, but the derisive scoffs Hermione made every time the subject was brought up were obviously bothering him. Regulus would have to figure out a way to fix that issue.

After Luna's suggestion that Ron try to use Divination to figure out who would be competing in the Triwizard Tournament, Regulus witnessed him use five different methods, all with an increased pensiveness that was starting to make Regulus nervous. When Regulus asked what he had seen, Ron shrugged his shoulders and changed the subject without answering.

He saw Moody for the first time two days after he arrived. Regulus had never actually encountered the man in person, though he had heard stories about him from other Death Eaters during his first life. Moody had known Barty's father, though he strongly disliked him. This endeared Moody to Barty despite their placements on opposite sides of a war. That is until Evan's untimely and violent death.

So Regulus had heard about him, certainly, but seeing the man in real life was another thing altogether. He had an air around him that made Regulus distinctly uncomfortable, though he couldn't articulate why. His magical eye was horrifying to look at, the way it swiveled around as if it had a mind of its own made Regulus feel vaguely ill.

It didn't help that Moody seemed especially interested in Regulus. He came hobbling into the Great Hall for lunch on Friday and slowed significantly when his possessed eye landed on Regulus's face. Regulus was mid-swallow when he noticed the ex-Auror, and he nearly choked on his food when they made eye contact.

Moody looked oddly surprised to see Regulus, though his face immediately fell into a scowl a moment later. Regulus thought he might stop to talk to them, but he kept walking passed, though at a glacial pace. Regulus noticed him speaking to McGonagall a bit later, and he could see that both professors were unsubtly glancing over at him.

Through the weekend, Regulus caught Moody watching him several times. The weather was still nice so he and his friends were spending most of their time outdoors trying to soak in the sun, but Regulus would still spy Moody tottering around the grounds, his eyes always glued to Regulus. Even when Regulus would make direct eye contact, Moody didn't always look away.

Late Sunday night once the common room was empty, Harry pulled out the mirror to call Sirius.

"Sirius. Sirius!" Harry called. Regulus cast a subtle silencing charm around them, so they wouldn't draw too much attention.

"Harry?" Remus said, his voice scratchy like he had been asleep. His face materialized on the other side of the mirror. The hair on one side of his head was stuck up at odd angles and heavy bags hung beneath his eyes. "Is everything okay?"

"Yeah, everything's fine. Where is Sirius?" Harry asked cheerfully. Regulus could tell that Remus tried to hide it, but there was a quick cringe and eye roll upon hearing Sirius's name.

"One moment," Remus mumbled before setting the mirror down.

"He didn't look too good," Harry said, sounding a little awkward, once they were alone again. Regulus nodded in agreement, though he wasn't sure what else to say. He wondered what was going on with them now that they were finally alone.

"Harry!" Sirius said suddenly, a wide smile on his face, all his teeth brightly on display. It didn't fool Regulus. He could see the stress lines forming at the edges of his brother's eyes.

"Hey, Sirius," Harry said with a grin. They chatted for a few minutes about Harry's week. Originally, Sirius had given him the mirror for emergencies only, but with Regulus still unconscious Harry had taken to calling him twice a day for updates. Now that Regulus was back at school, Sirius had compromised by asking Harry to call him once a week.

It was risky with Sirius still on the run, but Regulus thought it was for the best that they kept in touch. They needed each other, anyone could see that, and the casual updates about school were clearly calming some of the anxiety Sirius was dealing with.

"Has Harry told you about Moody yet?" Regulus asked once their conversation died down.

“Only a bit,” Sirius said. “He was always an odd guy.” Regulus thought that was a little bit kind, all things considered.

“He keeps giving Regulus weird looks,” Harry said. Regulus snapped his head over to look at him.

“What?” Regulus and Sirius said at the same time.

“You haven't noticed?” Harry asked Regulus with a disbelieving look.

“Of course, I’ve noticed,” Regulus defended. “I just hadn’t realized that you noticed.”

“Why is Moody giving Regulus weird looks?” Remus asked, clearly trying to get them back on track.

“I don’t know,” Regulus answered honestly. “Did either of you know him?”

“Vaguely,” Sirius said. “During the first war, he was a member of the Order. He was always intense.”

“Yeah, I met him a few times,” Remus added. “I don’t think he ever trusted me though. He was always suspicious of me.”

“I think he was just like that,” Sirius said quickly, though there was a stark look of guilt on his face for some reason. “He never trusted anyone.”

“Do you think Dumbledore told him who you are?” Harry asked after a beat of silence.

“I doubt it,” Regulus said, though he couldn’t be completely sure. “Moody doesn’t seem right in the head.”

That effectively ended that conversation. Regulus wanted to bring up the teaching of Unforgivable Curses, but he also didn’t want Sirius to overreact. Harry was right to be worried about him. Regulus could tell just from the few minutes through the mirror that he was struggling to keep himself under control.

Later that night, Regulus found himself wondering if James had ever known Moody and what he would have to say. He wished he could ask him, the real him, not the weird hallucination that was following him around. As the night dragged on and sleep continued to evade Regulus, he wished he could at least talk to the hallucination version so he could have some company, but apparently, that wasn’t how things worked.

He tried to think about him and even whispered into the silent dorm room, calling out for him. When that didn’t work, he walked downstairs into the common room and tried again, hoping that now that he was alone James would turn up, but he never did. Regulus curled up in an armchair near the dying fire waiting and eventually fell asleep. When he woke up a few hours later as the sun began to rise, a warm blanket had been tucked around him, though he had no idea who had done it.

Regulus had his first class with Moody the next week. He felt strangely nervous walking into the classroom, but he did his best to shake it off, following Harry so they could sit next to each other. Ron was nearly bouncing in his seat with excitement, as were several of the other Gryffindor boys. Neville looked like he might get sick at any moment, and Hermione kept shooting him uncertain looks.

When Moody stomped his way in and announced to the class that he would be putting them under the Imperius Curse to demonstrate its effects, Regulus's mouth hung open in shock.

"But you said it was illegal, Professor," Hermione chimed in right away. Her voice was uncertain and a little shaky. Regulus admired her bravery. Moody, who up until that moment had his eyes glued to Regulus's face, swung his magical eye over to look at her.

"Dumbledore wants you to know what it feels like," Moody said gruffly. "If you'd rather learn the hard way — "

"Dumbledore wants you to do this?" Regulus demanded, not even realizing that he was about to speak until the words were out of his mouth.

"You don't need to stay if you're against learning it," Moody replied immediately. Regulus didn't respond, he wasn't about to leave the rest of them alone in the classroom, but he would definitely be following up with Dumbledore after the fact.

Moody carried on with the lesson, though Regulus could see his magical eye glancing over at him repeatedly as he cast the curse on several different students. None of them seemed to be able to fight it off, but that was hardly surprising. Regulus wasn't sure that he had ever known anyone who could throw off the curse, even when it was cast by someone inexperienced.

The way the Imperius Curse worked was very different from its sister curse, crucio . Rather than removing all ability to think and forcing someone to do anything within their power to remove the curse, imperio made it so the person affected by it wanted to keep the spell on for as long as possible. Fighting against it was like trying to fight off a sleeping draught, it pulled you under in a way that was comforting, soft, and easy. It's why people under the curse seemed so relaxed because any worries someone might have were removed by the curse, all choice and decision-making were taken away.

Regulus found it especially hard because he always felt like he was trying to fight off his own worries, trying to bury them or escape them. Being under the Imperius Curse was like taking muggle drugs, something he had never done but had watched more adventurous Slytherins do. He felt a freedom that he never once experienced in his regular life. Needless to say, he was extremely worried about Moody casting the curse on him.

He watched him cast it on Dean, then Lavender, then Neville, each without issue. Harry was next and Regulus clenched his hands into fists, shaking slightly as he watched Harry walk up to the front of the classroom to endure an Unforgivable that he shouldn't even know the name of.

“Imperio,” Mood said loudly. Harry’s eyes went vague and unfocused in the way the others had. Regulus had to look away, the look on Harry’s face making him feel sick. He didn’t look back until he heard the sound of a desk being knocked to the ground.

“Now, that’s more like it!” Moody growled with what sounded like a mixture of excitement and annoyance.

Harry had managed to fight it off. Regulus had no idea how he did it, but he had shaken off the curse. Regulus breathed a sigh of relief that had been caught in his chest since the moment he entered the classroom.

“Very good, Potter, very good indeed!” Moody shouted. There was something about him that felt so familiar, something in the way he yelled, like chaos lived right below the surface of his skin. Regulus couldn’t put his finger on it though. He was appropriately distracted when Moody decided to cast the Imperius Curse again on Harry.

It wasn’t good to have the curse cast on you, Regulus knew that very well. It deteriorated someone’s brain over time. Usually, if it was just a small thing, then someone might not feel the long-term effects, but if someone was under the curse for months or years, then they would begin to lose parts of themselves. Surely Moody knew about the risks, he was an Auror after all, so why was he risking Harry’s health like this?

He cast the curse on Harry a total of four times, each time Harry throwing it off a little bit faster before he finally moved on.

“Black, you next,” Moody snapped, the trademark growl fading from his voice as he spoke. Regulus stood up and walked to the front of the classroom, still thinking about Harry. He would need to check in with him after the class was over, maybe go to Pomfrey to see if she could make one of the potions known for helping fight the aftereffects of the curse. His thoughts were stuck on that when Moody cast the spell.

The effect was immediate.

The last time Regulus had been under the curse it was because of Barty. Regulus had experienced the curse many times when he was a child, both of his parents using it freely when they needed him or Sirius to behave. It was never kept on them for very long, they were always worried about damaging their heirs too publicly.

Regulus could still remember the stories about Cygnus, his uncle, keeping his cousin Bellatrix under the curse for an entire year when she was only eight years old. It was a “secret” in the family, though of course, they all knew about it. Bellatrix never quite recovered from the effects, the damage done by that year turning out to be irreversible.

Barty never used the curse on Regulus until after Evan died, but he had lost his, albeit faulty, moral compass and had started using Unforgivables like they were the only spells he knew. His Imperius was different than either of Regulus’s parents’ were.

Walburga’s Imperius was always slightly painful. Regulus thought it might because of how much she used the Cruciatus Curse, as if the curse could never quite leave her wand, like little bits of dark magic would seep through every single time she cast a spell. It was still relaxing to have, but there was an itch to it like being bitten by a bug, a small little stinging sensation.

Orion's Imperius always fell right to the back of Regulus's mind. When he was little, he thought it was because his father wasn't very good at casting the spell, but when he was older he realized it was actually because his father was far more skilled with the curse than his mother. He could cast it in a way where someone wouldn't know to fight, even if they had the capability. It was insidious. The instructions would come from the back of Regulus's thoughts as if he had come up with them himself.

Barty's, on the other hand, was like being swept up in a hurricane. It was still unavoidable and inescapable, at least for Regulus, but it was also clear the moment it was removed that the Imperius Curse had been present.

Regulus had watched Barty cast it on wizards and muggles several times, but it wasn't until after one particularly difficult raid that Barty cast it on him. Regulus had wanted to go home, he was filthy, covered in ash and dirt after several other Death Eaters decided to burn down a handful of empty houses, and he just wanted to shower and sleep.

Barty, however, was feeling rowdy and energetic and wanted Regulus to stay over. When Regulus finally put his foot down, telling Barty firmly that he was going home and would see him tomorrow, Barty cast imperio on him the moment his back was turned. Regulus wasn't worried in the moment, too swept up in Hurricane Barty to think about it, but later he had the wherewithal to realize how much danger he had been in.

Barty just ended up making him stay and get drunk, eventually removing the curse an hour later when he felt like Regulus was too tipsy to leave safely and more willing to stay and spend time together. Regulus still left the moment Barty was passed out, drool pooling out of his mouth as he slept on the parlor floor. That was only a few days before Regulus really cut ties with the man.

Moody's Imperius was a lot like Barty's, though both more controlled and more emotional at the same time. There was a precision to it that Barty hadn't had in his early twenties, that he would never have now that he was dead. It no doubt came from years of practice and had Regulus had the capability, he would have been unsettled by the thought. It was more emotional because there was anger and vindictiveness to it.

Pretend to be a cat . Regulus dropped immediately to his hands and knees, not a single thought entering his mind. It was as easy as falling asleep.

Regulus was pretty sure that he was crawling around on the ground meowing, but his thoughts were too disconnected to really think about it. It didn't matter much what he was doing. It's not like he really cared what happened to him.

Regulus was barely alive, experiencing a life that was never meant for him, he was meant to be decomposing at the bottom of a lake inside of a cursed cave. He had no claim on his new life, he had no connection to it. He wasn't needed, everything would work itself out without him here. He had felt such guilt for stealing this second life, but he didn't need to. He could let go.

"This isn't how I imagined I would feel watching you pretend to be a cat," James said suddenly. Regulus gazed at him impassibly. James's mouth was turned down into a frustrated frown, his eyes distinctly unhappy.

Regulus meowed at him. He thought that he might have been trying to say something, but he couldn't use words when he was pretending to be a cat. James's frown deepened even further, and Regulus watched as he looked between him and someone else, as if he was trying to come to a decision about something. Regulus didn't much care what it was about. He meowed up at him again.

"Who is he looking at?" he heard someone whisper.

James finally looked down at him again before slowly crouching in front of him, his eyes focused and burning in a way that Regulus hadn't seen in a long time. He reached a hand out as if to touch him, though it stopped a few inches from Regulus's face.

James took a deep breath. "I wonder if I just," James muttered before finally letting his fingers brush the side of Regulus's temple.

One second Regulus was pretending to be a cat and the next he was gone.

Someone was slapping him in the face, which Regulus thought was both rude and oddly hilarious. He had never found being slapped in the fact hilarious before but suddenly he felt a little laugh spilling out of his mouth. The person slapped him again. Not very hard, just a small thwack across his skin, a sting spreading across his cheek. It took him a moment to realize his eyes were closed.

“James?” he said once he finally managed to open his eyes. They were still unfocused a bit, but he could tell that he was laying on the ground and that James was hovering over him. James laughed a little, sounding supremely uncomfortable for a second.

“James?” another voice repeated. Regulus looked over to see Moody half crouched looking intently at his face.

“He calls me that sometimes,” Harry said with an awkward chuckle. Right, Harry, of course. “Cause it’s my middle name.”

“And you call him by his middle name, do you?” Moody asked, giving Harry a piercing look. Harry shrugged a little, looking like a trapped animal, before turning his attention back on Regulus.

“Are you all right?” Harry asked. Regulus could see the line of tension marring his forehead.

“Fine,” Regulus said, pushing himself up so that he was sitting. “What happened?”

“You were crawling around and meowing like a cat, staring up at the ceiling or something, and then you just passed out,” Ron said, his face a mixture of laughter and concern.

“We thought you were talking to someone,” Harry said quietly, giving him a complicated look.

“Never seen someone collapse because of the Imperius Curse,” Moody said gruffly. “Guess this is just a class of oddballs. Let’s go again.”

“No!” Harry nearly shouted. “I mean, no, I think I should take Regulus to the Hospital Wing.”

“I’m sure Mr. Black can take it,” Moody disagreed. “Back to your seat, Mr. Potter.” Harry looked mutinous for a second.

“It’s fine,” Regulus said quietly. Harry reluctantly walked to his seat. Regulus pushed himself up to his feet and tried to shake off the feeling of disconcertment. Moody was watching him closely, giving him a very strange look.

“ Imperio ,” Moody said. Regulus didn’t even have a moment to feel the effects of the spell before he was gone, lying unconscious on the classroom floor once again. Harry put his foot down this time. The moment Regulus opened his eyes, Harry was dragging him out of the classroom toward the Hospital Wing.

“I think it’s okay, Harry,” Regulus said with a chuckle.

“You don’t know that,” Harry said seriously. Regulus rolled his eyes good-naturedly at the boy, he was such a worrier, just like his father.

“How are you feeling?” Regulus asked Harry quietly as they walked.

“What do you mean?” Harry asked, confusedly. Harry had finally stopped dragging Regulus, and if Regulus had to guess, was feeling more relaxed now that they were no longer in Moody’s presence.

“It’s not good for you to have the Imperius Curse cast over and over again like that,” Regulus said.

“Oh,” Harry mumbled, looking focused for a moment like he was searching his feelings. “I do have a bit of a headache, but I’m sure it’s nothing.” Regulus nodded instantly.

“I’ll catch up with you,” Regulus said, peeling off from him.

“What about the Hospital Wing?” Harry called after him.

“Don’t worry about it,” Regulus said, throwing the words over his shoulder. “I’ll meet you at lunch.” He could see Harry throw his arms up in defeat, but Regulus was a man on a mission now, and Harry no doubt already knew that he couldn’t stop him.

He had already decided to get Harry a dose of Comfrey’s draught after watching Moody cast the Imperius Curse on the boy, but hearing he had a headache just convinced him more. He had originally planned to go to Pomfrey, but now that he was out of class another idea came to him. He could kill two birds with one stone.

Comfrey’s draught was used to fight the effects of the Imperius Curse, but it wasn’t perfect and it needed to be taken pretty quickly after enduring the curse to work. Pomfrey, while a skilled healer, wasn’t a Potions Master. It would be better if Regulus went right to the source.

Regulus remembered Sirius reading about the draught when they were children, telling him the disturbing tale of Bernard Comfrey, who had set out to cure the aftereffects using a thistle-based potion, intending to create a draught based around the ground effects found in the plant.

Comfrey, while ultimately successful in creating the potion, destroyed his life in the process of developing the potion. He was the first person to discover the addictive effects of the Imperius Curse, and while testing different iterations of the potion, he would have someone cast the curse on him repeatedly, causing him to develop a debilitating addiction to it. Sirius, of course, thought this terrible fact was something meant to be shared, a malicious little smile on his face as he recounted the damage done to Bellatrix. Sirius had never liked their cousin, not that Regulus could blame him exactly. It always just made Regulus feel sad hearing about it though.

As he made his way through the castle, he couldn't help thinking about the vindictiveness in Moody's Imperius. He shouldn't have a reason to hate Regulus, right? But then again, the way he treated Draco indicated otherwise. Hearing about Moody turning Draco into a ferret and taunting the child made Regulus uncomfortable. He wondered if Moody hated Draco because his Death Eater father was able to slither his way out of punishment for his crimes. It would make sense for an ex-Auror.

Maybe Moody hated Regulus for the same reason. Regulus did technically have a Death Eater father himself, one who was currently evading punishment. There was no way Moody could know that Sirius was innocent, the entire world still thought he was guilty, and on the run, so why would Moody think any different?

It felt so unfair that a professor would target students because of who their parents were, it's not like they could help it.

Speaking of which...

"Hello, Severus," Regulus said, barging into Snape's office the moment he saw the man enter the room, following him through the door that hadn't yet closed.

"Black," Snape said with a sigh, sounding as if he had been expecting Regulus to come to speak with him.

"We need to talk," Regulus said. There was an uncomfortable bubbling of rage inside him, he felt like he wanted to scream and rave at the man, like he wanted to start spitting out insults. He didn't know where the feeling came from. While Snape made him angry, he wasn't usually one to attack someone that way. He might be a Gryffindor in this life, but he liked to think he had at least a little self-control.

Besides, it wasn't the right way to deal with a man like Severus. If Regulus were to start yelling, then Severus would no doubt just yell right back, and they would get nowhere. Yet Regulus couldn't shake the urge to scream. He had to work to swallow it down. It felt like he was fighting for control like he was riding on the tail end of a broom with someone else driving.

"About?" Snape prompted when Regulus didn't continue right away.

"I need a dose of Comfrey's draught," Regulus said.

"Go to Pomfrey, then," Snape said with a sneer. Regulus felt the wave of fiery anger for a second, but he took a deep breath and tried to fortify himself.

"You know," Regulus said, finally wrestling the feelings of anger down far enough that he felt like he could manage this conversation. "I always hated Potions."

Snape turned away from him to mess with something on his desk like this conversation was below him.

“Do you know why I hated Potions?” Regulus asked blandly. Snape didn’t respond, but Regulus knew he was listening. “Because of Slughorn. He was always interested in the Black family, you know? He couldn’t get at Sirius, not really, with him being sorted in Gryffindor and all, but he could get to me. Every single time I was in that classroom, he was always trying to talk to me, always trying to get me on his side. I hated it.”

“Is there a point to this?” Snape drawled, finally turning back around to look at Regulus.

“Have you ever known me not to have a point?” Regulus asked instantly. He and Snape might not have been friends during his first life, but they did know each other and surely Snape hadn’t forgotten that much. “You were always good at Potions though, weren’t you? Even without Slughorn’s unwanted attention.”

“I didn’t need Slughorn to teach me about Potions,” Snape said in response. It was obviously meant to be an insult, but it was exactly the in Regulus needed.

“And yet, somehow, none of your students are even remotely competent in the subject,” Regulus said lazily. Snape’s sharp eyes snapped to his.

“Slughorn couldn’t teach to save his life,” Regulus interrupted. “Half of his students couldn’t even pass their O.W.L.s and the other half had to teach themselves. I would have thought you, one of the few students who excelled in the class, wouldn’t have repeated the same mistakes.”

Snape opened his mouth, his face twisted furiously.

“Except you are somehow worse,” Regulus continued before Snape could speak. “You’re so caught up in your silly vendetta against a dead man that you can’t see how blundering you seem.”

“These students — ”

“They’re kids,” Regulus snapped, the anger from earlier fighting its way back to the surface again. “They don’t know anything. At least Harry I understand. He doesn’t deserve it, but I understand why you might be focused on him. James was awful to you, not that you weren’t just as terrible to him. But Neville?”

“Longbottom is — ”

“Dumbledore might not care that you’re terrible at your job, but you know who I am now and I’m not just going to let you act like this. Not anymore,” Regulus said. Snape glared at him so fiercely that Regulus started to wonder if he would just start throwing curses at any moment. “Besides,” Regulus added, “we have bigger issues.”

“And what’s that?” Regulus could see the way the words escaped Snape, it was clear that he didn’t want to ask, that he didn’t want to seem invested in whatever Regulus was about to say.

“Moody,” Regulus said. Something flashed behind Snape’s eyes, some indecipherable emotion, but it came and went so fast that Regulus had no hope of interpreting it.

“What about him?” Snape asked, through clenched teeth.

“There is something wrong with him,” Regulus said simply.

“What makes you say that?” Snape asked carefully, but Regulus could see the keen interest now. He no doubt had Snape’s full undivided attention.

“He’s casting Unforgivables on students,” Regulus said simply, not bothering to clarify which of the three curses Moody was using. Snape’s eyebrows raised slightly.

“That’s why you want the draught,” Snape said. It wasn’t a question, not exactly, but there was a curiosity behind it.

“Yes,” Regulus said, not bothering to specify that it was Harry specifically that needed it. He didn’t think that would get him very far.

“Dumbledore asked him to come to teach because of the Tournament,” Snape said, answering an unspoken question Regulus had. Regulus counted it as a win that he was being even moderately helpful.

“We’ve had some bad Defense teachers,” Regulus muttered, “but this seems over the top. I heard about what he did to Draco.” Snape’s face softened almost imperceptibly, before hardening in anger at the memory of Moody’s Transfiguration-based punishment. “I think he has issues with students whose parents are Death Eaters.”

Snape gave him an uncomfortably perceptive look. “He has a problem with you, doesn’t he?”

Regulus shrugged. “I can handle it,” Regulus defended. “But I doubt Draco will do well with Moody targeting him all year.”

Snape sighed, his shoulder lowering in defeat. “I’ll talk to Dumbledore,” Snape finally conceded.

Regulus nodded. “And the potion?”

Snape gave him a long, silent look. “I’ll make it today. The Slytherins are going to need it after their class as well.”

“Good,” Regulus said. “And if I find you’re targeting Neville — ”

“I’ll handle it,” Snape snapped, though there was a thoughtful look on his face.

Regulus left his office shortly after that, feeling far more settled than he was before. He would have never expected to find an ally in Severus Snape, but he knew appealing to his need to prove how intelligent he was, and his desire to protect Draco and the other Slytherins, would be the best route.

Despite this conclusion, he began to feel that overwhelming anger seeping in the farther away he walked from Snape's office. He wanted to go back in there and start yelling again. They had reached some understanding, Regulus thought, so why did he feel like this? He tried to parse through his thoughts, but his emotions had no starting point, at least not one he could easily find.

Lunch was still being served, but he felt off and didn't want to bother going to the Great Hall, especially if there was a risk of seeing Moody. He decided to head back to the dorm before he had to head out to Care of Magical Creatures. He had only just closed the dorm door behind him when he fell to his hands and knees.

The feeling inside him was difficult to describe, but it felt almost like a piece of him was ripping apart, like someone was reaching into his soul and tearing it in two. He grunted uncomfortably, squeezing his eyes shut against the feeling. It wasn't pain exactly, at least not in the traditional sense, but he still screamed when the ripping sensation swelled. A moment later, it stopped.

"I'm sorry, I'm sorry," someone was mumbling. Regulus was still breathing heavily, trying to get his body back under control. "I didn't know how to separate, I was just trying to help. I'm sorry, are you okay?" the person babbled.

"What was that?" Regulus asked in a stilted voice.

"I'm so sorry, Reg. I'm sorry." Regulus looked up to find James kneeling in front of him, his face twisted with worry. "I just wanted to help you fight off the Imperius Curse. I didn't realize it would... I'm not really sure what happened actually."

Regulus shook his head to clear it and settled back to sit on his feet. "You were able to fight off the Imperius Curse?" Regulus muttered questioningly.

"Well, I never had anyone cast it on me," James answered. "So I don't know."

"Lucky you," Regulus said, finally climbing to his feet, pointedly ignoring the upset look that crossed James's face. "What did you do then?"

"I'm not sure," James said with a shrug. "I just felt like... if I could be there, I could help." Regulus stared at him in silence for a long moment.

"That makes no sense," Regulus responded. James shrugged again, looking oddly like Harry when he was feeling uncomfortable.

"There is something wrong with Moody," James said suddenly, speaking the words like he might be overheard.

“Yes, that much is clear,” Regulus replied with a solid nod.

“No, you don’t understand,” James began to say but was cut off when the door to the dorm opened. Harry, Ron, and the other boys came barreling into the room.

“Were you talking to someone?” Harry asked, he sounded like he was purposefully keeping his voice light.

“No,” Regulus said quickly.

“You missed lunch,” Ron said, shoving a poorly wrapped sandwich into Regulus’s hands.

“Thanks,” Regulus muttered. Harry was still looking at him with something akin to suspicion, but Regulus wasn’t sure what to make of it, and he didn’t intend to ask for clarification if he could help it.

James disappeared the moment Regulus’s back was turned, so when he spun back around the room was empty. The memory weighed on him though. What had actually happened to cause him to black out when James touched him? It wasn’t possible that James was real, was it? Surely not. All ghosts Regulus had known could be seen by everyone, not just one specific person. He had never heard of that happening. He resolved to look into it when he had the time.

They walked down to Care of Magical Creatures together a bit later. Harry, Ron, and Hermione were all suspiciously quiet about what animals they had been learning about, and it was making Regulus nervous. Hagrid gave him a big smile when he arrived before gesturing over toward several crates filled with what looked like crabs.

There were so many of them in each crate that they were crawling all over each other and shaking the sides of the boxes as they bumped into the walls. It was upon closer inspection that he realized they were not crabs, but instead some weird bastardized version of a crab. They were about ten inches long and looked like pale double-ended scorpions. The smell of sulfur and rotting fish permeated the area.

“What are those?” Regulus asked, a cringe etched on his face.

“They are Blast-Ended Skrewts,” Harry said, clearly trying to hold in a laugh. Regulus gave him an incredulous look. “They’re a hybrid that Hagrid created.”

“Made of Manticores and Fire Crabs,” Hagrid said proudly. Regulus had to consciously keep himself from vomiting.

“They were six inches long when we started school,” Hermione said, an unhappy look on her face. That was an unusually fast growth rate, Regulus noted disturbingly.

Hagrid was beyond excited about the growth, Regulus discovered, and talked at length about it during class. He was delighted by the way the project was proceeding and suggested that they each make time to come down to his hut to observe the skrewts’ extraordinary behavior.

“I will not,” Draco said flatly, “I see enough of these foul things during lessons, thanks.” Regulus didn’t catch Hagrid’s response, he was too distracted by the way the skrewts seemed to scurry away from Draco when he got too close to the side of their box. Regulus didn’t know if the headless creatures were capable of experiencing fear, but he guessed it was some kind of animal response that they were having. He didn’t understand what about Draco was triggering it though.

In the entrance hall later they saw the posting for the Triwizard Tournament, telling them that the students from Beauxbatons and Durmstrang would be arriving Friday the 30th of October. It was a little over a month away, but students were already buzzing about it. Regulus was reluctantly excited, he had to admit, though there were still so many unknowns making him nervous.

“I wonder if Cedric knows? Think I’ll go tell him,” one of the Hufflepuffs muttered before wandering off.

“Cedric?” Ron asked, an odd tilt to his voice.

“Diggory,” Harry clarified. “He’s planning to enter the tournament.”

“How do you know that?” Regulus asked, watching as a light blush spread across Harry’s face.

“He told me,” Harry mumbled, sounding a bit unwilling to say the words.

Regulus shook his head, doing his best not to roll his eyes. It wasn’t Harry’s fault that he had a crush on the Hufflepuff boy, it seemed like half the students had crushes on him these days, but Regulus still wasn’t fond of him.

“That idiot, Hogwarts champion?” Ron asked with a small chuckle, escaping the conversation quickly as he charged into the Great Hall for dinner.

The school was buzzing with the news, and it was all anyone would talk about over the next few days. The twins were apparently trying to figure out a way to enter, but without prior knowledge of how they would check ages, they were at a loss for how to plan.

Harry asked him quietly one night if he was planning to enter since he was well over seventeen, and Regulus nearly cried from laughter, before telling him, “No, Harry, only idiots would enter that Tournament.” Harry laughed along, agreeing with him. Regulus guessed that Harry had to deal with enough attention as it was. He was glad the age limit was set to seventeen though, there was no chance Harry would be forced to compete.

this chapter is several days late because everything has been breaking in my apartment this week and it has been a huge mess.

this chapter is a bit of an interlude to the story before we really get into the action of fourth year, but i hope you enjoy it nonetheless.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Regulus wasn't sure what he expected Snape to do after their conversation. Snape hadn't ever been very receptive to others, at least during Regulus's first life, and he didn't expect Snape to be very receptive now.

He kept thinking about how funny it would be if Snape showed up to class acting like a kindly old woman, treating everyone to baked goods and forehead kisses. Of course, that image made for a ridiculous thought, but, if Regulus was honest with himself, he didn't think that Snape was going to change at all. Regulus was already planning how he would double down on his earlier statements and vague threats when Snape continued to treat his students badly.

However, Snape did change. Not a lot and not all at once, but the next time they had his class he seemed much more neutral than before. He didn't attack any Gryffindors or vanish anyone's potion when they didn't do a good enough job. Draco was being his usual loud and obnoxious self, and Snape actually chastised him. Though he didn't take any points away like he would have if it wasn't a Slytherin, Regulus still thought it was growth.

The most surprising thing was when the class ended, and Snape asked Neville to stay behind. Neville swallowed so loudly that everyone in the class could hear it. Draco and the other Slytherins all snickered at the boy, but the Gryffindors were just giving him looks of sympathy. Regulus gave Snape a stern look, but Snape was pointedly ignoring him. He decided to wait nearby to check in with Neville once he was done.

It took Neville nearly half an hour to leave Snape's classroom, cutting well into their lunchtime. Harry, Hermione, and Ron had offered to stay behind with him, but he just waved them off. He wanted the freedom to talk to Snape if he had to, and he didn't think it would set a good precedent if he did it in front of the others. He wasn't sure how he expected Neville to look when he left Snape's classroom, perhaps in tears or enraged, but regardless it was definitely not with a huge smile on his face.

"Hey, Regulus," Neville said cheerfully. "Sorry, were you waiting to talk to Snape?"

"No," Regulus said. "I was waiting for you. What did Snape want?"

“Oh,” Neville said, looking oddly touched that Regulus would wait for him. “It was the strangest thing. I thought he was going to poison me or something, but instead, he gave me this.” Neville held out an old potions book, it was well worn and nearly falling apart, but Regulus was still able to make out the title.

“He gave you a book on advanced Herbology in potion making?” Regulus asked, reading the title again to make sure he had it right.

Neville nodded vigorously. “Yeah, I mean, I knew Herbology and Potions had a lot of overlap, obviously plants are used to make potions, but I didn’t realize how many experts have masters in both subjects. Snape said that he was talking to Sprout about my performance in Herbology, and they think I might be able to pursue both.”

“What?” Regulus said, shaking his head to clear it. “But you’re terrible at Potions.” Neville raised an eyebrow at him. “Sorry,” Regulus added, a little embarrassed.

“I am aware of that,” Neville said with a little laugh. “Or at least, I was aware of that.” He laughed again, the wide smile still plastered on his face. “Snape said,” Neville whispered, looking around like someone might be listening in, “that he was trying to push me cause he thinks I’m one of the only ones in the class that might actually be good enough to get a Mastery in Potions.”

“Wow,” Regulus said loudly. Neville shushed him.

“I’m not supposed to tell anyone,” Neville said. “So don’t mention it to him. But he actually... apologized.”

“Apologized?” Regulus asked.

“I know,” Neville said with a nod.

“That’s great, Neville,” Regulus said after a beat, still trying to process what Neville was saying. “I’m — Well, I’m surprised.”

“You’re telling me,” Neville said, but he wasn’t looking at Regulus anymore. He was clearly getting distracted by the new book in his hands, so Regulus let him go. He wanted to go in and ask Snape if he meant what he said, but the more he thought about it, the more it made sense.

Many of the tutors he had as a child would be harder on Sirius or himself in subjects they were already good at, trying to encourage them to get even better. Usually, if a tutor had no comments about their performance in a subject, it meant they weren’t very good. He decided not to bring it up with Snape, he would keep an eye on him and Neville, but for now, he was pleasantly surprised.

Ron was asking Neville what was going on at lunch, but Neville just gave him a vague answer and went back to eating. Ron shared a look with Regulus, but Regulus could only shrug. He didn’t fully understand it either.

Snape, it turned out, was far more helpful than Regulus would have thought, because the next time he went to Defense Against the Dark Arts, Moody had decided to stop casting Unforgivable Curses on the students. Regulus breathed a sigh of relief the moment he heard it, even if Moody followed it up with a vague threat to the students.

“You better stay aware though, I might cast it on anyone at any time. CONSTANT VIGILANCE!” he said so loudly that half the class nearly jumped out of their chairs. Regulus thought it was mostly an empty threat. Or at least he hoped it was.

Regulus visited Snape the evening after Defense, and Snape let him in without even bothering to complain.

“Moody has moved on from casting the Imperius Curse,” Regulus said, taking a seat in the chair across from Snape’s desk.

“I told Dumbledore about it,” Snape said simply, watching Regulus with only a vague look of annoyance.

“And?” Regulus prompted. Talking to Snape was like de-gnoming a garden, tedious and exhausting.

“He seemed surprised and said he would talk to him, but he defended him regardless. Said he was a good Auror, but that he just had an odd way of teaching,” Snape said. Regulus thought about it for a moment before responding, trying to mull the words over carefully, looking for anything he might have missed.

“I don’t think Dumbledore is a very good Headmaster,” Regulus muttered, settling on the simplest fact. Snape, to his surprise, laughed, though only for a moment.

“You’re probably right,” Snape agreed solemnly. Regulus could tell that Snape was waiting for him to bring up the thing with Neville, but of course, he never did.

After that things calmed down a bit, but Regulus knew the worse had yet to come. They had a few weeks of normal classes before the students from the other schools finally arrived. James didn’t show up again, which Regulus was chagrined to admit he was disappointed by. It was pathetic to be so attached to a figment of his imagination.

Regulus had a lot of reading to catch up on for Muggle Studies, but luckily Hermione was there to help him through it. She dropped the course after her hectic third year but still was more knowledgeable than most of his classmates due to her muggle upbringing.

They were beginning to cover things like muggle artwork which Regulus found very fascinating, starting with music. There were several enchanted instruments in the classroom, that Burbage informed them muggles played by hand. He thought back to all the t-shirts he had found in Sirius’s old bedroom and wondered if he would get extra credit if he brought them. Their professor also began assigning muggle fiction that they would be discussing at the end of term.

“Now,” Professor Burbage, “your assignment for next class is to read this novel. I don’t expect you to finish it in one week, but you should make significant headway before our next meeting. You can’t read it all in one night. Do not procrastinate.”

She flicked her wand and a stack of novels began floating down the aisles, dispensing one on each desk. They all looked like they had been read many times, some of their covers were distorted from wear and tear. Regulus grabbed his before it could reach his desktop, flipping through the first couple of pages.

“ Great Expectations by Charles Dickens is one of the most popular muggle novels ever written. It is a very enjoyable read,” she said cheerfully.

Burbage was a dirty liar. Great Expectations was not only not enjoyable, but was in fact the most boring book Regulus had ever been forced to read, and he had read a lot of boring books in his life. If Dickens had still been alive, Regulus would fly to his house and Avada Kedavra him. He kept trying to pull it out in between classes and every time would find his eyelids growing droopy.

“Hey,” Hermione said, elbowing him for the third time in an hour. “Didn’t sleep well?”

“No, I slept fine,” Regulus said. “This book is going to be the death of me.”

“Oh, what are you reading?” Hermione said, tilting her head around to look at the cover. “I quite liked that book, but it is a bit dull at times.” Regulus looked at her with surprise and she laughed quietly. “I am fully capable of admitting when something is boring.” She eyed Ron, who sat across them in the library, his head flat against the table as he snored softly. “To you anyway,” she added.

“Want to just tell me what happens?” Regulus said with a hopeful smile. Hermione shook her head.

“No,” she said with another laugh. “I can’t wait to hear your thoughts.”

“Maybe muggle books just aren’t for me,” Regulus muttered as he reopened the book. Hermione gave him a judgmental look, and he promptly shut his mouth.

A few days after that she set a book down in front of him as he was eating breakfast. Regulus had just emptied his plate, taking his last bite of food, when the book clattered on his plate.

“Try this one,” Hermione said cheerfully. “It was one of my favorites, I think you’ll enjoy it.”

“ Little Women by Louisa May Alcott,” Regulus mumbled, picking up the book curiously.

“Yep,” Hermione said, “it was published in the same decade as Great Expectations, but it’s a lot more fun to read.” Regulus gave her an uncertain look, but she just elbowed him good-naturedly.

That was how Lavender found him, sitting in the Gryffindor common room, Great Expectations abandoned on his lap while his nose was tucked into Little Women .

“ Little Women ? Isn’t that a kids’ book?” Lavender asked. Regulus wasn’t sure that Lavender had ever spoken to him, and he was more than a little confused as to why she was doing it now. Parvati was standing a few feet away looking just as perplexed.

He shrugged. “I don’t actually know,” Regulus said. “I’ve never read a muggle book before.”

“Well,” Lavender said with a conspiratorial smile, “there are much better books than that one. Parvati, go get Mackenzie’s Mountain .” Parvati raised her eyebrows in shock. “Please,” Lavender hissed.

“That’s really all right,” Regulus said, but Parvati was already leaving, skipping up to the dorm room.

“It’s also a muggle book, but it’s way more fun,” Lavender said before breaking into giggles. Regulus was about to ask what she meant when Parvati dropped a book on a lap.

“Enjoy,” Parvati said with a laugh. She and Lavender left the common room a moment later, both of them whispering to each other.

Regulus didn’t have time to read the book yet, with the Great Expectations and Little Women on the docket, but he tucked it away in his bag to read later. Little Women was far more enjoyable than Dickens’s book. Regulus found the characters intriguing and easy to read about. If he had to read one more line from Pip the Orphan, he thought he might gouge his eyes out. He didn’t feel that was with Little Women , instead, it felt like greeting an old friend.

“I keep turning over new leaves, and spoiling them, as I used to spoil my copybooks,” Regulus read aloud to himself. “And I make so many beginnings there will never be an end.” He hummed quietly to himself, copying down the quote onto a blank piece of parchment.

Hermione was thrilled that he enjoyed the book, letting him keep her copy so that he could reread it. The rest of his classes were much of the same. The Blast-Ended Skrewts continued to grow at an alarming rate, so quickly that Regulus began to have fantasies of sneaking down there in the middle of the night to get rid of them. He didn’t want to hurt Hagrid though. Luna was busy with her new classes, Divination and Runes, so she wasn’t around as much, and when she was, she and Ron were often whispering to each other.

They were let out of classes early the day the other schools arrived so that they could watch them. They all piled out in a huge crowd, wrapping their cloaks tighter around themselves. The Beauxbatons students arrived in a flying carriage pulled by Abraxans, and the Durmstrang students in a magical ship that could fully submerge in water.

The Beauxbatons were first, their headmistress, a hugely tall woman named Madame Maxime easily commanded the attention of the crowd as she stepped out of the carriage. The students behind her were exactly what Regulus expected from the French school. There was a small crowd of boys and girls who emerged from the carriage after Madame Maxime, all of the shivering against the cold Scottish winds. They were all wearing thin, silky robes that looked very flattering on each of them, but were clearly unprepared for the chilly weather.

Durmstrang was next, their ship emerging menacingly from the Black Lake as all the Hogwarts students watched in awe. Regulus didn't know too much about the schools, but the moment he saw the headmaster, he knew he should have been better prepared for their arrival. He watched in apprehension as Igor Karkaroff stepped onto the bank of the lake.

Regulus didn't know Karkaroff well, he really wasn't very familiar with that many Death Eaters, but he had interacted with Karkaroff more than once. He arrived at one Death Eater meeting, easily towering over most of the other members, talking in a strong Eastern European accent and sneering at anyone who dared to look at him even a moment too long.

Barty was fascinated by him. If Regulus had to guess, he thought Barty might have had a crush on the man, sometimes he had terrible taste, not that Regulus would ever bring this up to his friend. Karkaroff was one of the Death Eaters most interested in torturing muggles. There were several that Regulus met that he was sure were only there because of the free-for-all they could have with torturing and killing. The Dark Lord didn't tend to attract the most upstanding members of society. In retrospect, it should have been a warning sign.

Behind Karkaroff was a crowd of students, including Victor Krum, the Quidditch player Ron was unreasonably obsessed with. He had an intense look on his face and walked at the front of the group of students, standing out as a clear leader. Regulus wondered if he was even young enough to still be in school or if Karkaroff was already cheating.

"Over here! Come and sit over here!" Ron shouted at the group once they all filed into the Great Hall.

"Too late," Harry said, giving Ron a sympathetic smile. Ron shook his head as they watched Krum and the other Durmstrang students sit at the Slytherin table. Draco smiled smugly at Harry, which Harry returned with a glare.

"Yeah, that's right, smarm up to him, Malfoy," Ron said bitterly.

Regulus was so busy watching Ron get flustered when one girl from Beaubaton asked him if they wanted their bouillabaisse that he almost missed the new additions to the professors' table. He didn't recognize one of them, but the other man he would know anywhere. Barty's father, Barty Crouch Sr., was taking a seat at the table.

"What are they doing here?" Harry said, surprised.

"You know who they are?" Regulus asked.

"That's Percy's boss, Mr. Crouch," Harry said, pointing at Barty Crouch Sr., "and that's Lugo Bagman, we met him at the World Cup."

"Oh," Regulus muttered.

“They organized the Tournament, didn’t they?” Hermione said. Regulus was barely listening. He couldn’t believe that he didn’t even think about the prospect of Barty’s father being here.

He wasn’t ever as bad as Orion, but Barty Sr. was definitely not a good man. Regulus was not even surprised that Barty went off the deep end after the way his father shunned and degraded him his entire life. Regulus always felt bad for him, but it wasn’t like they could help each other out of their terrible families. They were no James Potter.

Regulus listened as Dumbledore introduced the new adults and gave them the rundown of how the Tournament would work. Regulus only half paid attention, it wasn’t that relevant to him, he was much more worried about having to deal with Barty Sr. and apparent turncoat Death Eater Karkaroff. With Karkaroff especially, Harry would be in more danger than ever.

“Finally,” Dumbledore continued, “I wish to impress upon any of you wishing to compete that this tournament is not to be entered into lightly. Once a champion has been selected by the Goblet of Fire, he or she is obliged to see the tournament through to the end. The placing of your name in the goblet constitutes a binding, magical contract.”

Regulus wasn’t surprised by this information. Any magical event like this would bind someone to it. He wondered how the magical contract would be enforced though. If a champion refused to compete halfway through, what would happen to them? He was distracted by the thought of it, playing out the possibilities in his head.

“Now, I think it is time for bed. Good night to you all.”

“An Age Line!” Fred said, his eyes shining with madness. Regulus rolled his eyes at the boy and his twin. There was no way they were getting passed that line.

They headed toward the exit and arrived at the same moment that Karkaroff did. Harry stopped to let him pass, and Karkaroff walked past him before stopping to slowly look back, staring down at his forehead.

“Yeah, that’s Harry Potter,” Moody said from behind them. The hairs on the back of Regulus’s neck stood on end. He felt like an electric current was flowing through the room, but he couldn’t understand who was generating it.

“You!” Karkaroff said to Moody. Oh right, Regulus thought, Moody was the one to capture Karkaroff.

“Me,” Moody said gruffly. Regulus wasn’t sure why, but he suddenly felt the need to leave the Great Hall as quickly as he could. He grabbed Harry by the arm and pushed passed Karkaroff so that they could head back up to the safety of their dorms. Late that night, Regulus heard the sounds of Harry whispering to Sirius.

the goblet of fire.

“Anyone put their name in yet?” Ron asked a third-year girl eagerly as they walked down for breakfast the next morning. Regulus hadn’t slept well, he had spent the night tossing, turning, and fending off memories of Barty and his terrible father. He was still fighting the urge to glue himself to Harry’s side so he could protect him from Karkaroff and anyone else who might have it out for the boy, though he was sure Harry would likely not appreciate such behavior.

“Just the Durmstrang students,” the third-year replied, her eyes bright with excitement. “I haven’t noticed anyone from Hogwarts or Beauxbatons yet.”

“I wonder if any of them put their names in last night after we’d all gone to bed,” Harry posited. “That’s what I would have done. I wouldn’t want everyone watching. I mean, what if the goblet just spat your name back out again?”

Regulus and Hermione chuckled, looking up just as Fred, George, and Lee came sprinting down the stairs to the Entrance Hall, wide smiles plastered on each of their faces, their eyes manic with some new plan they were enacting.

“We’ve just taken it,” Fred whispered triumphantly to them.

“What did you take?” Hermione asked curiously.

“The Aging Potion, of course,” Fred said.

“One drop each,” George added, rubbing his hands together excitedly.

“I don’t think this is going to work, you know,” Hermione said sternly. “I doubt Dumbledore would have missed this when creating the Age Line.”

Fred, George, and Lee all ignored her, but Regulus thought she had a point. Not that he was planning to intervene, knowing whatever happened to the three troublemakers would no doubt be hilarious.

“I wonder if you could enter,” Hermione whispered to him, speaking so quietly that no one else could hear. Regulus had thought of this himself, not that he would willingly put his name in, but he did wonder if the Age Line would affect him. He shrugged at her, but he could see the curious glint in her eye. He wondered if she would force him to cross the line just so she could test it.

They watched as Fred, then George, crossed the line before being promptly ejected from the circle. They landed nearly ten feet away, crashing painfully to the cold floor, and sprouted identical long white beards. The entire Entrance Hall filled with laughter, even Fred and George joining in.

“I did warn you,” Dumbledore said. He sent them up to the Hospital Wing a moment later, informing them of several other students who had already tried futilely to age themselves up so they could enter the tournament. Regulus thought he noticed Dumbledore’s eyes flicker over to him as he spoke, but he couldn’t be sure that he didn’t imagine it.

They spent most of breakfast talking about who from Hogwarts might be chosen. Ron stayed suspiciously silent throughout the conversation. Regulus desperately wanted to pull him aside and ask him what he saw, hopefully in a way that Hermione would not overhear, but he didn’t know if Ron would actually tell him.

They headed to Hagrid’s after they finished eating. Hermione spent much of the visit talking about her house elf group S.P.E.W. that she was trying to get Hagrid to join.

“It’d be doin’ ‘em an unkindness, Hermione,” Hagrid said gravely when she finished speaking. Hagrid wasn’t the first to make this argument, claiming that it would hurt the house elves if she tried to free them. He wasn’t wrong that they would be greatly insulted if they were freed by their owners, but Regulus had been starting to wonder. He still wasn’t sure how he felt, and he didn’t want to bring it up to Kreacher on the off chance that it would damage their relationship, but he had been thinking about it.

“But Harry set Dobby free, and he was over the moon about it!” she said. “And we heard he’s asking for wages now!”

“Did he get them?” Regulus interrupted to ask.

“Wages?” Hermione asked. Regulus nodded. “I don’t know yet, but I can’t see why Dumbledore would deny him.”

Regulus sat back in his chair considering this. He wondered how many house elves didn’t want freedom because wages were so hard to come by. He had always heard that it was dishonorable for house elves to be paid, that they considered it an insult, but he wondered how much of that was true. So many of the things he was taught growing up turned out to be at least partially false. He wondered if Dobby would talk to him if he asked.

That night was the Halloween Feast and when they entered the Great Hall, they noticed that the Goblet of Fire had been moved so that it was right in front of Dumbledore’s empty chair at the professors’ table. The feast seemed to drag on as they waited for the announcement of the champions. Everyone seemed to be fidgeting restlessly and Regulus was starting to feel unsettled. His chest kept clenching painfully like something bad was about to happen.

“Well,” Dumbledore finally said, drawing the instant attention of the student body, “the goblet is almost ready to make its decision. I estimate that it requires one more minute.” Regulus wasn’t sure how he could tell, but he was ready to get a move on. Dumbledore gave some instructions for the champions once they were chosen, which Regulus only half listened to, before he took out his wand and dimmed the lights in the Great Hall so that the Goblet of Fire was the brightest thing in the room.

Everyone watched with rapt attention as the fire in the goblet suddenly turned a crimson red before sparks began to fly out of it. A lick of fire shot out intensely and out flew a charred piece of parchment.

“The champion for Durmstrang will be Viktor Krum,” Dumbledore said loudly. The applause was deafening, so loud it almost hurt Regulus’s ears.

“No surprises there!” Ron yelled, cheering along with the rest of the crowd. Karkaroff looked extremely pleased, which unnerved Regulus. He didn’t like the way the man’s face stretched with his crooked grin.

It was another few seconds before the fire turned red again and spat out another piece of parchment.

“The champion for Beauxbatons is Fleur Delacour.” The girl that Harry and Ron were sure was part Veela stood gracefully to her feet, sweeping down the aisles in a flourish of silvery blonde hair.

“Oh, look, they’re all disappointed,” Hermione noted of the other Beauxbatons students, several of whom had begun openly sobbing. The goblet turned red one more time just a moment after Fleur left the room.

“The Hogwarts champion is Cedric Diggory!” Every single Hufflepuff jumped to their feet and began screaming wildly. Ron shook his head just slightly, an annoyed and unsatisfied look on his face. Regulus thought for a moment that an expression of relief crossed his features before it disappeared. He didn’t understand it though. What had Ron been expecting?

“Excellent!” Dumbledore said cheerfully after the noise finally died down, though it took far longer than it did for either of the other two champions. “Well, we now have our three champions. I am sure I can count on you all to give your champions every ounce of support you can muster. By cheering your champion on, you will —”

Dumbledore stumbled over the last word before falling silent, the fire in the goblet distracting him instantly. It was turning red again, sparking flying out of it in every direction.

“What’s happening?” Hermione whispered just as a huge flame shot out and another piece of parchment began fluttering toward the ground. Dumbledore reached out a hand seemingly on instinct and grabbed the paper. There was a long, tense moment of silence as Dumbledore openly stared at the slip.

Dumbledore cleared his throat before speaking, his eyes glued to the parchment.

“Harry Potter.”

Regulus thought his head might explode. The tension that had been building up all day suddenly dispersed, quickly becoming replaced with a numbness that Regulus should have been worried about. Every head in the room turned to look at Harry who seemed just as disconnected as Regulus was, his eyes wide and empty.

Whispers began to spread throughout the room, growing louder by the second. Harry turned to look at Regulus.

"I didn't put my name in," he said, his words dismayed. "You know I didn't."

Regulus mentally shook himself. "I know," Regulus said quietly. Harry looked imploringly at Ron and Hermione, but both of them just stared back, their faces blank with shock.

"Harry Potter!" Dumbledore called again. He looked like he had straightened up, having gotten over the initial shock. "Harry! Up here, if you please!"

"Go on," Hermione whispered, giving Harry a little push. Harry walked up toward the professors' table, stumbling slightly on the hem of his robes. He looked like he was in a daze, and Regulus noticed his hands shaking just slightly.

"Well... through the door, Harry," Dumbledore said grimly. Harry moved toward the side door and suddenly Regulus was on his feet. What was he doing? He couldn't just let Harry walk in there, he needed to help him.

Just as soon as he was standing, he was yanked back so he was sitting next to Hermione again. He looked over at her in confusion and noticed her fists were clenched tightly in his cloak.

"You can't just barge in there after him," she whispered fiercely.

"Why not?" Regulus said, perhaps a bit nonsensically given that he knew precisely why he couldn't do that.

"Well, that is quite enough excitement for tonight," Dumbledore said before sending them off to bed. Regulus didn't move from his spot, but he could see teachers and prefects coming down the aisles to shoo curious students out of the Great Hall.

"Come on, we'll wait for him outside," Hermione said, clearly trying to get them to move. The moment they were outside the doors, Ron turned like he was going to leave, but Hermione grabbed him by the back of his robes. "What are we going to do?"

"What do you mean?" Ron asked, sounding petulant and annoyed. Regulus didn't have the wherewithal to figure out why.

"I think you guys should go back, I'll wait," Regulus said quickly. They were attracting too much attention standing in a group.

"Are you sure?" Hermione asked instantly.

"Yes, we don't know what or who is safe anymore," Regulus said, his words felt jumbled, but he hoped they understood. "If someone did this, then Harry is in danger."

"In danger?" Ron scoffed. Regulus looked at him curiously.

“Whoever put Harry’s name in isn’t his friend,” Regulus explained. “And given how many enemies he has, we all need to be careful. You two should stay together till you get back to the common room.”

Ron still seemed annoyed but nodded nonetheless. Hermione gave him one more long look before turning to leave, both of them glancing over their shoulders as they went. Regulus leaned against the wall. Surely Harry wouldn’t be hurt in that room, whoever did this intended for him to compete, it wouldn’t make sense for him to get hurt now. Still, he was having trouble shaking the desire to go running into the room so that he could drag Harry away to safety. They would have to tell Sirius and Remus before they read it in the papers. Regulus was not looking forward to having that conversation.

It took nearly an hour for Harry to leave the Great Hall, and he looked just as dazed then as he had earlier.

“Harry,” Regulus said quietly when he spotted him. Harry jumped slightly at the sound of his voice, turning to look at him. “What’s going on?” Regulus walked up to him, grabbed him by the arm, and pulled him into one of the small unused offices that was right off the Reception Hall. Harry followed him without arguing.

Regulus locked the door behind him. He could hear the sounds of other people leaving the Great Hall, and he didn’t want to be interrupted. Harry’s skin was unusually pale and sallow.

“Tell me what happened,” Regulus demanded.

“Moody said that I’m going to die,” Harry said.

“What?” Regulus shouted. Harry jumped slightly at the noise, and Regulus grabbed him by the shoulders firmly, doing his best to ground him.

“He thinks someone put my name in the goblet knowing I would have to compete, and he thinks it might be because they’re trying to kill me,” Harry said after a moment, the words spilling out of my mouth so quickly that Regulus almost couldn’t follow them.

“He said that?” Regulus asked, but something must have shown on his face because Harry immediately started shaking.

“You believe him, don’t you? You think I’m going to die in this stupid tournament,” Harry said, his voice edging into hysterics.

“No, Harry. No. You’re not going to die,” Regulus said. Harry was shivering so intensely that Regulus didn’t know how he was still standing. He imagined all the adrenaline and panic from the last hour was finally flooding his body now that he wasn’t in a room full of people who would judge him for it.

Harry was saying something else, but his words were shaking so badly that Regulus couldn’t make it out. Regulus pulled him in for a hug which Harry returned immediately.

"They're forcing you to compete?" Regulus asked. He didn't want to distress Harry more than he already was, but he needed to understand what was happening. Harry nodded against his shoulder. "Even though you're underage?"

"I have to," Harry mumbled, his voice catching slightly. His arms tightened to the point where they were almost painful.

"Okay," Regulus said quietly. "Okay. You're not going to die. I'm going to help you and we'll get through this." Harry nodded again but didn't speak. It took him a long while to calm down enough for him to talk again, but Regulus just held him close the whole time. He couldn't even imagine how he was feeling. Harry was targeted every single year, he could never get a break, but this time it was worse. Now he would be fighting for his life before a huge crowd of people, likely including the person who had specifically done this to him.

"Did they have any idea who did this?" Regulus asked once Harry stopped shaking. Harry pulled away and quickly wiped his face, Regulus looked away to give him a semblance of privacy.

"I don't know," Harry said. "Moody said they used a spell to make the goblet forget that there were only three schools."

"Hm," Regulus said, "I'll have to check in with Dumbledore. Did they tell you anything else?"

"The first task is on the twenty-fourth of November," Harry replied.

"What's it going to be?"

"They didn't say. Bagman said it was to test our daring, courage in the face of the unknown," Harry said with clear disdain. His panic had turned to frustration and annoyance. Regulus could tell that the fear was still there, but he wasn't drowning in it and that was all they could hope for at the moment.

"I'll figure it out," Regulus said. "You're not alone, all right?" Harry nodded and, finally, looked calm.

"Does anyone else know I didn't do it?" Harry asked.

"I don't know," Regulus replied honestly. "But don't worry about it right now. They're going to believe what they want to. Let's just worry about getting through it."

"I'm tired," Harry said suddenly. He sounded it, his voice dull, his shoulder sagging with exhaustion.

"I should probably go talk to Dumbledore," Regulus said. "Let me walk you back to the dorm first."

"Can you just talk to him tomorrow?" Harry said with a groan. Regulus heard the real plea behind it, Harry didn't want to be alone, and he would no doubt have to face some kind of madness in the Gryffindor common room.

“Of course,” Regulus agreed, throwing an arm around Harry’s shoulders as they left the room and walked up the marble stairs.

Nearly everyone was still awake when they made it to the common room, but luckily they were able to escape up to the dorm room relatively quickly. Hermione wasn’t anywhere to be seen, but Regulus guessed she would have gone to bed already. She would no doubt have a ton of questions for them the next morning.

“Oh, hello,” Ron said when they made it into the dorm room. The other boys were still downstairs so the three of them were alone. Ron was grinning at Harry in a way that looked unnerving and strained.

“Hey,” Harry muttered, pulling at the Gryffindor banner that Lee had tied around him. Regulus cast a quick spell to loosen the knot so that Harry could pull it off and drop it to the ground.

“So, congratulations,” Ron said. Regulus’s hackles went up right away.

“What do you mean, congratulations?” Harry replied.

“How’d you do it? Did you use the Invisibility Cloak?” Ron asked, he wasn’t smiling anymore, instead, he was grimacing.

“I didn’t,” Harry replied. “Besides, I don’t think the Invisibility Cloak would have fooled the Age Line.”

“Suppose not, since if it did, it would have covered both of us, wouldn’t it? But you found another way, did you?” Ron said, his voice growing snippy.

“No, I didn’t,” Harry said firmly.

“Did you do it for him then?” Ron said, addressing Regulus for the first time since they entered the room.

“What?” Regulus said dumbly.

“You can get past the Age Line, can’t you?” Ron said accusingly. Regulus paused for a second, trying to make sure that he had heard him correctly before responding. Harry had frozen as well.

“What makes you say that?” Regulus asked carefully. Ron rolled his eyes.

“I know who you actually are,” Ron said sharply.

“How?” Harry asked. Regulus shot him a look, but Harry was completely focused on Ron, not even sparing Regulus a glance.

“I thought you guys trusted me, but obviously you don’t,” Ron said, looking between them a few times before pulling the hangings around his four-poster bed shut.

Harry looked at Regulus incredulously, but Regulus didn't know what to say. Had Luna or Hermione told Ron? He hadn't actually thought about the fact that he should include him in a while and now he was feeling a bit bad about that. He figured he would get around to telling him the truth about who he was, but he hadn't had the chance yet.

"Whatever," Harry snapped, pulling off his cloak roughly and dropping it on the ground. "I'm going to bed."

"Wait," Regulus said, before giving Harry an apologetic look. "We have to call Sirius first."

"Why?" Harry asked.

"Because if he wakes up tomorrow and reads about this in the Prophet then he's going to overreact. It's better if we tell him now," Regulus explained.

"You think this is going to be in the Prophet?" Harry asked, his mouth hanging open in surprise.

"Yes," Regulus said slowly. He didn't think that was the surprising thing here, but Harry looked like he hadn't even considered that as a possibility.

"This is awful," Harry said, groaning quietly as he rubbed his eyes. "All right, let's call Sirius. Do you think he'll even be up?"

"Hopefully one of them will be," Regulus said. Harry pulled out the mirror, and they both piled onto Harry's bed.

"Sirius," Harry said but nothing happened. "Sirius!" Harry shouted. Regulus pulled the hangings closed and cast a silencing charm. "Maybe he's not awake."

"Sirius, for Merlin's sake!" Regulus said loudly. Suddenly there was a yelp from the mirror and Sirius's disheveled face appeared. Regulus would never mention it, and he hoped that Harry wouldn't notice, but he was pretty sure that Sirius had been crying. His eyes were rimmed red, his nose was stuffy, and there was still a slight tremble to his lips when he first answered them.

"What's going on?" Sirius asked anxiously.

"We need to talk to you about the tournament," Regulus said. "Is Lupin there?" It was the wrong thing to say. Sirius looked away, folding his lips between his teeth in a way that meant he was holding back tears before he seemed to bury his feelings and get a grip.

"He's out," Sirius said. "I'll relay the message. What's happening with the — did you say tournament?"

"The Triwizard Tournament," Harry said. He was looking at Regulus out of the corner of his eye like he wasn't sure how to proceed.

"Oh, right," Sirius mumbled. "What about it?"

“Try not to freak out,” Harry said. Again, it was the wrong thing to say because Sirius was immediately on high alert.

“What’s happening?”

“Harry’s name was drawn,” Regulus said, aiming to get it over with quickly. “We don’t know who entered him in the tournament, but they are forcing him to compete.”

“What?” Sirius said, but Regulus could see the beginnings of a smile on his lips. Of course, he would be excited about this.

“Sirius,” Regulus snapped. “This is not a good thing. Someone entered him into this tournament because they wanted to hurt him.”

“Yes, okay, I know that,” Sirius said, his mouth pulling down into a deep frown. “You think Karkaroff did this?”

“You told him about Karkaroff?” Regulus asked. Harry nodded. “Yes, I think Karkaroff could have done it, but I can’t be sure. There is something off about Moody too, but I don’t know what.”

Sirius sighed. “I feel like I’m too far from you both.” He was looking away now, staring off at something they couldn’t see. “I’m no help at all.”

“We’re not calling you to get your help,” Regulus said. “We’re calling so you hear it from us and not from the morning paper.”

“I can help,” Sirius snapped.

“That is not what I meant and you know it,” Regulus argued. Harry accidentally interrupted the beginnings of their squabble by yawning, though he was trying to cover it up. “We can talk about this more tomorrow, I just wanted to make sure you knew.”

“Right,” Sirius agreed, but he was watching Harry, his eyes soft. “You get some sleep.”

“Night, Sirius,” Harry muttered. Regulus tucked the mirror back into his trunk and climbed into bed. He drifted off to sleep with his head filled with fantasies of kidnapping Harry and running as far away as he could.

the hideout.

im posting this early because i love this chapter

“Only your son would end up the fourth champion in a Triwizard Tournament,” Sirius mumbled with a chuckle. He didn’t see James much anymore, the hallucinations finally starting to settle after his time in Azkaban, but he still found himself talking to them even though they weren’t there. “Knowing Harry, he’ll probably end up winning the whole thing.”

After the night when Harry’s name was drawn, Sirius had left Grimmauld Place and taken up residence in a cave near Hogsmeade. It was not very pleasant with only a damn dirt floor to sleep on, but Sirius found it comforting nonetheless. It almost felt like he was back in Azkaban, just without the dementors hanging over him at all times. He just couldn’t bear to stay in Grimmauld any longer.

He had thought, rather naively, that he and Remus would be able to work things out. He hoped that they would at least be friends again, but Remus had been so distant that it was almost worse than being alone. Sirius felt like he was living with a ghost, like he was being haunted by a person who was still alive. He hated it.

After Regulus and Harry had both returned to Hogwarts, Sirius and Remus were left to awkwardly avoid each other. Not that Sirius wanted to avoid Remus, he had never been one to avoid a confrontation, but Remus had always been a master at it, and the years apart had only made him more proficient. Sirius knew that he was driving Remus mad during the days that Regulus was unconscious, but he couldn’t help it. However, it seemed to just drive Remus further away and things didn’t improve even after Regulus recovered.

They had only had one successful conversation, about a week after Regulus left for school. Sirius had been experiencing a rather odd hallucination where Lily and his father were having an in-depth discussion about whether Sirius deserved a trial. Sirius had been only half listening, trying desperately to remember a time when those two people would have interacted. Of course, there wasn’t one. Orion Black would never deign to talk to a Muggleborn.

“Sirius?” Remus said. Sirius looked over, he hadn’t noticed him walk into the kitchen. “What are you staring at?”

“Oh,” Sirius muttered, looking back over to Lily and Orion who were now watching him closely, both looking equally annoyed that they had been interrupted. “Sorry,” he said to them, hoping they would just continue talking and leave him out of it.

“What are you apologizing for?” Remus asked uncertainly. Sirius glanced back at him. He looked supremely uncomfortable, leaning against the doorframe with false ease. He quickly crossed his arms over his chest when he noticed Sirius watching him.

“Not you,” Sirius said. “They’re —” He wasn’t sure that he knew how to explain exactly so he just motioned to where Lily and Orion were watching him. Remus looked in that direction quickly before looking back at Sirius, confusion and worry in his eyes.

“Is there someone else in the room with us?” Remus asked carefully. He was always doing that now, tiptoeing around questions or asking them in that soft, professor voice that made Sirius feel like a scolded child. He might be into it, in a different circumstance that is.

“Right, I know they’re not real,” Sirius said quickly. Remus raised his eyebrow at him but otherwise didn’t react. “Or,” Sirius amended, “I usually know. I usually can tell. Sometimes it just takes me a bit.”

Remus took a beat to respond, his eyes shooting around the room like he was searching for a solution. It was a plea for someone to rescue him, or at least that was how Sirius interpreted it. He wasn’t sure that he was very good at reading Remus anymore. He didn’t think he really knew this version of him.

“Does this happen a lot?” Remus asked. Sirius sighed and put his hands on his hips tiredly. He didn’t want to have this conversation, not now and not ever. He shrugged helplessly.

“Periodically,” he answered when Remus didn’t speak.

“How do you usually figure out that it’s a hallucination?” Remus asked.

“Sometimes it’s obvious right away, otherwise I just have to wait it out,” Sirius explained before he realized that he didn’t actually want to reveal that little tidbit of information.

Remus sighed tightly. “You could ask me,” he said.

“What?” Sirius asked, turning to look at him again. Remus had moved, walking so silently that Sirius didn’t even notice, and was now standing directly behind him.

“Whenever you see something, if you want to ask me if it’s real, I’ll tell you,” Remus said. He spoke with a gentleness that soothed something in Sirius. He wished Remus would touch him, even just a small caress, but he never did anymore. Sirius didn’t blame him, but he couldn’t deny that his body ached with his desire for it.

“Okay,” Sirius agreed, giving Remus a small, grateful smile. Remus returned it quickly, before shuffling off to make tea. It was helpful having Remus available to explain away hallucinations. But those small interactions weren’t enough to bridge the insurmountable gap between them.

By the time Halloween rolled around Sirius was itching for a fight. He wasn’t even sure what he was mad about exactly, or maybe he knew but just wasn’t ready to unpack it. The only thing he knew was that he was frustrated with Remus, and he was going to get him to talk whether he wanted to or not.

It wasn't pretty, and Sirius would rather do anything else than relive it, but he successfully riled Remus up. He had always been good at that. It wasn't his finest moment, and he definitely said some things that in hindsight he shouldn't have, but he just couldn't keep circling the drain of his and Remus's failed relationship.

It was him screaming, "Sometimes I think you would have been happier if I just stayed in Azkaban," that really derailed the already horrible fight.

"Maybe you're right!" Remus had shouted back, grabbing his jacket and sweeping out of the house as fast as he could. He knew logically that Remus didn't really mean what he said, that the words were spoken in anger and frustration, but Sirius still let himself wallow in the pain the words caused. Sirius didn't even realize he was crying until he started hearing his name being called from the mirror a full two hours later.

Harry looked horrible, and Regulus's face was pulled into one of intense stress. It made Sirius want to charge back into the castle, just so he could check in on them. The conversation didn't help at all. Harry was in danger again and Sirius was stuck hiding in his childhood home, useless to everyone around him. Worse than useless when it came to Remus.

He barely even had to decide to leave. It felt like muscle memory at that point. He packed a few things, nothing that could be traced back to him if he lost it, besides the mirror, before going to head out the door. It was only at the last minute that he remembered Remus. He would no doubt be back, though Sirius had no idea when. He was off in London doing Merlin knows what and Sirius had no safe way to contact him.

He pulled out a piece of parchment and left a note on the kitchen table updating Remus on the tournament and where Sirius had gone. He didn't want to wait around for Remus, the last words from the fight were still branded on his skin, and he winced every time he remembered them.

He didn't have a wand. He had been using Remus's since he had moved into Grimmauld Place, so he wasn't able to apparate. Buckbeak was still living in Walburga's old room, somehow very comfortable in the small, tight space, but Sirius hoped that he was ready to fly. He was in luck, as Buckbeak followed him out of the house, and took off the moment Sirius was on his back.

It took a long while to fly to Scotland. Buckbeak was clearly exhilarated to be out in the open again because he kept dipping and climbing through the air rapidly. It was fun at first, a nice distraction from the feelings that Sirius had been drowning in, but after a while, it started to become annoying. By the time Sirius landed in Hogwarts Valley, it was nearly nighttime again, the sun just starting to set on the horizon.

It was chilly, but Sirius didn't mind. It felt refreshing to be outside again. He changed into Padfoot once they reached the ground and started the journey North toward the school. Buckbeak kept getting distracted, so it took nearly all night to reach the cave Sirius was now residing in, and by the time he got there, he was too exhausted to do anything else besides collapse on the hard ground and go to sleep.

He fell right back into a routine of hunting rats and wandering the forest near his cave, before coming back to sit around and periodically nap with Buckbeak. The hippogriff seemed unbothered by their change in location, quickly making a nest for himself in the center of the cave and settling down for bed.

The night after Sirius arrived, he was distracted from dozing by the sound of Harry's voice calling him through the mirror. He was a little worried about what Regulus would have to say about him leaving Grimmauld, but it was only Harry this time.

"Where are you?" Harry asked once he could see Sirius's face.

"I didn't like being so far from you, Harry. Things are getting dangerous," Sirius said by way of explanation. Harry didn't pry, but Sirius knew it was only a matter of time before he heard from Regulus.

Harry spent most of their call complaining about his friend Ron, who apparently believed that Harry had lied to him about not putting his name in the Goblet of Fire, and was now ignoring both Harry and Regulus.

"Why Regulus?" Sirius asked.

"Oh," Harry said, looking uncomfortable for a moment. "I guess Ron figured out who Regulus really is, and he's upset because we didn't tell him ourselves."

"Why didn't Regulus tell Ron?" Sirius asked. He knew that Hermione, their muggleborn friend, and Luna Lovegood already knew, but he thought Regulus was friends with Ron just as much as he was with the others.

"I don't know. I think he was getting around to it, but he just hadn't yet," Harry answered, but it was clear that he wanted to move on, so Sirius let him. He listened to Harry's complaints and worries for nearly an hour before Harry was yawning too much to stay awake.

It had been a long time since Sirius had thought about the drama that came with being fourteen years old. It was almost refreshing to hear Harry complain about a fight with one of his friends rather than his worries about Voldemort or the Death Eaters running amok in the school. He wondered how Regulus was dealing with the stress. He doubted he was doing well, Regulus never coped well with stress.

He went down to Hogsmeade a few days later and stole a copy of the Prophet. That was how he discovered the ridiculous article Rita Skeeter wrote about Harry. His face was plastered all over the paper, the entire front page was made up of just one picture of him, the article continuing on pages two, six, and seven. The article itself was absurd including quotes from Harry that Sirius was almost positive were fake.

"I suppose I get my strength from my parents. I know they'd be very proud of me if they could see me now," the article read. Sirius chuckled even as a fiery pit of anger opened up in his stomach. It didn't even sound like Harry.

“I know nothing will hurt me during the tournament because they’re watching over me.” Ludicrous, Sirius thought. Harry would never say that. He had seen firsthand how Harry looked after finding out he would be participating in the tournament, and it wasn’t the face of a boy who “knew nothing could hurt him.” No, Harry was worried, and for good reason.

The strangest part of the article was Rita’s reference to Hermione as Harry’s girlfriend. “Harry has at last found love at Hogwarts. Harry is rarely seen out of the company of one Hermione Granger.” Sirius wasn’t inclined to believe anything Rita said, but he did wonder if something was going on between Harry and Hermione. He got the chance to ask a few nights later when Regulus called.

“Harry said you were hiding out in a cave,” Regulus said instead of a greeting.

“I was so far —”

“Does Lupin know where you are?” Regulus interrupted to ask. Sirius looked away for a second.

“I left him a letter,” Sirius explained. Regulus sighed. There was clearly something he wanted to say, but he was working hard to hold it back.

“This is extremely reckless, Sirius,” Regulus settled on.

“I’m aware of that, but I’m being careful,” Sirius replied. He felt like he was being lectured by a professor. “I want to be close by in case something happens.” Regulus sighed again.

“Fine,” Regulus said. They fell into a beat of silence.

“Is that all you called for?” Sirius asked.

“I guess,” Regulus said. “Harry wants to see you, but I’m not sure that’s a good idea.” Sirius perked up immediately.

“Yes, we could meet in Hogsmeade,” Sirius said.

“No, Sirius,” Regulus replied. “Harry is being watched. You would definitely get caught.”

“Ugh,” Sirius groaned. “What’s life without a little danger?” He had meant it as a joke, but it sobered both of them immediately. “Right, well, I’ll be close by anyways.”

“I’ll come by,” Regulus said. “I don’t think Harry should. Where exactly is this cave?” Sirius did his best to explain it to him. “Did you bring anything with you? Food? A wand?”

“I don’t have a wand,” Sirius said.

“Right,” Regulus said with a small shake of his head.

“I have a question,” Sirius said.

“Yes?” Regulus prompted, sounding distracted.

“Are Hermione and Harry together?” Sirius asked. Regulus chuckled, even as a look of anger flashed across his face.

“Been reading Rita’s work?”

“Not much else to do here,” Sirius replied. Regulus shook his head, his mouth twisting into a mixture of a grimace and a smirk.

“She’s a pest,” Regulus said. “No, they’re not dating. They seem more like siblings than anything.”

“Ah, so is there anyone he’s interested in?” Sirius asked. He felt a little silly asking about Harry’s dating life, but it was oddly relaxing to talk about something so normal.

Regulus rolled his eyes, but for once it didn’t seem like his annoyance was aimed at Sirius. “No,” Regulus said. “No one attainable that is.” Sirius raised his eyebrows questioningly.

“What does that mean?” Regulus looked around suspiciously before pulling the hangings around his bed closed. This ought to be good, Sirius thought triumphantly.

“You can’t mention this to him,” Regulus said.

“I won’t,” Sirius said.

“I’m serious,” Regulus said, hurrying to continue speaking so Sirius wouldn’t intervene. “I’m not joking. If you tell him, I’ll hex your bollocks off.”

Sirius laughed loudly. “Okay, I promise.”

“Harry may or may not have a crush on the other Hogwarts champion,” Regulus said quietly. Sirius racked his brain trying to remember if his name was mentioned in Rita’s article, but he could only recall the Beauxbatons and Durmstrang students’ names.

“Who?” Sirius said.

“Cedric Diggory,” Regulus said with another roll of his eyes. Sirius suddenly remembered one of the conversations he’d had with Harry over the summer, when Harry mentioned losing only one Quidditch game against the Hufflepuffs, and a certain seeker apologizing to him. At the time, Sirius had thought Harry’s red face had been because of embarrassment over the loss, but now it all made sense.

“And you don’t approve?” Sirius said. It was obvious that Regulus wasn’t thrilled about the crush.

“He’s too old for Harry,” Regulus said, then paused for a second, before whispering. “And he’s a Hufflepuff.” Sirius burst out laughing, incapable of holding it back when Regulus said Hufflepuff like it was a curse word.

“Do you think Cedric’s interested in him?” Sirius asked, once he was able to get his breathing under control.

“Who knows,” Regulus said with a shrug. “He wouldn’t be the only one,” he mumbled.

“Oh?” Sirius said. He felt like they were two old women, gossiping uselessly.

Regulus shook his head, a small smile on his face. “Let’s just say he has a way of attracting seekers.” Sirius tried to remember who else was a seeker at the school, but… surely not.

“Not Narcissa’s brat?” Sirius gasped. Now it was Regulus’s turn to laugh.

“I don’t think he realizes it yet. It’s a bit painful to watch honestly,” Regulus said. “He’s constantly seeking me out to make sure I’m keeping Harry safe.” Regulus did a rather impressive impression of a stuck-up little kid. Sirius’s stomach hurt from laughing so much. “He started making these ridiculous badges for everyone in the school.”

“Badges?” Sirius said, gasping for air as he chuckled. Regulus explained the Potter Stinks badges, and Sirius couldn’t help from losing it all over again. Poor kid, he had no idea what was happening.

“He’ll figure it out eventually,” Regulus said, before looking incredibly sad. “Or he won’t.”

Sirius watched his brother closely, but he was sure he was missing some key piece of information. He didn’t think he liked the look on his face though, like he was mourning something. “What about you?”

“What?” Regulus asked, looking caught for a second.

“Anyone you are interested in?” Sirius asked sarcastically.

“No,” Regulus said with a sardonic grin. “I’m not interested in any of the children I talk to on a daily bases.” Sirius almost believed him, except for the slight blush on his cheeks.

“What are you hiding?” Sirius asked. Regulus looked like he was seconds away from throwing the mirror across the room, and Sirius could see him clamming up by the second. “You don’t have to tell me if you have a crush.”

“I don’t have a crush,” Regulus said sternly, before coughing. He kept looking at something behind the mirror, like someone else was there listening in. “Someone else —”

It clicked for Sirius right away. “Someone asked you on a date, didn’t they?”

Regulus’s jaw clenched, a flash of embarrassment behind his eyes. “They asked me to the Yule Ball.”

“Aww,” Sirius said before laughing loudly.

“Yes, it’s very flattering,” Regulus said dryly.

“Are you going to go?” Sirius asked.

“No, Sirius, of course I’m not going to go,” Regulus replied exasperatedly.

“Why not? Do they go to Hogwarts?” Sirius asked.

“They go to Beauxbatons,” Regulus said.

“Then what’s the harm? They’ll be leaving in less than a year, right?”

“You sound like Hermione,” Regulus admonished.

“Do I? Maybe she’s onto something then,” Sirius said.

Regulus shook his head again. “Good night, Sirius,” Regulus said before his face disappeared. Sirius fell asleep that night still chuckling to himself, imagining the poor French wizard that had a crush on little Reggie.

On Hogsmeade weekend, Sirius went down to the river and cleaned his hair and clothes as best he could. If Regulus was coming by, then he didn’t want to worry him too much. He only had three pairs of clothes with him, but it was enough to cycle through. He stayed as Padfoot as he waited in the cave, unintentionally dozing all day.

“Sirius,” he heard someone call. He opened his eyes, blinking blearily, before transforming back.

It wasn’t Regulus.

“Remus,” Sirius said, surprised. He was dressed warmly, a coat tucked around him tightly. He looked tired. “What are you doing here?”

“Your brother told me where you were,” Remus said.

“Traitor,” Sirius muttered, though he hadn’t actually asked Regulus not to tell.

Remus sighed unhappily. “Listen, I’m sor —”

“Sirius, you left Grimmauld Place so that you could hide out in a cave with only a hippogriff for company.”

Sirius half shrugged. “Okay, I’m not upset anymore,” Sirius said. Remus gave him a long look before setting down a box in front of him. “What’s this?”

Remus slowly sat down on the ground across from him. It was clear that the frozen dirt wasn’t nearly as comfortable for Remus as it was for Sirius. Sirius winced sympathetically.

“Here,” Remus said. He reached into his coat pocket and withdrew a wand. It wasn’t one that Sirius had ever seen before. Sirius took it carefully. He could feel slight magic swirling in his fingertips when they touched the wood. It wasn't a wand bonded to him, but it would work.

"Whose was this?" Sirius asked suspiciously.

"It's new," Remus said. "Regulus all but forced me to buy it." Sirius chuckled.

"Thanks," Sirius said. Remus nodded, a small smile on his lips.

"I brought food and some more clothes," he said, nudging the box with his boot.

"You didn't have to do that," Sirius replied.

"I know," Remus said. "But if you're going to stay here then I wanted you to have something."

"Where are you staying?" Sirius asked quietly. He wasn't actually sure he wanted to know the answer. Remus, to Sirius's surprise, laughed.

"Your lovely brother rented a room for me at the Three Broomsticks," Remus said. "Said it was better if I was nearby."

"Wow," Sirius said.

"I agree with him," Remus said, giving Sirius a meaningful look. "Harry needs us, and I don't want you out here all alone. I probably won't be able to come up here too often, someone will definitely see me eventually, but I'll bring food when I can."

"Thanks, Remus," Sirius said.

Remus smiled at him, and for a moment, Sirius could imagine that they were still in love.

“It’s dragons, Regulus,” Harry said, startling Regulus from where he had been dozing in front of the fire. He hadn’t been sleeping well, not that he ever did, but it was especially bad now, and he kept catching himself half falling asleep where he shouldn’t be. “I’m a goner.”

“What’s happening?” Regulus said confusedly, rubbing the drowsiness from his eyes.

“The thing Hagrid wanted to show me, it was dragons. One for each of the contestants.”

“Oh, Merlin,” Regulus groaned. He knew it wouldn’t be a cakewalk, but dragons? Even the other contestants were only seventeen, and they were expecting them to fight a dragon. “Do you know specifically what you’re supposed to do with the dragon?”

“No,” Harry said shaking his head. He was staring into the fire, his wide eyes open in residual panic.

“Okay,” Regulus said quietly. “Let’s not worry about this tonight. Tomorrow I will go to the library and research dragons. We will figure out what to do.”

“Cedric doesn't know,” Harry said as they stood up to go to the dorm. “I bet Krum and Fleur already know, I saw Karkaroff and Madame Maxime there, so they probably told their champions. Do you think I should tell Cedric?” Harry rambled.

Regulus sighed quietly. “I suppose it would only be fair.”

Regulus’s opinion of Cedric Diggory had not improved over the past few weeks, mostly because of the ridiculous way the other students had been treating Harry in favor of Cedric. However, he had at least come to terms with the fact that it wasn’t Cedric’s fault. To Regulus’s knowledge, he hadn’t actually done anything wrong. Yet.

Regulus had been a ball of stress since Halloween, and he had thought of little else other than the upcoming tasks, though that wasn’t for a lack of attempted distractions.

Draco had been a constant annoyance, not just for Harry, as he usually was, but for Regulus as well. Draco had been far more boisterous and irritating since Harry’s name came out of the goblet, and it had become a near-daily occurrence that he and Harry were fighting.

A few days after the champions were picked, Draco all but dragged him away from his friends to ask what was going on.

"How could you let Harry put his name in the goblet? Did you do it for him?" Draco hissed, unstable magic crackled around him violently.

"I didn't do anything and neither did Harry," Regulus replied tiredly even as his hair stood on end, reacting to the electrifying magic in the air.

"Well, you need to fix it," Draco said sharply. "You can't just let him go on like this. People die in these tournaments. I know, I looked it up."

"Don't you think that if I could get him out of this, I would have done so already?"

"I have no idea what you would do given how poor of a job you've done so far at keeping him safe." The words were like a slap in the face, and Regulus recoiled before he could stop himself.

"What are these stupid badges about?" Regulus whispered furiously. "You know he didn't ask for this."

"Like I'm going to give up an opportunity to —"

"You know, Draco, if you have a crush on him, you can just ask him out," Regulus snapped with perhaps a bit more venom than the situation called for. Draco's mouth opened in shock for a moment before he whipped his wand out.

"I don't have a crush on him," Draco said through clenched teeth, poking his wand into Regulus's chest. It was like having a fight with a younger version of himself.

"Really? That's not how it seems to me." Regulus could feel Draco's magic like a heavy smog, curling around his fingertips and braiding into his hair. It was almost surreal. He had never felt anything like it.

"What do you think you're doing?" Moody's voice came out of nowhere, the man rushing around the corner, wand already drawn. Regulus didn't even think about it, quickly stepping in front of Draco to block whatever spell Moody hoped to cast on the boy. He wasn't proud of the way he provoked him, and he wasn't about to let Moody transfigure him into some other animal as a punishment.

"You have to watch out for the Malfoys," Moody said a moment after Draco skittered down the corridor and out of sight. "There a nasty sort."

"I'm perfectly capable of dealing with Draco on my own," Regulus said in reply, not even bothering to address the way Moody spat the name Malfoy. He doubted he thought very highly of the Blacks either.

"I bet you are," Moody said with an odd tilt to his voice. Suddenly, Regulus felt like he might get violently sick in the middle of the hallway. He avoided Moody after that, more than he already was.

Regulus had thought that bringing up Draco's painfully obvious crush on Harry would cause him to learn at least a little bit of subtly, but if anything, he just became even more of a nuisance. Regulus was so far beyond done with it by the time the first task rolled around. Not to mention the attention that Regulus himself had been getting. That was just plain embarrassing.

Alexander was a student at Beauxbatons. He was beautiful, just like nearly all of their student body — at least the ones who had come to attend the games. His brown hair was sandy and curled perfectly, his blue eyes piercing and hard to look at. For anyone else, he would be a catch. For Regulus though... well, Regulus just wasn't sure.

Regulus hadn't thought about dating or crushes in a long time.

He fell in love with James completely by accident, and he never got over it. He lost James and then was forced to watch as he fell in love with someone else, someone better. Despite how excruciatingly painful that was, Regulus never moved on from that feeling of all-consuming love. He couldn't even bring himself to be mad at James for dating someone else, that's how much his stupid heart belonged to the man.

He didn't live very long after losing James, only a few years, and there wasn't any time in there to think seriously about anyone else. Barty certainly never counted. In his second life, he looked like a child, and he spent nearly all of his time surrounded by children. Not to mention that he had a task, he needed to destroy the Horcruxes and kill Voldemort. That kind of plan did not involve something as mundane as dating.

So when Alexander, with his perfect hair and pretty eyes, pulled Regulus aside so he could ask him to the Yule Ball, Regulus nearly choked on his tongue.

"I'm sorry?" Regulus said.

"I know we do not know each other very well," Alexander said. "But I wanted to ask you before anyone else did." Regulus stared at him, unsure of how to even respond. He had just learned the boy's name a second ago, he didn't know a single thing about him.

"I — I have to get to class," Regulus said before running away like the coward he was. He hadn't expected Alexander to ask again, and he did his best not to think about it during his next class

"What was that about, by the way?" Harry asked later that afternoon. "That guy from Beauxbatons, what did he want?" Regulus felt himself flush.

"Oh, nothing really," Regulus replied. Hermione raised an eyebrow at him.

"He didn't want anything?" she asked.

"He was — actually, he — he asked me to the Yule Ball," Regulus said, tripping over his words like a silly schoolgirl. Hermione giggled.

"Did he really?" she whispered happily. "What did you say?"

"Nothing," Regulus said.

"You didn't say anything?" she asked. "At all?"

"There wasn't much to say given how fast I ran away from him," Regulus confessed, feeling more embarrassed than he had in years. He looked over at Harry who was just watching him with a look of pure confusion. "What?"

"You have to say yes," Hermione interrupted.

"Why?" Regulus asked.

"Why would he say yes?" Harry asked, the deep line between his brows causing his lightning scar to crinkle.

"Why wouldn't he? Like half the girls in Gryffindor have a crush on him," Hermione said, a light dusting of pink on her cheeks, the only indicator that she might agree with those girls.

"He can't go to the Yule Ball with him. He's a boy," Harry said. Regulus and Hermione stared at him before Hermione chuckled.

"Oh, Harry," she said fondly.

It took several long conversations for Regulus to understand the way muggles felt about gay relationships and for Harry to understand that the Dursleys' viewpoints on gayness were just as despicable as their views on magic. Not that being gay was completely accepted in the wizarding world, there were still the pureblood beliefs about maintaining a bloodline that they had to contend with, but that was more of an inconvenience than a direct hatred.

Regulus had never been attracted to girls, though during his first life, he knew one day he would be forced to marry one and to produce at least two children with her. When he was very young, he used to hope that Sirius would have children early and free Regulus from his responsibility. That hope fell through when Sirius was disowned, not to mention that Regulus now knew that Sirius had very little intention of ever marrying or sleeping with any woman.

Harry, upon learning all of this, looked like his entire world had just been turned upside down and violently shaken. He was quiet for two full days after that, walking around the castle in a daze. Regulus almost regretted talking to him when he noticed his eyes lingering on Cedric for a beat too long every time the handsome Hufflepuff entered the room.

The strangest moment of all was the conversation Regulus had with James when he finally showed back up. Regulus was finally reading Mackenzie's Mountain, the book Lavender had given him that had been sitting at the bottom of his bag since he received it.

He was surprised by the content though. The few muggle books he had read were very different from the book Lavender gave him. Mackenzie's Mountain, it turned out, was a love story. A love story about a woman with the last name Potter falling in love with a man named Wolf. Regulus almost felt like it was some pointed dig from Lavender.

“What is the Yule Ball?” James asked. Regulus had been reading in the library late in the evening, it was almost completely abandoned and very silent, so the sound of James’s voice made him yelp in surprise.

“Where have you been? I haven’t seen you in weeks?” Regulus snapped.

“Thought you didn’t think I was real,” James said snidely.

“What?” Regulus said, shaking his head.

“I said I thought you did not think that I was real,” James repeated, lifting his nose in the air in an uncanny impression of Sirius when he was a child.

“You couldn’t find a less confusing way to say that?” Regulus said.

“You mean you couldn’t,” James said. He was sitting in the chair across from Regulus and lifted one of his crossed arms so that he could point directly in Regulus’s face.

Regulus looked down at James’s finger, before looking back up. “Huh?”

James rolled his eyes exasperatedly, he looked like a petulant child. “If I’m made up, then it’s your brain coming up with my dumb sentences.”

Regulus gave him a long look. “I guess,” Regulus said uncertainly, deeply unsure of the point James was trying to make.

“I’m not just in your brain, you know,” James said finally. Regulus thought that James was trying very hard to look stern. “And anyway, you didn’t answer my other question.”

“Which question was that?”

“What’s the Yule Ball?” he repeated.

“Oh,” Regulus said. “It’s a Christmas celebration for the Triwizard Tournament. Why haven’t I seen you in so long if you’re not just in my head?”

“Well, I didn’t think you had time for me. What with your new boyfriend and all,” James said sniffing pompously and looking away.

“My new boy — what?”

“You know what I’m talking about,” James said.

“I assure you I don’t,” Regulus replied. “I figured you were here to ask about Harry and the extremely dangerous tournament he’s been illegally entered into.”

James’s face paled. Regulus wasn’t sure that he had ever seen a ghost grow pale like that.

“Right,” James said before swallowing harshly. “Is there any way to get him out of it?”

Regulus shook his head. "I already talked to Dumbledore, and he said there was no way to pull him out once his name was drawn," Regulus explained. "They set an age line to keep anyone under seventeen from entering, so someone else must have put his name in."

"Shouldn't he be disqualified since he's not old enough to compete?"

"I asked the same thing, but apparently disqualification isn't really a part of this tournament. Dumbledore said that he has to show up to each task otherwise his magical core could be damaged."

"What? His magic could be affected by this?" James asked, sitting up in alarm.

"Dumbledore said that the Goblet of Fire is intrinsically tied to the champions' magic. It chooses each of them for a reason, though that reason is mostly unknown to us. Regardless, it is not random and when a name comes out of it, the goblet's magic and the champion's magic are intertwined."

"This is bad," James said after a long moment of silence.

"Yes, thank you, James, I'm aware of that," Regulus snapped viciously, the stress that was constantly weighing on his shoulders seemed suddenly far too overbearing.

"I'm sorry," James said softly, drawing Regulus's attention easily. Regulus's shoulders dropped instantly.

"I'm trying to keep him alive and out of danger," Regulus whispered. "But it's so hard."

"I know," James said, reaching out to grab Regulus's hand. Regulus gasped when he felt James's fingers against his own.

"How?" Regulus said.

"I don't understand it either," James said, though he looked thoughtful. "I'm sorry I haven't been around. Some of it was on accident, I get... caught sometimes. I don't know how to explain it, but I also could have shown up earlier."

"Why didn't you?" A very odd expression crossed James's face.

"I'm not proud to admit it," James mumbled. "I'm here now though."

Regulus gave him a long look before something clicked. "The Yule Ball," Regulus said before snickering unexpectedly. He tried to cover his mouth to keep the sound from coming out. James watched him carefully looking both unhappy and entertained.

"Yes, it's not my proudest moment."

"You are utterly ridiculous," Regulus said, still laughing quietly.

James half shrugged. "Maybe," he said. "Are you going to say yes?"

“He hasn’t asked again,” Regulus said but when James just kept watching him, he elaborated. “Probably not, though Hermione thinks I should.”

“Harry’s friend knows about this?”

Regulus rolled his eyes. “Yes,” he said. James fell silent, watching Regulus with a quiet dissatisfaction.

“I think you should say yes,” James said finally, his voice firm.

“Weren’t you the one avoiding me because someone had the audacity to ask me to a dance?”

“Yes, but I was wrong,” James said decidedly. “You should go.”

Regulus shook his head at him disbelievingly. “I’ll think about it,” Regulus muttered. James smiled though it didn’t quite touch his eyes.

“I heard your conversation with Harry, by the way,” James said, leaning even farther forward. If he was real, Regulus was sure he would be able to feel his breath against his cheek. A feeling of longing nearly overwhelmed him at that moment.

“Which conversation?” Regulus asked, working hard to bury his feelings, shutting them behind thick stone walls in his head.

“The one about boys liking boys,” James said with a laugh at his own juvenile phrasing.

Regulus sighed tiredly. “Yeah, well I think I might grow to regret that conversation,” Regulus mumbled.

“You disapprove of Harry’s crush?” James asked. Regulus gave him a long look which just seemed to make James laugh. “You know,” he said, sobering suddenly, “of all the people who I thought might have a conversation like that with my son one day, I never would have guessed that it would be you.”

Regulus couldn’t hear any judgment in James’s voice, but he bristled nonetheless. “Well, someone had to explain it to him,” Regulus said defensively.

James, however, just looked impossibly soft. “I’m glad it was you,” James said.

“Hello, Regulus,” Luna said suddenly. Regulus sat up quickly. He hadn’t noticed how far forward he was leaning, as if he was trying to memorize every detail of James’s face.

“Luna,” Regulus said, his voice a touch more breathless than he would have liked.

“Madam Pince sent me back here to tell you that the library is closing,” she said softly.

“Oh, thanks,” Regulus responded, starting to throw his belongings back into his bag. He felt unsettled having Luna interrupt him from talking to James.

“Of course,” Luna said. “Good night, Regulus. Good night, James.” With that, she turned quickly and flounced away from them. Regulus was frozen for a moment before turning to look at James who appeared just as shocked as he felt.

They didn't talk again in the library, though James was next to him the entire journey up to the dorm room.

“How did she —”

“She’s Pandora’s daughter,” Regulus said quickly. “I don't know.” It wasn’t an answer, but it was still somehow unsurprising.

“What do you think it means?” James asked.

Regulus stared at him. James was standing in the common room now, dressed in a red sweater and faded blue jeans. His hair looked more put together than usual like he had combed it before showing up. Regulus wanted to hold him. He wanted to bury his fingers in James’s curls and breathe him in. He wanted so badly to touch him. And more than that, he wanted him to be real.

“Maybe you’re not... what I thought,” Regulus said quietly, taking a small step toward James. James tilted his head in confusion.

“What do you mean?” James asked, his eyes expectant and open.

“Maybe you’re really here,” Regulus whispered. He reached a hand out and James took it, like they were magnets, like he had no other choice but to catch him. His hand was warm and soft. Not quite real. But it was there. For that night, it was enough.

James was gone by the time Regulus woke the next morning, though he showed back up right before Regulus pulled out the mirror to call Sirius. He shouldn’t have been surprised that he had moved into a cave near them, but he was nonetheless. James listened quietly to the conversation, sitting behind the mirror so Regulus could see him the entire time. Mirth danced in his eyes as he listened to Regulus mention the boy who had asked him to the Yule Ball.

“You should get Remus to go meet him,” James said.

“Why? I can do it myself,” Regulus said, distractedly, already making a list of everything Sirius would need. A wand, for one. Food to keep him from eating rats.

“I had to trick them into spending time alone together for weeks before they finally figured themselves out,” James said, sounding like a tired parent. “Clearly they’re fighting again.”

“And that’s my problem because?” Regulus asked.

“Don’t you think they deserve some happiness, after all that time apart,” James said imploringly. Regulus sighed.

“Fine,” he muttered, pulling out a piece of parchment to write to Remus. He couldn’t force him to move into a random cave with an escaped prisoner, that would just be cruel, but he could certainly rent a room in Hogsmeade and heavily imply that Remus should be living there. James read over his shoulder, chuckling at Regulus’s less-than-subtle language.

“What is that?” James asked. Regulus lifted his head to look at where James was pointing. Mackenzie’s Mountain had fallen out of his bag when he was digging around in it for a quill.

“A book,” Regulus said quickly.

“It looks like a muggle romance,” James said.

“And how do you know that? Read a lot of muggle romances?” Regulus snarked.

“I had a — a friend who used to read them sometimes.” Regulus rolled his eyes.

“Just say Lily when you mean Lily,” Regulus said, exasperatedly. “Honestly, James.”

“Okay,” James said quietly. “Well, Lily used to read them. Not that one specifically, but it looks similar.”

“Lavender, one of the Gryffindor girls, gave it to me,” Regulus said.

“Another admirer?” James said with a wide smirk.

“Doubt it,” Regulus said with a laugh. “It is interesting though.”

“How so?” James asked.

“It’s about a Potter falling for a man named Wolf,” Regulus replied, a smirk of his own crossing his face. “Something you want to tell me?”

Regulus had been joking, but a bright blush spread across James’s cheeks. Regulus gasped. “It was just a crush,” James said, looking mortified.

“On Lupin?” Regulus asked, laughing quietly. James’s face turned even more red.

“I was very young,” James said, the words sounding like they were fighting their way out. “And you’ve seen Lupin.” Regulus decided to give him a break, not that he didn’t enjoy embarrassing James.

“Oh, yes,” Regulus said with a suggestive raise of his eyebrow. “I’ve seen him.”

James gasped, pointing at Regulus accusingly. “No!” he shouted. Regulus laughed even louder.

“I was very young,” Regulus said, lowering his voice in an impression of James. James guffawed, but he was interrupted from responding when there was a noise at the window. It looked like it was one of the school owls.

Regulus stood up and unlocked the window. The dusky owl flew in, doing a quick loop around the dorm room, before landing on Regulus's bedside table, sticking its leg out expectantly. Regulus unfurled the note that was tied there.

10 PM. My office.

"Who is that from?" James asked, his eyebrows furrowed.

"You would be happier not knowing," Regulus replied.

Chapter Notes

if you are just reading this update, you might have noticed that this fic went from being "mature" to "explicit." i made this change for two reasons. one, there will be graphic depictions of violence later on. two, there will be explicit sexual content even later than that.

actually, i did for three reasons, i asked on my tumblr if i should make this story explicit and the only answers i received said yes.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Remus had not expected to enjoy living in the Three Broomsticks, yet it was the most comfortable he had felt in years. Since that fateful Halloween night more than a decade prior, Remus had been jumping from one place to another, never willing to stay anywhere long. Not that he had the money or ability to remain in one location forever. He was always running, trying to escape the grief that threatened to bury him at any given moment.

When he was asked to come back to Hogwarts, he had thought about the offer of a clean bed and a warm meal multiple times a day, plus pay which was just fantastic. He had tried very hard not to think about how difficult it would be to walk the halls that he and his friends once haunted. Every moment in Hogwarts was like trying to breathe in smoke, choking and coughing even as he strained to get a clear moment.

Living in Grimmauld Place was just bizarre. Remus spent a good chunk of his time there thinking about the terrible childhood Sirius had to endure, remembering the way he would come back to school, a little too thin and flinching just a bit too often. It always made something awful and possessive and altogether too wolfy rise up in him. Especially before they started dating, when Remus couldn't express his possessiveness in any way except by staring at Sirius too long, and then avoiding him when he was forced to swallow down a growl.

He spent the rest of his time at Grimmauld avoiding Sirius once again, just like before, he would stare at his face a little too long, linger a minute more than was acceptable, and then he would scramble out of the room. He felt stupid enduring the same dance that he had two decades before, but he wasn't sure how to move forward from where they were.

He left Sirius in Azkaban. Not once did he try to visit him. Not that he would have been able to, as Regulus was so kind to remind him, but he didn't even try. He had spent all that time just trying to survive, feeling like a wraith drifting through life waiting until death finally arrived, a welcome gift in a sea of torture.

But it wasn't torture, not really, not like Sirius had endured for all that time. Every time he thought about it, which was often, he would internally flinch. It was like being stabbed over and over again, each time the knife twisting a little further into his gut, tearing him open. He was trying to do the right thing now, trying not to overwhelm Sirius, trying to just take care of him. And Harry, of course.

Sirius was still Sirius though. He was sharp, quick, and strikingly handsome despite the time spent in that awful prison. He was shaky and he was hallucinating and unstable, but he was still himself. Remus should have realized a storm was brewing, but he was still so busy avoiding Sirius, that he missed all the signs.

By the time Sirius came at him, all razor-sharp edges and tempest, Remus was completely unprepared.

Before Sirius went to Azkaban, Remus had become very skilled at dealing with Sirius's mood swings. He could disarm him, wrap around him, and tie him up in knots in just a few maneuvers. Sirius would come at him with seething anger or earnest sadness or burning excitement and Remus would have him on his knees, tipsy off of Remus's tender care and adoration. Everyone else found Sirius so overwhelming, but Remus knew just how to play him.

He was just out of practice.

Sirius was itching for a fight and instead of knocking the wind out of his sails, or dismantling the sails altogether, making Sirius help him put the sails away, tucking them under the bed for another day, Remus engaged. He let Sirius push him and he let his own emotions take control, pushing his good sense out of the driver's seat, and when all was said and done, he practically ran out of the house.

He didn't go far. Just down the street, tucking himself into an alley and letting himself get consumed by the panic attack that had been building for weeks. After that was finished, marking off his to-do list, he walked to a small store nearby, bought a pack of cigarettes, and chain-smoked all of them, before ambling back to Grimmauld smelling horrible and feeling even worse.

"Sirius!" he called out the moment the door was shut behind him, but he could sense that he was gone. He didn't know how, but he could always feel Sirius like his magic was folded into the air and Remus was just swimming through it.

He found the letter Sirius left for him in the kitchen, a quick note telling him that Harry's name had been drawn, whatever that meant, and that Sirius wanted to be close by. It wasn't till the next morning that he realized Sirius was referring to the Triwizard Tournament. The realization of what was happening — had happened — to Harry derailed him, and despite their fight, he understood why Sirius had to go, why he felt the need to be close to Hogwarts.

He wasn't sure what to do with himself, he lingered around Grimmauld for about half a day before realizing he couldn't stay there and headed back to his father's old house. His father had died the same year Sirius went to prison, only a few weeks later, and Remus was too consumed with grief over Lily, James, and Sirius to even bother grieving over his father, not that he would have done so given the chance. He held onto his house, living there periodically over the years, but he could never stay there long. It felt how Grimmauld must have felt to Sirius, suffocating and horrible.

He was ashamed to say that he was utterly useless until a week or so later when an owl arrived, knocking him out of his brooding. The owl was carrying a letter and a small pouch with way too many Galleons.

Lupin,

Harry is being forced to compete in the Triwizard Tournament, as I am sure you are aware. Not that Harry has mentioned you reaching out, I am certain you have just been terribly occupied, but perhaps you might speak to him when your busy schedule allows.

My brother has moved into a cave near Hogsmeade. I included directions at the end of this letter. He is living there, for the time being, and he will be needing a wand. I would go for it myself, and will if you are incapable, but it would be greatly appreciated if you could use the money I have provided to do this on your own.

I will not ask what happened between the two of you, because I do not care, but he should not be left alone. Surely you can see that.

I never get much time to go out to Hogsmeade, fourth year is as busy as any, but I felt it might be for the best to have a spare room there. Perhaps you can check on it for me. Rosmerta can give you a key.

R.A.B.

Regulus could be so dramatic, Remus thought, shaking his head. He hated the fond feeling that came now when he thought about Sirius's little brother. He barely knew anything about him at Hogwarts. The only Regulus Remus ever encountered was the one intent on riling Sirius up, fighting with him in the hallways, and ignoring him for weeks and months on end. Remus never had a high opinion of the boy.

When Regulus died, Sirius crumbled. The poorly built foundations of Sirius's well-being washed away in the tide Regulus's shocking death brought on. Remus could still vividly remember showing up at James and Lily's house to find Sirius curled up on the ground, his face red and blotchy with tears, looking at Remus like a starving man begging for a savior.

Remus did what he could for Sirius, held him close, distracted him when he was able to, and made sure he ate and washed and left the house periodically, but once those difficult months passed, Sirius became a firestorm of uncontrollable rage. Remus could still recall the horrible fear he felt every day, that Sirius was going to go too far and get himself killed.

Of course, everything came tumbling down when James and Lily were killed, but by then, Remus had all but forgotten about Regulus's death.

The Regulus he knew now was very different from the one he briefly encountered years before. He was sad and soft, still contained and controlled, but not quite as mean, like all the hurt he'd felt as a child had filtered out over the years. Most surprising was the way he looked at Harry, like a father watching his son, carefully counting his steps to make sure he never fell. It was clear that he cared about Harry fiercely, with a kind of irate affection that Remus had only ever encountered in wild animals.

It was sweet. Sort of. Mostly it was terrifying. Regulus had high standards, and Remus constantly felt like he was falling short of them. He had felt guilty about it all summer, but now he was trying to mitigate his own self-hatred. He didn't see it as very useful given what they were up against. He could feel bad about himself once they destroyed all the Horcruxes.

"Rosmerta, hello," Remus greeted as he entered into the nearly empty Three Broomsticks. It was still very early, the Hogwarts students not yet headed to Hogsmeade, so the inn was almost completely barren, only a few customers tucked away at the corner table.

"Mornin' Remus," Rosmerta replied. She was as beautiful as ever, and though he had interacted with her briefly during his year as a Hogwarts professor, he still found it odd to be greeted by his first name by her. "Here to check in?"

"Yes, I —" He wanted to explain, to elaborate on why a fourteen-year-old might be paying for his semi-permanent stay, but she just ducked down behind the counter and came back with a large key.

"You're in the top room," she said sweetly. "Your breakfasts and dinners are all paid for while you're here. Do you want them brought up to the room or will you take them down here?"

"My breakfasts and — what?" he asked, bewildered.

"Sorry, he didn't mention anything about lunch," Rosmerta said regretfully.

"No, no, that's fine," Remus said, waving her off.

He climbed the stairs to the private room on the top floor. There were only a handful of rooms at the Three Broomsticks, but only one at the very top. It was clean and cozy, a fire already burning in the fireplace. Remus set down his trunk, full of the few clothes he owned, and looked around the room feeling baffled. Regulus had gone to the trouble to book him this room, and pay for two meals a day just so Remus would be nearby, just so Remus could take care of Sirius. He knew Regulus had changed, but this was far more than he expected.

He was only in the room for a bit before heading out toward Ollivander's. The wand shop had a small location in Hogsmeade, a convenience that Remus appreciated. He didn't feel like dealing with the bustle and insanity of Diagon Alley. The man who ran this Ollivander's was young, maybe only twenty-five, but he was nice and didn't ask any questions about why Remus was buying a new wand.

There was no way for Sirius to come and try out the wands himself, so he just aimed to get one that worked for himself. Sirius hadn't had any trouble using Remus's wand over the summer, so he figured this would work just fine. He left the shop feeling an odd sense of accomplishment, though in reality, he had done very little.

Hogsmeade was comfortable and welcoming, like coming home. He hadn't felt this way at Hogwarts, but now he felt it. The way the cold Scottish wind blew through the city made Remus feel, for a moment, like nothing bad had ever happened to him, like he was settled in life, like he was happy.

He went back to the Three Broomsticks, ordering a bunch of food that he packaged together along with a few extra items of clothing he had picked up that morning, and began the slow hike to the cave. He took his time, doubling back and walking in various directions to make sure that no one was following him before he finally came upon it.

"Sirius," he called. Sirius looked up quickly. Remus had been wondering if Regulus would tell Sirius that he was coming, but the clear surprise on Sirius's face answered that question for him. He looked thin. He always looked thin now, but he looked even smaller than he had in Grimmauld. Remus's chest ached.

"Remus," Sirius croaked, his voice still damaged after all those years. Remus wondered if there was a way to help him, if he could cure him. He would have to look it up.

Their conversation was short, carrying on without touching too many heavy topics, before Remus started nearly force-feeding Sirius the food he brought. Over the summer, Sirius hadn't been able to eat. Remus didn't think that he experienced hunger cues the same way after starving for so long, and he had felt so out of his depth that he didn't quite know how to help him.

He didn't feel that way now. He wasn't sure what exactly had changed, but he thought that perhaps some of Regulus's forcefulness had rubbed off on him. He unpacked the food for Sirius and made him eat until Sirius looked like he might get sick. Sirius didn't complain though, just watched Remus with that soft, gutted look that he wore so often now, like he couldn't believe that Remus cared enough to make sure he was eating.

By the time he left the cave, Sirius was half asleep, the food causing his already weak body to drag him into rest. He cast a few warming charms on the clothes Sirius had, as well as Sirius himself, and headed back to Hogsmeade. He felt better and worse having seen Sirius. He felt better knowing that he was fed and that he was safe, at least as safe as he could be given the circumstances.

He felt worse though because seeing Sirius suffer, even for a moment, was like reliving all of his worst memories, one on top of the other, all piled high in his thoughts, crushing him beneath the weight of it. He spent most of the evening making a plan for how often he could go up to see Sirius without it being suspicious and for all the things he could do to help him in the meantime.

He made sure to write Harry as well. Regulus hadn't been subtle in mentioning that Remus needed to reach out to him. Harry had the mirror and would be able to talk to Sirius whenever he wanted, not to mention the fact that he lived with Regulus, but Remus was the only one of the three who had the capability to act like an adult in public. He could support Harry in ways that Sirius and Regulus couldn't, and he needed to start acting like it.

The Monday after Hogsmeade weekend, Remus went for a long walk around Hogsmeade. He thought about going up to the cave, but he didn't want to risk it. There were already people coming into town for the first task of the Triwizard Tournament, and Remus couldn't be sure that he wasn't being watched.

He ended up staying out late, only heading back to the Three Broomsticks when it was getting dark. He was passing by a few of the small houses, moseying up the road slowly, when a black dog caught his eye. He did a double-take before realizing that he was in fact seeing what he thought he was seeing.

Sirius was sitting between two homes, half covered with shadows, watching Remus with his piercing gaze. Remus looked around quickly, cast a very strong Disillusionment charm on Padfoot, and walked over to him in the least suspicious way possible.

"What are you doing here?" Remus whispered furiously. Padfoot didn't answer, of course, but he came forward and brushed his nose against Remus's leg before trotting off toward the Three Broomsticks.

Remus followed him warily, hoping that his spell wouldn't fail. Sirius was still a wanted man, and there was no doubt in Remus's mind that some of their enemies now knew that Sirius was an Animagus. With Peter out there, most likely returned to Voldemort's side, someone had to know.

No one gave Sirius even a passing glance as they walked through, and Remus could do little else except follow him into the Three Broomsticks, Sirius slipping through the front doors when an elderly couple was exiting. Sirius headed right up the stairs the moment he was inside, and Remus moved to follow him but was interrupted by Rosmerta.

"You're back," she said cheerfully. "Are you here for dinner?"

"Oh, err," Remus said, uncertainly. "I'll just take it up to my room if that's all right?"

"Sure, want me to bring it up for you?"

"No!" Remus said, perhaps a bit too loudly. "No, thank you. I'll do it myself."

She gave him an odd look but nodded. He had to wait a few minutes for her to bring him a tray of food, a warm and fragrant stew along with two rolls. He thanked her and headed quickly up the stairs.

Padfoot was right by the door to his room, his head cocked curiously.

"Sorry," Remus said. "I didn't want her to disturb us."

He unlocked the door and watched as Padfoot's skinny frame slipped through a second later. Remus walked in and placed the tray of food on the table near the fire, casting a quick stasis charm on it to keep it warm. He wondered if he would be able to convince Sirius to eat it.

"What's going on?" Remus said, turning back just in time to see Sirius transform. Sirius, however, looked just as confused as Remus felt. He shrugged and turned slightly to look at the empty space near the door. Remus should have realized.

The air shimmered slightly and then Regulus appeared, pulling James's, now Harry's, invisibility cloak off and tucking it away. Regulus's face was tight with stress, dark circles hung under his light gray eyes, his cheeks slightly hollow like he hadn't been eating well.

"We need to talk," Regulus said. Even his voice didn't sound right, there was a sharpness to him that felt painful.

Sirius sat down in one of the two chairs next to the fire, brushing his tangled hair out of his eyes. Regulus breathed a heavy sigh but didn't move from where he stood near the door, running a finger through his too-long hair.

"Okay," Remus said slowly when Regulus didn't continue.

"I believe someone — the Dark — You-Know-Who is using the tournament to get to Harry. I don't know how, but I think Harry competing is part of his plan," Regulus said stiffly.

Sirius nodded, though he looked curious. "How though? To what end?"

"I don't know," Regulus said. Remus was surprised to hear the open frustration in his voice. "But someone orchestrated this and whoever it was, they're doing it on You-Know-Who's orders."

"Why now?" Remus asked.

Regulus sighed again, looking a little defeated. His eyes drifted toward the bed like he was watching someone, but he glanced away quickly. "He's getting more powerful. We knew he was still alive, out there somewhere, but I think he's close to coming back. I just can't figure out how he's doing it."

"How do you know this?" Sirius asked. Remus was suddenly sure that he had missed something. Sirius was looking at Regulus with suspicion. It wasn't quite distrust, but like he knew Regulus was purposefully leaving something out.

Regulus looked over at the bed again and clenched his teeth tightly. Remus thought he noticed him shake his head, just slightly, but he couldn't figure out why.

"Regulus," Sirius said sharply.

"Snape told me," Regulus said, sounding almost regretful.

"You're getting this information from Snivellus?" Sirius said loudly. Regulus shushed him, though through clenched teeth so that it almost sounded like a cat hissing. "We can't trust him."

"Maybe not," Regulus conceded. Remus could see the tension around his eyes, it was like he had already had this argument and was being forced to have it again. "But he is useful."

“What did he tell you?” Remus said, purposefully interrupting whatever scathing remark Sirius was about to make. Regulus gave him a look of relief.

“His Dark Mark had faded over the years, but now it’s growing darker. He says that he felt it move two nights ago. There is only one reason that would be happening.”

“Voldemort is gaining power,” Remus said quietly.

“How does the tournament play into this?” Sirius asked, his mouth pulled down into a frown.

“I’m not sure, but I feel like someone is planning something related to it. I thought at first it was just to hurt Harry, but now, I can’t be sure.”

“Is there any way he can get out of it? Drop out of the tournament or something?” Remus asked.

Regulus shook his head. “No, but I — I have a plan,” Regulus said, his eyes drifting to the bed again before closing quickly.

“What plan?” Sirius asked.

“I don’t want to go into it now. I’ll deal with the tournament, what I need is for you two to start working on finding the other Horcruxes,” Regulus said. His arms were crossed tightly across his chest, his fingers digging into his biceps.

Regulus didn’t have much else to offer them, besides the advice to reach out to Dumbledore. “The locket I destroyed, do you still have it?”

“Yes,” Sirius said. Remus knew he had been keeping it close.

“It might help you,” Regulus said. “I’ve been thinking, what if it belonged to someone important? If we can track how he got it, then it might help us figure out what the others are.”

Sirius nodded solemnly.

“I need to get back,” Regulus said.

“What about the first task? Do you know what it is yet?” Sirius asked.

Regulus cringed. “Yes,” he said but didn’t elaborate. Sirius raised his eyebrows questioningly, but Regulus just looked away.

“I want to be there.”

“No, Sirius,” Regulus said.

“That’s not a good idea,” Remus said at the same time.

“If something is going on, I want to be there,” Sirius said, and Remus could already feel a fight brewing in him. He wouldn’t budge on this. Remus could already see it.

“What if someone sees you? The Grim walking around the Triwizard Tournament is sure to draw attention,” Remus said.

“What if I wore the cloak?” Sirius asked, but Regulus shook his head quickly.

“Moody can see through it,” Regulus replied.

“How?” Remus asked.

“I don’t know, that eye of his,” Regulus said, waving his hand around, but Remus could see the way his shoulders tightened. “You can’t go, Sirius. It’s not safe for you and if something happened to you, Harry would be devastated.”

Remus had to fight not to laugh. It was more than obvious to him that Regulus would not handle Sirius getting hurt well, but the way he shelved his own feelings off onto Harry was comical. Not that Harry wouldn’t be upset, he was clearly a sensitive kid and he had grown very attached to Sirius over the summer, both of them making up for lost time.

Sirius didn’t argue with Regulus, but he didn’t agree either. Remus was already preparing himself for the conversation they would have after Regulus left. Regulus pulled the invisibility cloak out, but didn’t put it on right away, instead, he stared down at it, kneading it nervously between his fingers.

“Things are only going to get more dangerous from here,” Regulus muttered. “I’m trying to keep Harry safe, but —” Regulus swallowed harshly.

“We know,” Remus said softly. “We’re with you. Both of you.”

Regulus looked at him, his shoulders dropping slightly, a grateful gleam in his eye.

Sirius watched Regulus leave with an odd look on his face and was quiet for a few long minutes after the door shut.

“Have you eaten?” Remus asked, mostly to break the silence.

“I have to go to the tournament,” Sirius said in reply. Remus sighed.

“I know,” Remus said. Sirius’s eyebrows raised in shock. “I have an idea, but you’re not going to like it.” Sirius, to Remus’s surprise, smirked at him. Suddenly, an awkward look crossed his face.

“Erm,” Sirius said before clearing his throat. “I have to ask you something.”

“Yes?” Remus said curiously.

“James,” Sirius said, pausing to cough again, “he wasn’t in the room with us, was he?”

“Just now?” Remus asked. Sirius nodded. “No, he wasn’t.”

Sirius nodded again. “Okay, that’s what I thought. But it looked like...”

“Like what?” Remus said. Sirius shook his head.

“It doesn't matter,” Sirius said quickly. “Anyways, what’s your idea?”

the first task.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Sirius knew that Regulus would not be happy to see him, but he had to be there.

Regulus refused to tell him what the first task was, and when Sirius finally managed to talk to Harry through the mirror, Harry was just as tight-lipped.

“What are they expecting you to do?” Sirius asked. Harry was in the common room, though it was late enough that no one else was up. Sirius wondered vaguely where Regulus was, but Harry didn’t mention it, so Sirius didn’t bring it up.

Harry looked away quickly when Sirius asked about the task, a slightly guilty expression on his face.

“I’m not sure,” Harry mumbled, his shoulders moving in an aborted shrug.

“Harry,” Sirius said with a sigh. “What did Regulus tell you?”

Harry shrugged again, and Sirius could already see that he wasn't getting any more information out of the kid. Traitor. Sirius let it go, more for Harry’s sake than anything and changed the subject. Harry looked so relieved that Sirius felt guilty for even asking.

They talked for a while after that, Harry spent most of the conversation complaining about Ron again. Sirius could see how much it was bothering him that his best friend wouldn’t speak to him. He knew that pain well, the months he spent without Remus and James during his fifth year painfully clear in his memories.

Sirius had been antsy since that conversation though. Remus told him that he had a plan to help Sirius attend the task, but he had yet to hear what that plan might be, and he was a little nervous.

“Sirius,” Remus said softly. Sirius was in the middle of pacing around the cave when Remus entered, he was dressed in a soft sweater, a pair of worn-out old trousers, and a long coat that Sirius had never seen before. No person had any right looking that delectable dressed in a sweater, but somehow Remus pulled it off.

“Let’s go,” Sirius said after a moment, still a little caught up in taking Remus in.

“Hold on,” Remus said. Something clenched harshly in Sirius’s chest and he ground his teeth together.

“I’m not staying back,” Sirius said. “I already said I wouldn’t interfere, but I have to be there.” Remus threw his hands up in surrender.

“I know that,” Remus said. “But we need to give you a disguise.”

Sirius looked at him uncertainly. "I was just going to go as Padfoot," he said.

Remus nodded. "I'm not disagreeing with that plan. The less you can speak, the better."

Sirius chuckled. "Thanks ever so," Sirius replied, he tried to sound grumpy, but the smile tugging at his lips ruined it. Remus smirked at him.

"There could be people who know what Padfoot looks like, so I'm going to transfigure you," Remus said.

"Good idea," Sirius said, but something was still tugging at him. He almost didn't want to ask. "Why did you say I wasn't going to like this plan?"

Remus's smirk widened even further, though he was clearly trying to tamp it down. "You'll have to be on a lead," Remus said.

"A lead?" Sirius asked, his mouth falling open slightly.

"You'll draw more attention as a loose dog, you're too big to blend in," Remus said.

"So I'm going as your pet?" Sirius interrupted and immediately felt himself blush at the words. Remus was clearly trying not to laugh.

"It's just for a few hours," Remus said placatingly.

A younger version of Sirius might have said something scathing or sarcastic. If you wanted me on a leash, Moony, you could have just said so. That version of Sirius was long buried, out of sight and out of mind. Besides, this Moony wouldn't want to hear that, and Sirius was trying very hard not to rock the boat.

"Fine," he grumbled. He wasn't really that bothered by it. It was a tad degrading, sure, but at least it was Remus with him. He's not sure he would let anyone else do it.

He transformed into Padfoot, melting into the comfort of his Animagus form with the ease of having done it for years and years. He loved the way Remus looked when he was Padfoot. There was no pain, rejection, or grief, just a simple, unending, and uninterrupted love that echoed in his thoughts to a chorus of mine, mine, mine. He would be embarrassed about it once he was human again, but for now, he didn't mind.

Remus pulled out his wand, a look of focused concentration on his face, and began the transfiguration. Sirius couldn't even feel it happen, though he did notice the appearance of a second tail once Remus pulled away. He was making Sirius look like a crup.

His Remus was so brilliant. It was very uncommon, probably impossible, for wizards to turn into magical animals when becoming an Animagus. There were some legends about the original founders of Hogwarts, that they could turn into magical creatures, but Sirius had never been able to find evidence of that. So making him look like a crup was a brilliant way to distract people from the presence of an animal.

Remus attached the lead to him as they started walking into Hogsmeade and Sirius quickly bumped his hand so that he knew it was okay. It wasn't ideal, but he knew his Remus was just trying to keep him safe. The road to Hogwarts was more packed than Sirius had ever seen it. He kept close to Remus's side, overwhelmed by the sheer number of bodies, let alone smells, present in the crowd.

They headed right for the champions' tent, Remus intending on speaking to Harry before the task began, but right before they arrived someone jumped in front of them.

"No," Regulus said, his voice tense with obvious stress and anxiety. "No, he cannot be here." He smelled like fear.

"He was going to come either way," Remus whispered. "I'll make sure he doesn't interfere." Regulus glared at Remus. Sirius had witnessed lesser men cower in the face of that anger, but Remus just looked back impassible. He supposed that he'd had a lot of practice given all the years he spent dealing with Sirius.

"If you so much as bark, I'm going to hex you blind," Regulus said to Sirius, speaking through gritted teeth. Sirius walked as far forward as he could and rubbed his face against Regulus's thigh. He hated how tense his little brother seemed. Regulus sighed quietly.

"How's Harry?" Remus asked.

"Nervous," Regulus said. People were piling into the stands quickly now.

"Who is that?" Remus whispered. Regulus turned to look as a man pulled Harry out of the tent and began speaking to him quietly. Regulus pursed his lips.

"Bagman," Regulus said. "He shouldn't be talking to Harry alone. I'll meet you both in the stands." He walked stiffly over to the two of them, interrupting whatever the man had been saying. Harry didn't bother to stop him, instead just watching Regulus as he took over the conversation.

A loud whistle was blown. "Come on," Remus said and began walking to the stands. Sirius noticed a few people gasp when they noticed him walk by, but he paid them no mind. No one tried to interfere or stop them, though Sirius did notice more than a few students waved excitedly at Remus. He was popular.

"Hello, Professor Lupin," a quiet, melodic voice said, just as they arrived at their spot in the stands.

"Just Remus is fine, I'm not your professor anymore, Luna," Remus said, a clear smile in his voice. "Hello, Hermione," Remus greeted as Hermione came to stand next to Luna. She smiled brightly at Remus.

"Okay," Luna replied. "May I pet your crup?" Sirius looked up just as Remus looked down at him. Remus was grinning mischievously.

“Of course,” Remus replied. “Be nice,” he mumbled to Sirius just as Luna reached out a hand and touched Sirius on the snout, scratching him lightly. Sirius rubbed his face up against her small hand, snuffling pleasantly.

Just then, everyone began cheering and gasping. Sirius couldn’t see anything from where he sat at Remus’s feet so he climbed up onto the stands next to him. The other Hogwarts champion had just come out into the arena. Sirius couldn’t remember his name. He had not been paying attention to the arena before, but now he noticed what everyone was gasping at.

Faced across from the champion was a dragon. A real dragon. Sirius felt more than saw Remus stiffen beside him.

“They have to face a dragon?” Remus breathed.

“They have to steal a golden egg from her,” Regulus answered. Sirius hadn’t noticed him come up next to him.

“They have to — how?” Remus asked, dismayed.

“However they can,” Regulus said, there was a smirk in his voice, but Sirius could hear the strain behind it. He nudged Regulus, noticing the way he watched the other Hogwarts champion like a hawk. Regulus reached out a hand and began scratching behind one of Sirius’s ears. Sirius didn’t think Regulus even realized he was doing it.

The Hogwarts champion worked quickly, transfiguring one of the boulders in the arena into a Labrador dog to distract the dragon so that he could steal the egg.

“Wonder what kind of dragon that is,” Remus muttered.

“It’s a Swedish Short-Snout,” Luna responded happily. “They breathe blue fire.” Just as she said it, the Short-Snout did just that, catching the champion across his arm. He cried out but still managed to get the egg and scamper away.

“Very good indeed!” Bagman shouted. “And now the marks from the judges!”

“Who are the judges?” Remus asked, leaning over to speak to Regulus, who was still petting Sirius slowly. Sirius was enjoying it far too much, the gentled press of Regulus’s hand making his eyes droop tiredly.

“Bagman, he works for the Department of Magical Games and Sports, the three headmasters and headmistress of the schools, Dumbledore, Karkaroff, and Maxime, and then Crouch,” Regulus said.

“Forgot about him,” Remus muttered. Sirius felt Regulus’s fingers tense in his fur for a second before relaxing and going back to petting him.

The next champion came out quickly after the first. Sirius was pretty sure her name was Fleur, the Beauxbatons champion. She trembled from head to foot as she walked out into the arena, the new dragon already there waiting. She charmed the dragon, a Common Welsh Green Luna informed them, into some kind of trance. Sirius didn’t recognize the spell. She was able to get her egg relatively easily, though her robes caught on fire when the dragon breathed a lick of fire while snoring.

“That was impressive spellwork,” Remus said quietly.

“Fleur is very talented,” Luna replied.

“What is Harry going to do?” Remus asked. Regulus gripped Sirius’s fur again but didn’t reply.

The next champion, Viktor Krum, had a much more violent approach to stealing his egg. He cast a Conjunctivitis Curse on the dragon, and although it made it harder for the dragon to spot him, the dragon thrashed around so much that it damaged the other eggs in its nest. The crowd was much louder during his turn than they were for the other two, invigorated by the excitement.

Just like that, Harry was up next. Regulus was scratching at Sirius’s fur so roughly that it almost hurt, but he did his best not to react. He thought that he might be calming Regulus down a bit, keeping him from turning that stress inward as he so often did as a child. If it kept him from imploding then it was worth a little bit of pain.

“What kind of dragon is that?” Remus asked as the dragon was brought out into the arena.

“A Hungarian Horntail,” Regulus responded tightly.

“They’re the most dangerous breed of dragon,” Luna said, a deep frown edged on her pale face.

“Oh,” Remus responded. Sirius knew that if he was human he would be feeling the same stress that everyone else was, but all he felt was concern about keeping Remus and Regulus calm. He leaned into Regulus’s side, and Regulus unconsciously put his arm around Sirius.

Harry walked out into the arena, looking much smaller than all of the other champions. Regulus stopped breathing. Harry moved quickly, sprinting to the side of the arena before the dragon could even see him. He cast a spell over himself, but Sirius couldn’t tell what it was.

“What did he just do?” Remus asked as if he could hear what Sirius was thinking. Regulus’s lips twitched slightly.

“He cast Aromullus,” Regulus said. “It’s used to keep scents from spreading. Dragons primarily use their sense of smell to find prey, this will keep the dragon from smelling Harry.”

Harry tucked himself behind a boulder in a way where the dragon couldn’t see him, but most of the people in the stands could. He settled down on the ground, leaning against the boulder.

“I’m confused,” Remus admitted after a few long seconds.

“Whoever entered Harry into this tournament wanted a show,” Regulus whispered. Sirius could practically feel his rage. “We’re not going to give it to them.”

“That’s very smart,” Luna said. “The dragon won’t attack unless Harry tries to get the egg.”

“Exactly,” Regulus said smugly before sitting down on the bench as if settling in for a long wait.

And a long wait it was. The crowd was tense with anticipation at first, but soon even the dragon settled in with boredom. Harry stayed where he was, tapping his foot occasionally and practicing a few spells with his wand. The crowd grew restless after a while, conversations breaking out here and there as people slowly lost interest in the performance before them.

The Weasley Twins, who had been gathering bets before the task even started, were now loudly taking bets on how long people thought Harry’s turn would go on. Hermione just shook her head at them, but Luna beaconsed them over to place a bet for twelve hours. Remus declined to place a bet as well, though he was laughing as he did it, clearly charmed by the twins.

Sirius watched the judges closely. Bagman looked like the world around him was collapsing, a face of panic that only grew stronger as the minutes ticked by. Crouch, Karkaroff, and Maxime all just looked annoyed. Dumbledore had a bland, cheerful look on his face, but Sirius was almost certain that the man was working hard not to laugh.

Sirius couldn't deny that he found it funny as well. It wasn't a plan he would have ever come up with, but Regulus and Harry executed it well. Watching the crowd grow disinterested was unusually satisfying. But Regulus was right, they all just wanted to watch the Boy-Who-Lived go through the tasks, and with Harry refusing to comply, they got nothing.

“This is going on for quite a long time,” a boy spoke suddenly. He had just walked up to them and settled next to Regulus on the stands. Regulus stiffened slightly, but Sirius couldn't figure out why. Sirius watched him closely and noticed a slight blush spread across Regulus's face.

“Yes, that's the idea, I think,” Regulus replied rigidly. The boy seemed unbothered by Regulus's rudeness. Sirius couldn't figure out if he knew him, but given his French accent, he would guess not.

“Why isn't he trying to get the egg?” the boy asked.

“He's protesting,” Regulus responded. The boy turned his blue eyes on Regulus, before they drifted to Sirius, who was now laying down on the bench, his head resting in Remus's lap. He seemed curious, but Sirius was relieved when he didn't ask.

“How long do you think they will let this go on?” the boy asked.

“Who knows?” Regulus responded though he was smiling now. It was more of an evil smile, Sirius thought.

The boy stayed next to Regulus for another twenty minutes or so, though they didn't talk much. “I must go find my friends again,” the boy said when he stood to leave. “See you later, Regulus.” He reached out almost like he was going to touch Regulus before dropping his hand and walking away.

“Who was that?” Remus asked, Sirius could hear the way he was trying to keep his tone light and conversational.

“No one,” Regulus said.

“Alexander,” Luna said at the same time. Regulus’s head snapped over to look at her. Sirius lifted his head curiously. “He’s taking Regulus to the Yule Ball.”

“Luna,” Regulus hissed warningly, but Luna just looked at him inquisitively. Hermione snickered next to Luna, but she seemed pleased.

“Oh?” Remus responded with a tiny laugh in his voice. Regulus’s face turned fiercely red, but he just looked away, his eyes once again glued to Harry who was still leaning against the boulder.

At one point, Sirius noticed Hermione stand up when Ron waved at her. She squeezed Regulus’s shoulder comfortingly as she passed and he gave her a small smile. Sirius watched as Hermione and Ron whispered to each other, too far away to hear what they were saying, but Ron kept looking at Regulus, a frown pulling at his lips. Hermione kept gesturing over at Regulus, but eventually, the two of them left together without speaking to him.

Sirius couldn’t say how long the task went on for. He was a bit embarrassed to admit that he fell asleep at one point, his head tucked against Remus’s warm thigh and with Regulus periodically petting him. When he woke up, the sun was setting and most of the stands were empty. Harry was still by the boulder, resting his head back on his folded hands, his eyes closed. Regulus was still watching him closely, his back just as tense as before.

“Surely there is going to be some end to this,” Remus said tiredly. Sirius scooted closer to the man. He could see from the way that he was sitting that Remus was uncomfortable from being in the stands for so long. Remus scratched him absentmindedly. “Good nap?”

Sirius huffed in response. Luna was no longer with them, Sirius guessed she must have left while he was snoozing.

It was completely dark by the time someone finally intervened. Dumbledore stood from where he was sitting with the remaining judges, only Bagman and Crouch, the other two having left already, and waved over the dragon’s keepers.

“Attention,” Dumbledore called. “This marks the end of the first task.” Sirius didn’t hear what else was said, as both Remus and Regulus stood up as they watched the keepers take the dragon away. Harry waited quietly until Dumbledore finally waved him over. Regulus was moving before Harry even had a chance to stand.

Sirius noticed Moody standing next to Dumbledore, Bagman, and Crouch as he and Remus followed Regulus down to speak to them. Moody was watching Harry with a keen look in his eye, and when he spotted Sirius his head shook slightly, it looked almost like an involuntary twitch.

“Gentlemen,” Dumbledore greeted.

“Am I done?” Harry interrupted, his voice scratchy as if he had just woken up. He was rubbing his face tiredly.

“They just called it,” Regulus answered.

“I didn’t know you had a crup,” Harry said suddenly, instantly squatting down to pet Sirius’s head. Sirius leaned into him happily, licking his nose once causing Harry to laugh.

“Yes, I just adopted him,” Remus responded.

“Harry, lad, what happened?” Bagman interrupted. “I thought you said you had a plan.”

“I did,” Harry responded, still squatting, but Sirius noticed the way his expression closed off when he realized he was being watched.

“You didn’t manage to get your golden egg,” Bagman practically yelled. Harry finally stood, shrugging as he did.

“Oh, well,” Harry said easily before smiling at Regulus. Regulus smirked back, looking terribly smug.

“This was your plan then, Black?” Moody said gruffly, Regulus turned to look at him with so much venom in his glare that Sirius thought Moody should have started melting on the spot.

“I have no idea what you mean,” Regulus said sharply.

“Now, now,” Dumbledore said placatingly. “This was completely fair game. The rules state that Harry merely needed to appear in the arena, not that he had to complete the task to move on.”

“But what is he going to do about the next task?” Bagman said, alarmed. “Maybe I could...”

“No, no, you don’t understand,” Bagman continued.

“He said he’s fine,” Regulus said sternly.

“I believe that is all for the evening,” Dumbledore said.

“Great,” Regulus said with false cheer. “Come on.” He wrapped an arm around Harry’s shoulders, he was slightly taller than Harry, though Sirius wasn’t sure when that happened. He all but dragged Harry away.

“Where is Rita?” Bagman asked.

“Albus,” Remus said once Crouch and Bagman finally walked away. “I need to speak with you in private if you don’t mind.”

“Of course, of course,” Dumbledore said easily. Moody was watching the exchange with intense interest, but Dumbledore waved him off. “Come to my office.”

Regulus felt extremely proud of himself. He could barely believe that his plan worked out so well. He thought for sure something would go wrong.

In the week leading up to the first task, it seemed like the walls were closing in on him from all sides. He was sure that he hadn't taken a full breath in days, each mouthful interrupted by the collapsing of his lungs under such immense pressure. He was trying to keep it together, for Harry at least.

Harry took it all in stride, though Regulus could tell that he was nervous. Despite his nerves, not once did Harry lash out. Regulus told him he would figure something out, and Harry believed him. Things were a bit weird when Moody pulled Harry into his office with the explicit purpose of giving Harry help that he was not supposed to have.

Regulus was very close to storming into Moody's office and demanding to know what the hell he was thinking. The only reason he didn't was because of James.

"Maybe he's just trying to be helpful." James was pacing the common room slowly, ambling back and forth on the bright red, ornate rugs. Regulus watched him from where he was curled up into a tight ball in front of the fire. "You said yourself that everyone knows Harry is playing at a disadvantage being so much younger than the other champions. Maybe Moody is just trying to give him a leg up."

"But why?" Regulus said. "Did Dumbledore tell him too? Why wouldn't he just tell me? It doesn't seem right." Regulus shook his head sharply. "I just wish I could figure out who put his name in that stupid goblet, then maybe I could figure out what they were planning."

"I thought you said they did it to hurt him," James said, turning once again to pace across the floor.

"Can you just sit down?" Regulus snapped. "You're driving me mad."

"Sorry." James sat down next to him, curling up his legs against his chest in a mirror image of how Regulus was sitting. "What is the other option?"

"What if they put him in the tournament because..." Regulus trailed off. He felt like it was right out of reach, like he should know the answer but for some reason, he didn't have access to it.

“Maybe they just want him to win,” James said with a smile that said I’m trying very hard to distract you so you don’t tear off your skin in frustration. “They want him to look talented in front of the world.”

Regulus chuckled quietly. “Maybe,” he conceded though they both knew that wasn’t what was going on. “I feel like someone is trying to push him through the tournament,” Regulus said. “Like they’re not trying to hurt him with it, but like they’re trying to get him to the end. I just can’t figure out why.”

“Why do you feel like that?” James asked quietly, tracking every micro-expression that crossed Regulus’s face with a closeness that Regulus would have found unsettling had it been anyone else doing it.

“Harry said Bagman was excited for him, and now with Moody trying to help him out,” Regulus said, “I’m not sure, it’s just how I feel.”

“Okay,” James said slowly. “Well, say you were Voldemort, how would you use the tournament?”

That wasn’t a way of thinking that Regulus particularly enjoyed, but it did open new avenues for him to use. “If Harry’s dream was really a vision, then it means the Dark Lord wants to kidnap him.”

“Right,” James said. Regulus could tell that James was purposefully withholding his judgment and doing his best to keep it to himself. It still bothered him though. That much was obvious. Regulus wondered if James was also thinking about that night he revealed that he had the Dark Mark. Regulus shook off the memory.

“But all the tasks happen on the grounds of Hogwarts. No part of the tournament happens anywhere else, so it’s not like he can use it to get Harry out of Hogwarts, right?”

“I don’t think so,” James said. “What about the winner’s ceremony?”

“I’m not sure,” Regulus said uncertainly.

“Maybe they’re just trying to embarrass him —”

“Or make a spectacle out of him?” Regulus interrupted.

“Could be,” James conceded. “I don’t know.”

Regulus growled in frustration. He hated feeling like this, like everything was just at the tip of his fingers, but he was unable to grasp it. James reached out and settled a hand in between Regulus’s shoulders. His hand wasn’t warm, not like it would be if he were alive, but he could still feel the pressure of it there against him and that was enough to calm him down.

It took another night of having the same conversation for something to click in his head. James was asking the same repertoire of questions as he had the night prior, but he was clearly growing frustrated as well. Regulus didn’t know if that frustration was aimed in his direction or not, but he felt it was all the same. He felt like he was failing Harry and James.

“I wish there was a way he could get out of it,” James said. “Protest or something.” James threw his hands in the air as he spoke, shaking them wildly and causing his fingers to dance around absurdly.

“Protest?” Regulus asked. He was laying flat on the ground this time, giving up on even bothering to sit.

“Yeah, like one time our Defense professor insisted on lecturing us all about werewolves and how dangerous they were, even when it wasn't the full moon, so me, Sirius, and Peter all left class in protest,” James said.

Regulus had to work not to snap at James for even saying Peter's name. He knew that James had been friends with the man at one point, but Regulus did not want to hear about him. If he came in contact with Peter Pettigrew ever again, he would tear Peter's throat out with his teeth.

“Not Remus?” Regulus asked. James looked slightly guilty.

“No, he thought it would be too suspicious,” James said. “Plus, he was so self-deprecating back then. Always going on and on about how werewolves probably deserves it and they were dangerous and he was a monster.” James rolled his eyes aggressively.

“I'm not sure his self-deprecation has changed much,” Regulus muttered.

“Werewolves aren't even scary,” James continued as if he hadn't heard Regulus speak. He probably hadn't, too caught up in his own thoughts.

“Really, James?” Regulus asked, raising his eyebrows questioningly. “Werewolves aren't scary?”

“Well, they're scary if you're a person, sure,” James said. “But I mean, when you're an animal they're just like big dogs really.”

Regulus continued to stare at him, not believing a single word he was saying.

“For instance,” James said, “one time we were all out in the forest and Moony started this ridiculous game where he would run away from us just to circle back and hide behind trees so he could jump out at Padfoot. Sirius got a real kick out of it, thought it was hilarious.”

“Maybe he was thinking about eating Padfoot,” Regulus said. “Don't werewolves eat rabbits and other small animals?”

James shrugged. “I don't know, but he wasn't trying to eat Padfoot. Moony loved Padfoot. The few times I spent the full moon with him without Sirius present, Moony was a nightmare. Searching the entire shack, sniffing every single corner, and digging at the walls. It was pathetic.”

“Is this about to be a lesson about werewolf mates, cause I don't think I want to hear that,” Regulus grumbled.

“I’m not sure if werewolves have mates,” James said.

“Well, given that you skipped Defense when they were teaching the subject, I’m not surprised you don’t know,” Regulus said.

“Do you know?” James asked, crouching down next to Regulus’s head excitedly.

“Let’s change the subject,” Regulus said sharply causing James to burst out laughing.

“Fine, fine,” James said once he got himself back under control. “What were we talking about again? Oh! Protests.”

“I don’t think Harry can just leave,” Regulus said. “That’s a little too close to not showing up. I don’t think a protest is worth damaging his magical core.”

“Yeah, suppose you’re right,” James mumbled, seeming far more solemn than he did a moment before. Regulus was almost sad to see the joyful, laughing face go. He wished he could just stay in that moment, watching James chuckle happily. He wished he could pause it, cast a Stasis Charm on it, and let it live there forever.

“What if he didn’t leave?” Regulus said quietly, more to himself than James. “What if he stayed in the arena, but he didn’t participate? Would that still be a protest?”

“What do you mean?” James asked.

“If I can find a way to disguise him or hide him, then he could stay away from the dragon. He wouldn’t have to engage and anyone hoping to watch him get hurt or trying to push him along to the next task doesn’t get what they want.”

It was that realization that led to the plan, the plan that had gone off without a hitch. Harry hadn’t even stolen his golden egg, though hours had passed since he entered the arena. Of course, this meant they knew even less about the next task, but Regulus didn’t care. Their plan would remain the same. Stay out of the way and don’t participate.

“I can’t believe that worked,” Harry said cheerfully as they walked back to the dorm. The castle was nearly empty by that point, most of the students had abandoned the task long before Dumbledore called it. “I wonder what Rita will have to say about this.”

Regulus snickered. “I’m dying to know,” he said sardonically causing Harry to laugh.

Regulus knew this was far from over, the memory of seeing Snape’s Dark Mark still vivid in his thoughts, but he felt elated. He wondered vaguely how Draco was doing. He had seen him once the task began, cheering along with his friends as Cedric, Fleur, and Krum all faced their dragons, but Regulus could see him growing paler.

By the time Harry entered the arena, Draco was sheet white, his fingers clasped on the bench beneath him so tightly that Regulus thought it might break. He tried not to openly stare at him, keeping his eyes glued to Harry instead and watching Draco out of his peripheral vision. Still, he noticed the moment it became too much for Draco, the boy jumping up from his seat and nearly sprinting out of the stands. Regulus just barely caught a glimpse of Pansy

Parkinson running after him, chasing him up toward the castle. He hoped that someone told Draco that Harry was fine.

There were a ton of people in the common room waiting for them, but one, in particular, stood out. Ron was standing near the portrait hole, looking very sallow and stressed, staring at Harry like he had seen a ghost.

“Harry,” Ron said. “Whoever put your name in that goblet — I — I reckon they’re trying to do you in!”

Regulus sidestepped Ron, trying to give him and Harry a moment to talk. He just barely caught the words Harry spoke in reply.

“Caught on, have you? Took you long enough.” Harry’s voice was cold.

Despite Harry’s lack of performance during the task, the common room was in the full swing of the party that evening. Fred and George had stolen a ton of food from the kitchens and people were lounging about and talking excitedly about Harry’s brilliant plan not to do anything at all. Regulus watched Harry enjoy the attention from the small second story above the common room, leaning over the railing to see Harry smile as he was welcomed into the fold.

“He’s really something, isn’t he?” James said suddenly. Regulus didn’t even notice him appear next to him. He looked over to see James leaning against the railing as well, a proud smile on his face, his eyes glittering in the firelight.

“Yeah, he is,” Regulus said, looking back at Harry. He was laughing loudly now, Fred had his arm around Harry’s shoulders, both of them listening to George talk as he waved his hands around wildly. Harry’s cheeks were pink with happiness, his green eyes bright. “He’s all you.”

Regulus couldn’t help but remember the way James looked after a Quidditch game when he would be surrounded by his teammates, the moment before the rest of his house made it out onto the pitch. He thrived under their attention, like a plant turning toward the sun. Regulus could never find it in himself to look away.

“No, no, he’s not,” James said quietly. Regulus glanced over at him. James had a look on his face like he was living in a past moment, right at the same time that he was watching his son.

Suddenly, Regulus wasn’t just thinking of James surrounded by his teammates or by his house, he was thinking of the way Lily walked up to James right after his final game at Hogwarts, the way she wrapped her arms around his neck, one hand curling into the hair on the back of his head, drawing up on her toes so she could kiss him on the lips.

Regulus could still recall the way he walked back up to the castle, his legs stiff and barely working, how he focused all of his thoughts on keeping himself from crying. He was the pureblood heir to the Black family, he was not going to cry in public over his ex-boyfriend kissing someone else. He was not going to do it.

Barty found him in bed a few hours later and slowly coaxed him out of the dorm room so that he would eat. Barty was the one that put him back together after that particular meltdown. He wasn't always a good man, but when Regulus needed someone, Barty was there for him.

Regulus wasn't sure why the breakdown happened then, it wasn't even the first time he saw Lily and James together. Perhaps it was that happy, open look that James wore that tore him to shreds. Perhaps it was the realization that no matter how much Regulus loved James, James never belonged to him and never would.

He wondered if James was thinking about that same memory now as he looked at the son he and Lily made.

"No, I guess he's not just you," Regulus said softly. He meant to follow it up with something nice, something humble and accepting, but his chest clenched painfully watching James look so sweetly at Harry. He swallowed around the lump in his throat, and when that didn't help, he decided to cut his losses, turning from James and scampering up to his dorm room.

"Reg?" He heard James say, his voice carrying up the stairs behind him, but Regulus didn't turn around. He wasn't sure what he would see on James's face, but he didn't think he would want to. He grabbed the mirror out of Harry's trunk and dressed in pajamas at record speed, crawling into bed, prepared to have himself a good cry before calling Sirius to ask about their conversation with Dumbledore and going to bed.

The sound of the door to the dorm opening interrupted him though. He looked up quickly, expecting to see James, though of course James never had to open doors and his being able to affect the physical world would be a huge deal. Naturally, it wasn't James. It was Ron.

"Can we talk?" Ron said, looking supremely uncomfortable.

"Of course," Regulus said, though it was a struggle to get the words out. He didn't want to have a conversation with someone else. He had dealt with more than enough that day and just wanted to close himself off, but Ron was a kid and he had that serious look on his face that meant it had been very hard for him to walk up to the dorm to speak to Regulus and, well, Regulus wasn't an asshole.

"I'm sorry," Ron said. At that moment, Regulus is positive that Harry sent Ron up here to apologize. He didn't hear their full conversation, but it didn't sound like Ron was about to apologize to Harry, so the thought that he would be doing it to Regulus exclusively was laughable. Still, Regulus was the adult here.

"What for?" Regulus said. Ron looked a bit out of his depth for a moment, but the hat didn't sort him into Gryffindor for nothing.

"For cutting you off," Ron said.

"It's fine," Regulus said quickly. Ron's mouth was still open like he was going to say something else, perhaps explain himself, but Regulus doesn't need him to. He understood why Ron was upset. He felt left out, ignored, and insecure about his own lack of fame, especially when compared to Harry's. He let Ron linger in the silence for a moment before continuing. "I'm sorry too, for not telling you who I was."

Ron shrugged just slightly. "Were you ever going to?"

Regulus wanted to say yes immediately, but he forced himself to think about it first. Was he ever going to? Probably, but he couldn't be sure. The only reason he would have considered telling Ron was because Hermione knew, and it felt unfair that only one member of their friend group was left out. If only Harry knew, then he might have never told.

"I think so," he said, as honest an answer as he could give. "But I didn't have any specific plans."

Ron nodded in understanding, but Regulus could see the uncertainty there. He wondered how long it would take to get back to normal.

"How did you know?" Regulus asked. "Who told you?"

"No one told me," Ron said quickly, almost like he was afraid he was about to get someone in trouble. "I don't want to talk about it, but no one told me... who else knows?"

"Luna, Hermione, and Draco," Regulus said quickly, more than used to this question by now.

"Malfoy knows?" Ron replied. "You told Malfoy and not me?"

"He's a Black," Regulus said with a little laugh. "He figured it out all on his own."

Ron left just a bit after that and Regulus was finally free to tuck himself into bed. He didn't feel much like crying anymore, though the empty feeling was still there. He almost wanted to relive all the memories of Lily and James falling in love, kind of like picking at a scab, he wanted to make himself bleed, wanted to hurt himself again and again until he grew numb to it.

Regulus sighed loudly. He didn't know why he felt like this now, it was all too late. There was no way to get James back, he fell in love with someone else and then he died. That was the most closure anyone could ever have from a relationship. But surrounded by so many people that James loved, not to mention James himself occasionally, it was impossible not to miss him. It was easier to not miss James when he felt hopeless, when he didn't see a future for himself, now that he knew he had to live till at least the Dark Lord was dead, it seemed far more daunting to do it alone.

And he was alone. Sure he had friends, and Harry who was more like family, and Sirius, his actual family, but he was... well, he was a bit lonely is all. He couldn't exactly remember a time when he wasn't lonely, but it just felt so much more potent nowadays, like the hollow feeling was a black hole, growing wider and more powerful the more it swallowed.

He sat with that feeling for a long time, wondering vaguely if James would show up again, but he never did. After a few hours had passed, and the rest of the boys were in the dorm, sleeping in bed, he pulled out the mirror, praying that Sirius was still awake.

“Sirius,” he said quietly, though he put up a silencing spell and there was no reason to temper his volume.

“Hey,” Sirius said right away, looking like he was waiting for the call. He was still in the room at the Three Broomsticks.

“Did you talk to Dumbledore?” Regulus asked.

“Yes,” Sirius said. He was smiling, making Regulus realize how rare his smile seemed when he wasn’t talking to Harry. “He recognized the locket. Get this. It used to belong to Salazar Slytherin.”

“What?” Regulus said, excitement surging through him.

“Apparently, Voldemort used to work at Borgin and Burkes when he was fresh out of Hogwarts. That was how he came into contact with the locket.”

“How do you know this?”

“Dumbledore had a memory from this old house elf,” Sirius said, his words coming faster by the second. “Voldemort was working at Borgin and Burkes and would go to this woman’s house to try and convince her to sell her belongings, she ended up showing him the locket and...”

Sirius trailed off, but in a way like he was trying to build excitement. “And?” Regulus asked, falling into his trap regardless of how obvious it was.

“And Helga Hufflepuff’s cup.”

Regulus’s eyes bulged open. “Slytherin and Hufflepuff? He’s collecting Hogwarts artifacts? That’s what he made into Horcruxes?”

“That’s what Dumbledore thinks,” Sirius said with a nod. “He doesn’t know where the cup is yet, but this is more than we had before. Dumbledore was pretty surprised to see the locket.”

“Well, if there is something from Hufflepuff and Slytherin, then shouldn’t there be something from Gryffindor and Ravenclaw?”

“Yeah, I think so. Remus is going to get some old books from our library and start trying to figure it out. We’ll worry about that for now. Any idea what the next task is?” Sirius asked.

“No, Harry didn’t get the egg, remember? That was supposed to contain a clue, so for now, we’re going in blind, but I’m going to try and figure something out,” Regulus replied.

Sirius nodded. “So... Alexander?”

“Good night, Sirius,” he said, feeling embarrassed all over again. He ended the call quickly. He didn’t know why he had said yes to Alexander’s invitation to the Yule Ball. In all reality, he hadn’t been planning to go at all, but with Hermione pestering him and James telling him he should, he just lost his head for a minute.

He felt mortified about it now, but pulling out of the dance would be rude. He would go with Alexander, and then he would never speak to him again.

Chapter Notes

this chapter is a tad short, but the next chapter is the yule ball, so you have that to look forward to. (i'm also uploading an entire week early, so hopefully you're not too disappointed)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The rest of November and most of December flew by in a haze. Regulus was consumed with thoughts about the next task as well as potential Hogwarts artifacts that the Dark Lord could have gotten his hands on. He knew that Lupin was researching it, but he couldn't stop himself from doing the same, searching through books in the library periodically just to see if anything would jump out at him. Nothing had yet, but he wasn't giving up.

Care of Magical Creatures had grown far more dangerous than it already was. The Blast-Ended Skrewts had grown to six feet long and had started killing each other at an exponential rate. Regulus wasn't upset to see them go. Rita was still sniffing around, now specifically requesting an interview with Hagrid, but Regulus chose to ignore her. She was annoying, but for now, she wasn't doing too much harm. Harry, Ron, and Hermione were worried about her talking to Hagrid, but Hagrid just brushed them off.

Divination was becoming tedious. Ron, despite his obvious interest in the subject, was still spending most class periods giggling with Harry as they obviously made fun of Trelawney for her ridiculousness. Trelawney was always waffling between the extremes of encouraging Ron, and even Harry when he would complete his homework by just predicting his own death, and disapproving of their rowdy behavior. Regulus was glad that Harry was laughing at her predictions rather than fretting about them.

Still, despite Harry's seeming indifference to Trelawney's supposed nonsense, Regulus couldn't help but feel annoyed. It was this annoyance that made him linger outside after class ended. Ron and Harry turned to wait with him, clearly wondering what he was up to, but he just waved them off.

"I'll catch up with you," Regulus said. "I need to speak with her about something."

"About what?" Ron asked quickly.

"Come on," Harry said almost at the same time. He gave Regulus a look before pulling on the sleeve of Ron's cloak, dragging him away.

Regulus had to wait for nearly half an hour before Lavender and Parvati left the classroom. They always stayed after to speak with Trelawney, both of them fully enthralled with the woman and her prophecies.

“Hey Reggie,” Lavender said happily when she saw him waiting. Parvati gasped when she heard the name leave Lavender’s mouth. Regulus nearly recoiled but managed to keep himself from actively doing it. Only Sirius had ever called him Reggie. Well, James as well, but only until Regulus told him explicitly not to call him that.

“Lav,” Parvati chastised quietly.

“What?” Lavender asked. “Are you waiting for Trelawney?” she said, turning back to Regulus.

“What are you going to ask her?” Parvati asked, her eyes lighting up with excitement. Regulus chewed on his lip, debating how much he should tell them.

“I just wanted to ask about her predictions concerning Harry,” Regulus said, lowering his voice to a whisper.

“Oh, yeah,” Lavender said, nodding seriously. “She’s so knowledgeable.”

“Well, I hope not,” Regulus confessed. Lavender frowned, a thoughtful look on her face. Parvati gave him a look that was dangerously close to pity.

“Hey, did you finish that book I gave you?” Lavender asked suddenly.

“Oh,” Regulus said, reaching into his bag to pull out the book. “I finished it last week, thanks for letting me borrow it.” Regulus had actually felt a bit scandalized by the book once he really got into it, he didn’t know that anyone read or wrote books like that, and he was even more surprised that someone Lavender’s age would read them.

“Here, you can read this one next,” Lavender said, already shoving another paperback novel into his hands. Parvati snickered.

“Lavender, that one’s terrible,” Parvati said, holding a hand over her mouth as she laughed.

“Please, it’s not that bad,” Lavender said, waving her hand dismissively.

“I should go,” Regulus said, gesturing toward the trap door after he quickly shoved the novel into his bag. He didn’t even look at it first, sure that he didn’t want to risk someone seeing him holding it.

“Right, see you later, Reggie,” Lavender said, wiggling her fingers as she and Parvati flounced off down the stairs. Regulus climbed up to the classroom, the pressure in his head immediately swelling when the strong incense smell flooded his nose. He cast a quick spell to dispense it, the scent was always too much for him. He didn’t know how Trelawney could stand it.

The classroom was still disorganized, though Trelawney was flittering around by one of the tables like she was trying to clean up. Regulus watched her for a moment, staying silent. He didn’t dislike her exactly, but he wasn’t sure that she was really a competent professor.

“OH!” Trelawney said, half stumbling down the stairs when she caught sight of Regulus. Didn't you see me coming? Regulus kept himself from saying. “What can I do for you, dear?”

“I need to ask you about your predictions about Harry's life,” Regulus said, deciding to cut right to the point. “How much are you seeing? What do you actually know?”

Trelawney gave him a long look but didn't answer right away. “You are a surprising student, Regulus,” she mumbled finally.

“If something is going to happen to him, then I need to know about it,” Regulus said quickly, barreling over her statement. “And if not, then you need to stop bringing it up at every given moment. He has enough to worry about without your prattling on all the time.” His voice was sharp broken glass, flying through the room like weapons.

Trelawney ambled closer to him, reaching out a hand and gently touching Regulus's cheek. Regulus worked to not pull away, not wanting to flinch in front of her. “It will work out for you,” she said, her voice nearly a whisper. “But there will be so much pain before that happens, pain you are not going to understand.”

“You could say that about anyone,” Regulus replied, but his voice was fainter than it had been a moment before.

“Don't believe everything he says to you,” Trelawney said. “He doesn't mean it.”

Regulus shook his head, dislodging her hand.

“And Harry?” Regulus said, speaking just as quietly. She didn't answer him, only turning and walking back up to one of the tables to continue cleaning. He ended up leaving the classroom feeling discontented and shaken. He should have known it would be useless. Or mostly useless, the one triumph was that she stopped bringing up Harry's death by the next week of classes.

In Transfiguration later that week, Professor McGonagall gave them a reminder about the Yule Ball. It was only a few weeks from Christmas, when the Yule Ball would take place, but it was clear that nearly half the students had forgotten about the ball.

“The Yule Ball is approaching,” she said sternly. It was nearly the end of class and everyone seemed hasty to leave. “It is a traditional part of the Triwizard Tournament and an opportunity for us to socialize with our foreign guests. Now, the ball will be open only to fourth years and above — although you may invite a younger student if you wish,” she said.

Regulus tuned her out after that. He watched vaguely as Lavender and Parvati giggled excitedly through the entire announcement, both of them glancing back at Harry as McGonagall spoke. Harry and Ron both looked bored, but Hermione was watching McGonagall with rapt attention, a light dusting of pink across her nose and cheeks.

“Potter — a word, if you please,” McGonagall said just as they were standing to leave. Regulus hovered near the exit of class to wait for Harry to catch up. He was almost certain that he knew what she was going to say.

He lingered outside the classroom, shivering slightly. The Transfiguration Courtyard was built in such a way that it almost always caused a wind tunnel to form near the classrooms. He could have easily cast a warming charm on himself, but he oddly loved the cold chill. It made him feel real.

Harry left the classroom only a few minutes later looking both worried and sullen.

“What did McGonagall want?” Regulus asked.

“I have to have a dance partner,” Harry said, throwing his hands up in exasperation, “for the Yule Ball.” Regulus valiantly held himself back from laughing, biting roughly on his lower lip to keep himself under control.

“Yes,” Regulus agreed with a little nod.

“You knew?” Harry asked, his eyes wide in shock. Regulus couldn’t stop himself any longer, letting out a laugh.

“Of course,” Regulus said. “Everyone’s been talking about the Yule Ball for weeks, Harry.”

“Yes, well, I didn’t realize that I would be forced to dance in front of the entire school,” Harry said. He looked like he was a second away from stomping his foot in frustration. “I don’t even know how to dance!”

“It’s not that hard,” Regulus said. “I can teach you, but you will need to get a date.”

“Oh, no,” Harry breathed. Regulus laughed again and Harry shot him a betrayed look.

The next week was fraught with tension as Ron and Harry had many discussions about how they would manage to get dates for the Yule Ball. The boys seemed fully out of their depth faced with the task of speaking to a girl. Regulus was being a bit cruel with the way he laughed at them every time they expressed worry over the prospect of approaching one of the girls, but he couldn’t help it.

“Why doesn’t he just walk up and ask someone?” James said to him one afternoon. Regulus was out on the grounds, walking near the lake. Alexander had asked to meet him but had yet to show.

“He’s intimidated,” Regulus said with a little laugh.

“The worst they can say is no,” James said, shaking his head. “I mean, really, it’s not that hard.”

“Not everyone is quite so resilient in the face of repeated rejections,” Regulus replied. James laughed good-naturedly.

“Won’t you take pity on him,” James implored.

“What do you want me to do? Set him up like a playdate. I know I’m a pureblood, but I hardly think you want me organizing an arranged marriage for him.”

James laughed again, though he abruptly cut himself off, his lips twisting unhappily, when Alexander came jogging up to Regulus. His blue school robes fluttered behind him elegantly as he moved, and Regulus vaguely wondered if he charmed them to do that.

“Regulus,” he greeted with a bright smile.

“Hello, Alexander,” Regulus greeted politely. James didn’t leave like he usually did, only stood to his side with his arms crossed. Regulus had to work not to glance over at him.

“I wanted to ask what you are wearing to the Ball,” Alexander said before launching into an explanation of his expected attire, the one his school suggested, as well as the four extra outfits he had purchased for the occasion. Regulus hadn’t given it much thought, though he realized now that he should probably ask Kreacher to bring him some options. He knew some of his old dress robes could be modified to fit him.

“What’s got you so despondent?” Regulus asked James once Alexander had gone. James was still frowning, but when Regulus spoke to him, his face cleared.

“Nothing, nothing,” James said. “He seems lovely.”

Regulus guffawed. “You’re the one who told me to say yes to him,” Regulus said.

“I know that,” James said, placing his hands on his hips and looking out toward the lake. Regulus shook his head.

“You’re ridiculous.”

That night, when they were in the common room, Fred and George came by to seemingly add another level of pressure on Ron and Harry.

“So... you lot got dates for the ball yet?” Fred said

“Nope,” Ron said.

“Well, you’d better hurry up, mate or all the good ones will be gone,” Fred said.

Ron ended up saying some ridiculous and mean things about some of the girls in their year, and Hermione went to bed early, clearly mad at him. Harry just looked a little vexed, though there was a determination behind his eyes. Regulus decided that he would give them one more day before he helped them out.

He found Harry wandering back to Gryffindor Tower the following night in a daze.

“Hey, you all right?” Regulus said, elbowing him lightly. Harry looked up like he didn’t even realize Regulus had approached him.

“Oh, yeah, yeah,” Harry said, but he was frowning. Regulus waited but when Harry didn’t continue he sighed.

“What happened?”

“I asked Cho to the dance,” Harry said.

“Oh,” Regulus replied, a bit surprised. Mostly he was glad that Harry hadn’t asked Cedric. He had forgotten about Harry’s crush on the Ravenclaw seeker. Harry really had a type, Regulus thought, his mind wandering unwillingly to a certain blonde boy. “Well, that’s good. What did she say?”

“She’s already going with Cedric.” Thank Salazar, Regulus thought.

“Tough luck,” Regulus said. “You know, you could ask Luna. She’s too young to go on her own since she’s in third year. You two could go as friends.”

“Yeah,” Harry said faintly. “Yeah, I think I will. Thanks.” He turned immediately to find her. Regulus shook his head in quiet exasperation. He walked into the common room to find Ron sitting in a distant corner looking ashen. Ginny was sitting next to him, talking to him in a low and soothing voice.

“What’s up?” Regulus said, walking over to them.

“Why did I do it? I didn’t — I don’t know what made me do it!” Ron’s voice was high-pitched and squeaky.

“What did you do?” Regulus said, alarmed.

“He just asked Fleur Delacour to the ball,” Ginny said, she was making a courageous effort to keep from smiling.

“You did what?” Regulus said, his eyebrows raising even farther up his forehead.

“I don’t know what made me do it!” Ron said, explaining that he saw her talking to Cedric and just walked up to ask her. “She looked at me like I was a sea slug or something. Didn’t even answer.”

“Oof,” Regulus said, cringing slightly. “Well, good on you for trying.” Ron did not look like a man who felt good for trying, he looked like he was contemplating drowning himself in the Black Lake.

“Why weren’t you guys at dinner?” Hermione asked a few moments later as she climbed through the portrait hole.

“Hermione,” Ron said faintly. “Neville’s right — you are a girl...”

“Oh, no,” Regulus said quietly. Ginny covered her face with her hands.

“Well spotted,” Hermione said burningly. Regulus couldn’t watch the interaction, it was like witnessing a train crash. Regulus was not surprised that Hermione turned Ron down, but he was surprised to learn that she already had a date. He wondered why she didn’t tell anyone.

Regulus tuned out the conversation when he noticed Parvati and Lavender coming into the common room.

“Hey,” Regulus called, striding over toward them.

“Reggie!” Parvati greeted. Great, Regulus thought, but he didn’t comment.

“Do you both have dates for the Yule Ball?”

“Parvati doesn’t,” Lavender said, a triumphant smile on her face. Parvati shot her a momentarily betrayed look, but covered it quickly with a smile. “I thought you were going with Alexander.”

“I am,” Regulus replied quickly. “I was wondering if you would be willing to go with Ron.” Parvati leaned around him to look at Ron, pursing her lips to the side, before sighing.

“Yes, fine,” Parvati agreed. Regulus sighed.

“Thank you,” he whispered. “I don’t think I can listen to him complain any longer about trying to find a date.” Parvati and Lavender giggled before leaving to go up to their common room, waving at Regulus as they went.

“Are you friends with them?” Ginny asked when he walked back over, she sounded appalled.

“Suppose so,” Regulus said. “Ron, you’re going to the Ball with Parvati.” Ron’s mouth opened in shock.

“I am?” Ron breathed.

“You’re welcome,” Regulus said, shaking his head.

“What about Harry?” Ron asked just as Harry came striding into the common room.

“She said yes,” Harry said cheerfully. “This whole thing is more trouble than it’s worth, I’m telling you.”

“Who said yes?” Ginny asked quickly, her eyes bright with intrigue. Regulus couldn’t be sure, but he thought he saw a little jealousy there.

“Luna,” Harry said.

“You asked Luna?” Ron said, sounding shocked.

“We’re going as friends,” Harry explained. Ron nodded, and Ginny looked momentarily relieved.

That night when they were relaxing in their dorm room, Regulus decided that it was finally time for him to teach Harry how to dance.

“Do I have to learn?” Harry whined.

“I guess not,” Regulus replied with false nonchalance. “You’re more than welcome to make a fool out of yourself instead.”

“Ugh,” Harry groaned but stood quickly.

“You’re teaching him how to dance?” Neville asked suddenly, keen interest behind his eyes.

“Not you too,” Ron grumbled.

“Yes,” Regulus said. “It’s really not that difficult. You just need to learn a few steps, and then you’ll be fine. I highly doubt anyone is expecting you to show off.”

“Says you,” Harry muttered. Neville didn’t look sure and ended up standing as well.

Regulus hadn’t been expecting it, he had just planned to give Harry a short lesson based on his own knowledge. Regulus, like most children in the Sacred Twenty-Eight, was forced to take many dance lessons as a child. He definitely wasn’t going to force Harry to learn all that he had, but he wanted to give him at least a fighting chance.

Instead, he spent nearly two hours teaching all the fourth-year Gryffindor boys how to Waltz. At first, it was just Harry and Neville, but eventually, Ron started feeling left out and joined them. Only half an hour in, Seamus and Dean came back to the dorm and joined as well.

James appeared only a few minutes after Regulus started talking and spent the entire night spread out on Regulus’s unused bed, his arms folded behind his head, a gentle smile on his lips. It turned out to be a surprisingly fun evening, and Regulus went to bed confident that Harry and the other boys would be well prepared.

the yule ball.

“This lace looks so girly,” Ron groaned unhappily. They were all getting dressed for the Yule Ball. Or at least, the other Gryffindor boys were. Regulus was already dressed and had been for nearly half an hour.

At the last minute, he had requested that Kreacher bring him some of his old dress robes so that he could choose a set to wear. He ended up settling for a pair of simple black ones that he had only worn once around this same age. He was pretty sure it was for a family Christmas event, but he had so many sets of dress robes that he couldn't be sure. Regardless, they still fit just fine and that was all that mattered.

“It's not that bad,” Harry responded, but he was grimacing as he said it. Harry and Ron were both wearing dress robes that Molly Weasley had purchased for them, though Harry's were more modern. Plus the green color that Harry wore was much more flattering than the color of Ron's. Regulus realized far too late that he should have purchased new dress robes for them earlier, so they weren't forced to wear the secondhand ones. He had offered a spare pair of his own sets, but both of them had refused.

“I'm going to cut off the lace,” Ron said, reaching for his wand.

“Let me,” Regulus said, jumping in quickly. He doubted Ron had the subtly needed for small clothing transfiguration.

Regulus made quick work of the lace, removing the fabric from the ruff and cuff. He also noticed an odd scent coming from the old clothing and cast a quick freshening charm on it. He stepped back to look Ron over, it was better without the lace, but it still looked odd. The color definitely wasn't helping. Regulus had never been the best at charms for clothing, it wasn't something he was allowed to practice growing up, often seen as beneath someone from his family, but he knew one spell that always worked.

“There,” Regulus said, satisfied, tucking away his wand.

“Oh, perfect, this is much better,” Ron said cheerfully. The old garment was now completely black, the fabric slightly transfigured to give it a silk appearance. It wouldn't last forever, but Regulus was certain it would at least last until tomorrow morning. Then Ron could throw out the robes and never think about them ever again.

“I still can't work out how you got the best-looking girl in the year,” Dean said sulkily to Ron. Regulus didn't even realize Dean felt that way about Parvati. He wondered if he should tell her.

“Animal magnetism,” Ron replied, sounding equally sulky. Regulus shook his head.

“Make sure you're nice to Parvati,” Regulus said sternly. “She was nice to agree to go with you.” Ron nodded slightly.

“I should probably go meet Luna,” Harry said.

“I’ll come with you,” Regulus replied. “I’m meeting Alexander downstairs.” Ron waved them off as they left, still looking at himself in the mirror.

They ran into Luna on their way downstairs. She was dressed in a cherry red dress that was covered in real flowers, all of them various shades of red, blue, and purple. She had charmed them to move around as well and a few were fluttering around her head like butterflies.

“Hey, Luna,” Harry greeted.

“You look lovely, Luna,” Regulus said.

“Thank you, Regulus,” she said mildly. “You both look nice as well. That green really brings out your eyes, Harry.”

“Thanks,” Harry said, blushing slightly.

They walked down together. Alexander was waiting at the foot of the stairs dressed in a very expensive set of gray robes. They were silky and shimmered in the firelight.

“Good evening,” he greeted, a wide smile gracing his face. His French accent sounded stronger than usual. Regulus wondered if he would prefer to speak in French. His was a little rusty, but he thought he might be able to get by if Alexander asked.

Alexander grabbed Regulus’s hand, placing a gentle kiss on the back of it before squeezing his fingers gently.

Regulus smiled. “You look nice,” he said. Alexander flashed a bright grin at him.

“Thank you,” Alexander said emphatically. “I chose this color to match your eyes.

“What a thoughtful thing to do,” Luna said. Alexander seemed to do a double take looking at Luna, his eyes glancing up to watch the moving flowers.

“I like your... dress,” he said with odd formality.

“I made it myself,” Luna replied. Alexander made a face like that point was glaringly obvious.

The doors were still closed to the Great Hall when a group of Slytherins came up the steps from the dungeon. Draco was leading the pack, wearing extravagant black dress robes that had a very high collar. Pansy had her arm curled around Draco’s, her pink frilly dress a stark difference from Draco’s look. Regulus looked away, but noticed Harry’s eyes lingering a second too long on Draco, before he glanced back at the doors.

“Champions over here, please!” McGonagall called.

“See you,” Harry said quietly, walking over to McGonagall with Luna in tow. Regulus noticed Fleur Delacour and a Ravenclaw student he didn’t know the name of, as well as Cedric and Cho. Harry was very purposefully not looking at them. Regulus saw Krum as well, and it took a long minute for him to recognize the girl with him.

It was Hermione. She was dressed in a periwinkle dress and her usually curly hair had been slicked down into a twisted knot on the back of her head. She was smiling, though she looked nervous.

“Shall we?” Alexander said, interrupting Regulus’s staring.

“Of course,” Regulus said politely, hooking his arm around Alexander’s. The doors had finally opened to the Great Hall, and Regulus noticed the champions and their dates standing off the side waiting for everyone else to enter. Alexander led him to one of the tables. The Great Hall was lavishly decorated with mistletoe and ivy on every available surface. The tables were lantern-lit and smaller than usual.

“Did you see Hermione?” Parvati said suddenly, she came sprinting over to their table, which was still empty except for the two of them. Ron was a few paces behind her looking surly.

“Yes, did you know she was going with Krum?” Regulus replied curiously.

“No idea,” Parvati said, shaking her head vigorously. Ron and Parvati sat down with them, but Ron didn’t speak. Parvati shot him a look before glancing back at Regulus like she was asking what she should do. Regulus shook his head unhappily.

Lavender and Seamus joined them a moment after Parvati and Ron sat down. Dean arrived with a Hufflepuff student a year above them. Neville and Ginny joined them next and Ron, who already looked to be in a terrible mood, seemed flabbergasted to see them together. Neville was clearly embarrassed, avoiding Ron’s gaze, but he pulled the chair out for Ginny politely, and when he caught Regulus’s eye, Regulus made sure to smile encouragingly at him. The last couple to join them were both from Beauxbatons, obviously Alexander’s friends given the way they beelined over to him.

Alexander and Regulus talked idly as the rest of the tables filled up. They really hadn’t spent much time together so it was nice to just chat as they waited. Alexander was friendly and easygoing, asking Regulus questions about which classes he was in and what subjects he liked the most.

“My favorite is... I think you call it Charms?” Alexander said. Regulus nodded. “Yes, Charms. My father said that all my magical outbursts as a child were Charms-related.”

“Oh, like what?” Regulus asked.

Alexander chuckled, his eyes far away, lost in a memory. “When I was very little, I would apparently summon anything in the house that I wanted by just scrunching up my nose.” He brushed his long fingers along the bridge of his nose as he spoke. “It started to become such an issue that my parents had to begin gluing down every object they could.”

Regulus laughed. “That’s quite impressive.”

“What was your first magical outburst?” Alexander asked, turning back to look at Regulus. His eyes were bright with interest.

“Well,” Regulus said, searching for some answer to give. It wasn’t the kind of thing that his family shared. Most stories of magical outbursts were made up, so they could be passed between family members, used for the sole purpose of bragging about their “magically gifted child.”

“I bet you had a lot,” Alexander interrupted Regulus’s musing. “You seem magically powerful.”

Regulus’s cheeks darkened slightly. “I don’t know that it was my first exactly, but it’s one of the first I can remember. I can’t recall why exactly, but I somehow enchanted all of my dirty clothes so that they would start dancing around my bedroom.”

Alexander laughed loudly, and Regulus gave him a half smile.

“Did you have music playing?” Alexander asked.

Regulus shook his head. “No, they were just dancing to their own rhythm,” Regulus replied with a chuckle.

He tried to ignore the way his chest clenched at the memory. Sirius had certainly found it hilarious, he can still remember his peels of laughter echoing off the walls. It was one of his first memories. His mother had not been as entertained. She barged into the room and demanded to know who was responsible. Regulus was too young back then to understand what was going on, but Sirius immediately claimed responsibility. His mother had punished Sirius so badly that he hadn’t been able to walk for two days.

“Here come the champions!” Parvati squealed. Regulus was glad for the distraction.

He watched the four champions enter with a quiet smile on his face. Harry looked thoroughly overwhelmed and like he was concentrating far too hard on walking normally, as if he was afraid he might trip over his feet if his focus slipped for even a second. Luna was next to him looking distracted and only mildly interested in what was going on.

They walked up to the head table where Dumbledore, Karkaroff, and Maxime were all seated. Barty’s father wasn’t there, but Regulus noticed Percy Weasley in his spot. When the four champions arrived, Percy pulled out the seat next to him, giving Harry a very smug look. Harry went to take the seat next to him, and Regulus tried to keep an eye on them, but they were all quickly distracted by the appearance of menus.

“Wow, we’ve never gotten menus before,” Seamus said, his voice filled with awe. “How do we order?”

“You just say the item out loud,” Regulus explained. These types of menus were common at Black family functions. They were excessively expensive, at least they used to be, and mostly there to keep wizards from having to interact with house elves.

“Ooh!” Seamus said loudly, a thoughtful look on his face. “Roasted chicken!” he yelled. Immediately his empty plate was filled with chicken, a broad, hungry grin stretching across his face. Alexander laughed lightly before placing his own order.

The rest of dinner was spent with them all talking together, though Ron was suspiciously silent throughout the meal. He kept shooting hurt and betrayed looks over at Hermione. Regulus could feel a storm brewing and all he knew was that he didn’t want to be in the room when it came to pass.

After the food had all been eaten, Dumbledore asked all of the guests to stand up. When they did, the tables were cleared with a quick wave of his wand. He quickly conjured a stage with several instruments, the Weird Sisters gliding onto the platform a moment later. Regulus watched as Luna gripped Harry by the hand and practically dragged him out to the center of the room with the other champions and their dates. Harry looked like he was seconds away from throwing up.

The dancing wasn’t bad and Harry looked presentable, if a little awkward, as he and Luna twirled around. Others joined them fairly quickly, Neville and Ginny the first two to go, and by then, no one noticed that Harry had only learned to dance a few days before.

“Would you like to dance?” Alexander asked, leaning down to whisper in Regulus’s ear. Regulus repressed a shiver while nodding politely. Alexander was taller than Regulus, but not by so much that it was awkward to dance with him. He was a good dancer, clearly, he had taken lessons just as Regulus had, and Regulus fell into step with him easily.

They were moving closer to the wall where a line of chairs had appeared when Regulus noticed Harry walk off the dance floor toward where Ron was brooding next to Parvati. He was just close enough to catch a piece of their conversation.

“How’s it going?” Harry asked Ron. Ron didn’t answer. Harry grabbed a butterbeer and sat down in the chair next to him.

“Parvati, would you like to dance?” Luna asked, her feet still moving like she was in the middle of a dance, though she stayed in place.

“You don’t mind, do you, Ron?” she asked. Ron didn’t even look at her. “Oh, never mind,” she snapped, jumping to her feet and grabbing Luna by the hand, both of them joining the rest of the dancing students.

Regulus rolled his eyes and pulled Alexander away, so he wasn’t forced to watch the two boys sulk, immediately throwing himself back into the music, and pushing the thought of teenage angst from his thoughts.

He surprised himself by having a lot of fun. He really hadn’t expected it. The Weird Sisters played a wide array of music, and they danced along to each one. Several times Alexander’s friends came over to join them, trading off partners in between songs only for Alexander and Regulus to come back together by the end.

“It’s hot in here, do you want to step outside?” Alexander shouted over the music. Regulus wondered if he was just being polite, he was pretty sure that he was red-faced from exertions, his hair sticking to his skin from the sweat. He must have looked ridiculous. He glanced over to where Ron and Harry still sat, and noticed Hermione over there with them, Ron’s face growing into an even worse scowl.

“Yes, definitely,” Regulus shouted back. Alexander linked his fingers in-between Regulus’s and led him out of the Great Hall.

The front doors in the entrance hall were open allowing the cold December air to flow freely into the area, cooling Regulus off immediately. Outside there were fluttering fairy lights in the rose garden decorating the greenery that lined each of the winding paths. There were several couples sitting on the carved benches nearby. Regulus led them to one of the tucked-away alcoves near the front doors, breathing in the chilly air as he leaned against the stone.

“Are you having fun?” Alexander asked, his smile soft.

“I am,” Regulus said.

“I am not sure if I should sound offended by how surprised you sound,” Alexander said, not unkindly.

Regulus let out a startled laugh, and Alexander’s smile widened in response. “I’m sorry, I guess I wasn’t expecting to enjoy myself.”

“Why not?”

Regulus gave him a long look. “I don’t know,” he said softly. Alexander's smile didn’t falter, but there was something in his eyes that Regulus didn’t recognize.

Regulus saw it coming, but he didn’t stop it. He saw the way Alexander’s eyes glanced down, the way his smile softened, the way he turned and leaned down. Regulus watched it all with an out-of-body feeling. His heartbeat galloped in his chest, but he couldn’t force himself to move.

Alexander pressed his lips against Regulus’s, his hand coming up to gently cup Regulus’s cheek. His lips were warm and soft and Regulus sighed immediately, Alexander taking the moment as permission to deepen the kiss. He couldn’t remember the last time he was kissed. Alexander’s tongue drifted along the seam of his lips like water gliding along the shore.

It was nice. This was nice. It was fine. Regulus couldn’t ever remember thinking this much while being kissed. His thoughts felt so loud, echoing through his head, ricocheting violently. Alexander was pulling away before he could get them under control. His soft smile was a little sad now.

“It is okay,” he said quietly. He kissed Regulus one last time, just a gentle touch. Regulus knew it was a goodbye. A second later he was gone, walking back into the Great Hall like nothing had happened, Regulus left alone in the cold.

He wasn't upset by it, though admittedly it wasn't the end Regulus would have predicted. He felt a bit bad for Alexander. He hadn't wanted to hurt him, though he knew it wouldn't ever go past this one dance. He didn't know where everyone else was, and he had no interest in re-entering the Great Hall dateless, so he decided to head to Gryffindor Tower.

He wandered back slowly, walking as if in a daze. He felt dehydrated and tired. It wasn't until he was back in the empty dorm room that he acknowledged the empty feeling in his chest, that hollow loneliness only growing as the minutes ticked by.

"I've never seen you dance like that," James said. Regulus jumped slightly, he hadn't noticed him standing by Regulus's bed, leaning up against the wall casually.

"Well, there was never a Triwizard Tournament while we were in school together," Regulus said. He could hear the smile in his voice, James's mere presence soothing the ache inside him like a cooling balm.

"Would you have gone with me to the Yule Ball had we had one?" James asked. Regulus gave him a hard look, sensing that he was being mocked, but James's face was tender.

"Of course," he said softly. They both knew it was a lie. James would have had to tell Sirius about them for that to happen. Lily would have had to say no first. Regulus would have had to admit to everyone in the school that he was dating a blood traitor.

"I'm jealous that he got to dance with you, and I didn't," James said bluntly.

"I never knew you were so possessive," Regulus said jokingly. Not over me, he added in his head. James frowned slightly, but it cleared quickly.

"It's not something I like to share," James said softly, looking mildly ashamed. Regulus chuckled, shaking his head fondly.

"Come here," he commanded, stretching out an open hand toward James.

James looked at him questioningly for a second before inching forward, his face deeply unsure. Regulus was worried for a moment that he might be flat-out rejected, but James gripped his hand tightly only a second later. As usual, he couldn't really feel him, there was no warmth, but there was a light pressure, it was enough for him to know James was there.

Regulus pulled him in and curled his arms around James's neck, resting his chin against his shoulder. James grabbed his waist lightly, his fingers resting lightly against his lower back. There was no music, but Regulus didn't need any. They moved in slow circles intertwined with each other.

"I miss you," Regulus whispered. He instantly regretted saying the words. He was just so lonely, he had let himself get carried away. He pulled away from James immediately, not brave enough to look at his face. "I'm tired. I think I need to get some sleep."

"Okay," James replied quietly. Regulus grabbed his pajamas out of his trunk and nearly ran to the bathroom to get undressed.

By the time he was in bed only a few minutes later, James was gone. He curled up tightly into a ball behind his closed curtains, the aching hole inside him growing wider and wider by the second before a restless sleep finally claimed him.

the egg.

When Regulus woke up on Boxing Day it was to find Harry already up and watching him. It was early in the morning, the sun just barely over the horizon, but Harry looked like he'd been up for hours. Regulus wondered if he had slept at all. He was curled up by the window, but his eyes were on Regulus.

"Morning," Regulus said groggily.

"Hey," Harry said. "Good night? I didn't see you leave." Regulus pushed himself up so that he was sitting, his legs thrown over the side of the bed. His head ached like he had been up drinking, he guessed it was from the dehydration.

"It was fine," Regulus said with a shrug. "I came back early."

Harry grimaced slightly. "Yeah, I saw Alexander snogging one of the Beauxbatons girls."

"Oh," Regulus said, more for a lack of anything else to add. He wasn't sure how he was supposed to feel, to be honest. "Glad he recovered so quickly."

"Recovered from what?" Harry asked curiously, tilting his head to the side slightly.

Regulus shook his head. "Why are you up so early?" He noticed the way Harry's fingers were tapping incessantly against his knees like he had an excess of energy that he didn't know what to do with.

"Cedric gave me his egg," Harry said quickly.

"Sorry?" Regulus said confusedly, squinting at Harry.

"Said I should take a bath with it." The words tumbled out of his mouth.

"Cedric said you should take a bath with him?" Regulus asked, alarmed. Harry's face turned so red that he worried he might blow up at any second.

"No," Harry muttered. "He said I should take the egg to the Prefects' bathroom, he gave me the password."

"He said you should take the egg to the bath?" Regulus repeated.

"Yes," Harry said frustratedly. "Stop repeating me." Regulus shook his head again, trying to clear it.

"Right, sorry, why did he give you his egg?" He felt like he was stumbling through this conversation.

“He said it was repayment for helping him with the dragon, giving him a heads up, you know? He said I could borrow it for a few days.”

“Where is the egg now?”

Harry responded by looking pointedly at his bed where the egg was sitting directly on his pillow.

“Have you taken it to the Prefects’ bathroom yet?”

“No,” Harry said. “I figured I would tell you first.”

“Okay,” Regulus said nodding.

“I opened it last night, down in the common room, and it made an awful screeching noise. I thought my ears were going to start bleeding,” Harry said with a tiny laugh. Regulus blinked at him for a second.

“I need some tea, then I’ll figure it out.” He felt like his head was too heavy for his body.

“I can help,” Harry said instantly, jolting forward like he was going to stand but changed his mind at the last second.

“It’s fine,” Regulus said haphazardly, climbing out of bed and stretching. He was sore for some reason, probably from all the dancing.

“No,” Harry repeated, more firmly this time. “I want to help. I know you said we aren’t going to do anything, but I want to at least be prepared.”

Regulus gave him a measured look. “Okay,” he said slowly, dragging out the word. “We’ll go after breakfast.”

Harry nodded, standing up and heading to his trunk.

“Did you sleep at all?” Regulus asked as they descended the stairs to the common room. It was a chilly morning, and Regulus shivered slightly.

“A little,” Harry responded distractedly.

“What time did you get back?” Regulus asked, looking at him from the corner of his eye.

Harry shrugged. “Not that late,” he said. “But I couldn’t sleep.” Regulus nodded.

They walked down to breakfast together through a completely empty castle. Everyone must have been sleeping late because of the Yule Ball the night before. The corridors were eerily silent. Harry had brought his bag along with him, tucking the egg into it. No doubt someone would wonder where he got it from if they saw it. The bag would probably also look suspicious to anyone who saw it, but it would have to do for now.

“What happened with Ron and Hermione?” Regulus asked, already regretting the question. He knew he would hear about it either way, so he figured hearing it from Harry first would be better.

Harry immediately rolled his eyes. “Ron was so mad at Hermione for going to the Yule Ball with Krum. First, he was mad 'cause she didn't tell us, which is fine, I don't care, but I get it,” Harry said, already slipping into his ranting voice. “Then he was all ‘she's fraternizing with the enemy.’ It was so embarrassing.” Harry lowered his voice while imitating Ron, and Regulus chuckled quietly.

“He always was the jealous sort,” Regulus said.

“That's why he was so mad? Cause he wanted to go to the Ball with Hermione?”

“Yeah, probably,” Regulus answered with another little laugh. “I'll have to apologize to Parvati.”

“Er, yeah,” Harry said awkwardly. “I don't think she had a very good time.” Harry shook his head exasperated as they walked into the Great Hall. It was almost completely empty. Only Dumbledore was there, eating slowly while he read the Prophet.

“Morning Professor,” Harry said when Dumbledore looked up at them. Despite the fact that the castle was full of students, unlike most winter breaks, there was only one long table in the Great Hall. Harry and Regulus sat only a few seats away from Dumbledore.

“Early start today, boys?” Dumbledore asked cheerfully. Harry nodded but didn't respond. “Did you enjoy yourself last night?”

“Of course,” Regulus said politely, but Dumbledore was giving him a look that clearly meant he didn't believe him.

“Better than some,” Harry muttered, tucking into breakfast with a fierce viciousness.

“Ah, yes,” Dumbledore said thoughtfully. “The cruel sting of young love. Miss Lovegood seemed to enjoy herself. I noticed she was one of the last to leave.”

Regulus smiled fondly. He should have spent more time with her last name, the guilt from leaving so soon was starting to bother him.

“Luna could have fun doing just about anything,” Harry said.

“That's a skill in and of itself, is it not?” Dumbledore replied. Harry seemed to think about it as if the idea had never occurred to him but finally nodded in agreement.

“Do you know what's wrong with Mr. Crouch? Percy said he was sick,” Harry said after a few long moments of silence. He was looking at Dumbledore with that keen gaze he got when he was trying to puzzle something out.

“I can't say I do,” Dumbledore answered, a slight furrow to his eyebrows causing the deep line between them to sink even further into his wrinkled skin.

“Percy told you this last night?” Regulus asked, remembering Percy’s smug face as he beckoned Harry over.

Harry nodded once. “Yes, he said that Mr. Crouch hasn’t been the same since the World Cup.”

“Hm,” Dumbledore hummed quietly. “It has been a difficult year for him, I’m afraid.”

“Has it?” Regulus asked.

“Losing his house elf so publicly, I cannot imagine it was easy,” Dumbledore responded evenly. Regulus felt like he was missing something, but he didn’t know if Dumbledore knew either. It was like they were both walking around blind, both with pieces of the puzzle, but not nearly enough.

“He shouldn’t have dismissed her like that,” Regulus said softly, remembering what Harry told him about how Winky was freed at the World Cup.

“I thought you supported S.P.E.W.,” Harry said, his voice lightly sarcastic.

“S.P.E.W.?” Dumbledore asked.

“The Society for the Promotion of Elfish Welfare,” Regulus supplied. “Hermione created it.”

“She wants to free all the house elves,” Harry added offhandedly.

“A noble cause,” Dumbledore said, bringing his fingers together in front of him, his fingertips touching lightly.

“All the house elves are afraid of her now,” Harry said. “Worried she might free them against their will.”

“How do you know that?” Dumbledore asked, a twinkle in his eye indicating that he already knew. Harry looked at him nervously before stuffing his mouth with a piece of toast. “And you support S.P.E.W.?” He aimed the question at Regulus.

“I wear the badges,” Regulus said simply. Dumbledore and Harry kept watching him like they expected more of an explanation. Regulus sighed quietly before double-checking that they were still alone. “I’m not going to turn it down when she offers. She’s fifteen.” Harry didn’t seem to understand, but Dumbledore nodded thoughtfully.

“Would you ever free Kreacher?” Harry asked. Regulus worked not to cringe.

“I don’t think so,” Regulus said. “Kreacher is so old, and he’s very loyal to my family. He was especially attached to my mother. I think the shock would kill him if I tried to free him.”

“Is that why you said Mr. Crouch shouldn’t have dismissed Winky?”

“It’s very shameful for elves to be freed like that. Most of them are not like Dobby.”

“Dobby is certainly an anomaly,” Dumbledore added.

“If Winky didn’t have Hogwarts as an option, I’m not sure what she could have done,” Regulus said, thinking of the secondhand story he heard from Hermione about their visit to the kitchens. Winky sounded so desolate.

“That’s true,” Dumbledore said, looking at Harry. “Perhaps Miss Granger should think about the options for all the house elves she plans to free.”

“Do you think she’s wrong for trying to free them?” Harry asked inquisitively.

“Wouldn’t you want to be free?” Dumbledore replied.

“Yes,” Harry answered automatically. “Imagine if you ended up with the Malfoy family or something. Sounds horrible.”

Regulus didn’t reply, but the ideas weighed on him through the rest of breakfast. No one else joined them, still far too early for most of the castle to be awake after the festivities the night before. Dumbledore left only a bit after they finished talking, ambling out of the Great Hall while he hummed to himself.

“Do you ever get the feeling that Dumbledore can hear your thoughts?” Harry said.

“He probably can,” Regulus answered automatically, interrupted immediately by a yawn. It was too early to be having these kinds of conversations.

“What?” Harry shouted, alarmed.

“Yeah, he’s a powerful wizard, and he’s really old. I’m sure he has some level of control over his Legilimency.”

“What’s that?” Harry asked, his eyes still wide with shock.

“It’s a type of magic that allows someone to search another person's mind. The Dark — You-Know-Who was proficient at it. Some people just have a natural gift for it, but most wizards can learn the spell over time. It’s just like any other magic.”

Harry’s mouth was hanging open. “So Dumbledore has been able to hear my thoughts this entire time?”

Regulus chuckled. “Probably not all of them,” he conceded. “I doubt he’s poking around in there without permission, but if you’re thinking loudly, he can probably pick up on it.”

Harry swallowed harshly. “How do I stop myself from thinking loudly?”

“You use Occlumency. It’s like shutting the door to your mind. Sirius and I were taught how to use it as children, though Sirius was always much better at it than I was.”

“Who taught you?”

“My mother,” Regulus answered, cringing slightly. “She wasn’t a very gentle teacher, but we learned how to use it. It did come in handy at times.”

“Could I learn?” Harry asked. Regulus shrugged.

“I don’t see why not,” Regulus replied. “I wouldn’t know how to teach you, but I could try and look it up if you want.” Regulus paused to think about it for a moment. “Sirius would probably be a better person to ask.”

Harry looked uncertain but didn’t argue.

“Do you know where the Prefects’ bathroom is?”

“Yeah,” Regulus answered. “It’s on the fifth floor.”

“Were you a prefect?” Harry asked as they got up from eating and headed back out into the Entrance Hall.

“I was,” Regulus said softly. “Much to my parents’ delight. I hated it though. I never used the Prefects’ bathroom much, only a few times, it’s too far from the Slytherin common room to be convenient.”

“I wonder who in our year is going to be a prefect,” Harry said thoughtfully.

“Hermione,” Regulus said. Harry chuckled and nodded.

“Yes, definitely Hermione,” Harry agreed.

“Here it is,” Regulus said once they passed the Boris the Bewildered statue that was just to the left of the entrance. “What’s the password?”

“Pine-fresh,” Harry whispered. There wasn’t anyone around to overhear them. The door audibly unlocked, and Harry pushed it open.

Regulus was immediately inundated with memories of coming to the bathroom with James. They had only done it once, a few weeks after their first kiss. Regulus had been so nervous, shooting vague insults at James the entire time because he had no idea what to do with his emotions. James took them all in stride, as he always did. His main response to hearing insults was fond affection.

He could still remember James taking all his clothes off, including his pants, far too comfortable being naked around others, before jumping into the water. Regulus was pretty sure that his entire face and neck were red with embarrassment trying not to look at him. He shook off the memories, the angry burn that came along with all his thoughts of James these days was too high a cost to reminisce.

The bathroom was just as beautiful as he remembered. The gold faucets lined the perimeter of the large pool, glittering in the morning light. The mermaid carved into the window pane moved around leisurely, glancing at them haphazardly before swimming off.

“Wow, this is way better than the Gryffindor showers,” Harry said, he was glancing around the room rapidly like he was trying to take in every single detail.

“Definitely,” Regulus said. He turned and locked the door, ensuring that no one else, even someone with the password, would be able to enter while they were using the room. “Remind me again what Cedric said we should do?”

“Just mull things over in the hot water,” Harry said, putting up air quotes as he spoke.

“He couldn’t give you exact instructions?” Regulus asked, shaking his head. Harry shrugged.

“Guess not,” Harry muttered. “What do you think we should do?”

Regulus sighed tiredly. “Mull things over in the hot water I suppose,” he said. He flicked his wand and instantly all the faucets turned on, the bath immediately beginning to fill with water, the soaps and oils were added as well, causing huge piles of bubbles to form.

Harry took off his clothes quickly until he was only in his pants and t-shirt, climbing into the water and breathing a loud sigh of relief when he was submerged in the water. “I wish I knew about this before,” Harry mumbled. His eyes were closed behind his glasses, which were heavily fogged up from the steam.

Regulus stripped down as well. The last time he was here he was only wearing his pants, though he took them off, rather embarrassingly, once he was fully submerged in the water. No one had seen him naked before, besides his family members when he was very young, and he couldn’t stand to be naked in front of James yet.

Even the first time the two of them had sex, it was in a very dark unused classroom. Regulus didn’t think he would have been able to handle it if it was in a well-lit room. He got over that eventually, of course, but it took some time.

He stayed in his pants and shirt this time, trying very hard not to think about how weird it was to be back in this same place with James’s son. It was under very different circumstances, but it was still a bit weird.

The moment he lowered his foot into the water, placing it on the first step, all thoughts of awkwardness flew from his mind. Instead, he thought about the last time he took a bath. It was during his first life. He used to sulk for hours in the bath at Grimmauld shortly before his death. After what happened in the cave, he’d never had another inclination to be submerged in water again.

He should have thought about this problem before coming here, but it had slipped his mind.

“Are you okay?” Harry asked. He was sitting against the wall on the opposite side of the bath, watching Regulus with a concerned expression.

“Fine,” Regulus answered through clenched teeth. He tried to take another step, but his body refused to move.

“Are you sure? You look like you’re shaking,” Harry said, his voice growing more unnerved.

“It’s fine, I just need a second,” Regulus said, silently begging Harry to let it go. He thanked every single wizard and witch he could think of when Harry just sighed quietly and turned around to look at the mermaid who had swum back into the frame.

The water wasn’t even cold. He had no issues with showering. There should be no reason for him to react this way to bath water. This water was so hot it nearly burned his skin. It was filled with floral-scented oils and bubbles. He wasn’t in the dark. It should not bother him this much.

It took him far longer than he cared to admit to force himself to take another step.

He was shaking slightly, but each step was easier than the last and finally, he was able to sink down into the water. Harry was watching him again, but he didn’t ask, and Regulus was grateful for it. He didn’t think he could explain what was happening to him while also standing in the water. There were only so many things he could handle at once.

“Now what?” Harry asked.

“Can you open it again?” Regulus asked, curious to hear the screeching Harry had described. Harry looked uncertain but reached for the egg and opened it.

Regulus was vaguely worried that the glass window might shatter. “Close it! Close it!” he yelled. Harry slammed it shut.

“I’d try putting it in the water if I were you.” It was so quiet in the bathroom now that the bath was full and the screaming had stopped, so both of them shouted in surprise when they heard her voice.

“Myrtle!” Harry yelled. “How long have you been in here?” He looked around in a panic as he spoke.

“Don’t worry. I closed my eyes when you got in,” Myrtle said dismissively. “Not that there was anything to see.” She stuck out her lower lip in a pout. Harry’s face was bright red.

“Did you say we should put it in the water?” Regulus asked.

“That’s what Cedric did,” Myrtle said, twirling around in the water.

“Have you been spying on him too?” Harry asked unhappily. “What do you do, sneak up here in the evenings to watch the perfects take baths?”

“Sometimes,” Myrtle said slyly. Regulus couldn’t help the laugh that escaped him. Harry looked properly offended by it, but Regulus couldn’t stop himself. There was a slight look of jealousy on Harry’s indignant face that Regulus found ridiculously funny. “I’ve never come out to speak to anyone before though.”

“We’re honored,” Regulus said with a broad smile. Myrtle returned it immediately, batting her eyelashes at him. Harry huffed before gripping the bottom of the egg and lowering it under the surface of the water. He spun the top and the egg fell open, a muffled sound emanating from it.

“You have to put your head under the water too!” Myrtle said with a high-pitched giggle. She seemed to be enjoying herself far too much. Harry grumbled but immediately dunked his head under the water.

Regulus tried to do it too, but he couldn’t move. The thought of the water around his nose, ears, and mouth was far too much to bear. He didn’t think he would be able to focus on listening when he was this distracted.

“No,” Regulus said quickly. “What did the song say?”

“Put your head under and listen to it,” Harry said, dunking his head again. Regulus swallowed, gritted his teeth, and swallowed again.

Harry came up a second later. His mouth was open like he was going to say something but couldn’t do it. He was watching Regulus intensely. He snapped his mouth closed after a second.

“You don’t like being in the water, do you?”

“No,” Regulus said softly.

“Okay,” Harry said. “One second.” Harry submerged his face below the surface, this time for a long thirty seconds, before coming up gasping for air.

“What does the song say?” Regulus asked again.

*“ Come seek us where our voices sound,
We cannot sing above the ground,
And while you’re searching, ponder this:
We’ve taken what you’ll sorely miss,
An hour long you’ll have to look,
And to recover what we took,
But past an hour — the prospect’s black,
Too late, it’s gone, it won’t come back. ”*

Harry had to say the lines one at a time, listening to the song again and again to make sure he had it right. By the end, he was watching Regulus with a look of stark panic on his face, clearly unsure what to think.

“Slow, aren’t you?” Myrtle simpered at them. Harry glared at her, but Regulus was distracted by the mermaid swimming out of the frame again.

“The Black Lake,” he mumbled. “Merpeople can’t sing above the ground and some of them live in the Black Lake.”

“Oooh, very good,” Myrtle said excitedly.

“They’re going to take something from me and hide it in the Black Lake?” Harry groaned.
“What do you think it’ll be? If I don’t participate, then I’ll never get it back.”

Yes, Regulus thought, that does complicate things a bit.

the second task.

Chapter Notes

you already knew this was coming

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The second task snuck up on them faster than Regulus would have expected. Since the Yule Ball, nearly all of his available time was spent doing some kind of research, either on the Founders of Hogwarts or how to breathe underwater, or trying to figure out what in Salazar's name was going on in the castle. Things were growing weirder and weirder as the second task approached.

Rita Skeeter had written a terrible article outing Hagrid as half-giant, apparently based on an overheard conversation from the night of the Yule Ball that was between Hagrid and Madame Maxime. No one had any idea how she had managed to sneak onto the property in order to hear their conversation, and something about it was making Regulus distinctly nervous. Regulus thought Hagrid wasn't going to come back to teaching at all after the article came out, but Harry, Ron, Hermione, and Luna, with the help of Dumbledore, were able to get him to leave his hut and return to classes.

Moody seemed to be trying to help Harry, if in a roundabout way. He caught Harry sneaking around the castle, apparently fully capable of seeing through the invisibility cloak, and had covered for him when he was almost caught by Filch and Snape. However, this confrontation ended with Moody "borrowing" the map from Harry, a truly terrible thing. Regulus would have yelled at Harry if it wasn't already clear how terrible he felt. If Regulus wasn't already suspicious of Moody, he would have broken into his office and stolen the map back. As it was, he didn't want to risk drawing any more attention to himself than he had to.

That night also led them to the discovery that Moody had apparently searched Snape's office. Ron and Harry thought that maybe Moody had been asked to keep an eye on Snape as well as Karkaroff, but Regulus wasn't sure. There was something in the way Moody watched Snape that reminded him of how Moody watched Regulus, with a disdainful suspicion that never seemed to fade. Besides, Snape was just as worried about the way his Dark Mark was changing as Regulus was, he was doing a good job at hiding it, but Regulus could understand how he felt. He was a traitor and the Dark Lord would want revenge.

Ludo Bagman also tried again to offer Harry help on the task while they were on a visit to Hogsmeade, pulling him aside in the Three Broomsticks. It was very suspicious behavior that Regulus did not appreciate. Regulus hadn't been with them at the time, having snuck off to talk to Remus about the ways someone might spend an hour underwater without dying.

That entire day was derailed when Regulus discovered that Remus and Sirius were once again fighting. He had no idea what about, but Sirius wasn't there when he went to meet Remus, even though he said he would be, and when Regulus called Sirius on the mirror later that evening it was clear that Sirius was not doing well, his hair matted again, his eyes sunken into his too-thin face.

Regulus didn't have the energy or inclination to deal with the issues in Remus and Sirius's relationship, but he wished they would work out whatever was happening between them so they could be more helpful. Why couldn't they have relationship drama after the Triwizard Tournament? Or better yet, after the Dark Lord was dead.

The plan was still to do nothing during the second task despite the statement that Harry would lose whatever it was that was taken forever. Regulus was pretty sure that they wouldn't actually keep whatever they took, there was nothing in the rules about losing your belongings, and it seemed like an unreasonably cruel outcome to failing a task. Especially one that was already so dangerous. Harry was worried his broom would be taken, and Regulus had assured him that if that happened, he would make sure Harry got a replacement. It wasn't like the Black Vaults would be even marginally affected by a new broom.

However, there was still a worry that the task would make it so Harry was in danger if he wasn't prepared. Regulus had no idea how they would put the champions to start, they could place them underwater first regardless of how prepared they were, so they were coming up with contingencies just in case. Sirius suggested a Bubble-Head charm, which wasn't a terrible idea, but was also very finicky. If Harry couldn't perfect it in time, then he would risk drowning, a fate Regulus wouldn't wish on his worst enemy.

Regulus wasn't sure what else to do. They were in the library late the night before the task, Harry with his head down on the desk as he groaned pathetically about whatever item he was going to lose in the lake. It was a common complaint over the last few weeks, and it was starting to do Regulus's head in.

"I've said this a million times, they can't just take things from you," Regulus said. "It's fine. I'm sure they will give you whatever it is back."

"Maybe I should try the Bubble-Head Charm again?" Harry said, lifting his head to say the words, a small pout on his face.

"You already know it well enough to get out of the water," Regulus said dismissively. "That's plenty."

"If you say so," Harry muttered petulantly. "Ron, any ideas?"

Ron was in the middle of re-reading a copy of the Quidditch magazine Harry had a subscription to. "Ideas about what?" he said distractedly.

"What do you mean about what? Haven't you been paying attention?" Hermione asked sharply.

“I told you there are plants you can use to breathe underwater,” Luna said. Regulus thought it was the closest she had ever been to sounding exasperated.

“Yes, the only problem is that none of those plants are real,” Hermione said snidely. She was clearly tired, and she and Ron were still on the outs, it was making her more annoyed than usual.

Luna glared at her, actually glared. Regulus didn’t think he would have ever seen Luna make a face like that.

“Just because you’re narrow-minded, doesn’t mean that I’m lying,” Luna said.

“Ron, you don’t see anything, do you?” Harry interrupted to ask again.

Ron finally looked up from his magazine, but Hermione replied before Ron could even open his mouth. “He’s not a seer, seers aren’t real,” she said, her hair seemed to grow bigger every time she spoke in that sharp, stressed tone.

“Hermione,” Regulus said warningly.

“Don’t tell me you believe him?” she said. “You said it yourself, Trelawney is a fraud.”

“I said that she seems like a charlatan, not that she actually is. I have no idea if she’s the real thing or not,” Regulus replied tiredly.

They had been having this conversation a lot in the last two months. Mostly because Trelawney had outright said that Ron had the gift in the middle of class, and Ron seemed to be letting the attention go to his head. Lavender and Parvati were very impressed. Even though Parvati had had a terrible time with Ron at the Yule Ball, something that Regulus had apologized profusely about, Parvati had promptly gotten over it when she realized that Ron had a talent for Divination.

Regulus had no idea if Ron actually had a gift for it. Trelawney seemed to pick a new student to dote on every couple of weeks, and he was pretty sure she was going to toss Ron aside the first time he made an improper prediction.

“This is useless,” Hermione practically growled.

“What are you two doing here?” Ron asked. Regulus followed his eye-line to see Fred and George walking through the library. He didn’t think that he’d ever actually seen the twins in the library before.

“Looking for Regulus and Hermione,” George replied. “McGonagall needs to talk to both of you.”

“Why?” Hermione asked, looking panicked.

“Dunno,” Fred said. “She was looking a bit grim, though.”

“We’re supposed to take you down to her office,” George said.

“Fine,” Regulus said. He wasn’t making any more headway tonight anyway, and with Hermione going with him, at least there would be less fighting between her, Luna, and Ron. “Harry, you need to get some sleep. We can practice the Bubble-Head Charm in the morning before the task.”

Harry nodded tiredly and started packing up his belongings. Regulus and Hermione followed Fred and George up to McGonagall’s office. The twins walked several paces ahead of them whispering quickly to each other, their voices completely incomprehensible.

“Hermione, I think you should lay off Luna,” Regulus said quietly.

“Of course, you would side with her,” Hermione responded loudly. Regulus sighed.

“I’m not siding with her, I’m not taking sides,” Regulus said. “But Luna is our friend, if she wants to believe in animals and plants that you don’t think are real, then I think we should let her.”

“So you agree? You don’t think what she’s talking about is real?” Hermione said sharply.

“You know that’s not what I said,” Regulus said. “Stop trying to back me into a corner. Luna cares about you, and it clearly hurts her feelings when you talk down to her like that.”

Hermione looked insulted and turned her head away from him as they kept walking. Regulus knew it would take time, she was just stressed and clearly going through something, but he wasn’t trying to hurt her. He knew she cared about Ron and Luna, she just had a funny way of showing it sometimes.

“Good luck,” George said when the twins dropped them off, a dramatically large frown on his face. Regulus shook his head fondly before entering the office.

“Miss Granger, Mr. Black,” McGonagall said, standing up from where she was reading over something at her desk. “Thank you for coming so quickly.”

“What’s going on, Professor?” Hermione asked, her voice shaking slightly. Regulus knew how much she hated to be called into professors’ offices. She seemed to always be afraid that she was about to be expelled, despite not doing anything wrong.

“You both have been selected to participate in the second task of the Triwizard Tournament,” McGonagall said. She had an unhappy look on her face that was making Regulus feel unsettled.

“What do you mean?” Hermione asked nervously.

“Each of the champions will be required to rescue the person most important to them,” McGonagall explained. “Mr. Krum will rescue you Miss Granger and Mr. Potter will rescue you, Mr. Black.”

“You’re going to put us in the lake,” Hermione said, it wasn’t a question.

“That is correct, but you will be under a heavy sleeping charm. You will not feel or notice a thing.”

“What happens if our champions don’t get to us on time?” Regulus asked.

“The merpeople will bring you back,” McGonagall said. “Don’t worry, you will not be in any danger.”

“Okay,” Hermione said uncertainly. “I didn’t realize I was important to Krum,” she mumbled to herself, so low that Regulus almost didn’t hear her.

“Are you both ready?”

“What about our stuff?” Regulus asked.

“The elves will return it to your dorm room. Now, if you wouldn’t mind placing your items on the ground.”

Regulus was having an out-of-body experience. He was completely disconnected from the world around him as he lowered his bag off of his shoulder and onto the ground, watching disjointedly as McGonagall raised her wand to point it at both of them. A second later he was gone.

The next second he was drowning. The cold water was like a shock to his already confused system. All thoughts of what he had been doing a moment ago were gone, he couldn’t think of anything but the icy water he was trying to escape. He tried to use his arms to fight his way to the surface, but they were shaking so badly that they were virtually useless to him.

His face surfaced for a moment, just long enough for him to suck in a breath of air, but it was a mistake, and a second after that he was sinking beneath the frigid water once again, now with a large gulp of it flooding into his lungs, burning him from the inside.

Something sharp attached to the collar of his shirt. The inferi. Fuck, he forgot about the inferi. They were back, he had to get them off. His arms felt so weak though, his lungs burned, and he was losing consciousness fast. All he could see when he opened his eyes was dark water, all of it too opaque to see through.

The sharp nails of the inferi were latched on his collar and dragging him down. At least he thought it was down, he was disoriented and he was dying. Again. Black shadows were taking over his already limited vision. He could feel his body trying to cough and breathe at the same time, taking in more freezing water into his lungs every couple of seconds.

One moment before his vision was truly gone, he broke out of the water again. He could feel his body being dragged onto the ground. His eyes were closed, and he couldn’t breathe, the water in his lungs preventing him. He couldn’t move at all, couldn’t scream, couldn’t fight.

“Ejicere,” he heard a panicked voice say. The water in his lungs moved on its own then, shooting up his windpipe and out his mouth. It felt like glass shredding him as it forced its way out, but all he could do was cough and struggle. “Sirius, calm down,” they whispered fiercely. “You can’t draw any more attention to yourself here.”

Once the water was gone and all that remained was the pain in his throat, he finally was able to take note of how the rest of his body felt. He was shivering harshly, the cold wind causing the freezing water to drop to a point where every piece of exposed skin hurt. There was something warm worming its way between his arms, he had no idea what, but his trembling arms came up automatically and hugged it against his chest. He leaned his head down on it, feeling soft fur tickle his nose.

“He said he didn’t like water,” Harry said suddenly, his worried voice very close to Regulus’s ear. “I didn’t know he couldn’t swim.”

“He can swim,” Remus said quietly. “I think he was just... surprised.” That was a nice way of putting it.

“Harry, man, you were first! You were the first one out of the water. Cedric just now came up with Cho,” Ron said. Regulus rested his head even harder on the furry object he was holding. It hurt to breathe, worse than anything he had ever felt, so all he could do was sit and wait. He didn’t think he could talk even if he tried, and he was too tired to try.

“I think I should take Regulus inside,” Remus said. He must have moved away to talk to someone.

“Yes, of course,” McGonagall said.

“Regulus, can you walk?” Remus said quietly. Regulus lifted his head, a difficult feat given his exhaustion, and managed to open his eyes. Remus’s face was right in front of his, his eyebrows furrowed in worry.

“Yes,” he croaked, immediately cringing at the feeling of his torn throat. He started to move so that he could stand and the warmth against his chest wiggled away. He finally looked at it to see Sirius in his transfigured animagus form, the same one he had for the first task. Suddenly the sharpness pulling at his collar made sense, Sirius must have jumped into the water and dragged him to the bank of the lake.

Remus placed a hand under one of his arms and all but pulled him to his feet. Without Remus’s support, he was sure he would have wobbled dangerously or fallen flat on his face, but Remus kept him upright as they started walking back up to the castle. He was glad that he was there to keep him from embarrassing himself further.

“Harry, you stay down here,” Remus said over his shoulder. “You still need to hear your score. I’m just going to take Regulus up to the Hospital Wing.”

Regulus tried to turn to look at Harry, possibly to say something reassuring, but turning his head even slightly made him dizzy, and he ended up stumbling over his feet. Remus’s hand around his arm tightened, practically carrying him.

They moved slowly, Regulus only capable of walking so quickly, his limbs still aching from the cold water and his earlier panic. Sirius walked next to them, his warm body lingering against Regulus's legs as he moved. Sirius was staring at the ground ahead of him, the muscles in his face pulled into a tight expression.

"Wait," Regulus said. Or tried to say, his throat hurt so badly. "Moody."

"What?" Remus said, though he didn't stop, continuing to move them slowly up the hill to the castle. "What about Moody?"

"He has the —" Regulus broke off to cough, though that only made the pain ten times worse, "the map."

"The map?"

"Moody has the map," Regulus said, by the time the last word was spoken, he could taste blood in his mouth.

"Moody has the map," Remus repeated thoughtfully like he was trying to puzzle out what Regulus meant. Regulus implored him to understand, he didn't think he could speak again if he tried. "The map," Remus said again.

Regulus reached out and pointed exaggeratedly at Sirius.

"Oh!" Remus said, the point finally clicking. "Sirius, you have to go," he whispered. "Moody has the map, so he'll be able to tell who you really are." Sirius was giving Remus an unfathomable expression. Or at least, Regulus had no way of deciphering it. Remus seemed to understand though, sighing quietly. "Harry is safe. I'll make sure that Regulus gets to the Hospital Wing, just go. I'll find you after."

Sirius looked at them both for one more long second before taking off toward the Forbidden Forest. Remus didn't speak again until they walked through the doors of the castle. They were completely out of eyeshot of everyone and Remus must have grown tired of the slow walking. He cast a quick lightening charm on Regulus and picked him up. Regulus groaned in surprise, but promptly shut up when the sound caused more blood to fill his mouth.

"Sorry, but you're very slow," Remus said. Regulus didn't protest, he didn't really care to. Instead, he rested his head against Remus's shoulder and shut his eyes, enjoying the soft movement of being carried through the castle.

“Father,” Sirius said stiffly. He was thankful his voice didn’t waiver. “Where is Mother?”

“In her room,” Orion replied. “Best if you do not disturb her. I do not believe she would want to see you.”

“Has she ever wanted to see me?” Sirius muttered reflexively.

Orion looked up for the first time since Sirius entered the room. He was sitting in front of the fireplace in his parlor. Sirius had so many horrible memories of this room, but they all felt distant now. As if they were all placed behind a thick layer of glass, impenetrable and incapable of touching him.

He wondered if his father was thinking of those memories too. He wondered if his father even remembered those moments. All those punishments, all that pain and suffering and fear. What did it even mean to a person like Orion Black?

His father looked much worse than the last time Sirius had seen him. It had been almost four years since he laid eyes on that man. It had been in this same room, under very different circumstances. His mother had been screaming, rage and hurt flashing across her face in a duel to the death, his father brandishing his wand as he lazily dulled out burning hexes like they were nothing more than first-year charms. His brother — his brother had been in his room, hiding as always.

His father looked almost healthy then, at least significantly more healthy than he did now. His salt and pepper hair had gone completely gray in the last few years. His beard was patchy and misshapen. His skin was sallow and waxy-looking. Sirius wondered if his mother was poisoning him, he wouldn’t be surprised.

“She did used to,” Orion said. “But you are correct. It has been quite a long time.”

“What do you want?” Sirius snapped. He didn’t need to be reminded that his mother didn’t love him. He knew that fact very well.

“She loves you, in her own way,” Orion mumbled. Sirius bristled, his Occlumency walls slamming shut automatically.

“Don’t dig around in my head,” Sirius snapped.

“My apologies,” Orion said lazily, not an ounce of remorse in his voice.

“What do you want ?” Sirius repeated. He’d had enough of being in this forsaken house. It was terrible before, it was unbearable now, now that —

“Regulus is —”

“I know,” Sirius said grimly. He meant to snap, he meant to sound angry, to put every shred of resentment into his words, to make sure his father knew that Sirius blamed him for Regulus’s death. Instead, the words just sounded sad.

“It is time for you to give up this foolishness,” Orion said, his voice harsher than it had been a moment ago. “It is time for you to come home.”

“Come home?” Sirius asked incredulously. “You disowned me. Don’t know if you forgot.”

“I have not forgotten, Sirius,” Orion said. “But that was before. This family needs an heir. We are prepared to welcome you back into the fold.”

“Welcome me — why would you think I would ever come back to his hell house?”

“Hell house,” Orion muttered. “A muggle phrase, no doubt.” Orion shook his head slightly, disdain evident on his face. “You have had your fun and we have allowed you to carry on.”

“Allowed me?!” Sirius shouted. He needed to stop just repeating the words coming out of his father’s mouth, but he was so aghast by what he was hearing that he could do little else.

“Yes,” Orion snarled, his sudden rage causing Sirius to take a small step back. He regretted the show of weakness, recognizing the predatory look on his father’s face. “How do you think this will all play out?”

“What do you mean?” Sirius said tightly.

“Do you think this war will end in your favor? Do you think your friends, your lover ,” his face twitched at the word, “will survive this?”

“You don’t know what you’re talking about,” Sirius replied.

“Especially with your involvement,” Orion said, getting up from his armchair to stand in the center of the room. Sirius didn’t flinch. He consciously did not flinch. But the sight of his father in the same place he had been the last time they had spoken made it a struggle for him.

Sirius didn’t reply, he didn’t know what to say.

“We both know your friends are worse off with your involvement.”

“That’s a lie,” Sirius whispered.

“You have made them into targets, merely by spending time with them,” Orion said.

“Shut up!” Sirius yelled, taking a step toward his father. Orion merely rocked his head back and forth lazily, before sitting back down, the brief movement exhausting his dying body. And he was dying, Sirius realized. That’s why he looked so terrible, that’s why he was making this last ploy to reach out to Sirius. Orion was on his way out, and they both knew it.

“Son,” he said, the title like poison, “you need to find a way to live your life so that you are not hurting others.”

“I’m not hurting them —”

“I have known you for two decades now, and I know how you are,” Orion said tiredly, his energy clearly draining quickly.

“You don’t know anything about me,” Sirius hissed.

“You have spent your life hurting everyone around you,” Orion replied. “Your mother can barely stand to think of you. I have been nothing but disappointed. And your brother —”

Sirius’s eyes snapped open. He didn’t usually have dreams like that as Padfoot, but he could feel the moment he woke that he was still in his animagus form. The world was all grays and yellows, mildly distracting really, though that was welcome after that memory.

He remembered getting so drunk after the meeting with his father that Remus had to come hunt him down two days later, scrapping him off the streets of London and nursing him back to health. Or as close to health as he could be at the time. After his brother’s death, he was never quite healthy again.

The words his father had spoken dug into him like a battering ram, destroying everything in the process. They ate away at him. It was like his father could see every shadow in his head, every self-conscious fear that existed inside of him.

The worst part of it all was that his father had been right. James and Lily died because they knew him. He was the one who suggested they switch to Peter, worse than that, he could still remember staying up late with James talking about whether they should take Dumbledore up on his offer to be secret keeper. Sirius had been part of convincing James not to. James was all too willing to agree, to put his wife and son’s life on the line in the name of friendship. Their deaths were his fault.

Remus spent years transforming alone, he was cut out of their friend group because Sirius didn’t trust him. He kept him around, he stayed with him, but he never treated Remus like he deserved to be treated. He wasn’t good for him. He wasn’t good for anyone.

And Regulus... Well, his brother died because Sirius left him behind. The fact that Regulus had miraculously come back to life meant little when Sirius remembered that he went through so many terrible years because Sirius wasn’t a good enough brother.

Sirius didn’t even have to wonder why he was dreaming of that conversation. Seeing his brother drown all over again had definitely triggered it. He was still struck by how haunting it was to watch his brother's head break through the surface for a split second before he started sinking. He didn't even think twice before diving into the water to drag him to shore. Harry was there trying to help, but Sirius couldn't even think of anything but not letting Regulus die again, certainly not right in front of him.

He wondered if Remus would be upset with him for doing that, for breaking the lead and sprinting into the water like that. He wondered if Remus would even bother to come talk to him at all. They hadn't actually spoken for a few weeks now.

It all went wrong two days after Christmas. Sirius had hung around in Remus's room at the Three Broomsticks over the Christmas holiday. Things were better than Sirius ever remembered them being. He was warm and full and happy for three whole days. Then the day after Boxing Day, Sirius went and did something stupid.

Remus was just looking so cuddly and kind, his eyes an amber color that seemed to draw Sirius in. They were drinking firewhisky and had been for a few hours at that point. Sirius just couldn't help himself. He leaned in, pulled himself out of his chair, and kissed him.

Remus's lips were rougher than he remembered, though Sirius would guess his were as well. It didn't matter. They were kissing and that was all that mattered. That was all that ever mattered to Sirius. Remus groaned against his mouth, pushing up as he grabbed Sirius's face with both of his hands.

Everything moved so quickly after that. Sirius had to tip his head back to kiss Remus, pushing up onto his toes so that he could pull on the roots of his hair. He fumbled with Remus's belt, unlatching it quickly and shoving Remus's pants down far enough so that he could get his hands around his cock, both hands because Sirius never did things halfway.

Touching him was the best thing Sirius had ever felt, made even better by the fact that Remus let him, moaning quietly against him the entire time. Sirius licked a wide stripe under Remus's ear, right where he knew Remus loved it, before dropping to his knees.

The thing is, Sirius had spent his entire life enduring people telling him what he was made for. The Black heir, the one meant to lead the family, the great family shame, the disowned pureblood, the lone lion in a pit of snakes. The shining point for those who stood against Voldemort, the example of how people weren't like their family. The traitor, the escaped prisoner, the madman. The one who would never be anything but a Black.

None of that ever phased him because Sirius already knew exactly what he was made for. He was made for sucking Remus's cock and nothing else. He was pretty sure all of his happiest moments were him on his knees. Not that he would ever share that with anyone, not even on threat of death, though he was pretty sure Remus already knew how he felt.

At least, Sirius thought he did.

"This is a mistake," Remus muttered. Sirius opened his eyes and dislodged himself enough to look at Remus's face which was stricken with horror and regret.

"What?" Sirius breathed.

“We shouldn’t be doing this,” Remus said. “This is a mistake.”

Sirius wasn’t sure that he even said anything else. Why Remus felt like a good time to reject him was when Sirius was actively going down on him, Sirius would never know. He wished Remus would have kicked him long before he managed to get on his knees for him. He didn’t need to add that embarrassing memory to his life full of shame.

They hadn’t spoken since then. Sirius showed up the morning of the second task, already transformed into Padfoot, and didn’t bother to change back before Remus transfigured him a disguise and placed the collar around his neck.

After the entire debacle with Regulus almost dying right in front of him, Sirius had run through the Forbidden Forest for nearly an hour just to work off some of the hectic energy that was buzzing under his skin. He went back to the cave after that, curling up next to Buckbeak, and promptly fell asleep. He had no idea how late it was now, though based on his limited view of the sky from inside his cave, he would guess it was early evening.

He closed his eyes again but didn’t fall asleep. It was almost like meditating, being in animagus form, all those painful thoughts and anxieties were quieted to a background hum, incomprehensible to his animal mind. He could hear much better as Padfoot. He could hear the sounds of running water and small animals outside the cave. It was nice, relaxing in a way he almost never experienced anymore.

It was another few hours before he heard the soft footsteps of someone climbing up toward the cave entrance. He didn’t bother to even lift his head, he already knew who it was. He would recognize those footsteps anywhere.

“Sirius?” Remus called softly. The cave was dark this late in the evening, though Sirius was sure Remus could see through it, his eyes supernaturally sensitive to the darkness. “Incendio,” Remus whispered, relighting the fire in the center of the cave.

Sirius watched him walk in and sit down a few feet away, much closer than Sirius would have expected. Remus was watching him with a measured, unreadable look. He had a bag with him and Sirius could smell the enticing scent of roasted chicken wafting out of it. His stomach rumbled loudly.

“Will you transform back? I want to talk to you,” Remus said. Sirius really did not want to do that. He wanted to be petty and stay as Padfoot all night, waiting until Remus left in a huff, but he was pretty sure he wouldn’t get any of the food Remus brought if he did that, and ultimately his hunger won out. His body shivered with magic as he transformed quickly.

“If you’re here to berate me about jumping in to get Regulus, then can you save it for after dinner? I’m not going to apologize for it anyways,” Sirius said, perhaps a bit too sharply given the way Remus’s face fell.

“I would never ask you to apologize for that,” Remus said. “I was a second away from summoning him out of the water myself.”

Sirius breathed an audible sigh of relief, his shoulders relaxing finally. “That’s how he died,” Sirius said quietly. “He said he drowned. I couldn’t let it happen again.”

“I know,” Remus said. Sirius glanced up to find Remus watching him with that soft, tender look that Sirius so often found irresistible. He wasn’t about to fall for that trap again.

“What did you bring?” he asked to break the tension.

“Oh,” Remus said. “Part of the feast from Hogwarts.” He handed the bag to Sirius who quickly reached in pulling out plates and plates of food, all charmed to stay warm. “Sorry it took a bit, I wanted to make sure Harry and Regulus were both okay.”

“And were they?” Sirius asked around a mouthful of food. Remus gave him a small, fond smile.

“Yes, Pomfrey fixed Regulus up quickly, he was sleeping when I left. Harry wasn’t injured.”

“How did Harry do it?” They had arrived late to the task, right as the champions were jumping in the water, so Sirius wasn’t able to catch Harry casting a spell.

“Gillyweed apparently,” Remus answered, shrugging slightly. “Dobby stole it for him.”

“I don’t know what that is,” Sirius said.

“It’s pretty rare, but if ingested, you grow gills and webbed feet and hands. Dobby said he overheard Moody talking about it.”

“Useful,” Sirius muttered, stuffing a handful of roasted potatoes into his mouth.

“I brought silverware, you know,” Remus said though he was smiling widely. Sirius shrugged haphazardly. “Harry got a 45 on the task. He’s still in last place, but it was the highest score given today.”

“He bloody well deserved it,” Sirius said. “He was leagues before the others.” Remus nodded. “I thought the plan wasn’t to participate though? Didn’t Regulus say they were — what was it? Protesting.”

“Yes, but Harry was under the impression that Regulus would be in real danger if he didn’t go down to get him.”

“What? He thought they were just going to keep them down there if the champions didn’t succeed?” Sirius asked incredulously.

“No,” Remus said, chuckling slightly. “He said that Ron was with him when they realized that Regulus and Hermione were taken, Harry originally thought Regulus would die if he didn’t rescue him, but Ron apparently explained to him that they would probably be released either way. None of the people taken were magically bound to the tournament so they couldn’t just kill them.”

“Smart kid,” Sirius said.

“He’s quite the strategist,” Remus agreed. “But anyways, Harry still knew that Regulus didn’t like water. I don’t think he knows that’s how Regulus died the first time, but he knew enough to rescue Regulus. Hence the Gillyweed and first place score.”

Sirius shook his head fondly. “He and Regulus are so…” He wasn’t sure how to finish that sentence.

“Protective,” Remus supplied. Sirius nodded. Remus gave him another one of his long, measured looks before taking a deep, fortifying breath. Sirius tensed up immediately. “I wanted to apologize.”

“No need,” Sirius said quickly, waving him off. “It’s fine.”

“It’s not,” Remus said, so softly that Sirius nearly didn’t hear him. “So much time has passed.”

“Remus!” Sirius shouted. He was on his feet, though he didn’t remember standing. “It’s really fine. I’m not upset. Can we just drop it?”

Remus looked startled, his mouth hanging open slightly. “Sirius, I’m trying to tell you —”

“I won’t try it again,” Sirius said quickly, sweeping his hands out erratically. He didn’t need Remus to let me down gently. The last rejection had been more than enough. “I understand if you don’t — I know you don’t want me like that anymore.”

“I never said that,” Remus said firmly. He was standing now too. “I never said I didn’t want you, but —”

“Then what?” Sirius shouted. Things were getting out of hand quickly, but Sirius wasn’t sure how to get himself back on track. “What else could you possibly mean by calling it a mistake when your dick was in my mouth?”

“Neither of us is in a place where we can handle something like this,” Remus said, his voice had shifted again. He sounded almost like a professor like he was slipping into his teaching persona just to lecture Sirius. “You’re living in a cave for Merlin’s sake!”

“I wanted to be close to Harry,” Sirius said through clenched teeth, “in case something happened.”

“I know that,” Remus conceded, still talking in that awful steady voice.

“Then you don’t get to use it as an excuse,” Sirius snapped.

“I think we need more time before trying anything like that again,” Remus said over him as if he didn’t even hear Sirius speak. “You’re still a wanted man. You haven’t had a moment of freedom since you were twenty.” Sirius felt like he had been slapped.

“So what? I’m too inexperienced for you ‘cause I haven’t had time to bed half of England?” Sirius snarled. His magic cracked dangerously across his fingernails. Azkaban had done a number on his accidental magic, turning him into a dangerous time bomb that could go off at any moment.

“What is that supposed to mean?” Remus whispered. His eyes were dancing with anguish and some other mixture of emotions that Sirius couldn’t hope to understand. He knew it meant he was getting too close to saying something that would cause the evening to erupt into chaos. Sirius had never been known for his ability to stop himself though.

“Oh, spare me. I’m not stupid enough to believe you spent the last decade loyal to a man you let rot in prison,” Sirius yelled.

Remus’s face moved through emotions like lightning, flashing across his face in a moment of violence. Sirius felt regret immediately. Remus’s life was worse with Sirius in it. Sirius sighed, the anger taking all his remaining energy, and collapsed back onto the ground.

“If you don’t want me, then I would rather you just tell me,” Sirius said quietly before squeezing his eyes shut. The following words he spoke were said with more vulnerability than anything he’d said in years. “You’re the only friend I have left, and I would rather have you as my friend, than not have you at all.” It was a selfish plea given how often he seemed to hurt Remus, but he made it regardless.

Sirius expected Remus to leave, he expected him to yell before storming out. That was always Remus’s go-to when they would fight. He would have some devastated final word that would remind Sirius how terrible of a boyfriend he was, and then he would leave to cool off.

That’s why he jumped so violently when he felt Remus’s hand on his back. Remus didn’t move away, he just held it there, firmly rubbing Sirius’s back through his thin sweater.

“You have always been the most important person in my life, Sirius,” Remus said quietly. Sirius squeezed his eyes shut even harder, so hard that he could see lights dancing behind his eyelids. “It’s not because you’re inexperienced or some other nonsense like that. It’s because you spent more than twelve years being tortured. It’s because I spent twelve years missing a man I thought killed my closest friends.”

Sirius let out a quiet sob, covering his face with both of his hands, trying to smother the noise.

“I think we need more time,” Remus said gently. “But there has never once in my entire life been a moment when I didn’t want you. Okay?”

Sirius noticed that he didn’t deny his accusation about bedding half of England, though he guessed that would have to be a conversation left for another day.

“Okay,” Sirius said miserably. He felt a bit like a scolded child, but Remus just wrapped his arms around Sirius’s shoulders and held him as he calmed back down. They were silent for a long time, the only noise was the crackling of the fire. When Remus spoke again, it was with a solemnness that Sirius hadn’t heard in a long time.

“I think I know what another Horcrux is.”

here this is a day early

See the end of the chapter for more notes

James was with him when he woke up. He was running his lifeless fingers through Regulus's hair, gently brushing his forehead every couple of seconds. He had a tender smile on his face, but his eyes were elsewhere, watching something else in the Hospital Wing.

"James," Regulus said softly. James glanced down at him, just as someone else spoke.

"Oh, you're awake," Harry said. Regulus turned his head to see Harry and Hermione sitting beside his hospital bed, both of them wrapped in soft-looking blankets. They were both giving him odd looks that he did not appreciate.

"How long have I been asleep?"

"A few hours," Hermione answered. "Professor Lupin left just a bit ago. He said he needed to talk to Dumbledore."

Regulus could still feel the light pressure of James's fingers against his head, he wondered if Hermione and Harry could see his hair moving.

"How are you both feeling? What happened during the task?" Regulus asked, slowly pushing himself up so that he was sitting. The potions Pomfrey had given him had worked wonders and his throat didn't hurt at all. However, his body still ached slightly, but he figured that was to be expected.

It took them about half an hour to unravel the story of what happened during the task. Harry panicked when he found out that both Regulus and Hermione had been taken. He was planning to use the Bubble-Head Charm that they had practiced to rescue Regulus from the water, but Dobby had found them shortly before the task to give him Gillyweed. Dobby and Moody's involvement was highly suspect to Regulus but he wasn't sure what to make of it.

Regulus was a little disappointed to hear that Harry had managed to get first place and the highest score of the task given their original plan, but he wasn't too hard on him. He could see from the look on Harry's face that he had just been worried and Regulus couldn't fault him for that.

The most surprising aspect was the fact that Moaning Myrtle had intervened to tell Harry where to go once he was in the Lake. Regulus would have to make sure and thank her for her help. She always did have a soft spot for Harry.

Pomfrey came over a short while after Regulus woke up and shoed Harry and Hermione out of the Hospital Wing. Regulus felt fine, but Pomfrey insisted that he stay overnight at least just to make sure there were no lasting effects on his lungs. He could still be at risk of drowning despite the water being removed from his lungs hours earlier. At least, that's what the medi-witch said.

"I can't believe Sirius jumped in that water to save you like that," James said once they were alone.

"Yeah, who would have thought?" Regulus replied. James was watching him with an odd look in his eyes, Regulus couldn't place it. "What?"

"You're so important to them," James said softly.

"Huh?" Regulus said distractedly.

"Sirius and Harry," James explained. Regulus gave him a long look.

"You say that like it's a bad thing," Regulus said slowly.

"No, that's not what I mean," James said, shaking his head slightly. He dropped his hand away from Regulus's hair and intertwined their fingers. "I just only ever knew you as an outsider, and now you have this place in their lives. It's —"

Regulus watched him curiously as James tried to parse out his own meaning. He kept searching around the room like it would give him the answers.

"It's the place you would have had," Regulus supplied. James looked at him with surprise. "In their lives, if you had survived, Harry and Sirius would feel this way about you and not me."

"Yeah, I suppose you're right," James mumbled. They stared at each other for a long moment. Regulus couldn't quite understand how James was feeling and his face gave nothing away.

"Are you upset with me?" Regulus asked finally, he couldn't bear the silence any longer.

"No," James said, his face softening instantly. "Of course not."

"Then what is it?" Regulus persisted. He could feel that James was holding back.

"I guess — I guess I'm a bit jealous is all," James admitted, looking abashed and awkward.

"I'm sorry," Regulus said, feeling just as awkward.

"No, no!" James shouted. Regulus jumped slightly in surprise. "Don't be sorry," James said, quieter this time. "I just — I'm happy it's you, but —"

"It's okay if you have complicated feelings about it all," Regulus conceded. "I know that it should be you or Lily here, instead of me."

James looked haunted for a second, but he schooled his features quickly. Not quickly enough for Regulus to miss it though.

“You know I would give it all up if it meant you and L — Lily could be here instead,” Regulus said, choking on the words slightly.

“Regulus, please,” James said frantically. “Please stop. Please don’t say that. That’s not what I want.”

“How can it not be what you want?” Regulus asked though he mumbled the words to himself like he wasn’t speaking out loud.

James sighed then fell quiet for a long moment. “You’re right, my feelings are complicated,” James said finally.

He was looking out the window now, his eyes far away. His hand was still wrapped around Regulus’s, but Regulus couldn’t feel him nearly as much as he could a few moments before. It was odd, like a melancholy emptiness was taking over, pulling James even farther away from him, though Regulus had no idea how to fix it. They didn’t speak again and it wasn’t long before Regulus fell back asleep. When he woke the next morning, James was gone.

The aftermath of the second task came down in the form of Rita Skeeter's articles. The first one was a piece in the Prophet about Remus Lupin, previous Defense Against the Dark Arts Professor, and rumored unregistered werewolf, whose crup jumped into the Black Lake the moment Regulus Black broke through the surface. Rita argued that the crup's actions should have disqualified Harry from winning, but that clearly Dumbledore didn’t agree. The article was full of a bunch of insidious speculation and anti-werewolf sentiment, with Rita writing about whether werewolves should even be allowed to own pets, let alone well-trained magical ones.

Regulus was horrified to read it, though beyond grateful that there wasn’t even a hint of who that crup could actually be. Hermione was enraged by the article, ranting all morning about how unfair it was that Rita could just claim Lupin was a werewolf based solely on rumor.

“That could ruin someone’s life, don’t you get that?” Hermione snapped at Regulus who had merely expressed relief that Sirius wasn’t at direct risk.

“Yes, Hermione,” Regulus said tiredly. “I’m not disagreeing with you.” It went on like that through most of breakfast. Harry was just as angry, though he was much better at burying it behind furious chewing. Ron just shook his head in disdain.

It only got worse when they showed up at Potions only to be met with a gaggle of Slytherins lying in wait.

“There they are, there they are!” Pansy said cheerfully, breaking through the group so she could face them all directly. She had a vicious look on her face that made Regulus nervous. “You might find something to interest you in there, Granger!” Pansy snarked as she tossed a copy of Witch Weekly directly at Hermione’s face.

Hermione caught it deftly, before stomping into the classroom, rolling her eyes at Pansy's antics. Regulus just barely caught the look of vexed disappointment on Pansy's face. Hermione rifled through the magazine quickly once they were sitting at their usual tables, Regulus next to Harry and Hermione next to Ron.

"I told you not to annoy Rita Skeeter! She's made you out to be some kind of —" Ron hissed.

"What's it say?" Harry whispered. Ron grabbed the magazine out of Hermione's hands and tossed it to them.

"It's just a pile of old rubbish," Hermione said derisively.

"Harry Potter's Secret Heartache?" Harry read incredulously. Snape had already begun writing the ingredients for today's potion on the board, so Harry and Regulus pulled the magazine below their desk to read it.

The article was ridiculous. It was mostly just Rita positing that Hermione might have secret romances going on with Viktor Krum, "Bulgarian Seeker and hero of the last World Quidditch Cup," — which Regulus found to be a bit generous all things considered — Harry Potter, and Regulus himself, who Rita described as "the mysterious heir to the House of Black."

"This really is a pile of old rubbish," Regulus agreed, tutting quietly. Pansy was quoted in the article, describing Hermione as "really ugly" and guessing that she was probably using Love Potions that she brewed herself to get all these boys interested in her.

Hermione and Ron kept whispering as class began, though Regulus couldn't hear them very well. Something about how Rita had known that Krum had asked Hermione to visit over the summer. Ron's face turned stormy at the mention of Krum, though Hermione seemed to just be confused. They were interrupted by Snape, who quickly corralled all the students back into the lecture while Regulus tucked the magazine into his bag before Snape could see it.

Snape was giving Harry a very dirty look throughout the beginning of class and Regulus was seconds away from intervening when there was a knock at the classroom door.

"Enter," Snape said in a bored tone. Karkaroff came storming in and immediately demanded to speak to Snape. Snape tried to shoo him off, telling him that they would talk after class, but Karkaroff was persistent.

"I want to talk now, while you can't sneak off, Severus. You've been avoiding me."

"After the lesson," Snape snapped, but Karkaroff stayed in the classroom during the entire period, hovering near the front of the classroom and watching the proceedings with his beady eyes. Regulus could already see the determined look on Harry's face and didn't even want to know what he might have had planned.

"You go," Regulus hissed. "I'll stay and listen." Harry gave him a curious look but ultimately nodded. When the other students left, Regulus ducked behind his table, scattering a few of his belongings so that he could pretend to pick them up while he listened.

“What’s so urgent?” Snape hissed.

“This,” Karkaroff responded in the same tone and ripped up his left-hand sleeve to show Snape his forearm. Regulus didn’t have to see it to know what it was. Karkaroff was showing Snape his Dark Mark.

“Put it away!” Snape snarled.

“But you must have noticed —” Karkaroff started to say, his voice agitated.

“We can talk later,” Snape said sharply. “Black! What are you doing?”

“Just packing up my belongings,” Regulus said blandly. Karkaroff looked at him for a moment, his face a swirl of anger, worry, and suspicion, before stomping out of the classroom leaving Snape and Regulus alone. “It’s his Mark, isn’t it?” Regulus asked, walking up to the front of the classroom.

Snape leaned heavily against his desk, crossing his arms over his chest, his face riddled with tension. “He’s growing more powerful,” Snape said quietly. “Karkaroff wants to run.”

“He probably should,” Regulus said. “If he rises again —” He stopped to clear his throat which was suddenly suspiciously tight. “If he rises again, Karkaroff will be hunted down.”

Snape nodded and they both knew what Regulus wasn’t saying. Snape would be in the exact same boat. Regulus wanted to ask what Snape’s plan was, but he could see the rigidity there and decided to show mercy, at least for now. If the Dark Lord rises, they could all end up dead.

“Why were you looking at Harry like that during class?” Regulus asked, deciding to change the subject.

Snape’s face twisted into an ugly snarl. “I know he and his friends are stealing ingredients. You’re probably helping them,” Snape accused sharply.

“What are you talking about?” Regulus asked, throwing his hands out in confusion.

“Boomslang skin. Gillyweed. Lacewing flies,” Snape listed.

“Oh, yes, the Gillyweed was us,” Regulus said with a slight nod. He didn’t realize that Dobby stole it from Snape’s stores, though he supposed that made sense. Snape was clearly working hard to cover up his shock at Regulus’s admittance. “I’ll replace it. Harry didn’t do it on purpose.”

Snape’s lip curled angrily, but he seemed to be wrestling with his desire to blame Harry regardless. “And the Boomslang skin? The Lacewing flies? We both know what potion that’s used for,” Snape said, unwilling to back down completely.

“Both of those are missing?” Regulus asked. Snape nodded his head once. “Someone is stealing ingredients to make Polyjuice Potion?”

“Not someone,” Snape snapped.

“It’s not us,” Regulus said. “I would just buy the ingredients. That’s what I did last time.”

“Last — last time?!” Snape yelled. Regulus waved him off.

“Don’t worry about it,” Regulus said calmly, unbothered by Snape’s agitation. “Who else do you think it could be? Do you think someone is using Polyjuice in the castle?”

“I already know —”

“It’s not us, Snape,” Regulus repeated firmly. “Try to think past your own biases for a second. Who else would need Polyjuice?” Snape glared at him for a long few seconds before looking away, his eyebrow twitching thoughtfully.

“It’s probably an adult or a sixth or seventh year,” Snape said. “I don’t think many of my students could brew it successfully otherwise. Longbottom may be able to figure it out. Granger might be able to as well, but you say it isn’t you.” Snape gave him a suspicious look but Regulus just raised his eyebrows in waiting. “To what purpose, I don’t know.”

Harry ambushed him with questions about what Karkaroff wanted from Snape the moment he left the classroom. Regulus explained in as simple of terms as he could.

“They were both Death Eaters, they still have physical ties to You-Know-Who,” Regulus said, already regretting what he was about to say. “They can tell that he’s growing stronger.”

Harry’s face paled. “They can feel that?” Harry asked.

“Do you know what the Dark Mark is?” Harry shook his head. “It’s a brand that You-Know-Who gives his followers, it’s the same symbol you saw at the Quidditch World Cup, the snake and the skull. Death Eaters have it on their left forearms. You-Know-Who could use it to summon his followers and they could use it to call him as well. It had faded after he was destroyed, but it’s been growing darker. Karkaroff is getting nervous.”

Harry looked for a moment like he might be sick, but Regulus reached up to wrap an arm around his shoulders. He was trying to ground him, that Harry was at Hogwarts, safe with Regulus.

“Don’t worry about this, okay? I just want you to know about it, but it’s not something you need to focus on,” Regulus said quietly. Harry nodded, a small bit of relief crossing his face.

The conversation with Snape about the Polyjuice Potion tugged at him for the entire evening and most of the following day. He couldn’t help watching other students and professors suspiciously as he walked to Hogsmeade with Harry, Ron, and Luna. Hermione and Neville walked behind them several paces, deep in a conversation about Herbology that Regulus found painfully boring. Even overhearing it was putting him to sleep.

He had Harry's invisibility cloak tucked into his robes, already planning to slip off the moment he could. Harry had complained most of the morning about his desire to go with him.

"It's better if you're seen in Hogsmeade, less suspicious that way," Regulus said. "We don't want to risk Sirius's location."

Harry sighed, Regulus already knew that argument was the killing blow. "Yes, fine. Tell him I said hi."

"You can talk to him in the mirror tonight," Regulus said, squeezing Harry's shoulder as they walked. "But I'll tell him."

"Oh, will you give him this?" Luna asked, handing Regulus a small bag.

"Er, sure, Luna," Regulus said. "What is it?"

"It's a Ranglehorn Snout," Luna whispered. "It'll help keep him hidden."

"Oh," Regulus said raising his eyebrows slightly. "Thanks, Luna. That's very thoughtful." Luna smiled brightly at him while he and Harry shared a small look.

He left them a few blocks away from the Three Broomsticks, throwing on the cloak and making his way up to the cave. It was not a terribly long walk, but Regulus was out of breath by the time he got there.

"I don't see why you have to go alone?" Sirius's voice could be heard a few paces from the entrance to the cave.

"You probably shouldn't talk so loudly if you don't want to be found," Regulus said as he entered, pulling the cloak off. "Or at least cast a silencing charm."

"Right," Lupin said, pulling out his wand to do exactly that. Both men were sitting on opposite sides of a dying fire, about as far away from each other as they could get in the small space.

"So, Lupin, are you going somewhere?" Regulus prompted, sitting down and crossing his legs under himself. Sirius looked disgruntled and glanced away from both of them as Lupin began to speak.

"I've researching different artifacts tied to the founders of Hogwarts," Lupin said, Regulus nodded along in understanding. "We know about Hufflepuff's cup and Slytherin's locket. For Gryffindor, the only thing I could find was the sword which Dumbledore already has and confirmed is definitely not a Horcrux."

"That leaves Ravenclaw," Regulus said.

"Exactly. The only thing I could find with any substance was the Lost Diadem of Ravenclaw. Have you heard of it?"

“I don’t think so,” Regulus answered.

“It’s a piece of legend, apparently it was supposed to enhance the wisdom of whoever was wearing it. It was created by Rowena Ravenclaw, but her daughter, Helena, stole it. So the story goes that Helena ran away with the diadem and Rowena sent the Bloody Baron after her to bring her home.”

“The ghost of Slytherin house?”

“Yeah, did you know that he used to be in love with Helena?” Lupin asked, clearly lost in his story.

“No, I usually tried to avoid him, if I’m honest,” Regulus said with a small laugh.

“Understandable,” Lupin agreed. “Well, he tracked Helena to a forest in Albania where she hid the diadem in a hollow tree, or so they say. Helen refused to come back with him so he killed her, then himself in remorse.”

“Morbid,” Sirius muttered. Lupin gave him a small look that Regulus didn't understand.

“The diadem was never found,” Lupin said, “but people have been looking for it for hundreds of years.”

“That’s what I was thinking,” Lupin said. “I asked Dumbledore about it. He said I could try talking to Helena herself, but her ghost is really shy and I wasn’t able to find her. But apparently, Dumbledore thinks that Voldemort was hiding in that exact forest in Albania a few years ago. It’s where Quirrell met him on his year sabbatical.”

“Of course,” Regulus breathed. “It all makes sense.”

“I’ve decided to start there. He might not have hidden the Horcrux, but if I can track where he found it originally, maybe I can figure out where it is now.”

“And what if Voldemort is still there?” Sirius yelled. Regulus jumped slightly at the noise, but Lupin just looked tired as if they had been having this conversation all morning. They probably had.

“Dumbledore doesn't think he is,” Lupin said calmly. “And I’ll be careful.”

“You could die out there and no one would know where you were,” Sirius said frantically. “I would have no idea how to find you. I wouldn’t even know you were dead.”

“Sirius,” Lupin said quietly.

“Why don’t you just go with him?” Regulus asked. Sirius looked at Regulus with a face so full of betrayal that Regulus outwardly cringed.

“I can’t,” Sirius said. “I have to be here. Harry —”

“Harry is fine,” Regulus said. “I can keep him safe.”

“Oh, are you planning to do that before or after you drown in the Black Lake?” Sirius snapped. Regulus flinched, though he didn’t argue.

“Sirius, please,” Lupin begged.

“No, clearly I’m needed here,” Sirius replied, his cheek twitching with stress.

“You won’t be able to come to the school while Moody has the map,” Regulus said.

“Then steal it back,” Sirius yelled, throwing his hands up in frustration. “This is ridiculous. He shouldn’t be able to just take it.”

“Didn’t you guys lose it to Filch in your seventh year?” Regulus replied.

“Yes, well, that’s different,” Sirius said, his face bright red.

“I promise to be careful, I won’t take any unnecessary risks,” Lupin said, looking imploringly at Sirius. “I’ll be back before the third task whether or not I find anything.”

“You can’t just disappear,” Sirius said softly. Regulus looked away, suddenly feeling like he was intruding. “I can’t do that again. Please.”

“I promise,” Lupin said just as softly. “I’ll come back and I’ll keep you updated the entire time.”

Sirius was quiet for a long time. “Okay,” he finally agreed. “Regulus, you need to get that map back. I want to be there for the third task.”

“I’ll try,” Regulus said.

the insider.

With everything that had been going on with the Triwizard Tournament and finding the Horcruxes, it felt like classes and life at Hogwarts had fallen by the wayside. Regulus felt like he desperately needed to catch up. It would be humiliating to do poorly in classes he'd already taken and done well in.

Regardless, everything felt so chaotic. The articles from Rita had caused Hermione to receive an unreasonable amount of hate mail for weeks. The first time it happened everyone was confused as Hermione opened one of the numerous letters she had received.

"They're all like this," Hermione said frantically, showing one letter in front of Regulus's eyes.

You are a WickEd giRL. HarRy PotTER desErves BeTteR. GO back wherE you cAME from mUGgle.

"I don't think you should —" Regulus started to say, but it was too late. Hermione opened the next letter and suddenly a foul green liquid was spilling out on her hands.

"Undiluted bubotuber pus!" Ron said.

"Evanesco," Regulus said quickly, vanishing the liquid. It was too late though, Hermione's fingers already starting to grow painful sores. "You better go to the Hospital Wing. Don't open any more letters."

Hermione nodded quickly, her eyes tearing up slightly from the pain as she stood to leave the Great Hall. Regulus gave Ron a pointed look and Ron jolted slightly before getting up to follow her. After that Regulus took to vanishing any letters that Hermione received, regardless of who they were from.

Remus was gone now, checked out of the Three Broomsticks and off to Albania. Sirius was calling on the mirror nearly every night to talk to either Harry or Regulus or both. Regulus empathized with his worry and loneliness, but his constant calls were starting to drive Regulus a little crazy.

One night he was about a second away from telling Sirius that it was late and that he couldn't keep Harry up all night chatting just because he didn't have anyone to talk to when James stepped in. Regulus had been in bed already when he heard Sirius's voice from the mirror. Harry still hadn't managed a solid silencing charm yet, so Regulus had taken to casting one the moment he heard a voice.

Regulus sat up in bed, irritated and tired, about to pull open his curtains and intervene, when James appeared at the end of his bed.

"Let them be," James said softly, his voice pleading. "Please."

Regulus sighed. "Harry has school," Regulus said, though it was weak. He had never been able to say no to James, especially when he begged like that.

"I know, but Sirius might go crazy if he doesn't have someone to talk to," James said imploringly.

Regulus gave him a look but paused before replying. "Can you see him?" Regulus asked.

James tilted his head to one side and then the other. "Sort of," James explained. "It's not like I can see you, you're very easy to find, but when I really look for him, I can see Sirius sometimes."

"I wonder why," Regulus said, leaning back onto his pillows, his muscles ached from the day and it was making him sleepy.

"I've been thinking about that actually," James said. He leaned back as well onto the opposite side of the bed, moving so that their legs were tangled together slightly. James always seemed to move so that he was touching Regulus, no matter how small the touch might be. "I think it might be because Sirius and I were so close."

"Then why not just show up for him? Why do you hang around me so often?" Regulus asked, his voice light and quietly sarcastic. He was genuinely curious, though he worried that James's answer might hurt him.

James, to Regulus's surprise, blushed. He looked away slightly, his eyes narrowing as if in embarrassment. "You know why," James mumbled. His lips twitched like they couldn't decide whether he should smile or frown.

Regulus gave him a bewildered look because he was certain he didn't know why. "What?"

"Don't make me say it out loud," James pleaded. Regulus would give anything to know what James didn't want to say, but, of course, he could never say no to the man.

"Can you see Remus?" Regulus said, changing the subject. James seemed to visibly relax, though his eyebrows furrowed.

"No, I can't," James said. "Not by himself anyway. I don't know why though. I can't see Harry either unless he's with you."

"Well, you didn't actually know Harry very well," Regulus said, instantly flinching after he said the words. "Sorry, that came out wrong. I know you knew him, but he was only a baby, right? He's a person now. Or he was always a person, I just mean —"

Regulus was cut off by James's loud laughter.

"I know what you mean," he said with a chuckle. "Don't worry, I'm not offended. You're right, I don't really know him like I know you and Sirius."

"I wish you did," Regulus said softly. "You would like him."

“I know I would,” James said, giving Regulus a very tender look.

Regulus didn't try to intervene between Sirius and Harry again, even after Harry woke up late for breakfast, rubbing his tired eyes and yawning all through the morning. He still felt so protective over him that he often forgot that he had to give Harry space to make his own mistakes, even if they were little ones like staying up too late chatting with your godfather.

Regulus talked to Sirius about twice a week, though their conversations were much shorter than the ones Sirius had with Harry. Mostly they talked about possibilities for the last task and worries about who might be in the castle with them. Occasionally, they talked about school which Regulus found hilarious. Never once had the two of them talked about school before.

School itself was becoming quite a nuisance actually. His classes were ramping up for the end of the year and Regulus was suddenly swamped in busy work. The classes he'd taken before weren't as difficult to keep up with, but there was still the oddity that came with different professors.

Transfiguration and Charms were the easiest. He had done well in them the first time around and he still had the same teachers for the subjects, so there wasn't too much change. Unlike his first few years at Hogwarts, he wasn't holding back as much in classes, trying to disguise his older magic. Usually, he just pattered around until someone else successfully cast the spell, usually Hermione though not always, and then he would cast it as well. This had the added benefit of keeping him from being assigned extra classwork like the students who failed to cast the spells on the first try.

Potions and History of Magic were slightly more complicated. History of Magic had always been boring and while Regulus did a passable job the first time around, he had almost instantly forgotten everything he learned before and he just didn't have the drive to relearn it. Hermione seemed to be the only one who ever bothered to pay attention, he had no idea how any of the other students were even passing the class.

Potions, as well, had never been his best subject, though he did well enough. However, with Snape as a teacher, the class periods were always all over the place as far as quality went. Sometimes Snape seemed extremely invested in teaching them, walking around the class and giving feedback. Other times, he seemed to forget that he had other students beyond Neville, whom he had quickly begun focusing all his attention on.

On those days, there would be far more explosions than normal, usually coming from Seamus's or Theo's cauldron. Regulus had no idea what Theo was like or what he kept trying to make in his cauldron, but it almost always ended badly. Hermione would always be in a bad mood after those classes as well, frustrated that Neville was getting any attention in the subject — even though most of the attention was largely negative, or at least extremely intense.

“Hermione, you don't even need the attention. You always brew the potions perfect the first time,” Ron would say as they left the class. They had this conversation basically every other week.

“Yes, well,” Hermione would reply, turning up her nose in annoyance, “Professor Snape could at least acknowledge that.”

Neville would stay late most class periods, along with Seamus and Theo who were often forced to stay behind in order to clean up their mess. It didn’t matter anymore which one of them caused it, Snape would just assume they were both at fault and make them both stay.

“That Theo kid is so weird,” Regulus overheard Dean say once or twice. Regulus privately thought that Dean was just worried that Theo’s antics were going to entice his best friend away.

Seamus and Dean had been attached at the hip since first year and even now they seemed to only talk to each other. They reminded Regulus a bit of James and Sirius in the early years, never one without the other. Both of them had perfected the look that kids got when they were sure, at any given moment, that they were about to get in trouble. James and Sirius wore that expression so often in their first few years at Hogwarts that Regulus almost forgot what they looked like normally.

Herbology was just as tedious as it was the first time around. Regulus did not like dirt and he hated the strong smells that came along with spending time in the Greenhouses. If he never had to smell dragon dung fertilizer ever again, it would be far too soon. James found his suffering hilarious because he was a cruel, cruel man. Almost every time Regulus left the class, James would appear, a mocking smirk on his face.

“Little lordling pureblood can’t handle a bit of mud?” James would say before laughing obnoxiously loud.

“You were a little lordling pureblood yourself, if you don’t recall,” Regulus would reply petulantly.

“Yes, but my parents let me play in the dirt,” James would say, knocking Regulus with his shoulder.

“No decorum,” Regulus would mutter. James would laugh and laugh.

Care of Magical Creatures was much the same as Herbology. A little boring and very gross. The Blast-Ended Skrewts were almost all dead by the time April rolled around, but the ones that survived were massive and disgusting. Regulus would show up to class after giving Ron, Hermione, and Harry a very long lecture about the importance of not listening to Hagrid when he claimed that something was safe.

All three of them would nod along and then inevitably ignore him once they got to class and Hagrid would request assistance. It wasn’t too bad in the off classes where they encountered normal animals, like the one where Hagrid brought out a bunch of nifflers, but the skrewts were highly dangerous.

“No, let him handle it himself,” Regulus would snap at them. Ron was the only one who listened most of the time, though even he would get wrapped up in helping Hagrid deal with the monstrous beasts.

The Slytherins were the only ones in the class that seemed to have any critical thought. All of them would hover several yards away, watching with bored expressions as half the Gryffindors tried to take care of the giant animals. Only once did a skrewt make a run at the group, but something about the hoard of Slytherins scared the beast off at the last second.

Regulus did not understand it, but he noticed Draco step back from the group as if not to draw attention himself, his face pale and unnaturally sharp.

Draco himself had become quite the irritant in Regulus’s life. After the events of the first two tasks, Draco seemed to be unreasonably focused on what Harry would be asked to do in the final event.

“I have already told you a million times,” Regulus would say, fully exasperated by the pointy blonde’s constant pestering, “he’s not going to do anything. The second task was a fluke, but he is going avoid the danger altogether for the third one.”

“And you’re sure? Do you know what the task is yet?” Draco would say as if he hadn’t just asked that exact question.

“Why don’t you ask your father if he knows?” Regulus finally suggested one time. “He always has insider knowledge, maybe he can tell you what the task is.” Draco pursed his lips unhappily but didn’t argue.

Honestly, Regulus had no idea how Draco kept finding him alone. Regulus was rarely alone these days, but it was like Draco could sense the moment he was isolated and he would choose that moment to strike. It was doing Regulus's head in. Draco’s worry was one thing, but his complete inability to admit that he cared about what happened to Harry was even worse. He was adamant that he hated Harry and that that was all he felt, even though anyone with eyes could tell that wasn’t true.

None of the Gryffindors seemed to notice that Draco was always sneaking around trying to talk to Regulus, or at least, they never said anything about it. The only two who seemed to pick up on it were Luna and Pansy. Luna was unbothered; if she was even curious about what Draco was saying, she never acted on it.

“I think he’s fragile,” Luna privately told him once. “He’s working very hard not to show it though, isn’t it?”

She had hit the nail right on the head, Regulus thought. Regulus didn’t know Lucius exceptionally well during his first life, but what he did know about him, did not reflect well on the man. He was stiff and angry, he thirsted for power in a way that few Slytherins ever actually matched up to. Mostly he was unyielding, cruel when he needed to be, conniving, and ruthless most days.

Narcissa was the same. She was understated about it, but she and Lucius aligned perfectly in attitude and behavior. How they had raised a son like Draco, who flittered around the castle obsessing over a boy and the possible danger he might face, Regulus had no idea. Perhaps Lucius and Narcissa had coddled him a bit too much. Then again, his own parents were cruel and ruthless in their own right, even more so than the Malfoys, and Regulus had dedicated his second life to keeping his ex-boyfriend's son safe and happy. Perhaps empathy skipped a generation.

Pansy, on the other hand, never spoke to Regulus, though she watched him with a curious glint in her eyes. After the Yule Ball, Pansy loudly announced to anyone who would listen that Draco was now her boyfriend and that everyone needed to back off and leave him alone. Draco seemed at best bored by this announcement, and at worst, he seemed outright irritated and embarrassed by it. Still, he didn't disagree with her, allowing her to tell everyone.

Regulus thought this might be the reason she was so aware of where Draco was at any given time. Anytime Draco would find and ambush Regulus, Pansy wouldn't be far behind, showing up ten or twenty minutes after Draco left, just so she could pretend to be doing something else while watching Regulus out of the corner of her eye. Regulus wasn't sure what to make of it.

Lavender and Parvati seemed to think it was because Pansy actually had a crush on Regulus and not Draco.

"She's always watching you, it's obvious that she likes you," Lavender said one night before letting out a only slightly mean cackle.

"I hate to say it, but I agree," Parvati added solemnly. "It makes perfect sense."

"I'm not interested in her," Regulus replied as magnanimously as possible.

"Good," Lavender said, her voice a little too sharp. "She's only interested in you because she wants to marry into the Black family."

"Lav," Parvati chastised.

"What? It's true," Lavender said but looked abashed.

"You're probably right," Regulus said. "Though the Malfoy family is not that different."

"True," Parvati agreed.

Despite that short conversation, which Regulus felt settled the matter quite well, Lavender and Parvati would bring up the prospect of Pansy's crush on Regulus every few times he talked to them. There was never much else to add to it, but they seemed to enjoy rehashing their opinions on the topic often.

Lavender had also started giving Regulus more and more romance novels now that he was actually reading them. She would slide him one with a hungry smile and after Regulus finished reading them, she would pounce, instantly asking him in-depth questions about the characters and the story, desperate to know exactly what Regulus thought.

It reminded Regulus a bit of how Hermione would talk about certain school subjects or S.P.E.W.; if anyone brought up a topic that Hermione loved, she would smile like a shark about to devour a giant fish before jumping into the subject like she was being paid to lecture about it. Regulus thought that Lavender and Hermione would probably get along better if they could find just one subject that they agreed on.

Instead, Hermione was highly judgmental of Regulus's friendship with Lavender and Parvati. She thought they were vapid and dumb, though she never said that much out loud. Regulus knew it just came from a place of insecurity so he never let it get to him. It reminded him of how he felt about Sirius and all his friends, he could never touch them, could never fit in with their happy friend group, so resigned himself to calling them idiots and hating them.

Regulus thought Hermione's feelings were made worse by the fact that the girls were very interested in Ron's divination abilities. Ginny was just as horrified by his friendship with them. Regulus didn't know Ginny very well, but that didn't seem to stop her from having very strong opinions about who he should and should not spend time with.

Divination, in fact, had turned into the Ron Weasley show. Trelawney would only teach for about twenty minutes before coming over to Ron and checking on his progress. Regulus barely paid attention to it, he was just glad that Trelawney had laid off on giving death predictions to Harry. He was pretty sure his hair was going to turn prematurely gray if he had to hear even one more of them.

Luna was not in Divination, though she was clearly very interested in the subject. Most evenings, she would find her way into the common room and ask Ron searching questions about what they were learning.

"Why didn't you take Divination yourself?" Hermione asked one night. Her voice always grew sharp when this particular topic came up.

"Oh, I'm not allowed," Luna said simply and then refused to elaborate.

Astronomy and Muggle Studies ended up being Regulus's favorite classes, though he was pretty sure no one knew that except James. Astronomy had always been a strong course for him given how obsessed with the subject his family was, but he found peace in studying the sky. He loved being in the Astronomy tower, often lingering there long after class was dismissed. James would always find him once he was alone.

"Sometimes I forget how beautiful it is up here," James would say nearly every time, always looking on in awe like it was his first time seeing it.

"I know," Regulus would reply because what else was there to do other than agree? It was one of the most peaceful places in Hogwarts. Although James always had to ruin that peace, at least a little bit, it was just his way.

“How many people do you think have lost their virginity up here?” James would ask, a smirk in his words.

Regulus, never one to be out-manuevered, would reply with something even more annoying. Something like, “I bet Snape lost his virginity up here.”

James would groan, throwing his hands over his face in disgust, and Regulus would cackle meanly.

“Why would you put that image in my head?”

“What? You don’t like picturing Snape naked?”

“No! Of course not, no one wants to picture that!” James would say, before pointing a finger at Regulus accusatorially and saying, “And you better not be either.” Regulus would laugh so hard that he struggled to draw breath.

It was a nice little routine for them. Every time the dance was a little different, but it always ended the same, both of them leaning against one another in quiet observation of the stars watching down on them.

Muggle Studies was the only class that Regulus did not have any friends in. There were so few students taking it that they were all combined into one and it was mostly made up of Ravenclaws and Hufflepuffs. He was the only Gryffindor and, of course, there were no Slytherins. Regulus, however, loved it.

It was probably the only class that actually challenged him. He suspected that this might be in part because Professor Burbage, while obsessed with muggles, was not actually that knowledgeable about them. Hermione was his only other source on muggles, but she often gave him corrections to what Burbage taught.

They were learning about muggle planes. At first, Regulus thought the woman was outright lying to them. There was no way that muggles had developed trains that could fly (Burbage’s words, not his), but apparently, it was true. Hermione had even been on one, which Regulus was equal parts fascinated and disturbed by.

“I can’t believe that you’re so interested in this,” James said one afternoon. Regulus had just left class and was walking in a mostly empty area of the castle as he worked his way back toward Gryffindor Tower. He had already pulled out his notes from class and was looking them over.

“Muggles are so inventive,” Regulus said with awe. “Wizards would never come up with something like this.”

“We don’t really need to though, do we?” James said, looking at his notes curiously like he was trying to parse out everything Regulus had written.

“I don’t know, international portkeys are such a pain, this might be better,” Regulus responded. James laughed quietly.

“It seems dangerous,” James said, sounding a bit uncertain.

“Hermione says cars are actually more dangerous than planes now, though Burbage said that thousands of muggles died while they were inventing planes. I don’t know if that’s true or not,” Regulus said. “Did Lily ever go in a plane?”

James’s eyebrows raised slightly. “I don’t think so,” James said with a tiny frown. “I never got the chance to ask.”

“Sorry,” Regulus said softly. He stopped walking so he could James in the eye. “Do you — do you ever see her?”

James shook his head. “I don’t know where she is,” James said quietly. “Where it is, I hope she’s okay.” Regulus watched him for a long few seconds.

“She’s probably with Harry, we just can’t see her,” Regulus said. James smiled, though his eyes watered slightly.

“Yeah,” James said. “Yeah, I reckon she is.” He was quiet as they started walking again, but after a few moments, he said, “Or with Sirius. I always suspected that she liked him more than me.”

Regulus couldn’t help the loud laugh he let out.

Defense Against the Dark Arts was the most stressful class in Regulus’s schedule. While Moody had calmed down some in regards to the way he was teaching, he was still unsettling. Regulus never went into class without ensuring his Occlumency walls were up. He didn’t know if Moody was any good at Legilimency, but he never wanted to risk it. He told Harry never to look the man in the eye just in case.

There was also the fact that Moody had taken to calling on Regulus in every single class period. It didn’t matter if it was to answer questions or to demonstrate some spell, Moody would always call on Regulus first. It was the only class where Regulus was extremely careful about his performance. He always made sure that he struggled with the spell a little bit. He didn’t care if it affected his grade as long as it kept Moody from being more suspicious than he already was.

Regulus kept trying to figure out Moody’s schedule, he knew he needed to steal the map back, but Moody was erratic and it wasn’t like Regulus could sneak up on him wearing the cloak given that Moody could see through it.

Near the end of April, Regulus was once again watching Moody. He was sitting in one of the alcoves near the Defense classroom pretending to read.

“Regulus,” a voice hissed. Regulus looked around. “Over here.” Regulus finally noticed a large rug that was hung on the wall moving slightly. He walked up to it and pulled it aside to find a secret alcove he had never seen before. Draco was inside, looking sweaty and manic.

“What?”

“Get in,” Draco hissed, grabbing Regulus by the cloak and dragging him behind the rug.

“What’s going on?” Regulus asked. Draco didn’t usually insist on such secrecy. Sure, he only approached Regulus when he was alone, but he would usually just walk up to wherever Regulus was.

“I figured out the task,” Draco said triumphantly. His face twitched oddly, Regulus thought he was trying to give a smug smile, but he mostly looked pleased.

“You did? How?” Regulus asked.

“My father told me,” Draco said. Regulus had not been serious about Draco asking his father, but he couldn’t deny that he was happy he did.

“Okay, what is it then?”

“It’s a labyrinth!” Draco shouted before covering his mouth and then speaking in a much quieter voice. “It’s a maze. There will be a bunch of enchantments and creatures that they’ll have to get by.”

“A maze,” Regulus breathed. He was trying to process everything that Draco had said, but Draco went on talking.

“I don’t know all of them, but I know there is going to be a boggart, an acromantula, and I think a sphinx,” Draco said. He was speaking so quickly that his words blended together. “My father said Hagrid is donating the creatures, so I bet he’ll add one of those terrible skrewts he made.”

“Yeah, I bet he will,” Regulus said faintly, feeling dazed. Draco’s smile widened even further. “This is — this is very helpful, Draco. You have no idea.”

Draco smiled proudly and then moved his shoulders around in a way that reminded Regulus distinctly of a bird preening. Draco was clearly trying to tamp down it and stop himself from doing it, but Regulus noticed it anyway. Suddenly, his smile fell and he looked deadly serious.

“Do not tell Potter I told you this,” Draco said. “And — and — and if he wins then I’ll make sure everyone knows you were cheating.”

Regulus threw his hands up in surrender, doing his very best not to laugh. “Of course, I’m trying to keep him alive.”

Draco nodded seriously, then swept out of the alcove and was gone.

the pensieve.

Chapter Notes

cw: there are a lot of mentions of vomiting in this chapter

Regulus immediately began preparing for the final task right after Draco told him about it. He made a list of all the creatures he could think of, the ones Draco had mentioned and any others that might be relevant, and started making a plan on how Harry could avoid, escape, or in desperate times, defeat each of them. Harry watched over his shoulder through most of the research, absorbing the information in a way he rarely did. Defense Against the Dark Arts was easily Harry's best subject, and he seemed to crave for more knowledge.

One afternoon, Harry was pulled away to go talk to Bagman about the next task. Harry threw him a smug smirk as he left, clearly, he felt good being ahead of the curve. Harry barely even questioned where Regulus had learned about the task, too excited to know things before the other champions. At first he wanted to share, at least with Cedric, what they knew, but Regulus convinced him not to. They didn't want people asking too many questions.

They had to have several conversations about Harry not actually participating in the task. Even though Regulus was providing him with as much preparation as he could muster, that didn't mean that Harry should hurry through the maze and try to win. His only task was to stay alive.

"Are there any more creatures that still need researching?" Hermione asked as she, Ron, and Regulus settled down in the common room.

"Well, I'm not really sure how to research the skrewts since Hagrid invented them," Regulus answered.

Hermione hummed, pursing her lips unhappily. "Yes, that does complicate things a bit."

"I guess he could just try to run away," Ron offered.

"True, but they're so fast now," Hermione said. "It would be better if he had some way to defend himself."

"Too bad we can't just go down and fight one of them now," Ron said with a chuckle. "Then at least we would know what to do."

"Somehow I doubt Hagrid would be very happy about that," Regulus said, though he laughed quietly as well.

“Why he’s allowed to keep creatures like that on school grounds doesn’t make any sense to me,” Hermione muttered. Ron and Regulus nodded. They fell silent as each of them began working on their classwork. Ron was trying to read his History of Magic textbook, but within a few minutes, Regulus could already see his eyes drooping sleepily.

Hermione was scribbling on a piece of parchment, copying down the notes she had taken in Ancient Runes so that they were easier to read. Regulus just felt burnt out, though he was trying to work through some of the reading for Charms, regardless of the fact that he already knew the subject.

When Harry came back from his meeting, much later than Regulus expected him to, he busted in through the portrait hole in a flurry of anxious energy.

“Crouch attacked Krum!” he all but shouted. Ron jolted out of his sleep, his snores abruptly cutting off as he nearly fell out of his chair in surprise.

“What?” Hermione asked, her hair had grown in size as she worked from where she had been anxiously pulling at the roots, and now it looked like a lion's mane the way it framed her face.

Harry was breathing heavily, looking distressed and frustrated. “Harry, sit down,” Regulus said. Harry rushed forward to obey. “Tell us what happened.”

“After Bagman told us what the task would be — which they built it on the Quidditch Pitch, did you know they were going to do that?”

“Yes, haven’t you noticed that they’ve been working around there?” Hermione responded. Harry shook his head.

“What happened with Crouch?” Regulus prompted impatiently.

“Right, well Krum asked to talk to me in private, and then Crouch came out of the Forbidden Forest and grabbed onto me. He was crazy, muttering about his son and his wife, something about Bertha Jorkins.”

“Bertha Jorkins?” Regulus asked, his eyebrows raising in surprise. Harry nodded so quickly that it looked like his head would bob right off his neck.

“Yes, the same as in my dream,” Harry said. “Or vision, whatever.” He waved his hand around frantically like he was trying to fend off distractions.

“Then what happened?” Ron asked, his blue eyes were watching Harry hungrily.

“Well, I went up to get Dumbledore since obviously, something was wrong with the man, Krum stayed behind to watch him, but by the time we came back he was gone, and Krum had been stunned. He said that Crouch attacked him.”

“Was Viktor all right?” Hermione asked. Ron rolled his eyes quickly, but Hermione didn’t seem to notice.

“He was fine, just annoyed. But Karkaroff showed up, and then Hagrid attacked him.” Harry had a bead of sweat running down the side of his face, and he brushed it off quickly, flicking the sweat onto the ground.

“Hagrid attacked Karkaroff?” Ron asked, alarmed and perhaps a bit excited.

“Yes, it was honestly scary. I’ve never seen Hagrid act like that,” Harry said, his eyes seeming to widen even further as he said it. Regulus could imagine that seeing Hagrid angry would be terrifying.

“I wonder what happened to Crouch. You said he mentioned his son?” Regulus asked though he wished he didn’t. He did not want to talk about Barty.

“Yes, but I think he was hallucinating, he kept talking to a tree like it was a person,” Harry responded. They fell silent for a moment while each of them took in what Harry had said.

“Maybe Mr. Crouch didn’t attack Viktor,” Hermione said thoughtfully.

“What do you mean?” Harry asked. His words were a bit sharp, as they often were when he felt like someone was discounting what he had to say. Hermione didn’t seem to notice, or she at least didn’t react.

“Well, what if someone attacked both of them, but Viktor only thought it was Crouch,” Hermione said.

“But then why would Crouch run off if he wasn’t trying to hide from Dumbledore?” Ron asked.

“I don’t think he ran,” Harry said, furrowing his eyebrows. “He seemed really weak, I mean he could barely walk — I don’t reckon he was up to disappearing or anything.”

“You can’t disapparate on the Hogwarts grounds, haven’t I told you enough times?” Hermione said frustratedly. “Honestly, I —”

“There is something else,” Harry interrupted whatever else Hermione was about to say. “He said something about Voldemort.”

“What?” Regulus asked.

“He said that he was getting stronger,” Harry said, his voice seemed to grow dull like what had just happened was finally sinking in.

All four of them were silent for a long moment before Ron said, “Well, you said he was out of mind, he was probably just raving...”

“He was sanest when he was trying to talk about Voldemort,” Harry replied unhappily. “He was having real trouble stringing two words together, but then he seemed to focus. He just kept saying that he needed to warn Dumbledore.”

Harry was on edge most of the following day. They had called Sirius to tell him what happened, and Sirius ended up lecturing Harry for nearly half an hour about the dangers of walking into the forest with random people. Harry was clearly frustrated, but Regulus was secretly glad that Sirius was the one to tell him not to do that.

Regulus didn't think he had ever seen Sirius act so sternly. It was like a flash from another life — one where Sirius never went to Azkaban and actually got the opportunity to raise Harry. Even with the way Sirius was clearly suffering, it was obvious that he cared for Harry fiercely.

At one point during the day, Harry wanted to go talk to Moody about Crouch, apparently Moody had been called to search the forest for the man, but Regulus was not about to let Harry talk to Moody in private.

"If he finds anything, we'll know about it," Regulus said. Harry pouted all through lunch. By the time they went to Divination, Harry was in a strop.

The classroom was unusually warm and muggy that day. The days were beginning to grow warmer as summer approached, though Trelawney never seemed to extinguish her fire. Regulus was barely holding on as he listened to Trelawney's lecturing. He could see that Ron and Harry had already lost their fight, and both of them had their eyes fully closed. Regulus was just debating the merits of sleeping through the rest of class when Harry flung himself onto the floor and began screaming in pain.

Regulus was up and on his feet in a second, taking two long strides toward Harry before kneeling down beside him. He could see the rest of the class gathering around, Trelawney looking openly intrigued, but he ignored them. Harry was rolling back and forth as if he was having a seizure.

"Harry! Harry!" he called, trying to wake Harry out of what was happening. Harry's hand came up quickly and began clawing at the scar on his forehead. The scattered lightning in his skin appeared swollen and irritated. Regulus pulled his hands away, trying to keep Harry from doing any further damage to himself. "Harry!" he shouted once more, and Harry's eyes finally shot open.

His eyes were unnaturally bright, the green so vibrant that it seemed to glow. There were tears dancing right on the edge of falling down his cheeks, his mouth pulled into a grimace of pain.

"What was it, Potter?" Trelawney said excitedly. "A premonition? An apparition? What did you see?"

"Nothing," Harry said quickly.

"You were clutching your scar! You were rolling around on the floor, clutching your scar!"

"That's enough," Regulus said sharply. Trelawney looked at him angrily, but Regulus only stared back at her.

“I need to go to the Hospital Wing, I think. Bad headache,” Harry muttered, slowly pulling himself to his feet.

“I’m going with him,” Regulus said, already gathering up his and Harry’s belongings. Ron looked worried, and like he might get up to follow them, Regulus just shook his head. Harry didn’t wait for him before rushing out of the classroom, but he was standing at the top of the stairs when Regulus climbed down the ladder.

“I’m going to see Dumbledore,” Harry said stiffly once Regulus was in front of him, before turning and rushing down the stairs.

“Wait, your scar —”

“I can get a pain potion afterward,” Harry threw over his shoulder. “This is more important.”

“Okay, fine,” Regulus said, rushing after Harry. They arrived at the gargoyle in no time, and Harry immediately started listing every sweet that he could think of.

“Chocolate Frog,” he yelled angrily. “Sugar Quill! Cockroach Cluster!” Finally, the gargoyle sprang to life and jumped aside. “Really? I was just joking,” Harry muttered. Once they reached the top of the spiral stone staircase, they could hear loud voices from behind the oak door that led to Dumbledore’s office.

It was Moody, Dumbledore, and the Minister of Magic, Fudge, arguing about both Bertha Jorkins and Barty Crouch’s disappearances. They listened quietly before they heard Moody say, “It’s just that Potter and Black want a word with you, Dumbledore. They’re just outside the door.”

“That’s freaky,” Harry mumbled just as the door opened.

“Hello, Potter,” Moody greeted before his magical eye settled on Regulus. “Black. Come in, then.”

Fudge tried, not very subtly, to question Harry before Dumbledore shooed both him and Moody out of his office.

“I wanted to talk to you, Professor,” Harry said quickly to Dumbledore who nodded once.

“Wait here for me, our examination of the grounds will not take long,” Dumbledore said before leaving Regulus and Harry alone in his office.

Regulus desperately wanted to know what Harry had seen, but he could tell that Harry wasn’t ready to talk about it yet. Nevertheless, he would hear it when Dumbledore came back, and there was no use making Harry tell the story twice. Regulus was looking around the office idly when he heard Harry speak.

“What’s that?” Harry asked. Regulus turned to see what Harry was gesturing at. It was a shallow stone basin that had silvery light dancing and shimmering out of it.

“It’s a Pensieve,” Regulus said. “You can use it to view memories. That’s what those silver things are.” He pointed to the silvery memories swimming along the surface of the water. Harry, without saying another word, bent forward to get a better look and in the time it took Regulus to blink, his head was dipped in, and he was viewing whatever memory Dumbledore had stored there.

Regulus groaned frustratedly. In order to pull Harry out, he would have to enter the Pensieve with him, and he did not want to go in. Regulus always hated Pensieves — not that he had used them that often.

When he and Sirius were very little, his father used to side-along apparate them all over the country. He would tell them that it was shameful to get sick while apparating and that he wouldn’t allow them to go to Hogwarts if they were still sickening up during the process. Regulus never had a problem with it, though he didn’t like the feeling of being squeezed, turned and stretched, he would never vomit. Perhaps he would be a bit sweaty and a little green, but he never actually threw up.

Sirius on the other hand was terrible at it. Regulus had a distinct memory of being six years old, Sirius was seven, and their father apparating them to their aunt’s house. Sirius mumbled something about being fine before he doubled over and threw up all over their father’s shoes. It was a nasty sight and their aunt, who was standing outside her house when they arrived, gasped like it was the most horrifying thing she had ever witnessed.

Regulus felt very smug and happy that he was able to keep ahold of himself. Sirius just glared at him, baring his teeth in that animalistic way he always did as a child. Regulus just scoffed and turned his head away while his father flung a stinging hex at Sirius, admonishing him for getting sick.

Now, looking back on the memory, he could see how awful of a person his father had been. It had seemed normal back then, all the adults in their family reacted that way, but now that he thought about someone doing that to Harry, he wanted to break something in half.

In retaliation for Regulus’s smugness that day, Sirius tricked Regulus into putting his head in his grandfather’s Pensieve. Regulus was very gullible, as many younger children are, and he trusted Sirius. He barely made it halfway through whatever memory he was watching before he had to rip his head out of the water, throwing up all over his nice wizard robes before promptly fainting in the middle of his grandfather’s office.

Sirius had left him there, and Regulus was punished for sneaking into the office without permission. Regulus didn’t use a Pensieve again until he had graduated from Hogwarts. Barty’s father had one in his house, though Barty claimed it had actually been confiscated by some man who was sentenced to life in Azkaban. They used it a few times during their work as Death Eaters, and each time, Regulus had to excuse himself to get sick in the bathroom. It was very improper.

That was why Regulus refused to put his head in the Pensieve in order to pull Harry out. He glanced over the top and saw a memory of a younger Dumbledore floating at the top. Regulus looked away quickly, just the quick swirling moment making him feel motion sickness.

Dumbledore came back only a few minutes later. Regulus looked up at him like a guilty child once he noticed Dumbledore watching Harry with a small frown.

“Sorry,” Regulus said quietly. “He just tipped his head in, I didn’t have time to stop him.” It was a terrible excuse, he should have gotten Harry out when he had the chance.

Dumbledore just waved his hand dismissively. “Ah, it is quite all right. Curiosity is a dangerous thing,” Dumbledore said before tipping his head into the Pensieve alongside Harry. A moment later, they were both back out of the water.

“Professor,” Harry gasped. “I know I shouldn’t’ve.”

“I quite understand,” Dumbledore responded.

“Harry, what was it you saw?” Regulus asked quickly. They were here for a purpose and Regulus was tired of waiting.

“In the Pensieve?” Harry asked, tilting his head to the side.

“In Divination,” Regulus corrected tiredly.

“Right, I — er — I fell asleep in class,” Harry said, blushing lightly while looking abashedly at Dumbledore who had taken a seat behind his desk.

“Very understandable, do go on,” Dumbledore responded evenly, though Regulus could see the light tug of a smile on his lips.

“I had a dream about Voldemort. He was torturing Wormtail — you do know who Wormtail is?”

“I do know. Please continue,” Dumbledore said.

Harry launched back into his explanation. Apparently, he had seen Voldemort receive a letter from an owl that told him that Wormtail’s mistake had been fixed. There was a jumble of other information, mostly that Voldemort had a snake he was thinking of feeding Wormtail too, and that someone was dead.

“Then he cast the Cruciatus Curse on Wormtail, and my scar hurt,” Harry said. “It woke me up, it hurt so badly.”

Regulus tuned out their conversation. He wondered who the Dark Lord had killed, but his thoughts kept drifting to Crouch Sr., Harry had been right there, what if someone had been after him? Could they have gotten through the forest? He would have to contact Sirius, see if he could move closer without being spotted on the map. Maybe he could search the forest, try and track down any unknown scents.

“You know the trial where you found me? The one with Crouch’s son?” Harry said, gesturing toward the Pensieve. Regulus shook himself out of his thoughts. “They were talking about Neville’s parents?”

Dumbledore's face was grim. "Has Neville mentioned to you why he was brought up by his grandmother?" Harry shook his head.

Regulus's stomach twisted at the mention of Neville's parents. He had read about their attack in the weeks of research he did after he first came back to life. He knew that Barty had been involved, and he knew that he died in prison, but he didn't like to think about it. It was like a broken bone, as long as he didn't bother it, he never felt the pain.

"Frank and his wife were tortured for information about Voldemort's whereabouts after he disappeared. The Death Eaters were very desperate to find him, many refused to believe that he was really gone. They thought that the Aurors were hiding him."

"So they're dead?" Harry asked quietly, his face very pale.

"No, the effects of the Cruciatus Curse are long-lasting and very damaging. It can destroy the nerves and the mind. They are both still in St. Mungo's Hospital for Magical Maladies and Injuries."

"Oh," Harry said before swallowing harshly. He looked horror-struck, and Regulus felt the same. He hated to think of Barty there watching a poor couple get tortured into insanity.

"The Ministry was under great pressure to catch those who had done it. However, the evidence was unreliable given their condition," Dumbledore said bitterly.

"So, Mr. Crouch's son might not have been involved?" Harry said slowly. Regulus thought he might pass out for a long second, gripping the back of the chair that sat across from Dumbledore. "His own father threw him in prison?"

Barty could have been innocent? Though he was guilty of many other things that happened during the war. But he could have been innocent of the crime he was convicted of? The thought made Regulus feel dizzy.

"Not unusual behavior for someone like him," Regulus spat before he could stop himself. Both Dumbledore and Harry looked at him with surprise.

"What do you mean?" Harry asked curiously.

"He's the one that put Sirius away without a trial," Regulus said. "He was gunning for Minister of Magic."

Harry's mouth hung open in shock.

"Mr. Crouch is —" Dumbledore said, looking far away in a terrible memory. "He is a complicated man."

"That's generous," Regulus muttered.

"What happened to Crouch's son?" Harry asked.

"He died," Regulus said. "In Azkaban."

“Oh,” Harry replied, though he looked thoughtful and a bit confused. They left Dumbledore’s office not long after.

Dumbledore gave them a last warning, telling Harry, “Please do not speak about Neville’s parents to anyone. He has the right to let people know when he is ready.”

the prodigal son.

Chapter Notes

i wasn't going to update until saturday, but here's a surprise new chapter

The sound in the Great Hall was deafening on the morning of the Third Task. They had prepared as best they could, and it was finally time. Regulus thought he might vibrate out of his skin with the amount of anxiety running through his veins. He was far more anxious than Harry, who seemed calm and unaffected, though Regulus could see a slight tension in his shoulders every few minutes or so.

Harry didn't have to take exams, and Regulus felt he had done about as well as he could have given the many distractions. Regardless, they were over now and could be put out of mind. Technically the other fourth-year Gryffindors still had the History of Magic exam left that morning, but Regulus had been given leave to take his early so that he could spend the day with Harry before the task.

In the meantime, Harry had been practicing a litany of spells, charms, and hexes while preparing for the task. He was probably better trained in Defense than most average seventh-years at this point.

"You remembered the amulet, right?" Regulus asked again for the third time.

"Yes, I have it already," Harry answered with only slight exasperation. He reached beneath his shirt and pulled out the necklace that they had retrieved from the Potter Vault last year. Regulus had mostly forgotten about it until James brought it up a few nights before. Regulus could have kissed him.

The owls arrived only minutes after they sat down to eat. Regulus grabbed his copy of the Daily Prophet from his owl, but before he even had a chance to look at it, Hermione had unfolded her copy and spat out a mouthful of pumpkin juice all over it.

"What?" Harry and Ron said at the same time. Regulus watched her spell away the juice, her cheeks flushing.

"Nothing," Hermione said quickly, not looking up even as she shoved the paper aside. Regulus raised an eyebrow before unfolding his own copy.

Harry Potter: "Disturbed and Dangerous" by Rita Skeeter was spread across the entire front page of the newspaper.

"Oh, great," Regulus muttered. He scanned through the article quickly. Rita Skeeter had written all about Harry's fit in Divination a few weeks prior, though Regulus had no idea how she had known about it. He wondered which one of their fellow students had told her what happened.

“Gone off me a bit, hasn’t she?” Harry said lightly, seemingly unbothered by Rita’s new attempt to slander him in the paper. No teenager should be that unbothered by their public image, Regulus thought.

“Why does it say that she witnessed Harry leaving class?” Regulus pondered. He read through the article again. Draco was quoted in it, revealing the fact that Harry was a Parseltongue to the world. Sometimes Regulus forgot how much of a pain Draco could be when he wasn’t being helpful, weirdly helpful.

“The window was open,” Harry said. “Maybe she heard me.”

“You were at the top of the North Tower!” Hermione yelled. Regulus tuned them out for a moment, thinking over that day in Divination. It was a pivotal moment, but in a way that Regulus couldn’t fully understand.

Since their meeting with Dumbledore, Harry had seemed a bit disconnected. He was very worried about the Dark Lord gaining power, though he didn’t talk to Regulus about it much. Regulus tried not to take it personally, but he couldn’t help the way that small rejection stung. Sirius kept him well-informed though. Apparently, Harry had been bringing a lot of his concerns to Sirius instead.

Sirius did his best to relieve Harry’s worries, but there wasn’t much he could offer given that they had little idea what the Dark Lord might be up to. However, he was very strict about Harry focusing only on getting through the Third Task. Regulus overheard him telling Harry one night that anything happening outside of the castle was not Harry’s concern and that he shouldn’t dwell on it. Regulus appreciated that Sirius didn’t want to burden Harry, and though he selfishly wished Harry would confide in him instead, he was glad that Harry had someone to talk to.

“Wait! We’ve got our History of Magic exam in ten minutes!” Ron yelled as Hermione took off out of the Great Hall.

“Where’s she going?” Regulus asked, having missed the entirety of their conversation.

“Dunno,” Ron said, shaking his head. “She just started mumbling about Rita.” He turned to Harry. “What are you going to do in Binn’s class — read again?”

“Yeah, I guess,” Harry responded with a half-shrug, still unaware of his surprise for the day.

“Potter,” McGonagall’s sharp voice cut in, “the champions are congregating in the chamber off the Hall after breakfast.”

Harry looked confused, the task didn’t start until that evening, and he was probably wondering why he would need to meet up with them so early.

“The champions’ families are invited to watch the final task, you know. This is simply a chance for you to greet them,” McGonagall explained before walking away. Ron left a moment later, hurrying to his final exam. Regulus stayed and finished his breakfast leisurely with Harry while the Great Hall slowly emptied.

“What family is supposed to be here?” Harry asked bewildered. “They’re not expecting the Dursleys to visit, are they? And anyway, I thought Sirius couldn’t come on the grounds.”

Regulus cringed slightly. “Yeah, that’s true. I’m planning to steal the map back once you enter the maze. I think Moody keeps it in his office most of the time. I doubt he’ll have it on him during the event. Then Sirius can be there when it’s over.”

Regulus had originally thought that Moody was keeping the map on him at all times, and in his growing desperation approaching the third task, he had tried multiple times to summon it from the man, but it never came. He had had to enlist the Weasley twins several times to distract Moody, and he was pretty sure that he was single-handedly funding their new prank creations with the amount of money he was giving them.

It wasn’t until he inspected Moody’s office door that he realized the wards placed on it would prevent anything inside from being summoned successfully. It was difficult to place wards like that on a specific object, so it seemed most likely that Moody was keeping it safe behind his locked office door. Regulus planned to wait until he saw Moody at the task before heading to his office to dismantle the wards and steal the map. It was a huge chore just to get Sirius on campus, but Regulus knew Harry would be happier if Sirius was there after the task was finished, and Regulus would do nearly anything to make sure Harry was happy.

“Harry, come on!” Cedric said as he, Krum, and Fleur started heading to the chamber. Regulus got up with them. Harry was a tad slower to stand, giving Regulus a curious look.

Cedric and his parents were already hugging when they entered the chamber. Krum was in the corner talking in Bulgarian to his stern-looking mother and father while Fleur was holding hands with both her mother and little sister. It took Harry a long moment to realize there were other people in the room.

“Surprise!” Mrs. Weasley shouted.

“Oh!” Harry said happily. Mrs. Weasley rushed forward to greet him while Regulus stood off to the side. Bill Weasley, the oldest of Ron’s siblings, was with her. He was easily the most attractive Weasley, not that Regulus would ever share that thought. Lupin was behind them, towering over both of them, though Harry didn’t notice him right away.

Lupin had just returned that morning, sending Regulus an owl the night prior to let him know he would make it in time. He looked tired though, and clearly worn down. Regulus wondered when the last full moon was. He never remembered to track it.

“You all right?” Bill asked Harry easily, a bright grin stretched across his handsome face. Fleur, Regulus noticed, was eyeing Bill over her shoulder, her eyes sweeping up and down quickly as she took him in.

“Yeah, yeah,” Harry said cheerfully. He finally noticed Lupin, rushing forward to hug the man tightly. Regulus felt warm watching them reunite. He wished Sirius could have been there though. He felt bad knowing he was missing this, though he and Harry talked nearly every night.

“Hey,” Lupin greeted Regulus once Harry let him go and began speaking to Bill again. Harry seemed to light up under his attention, and Regulus had to keep himself from rolling his eyes. “How are you feeling?” Lupin asked kindly.

“As calm as I can be,” Regulus answered quietly. Lupin patted him twice on the back, a grounding gesture that Regulus oddly appreciated. Ron’s mother seemed to be partially avoiding speaking to Regulus, though Bill kept throwing him polite smiles like he was trying to include him without actively annoying his mother. He knew he made the Weasleys uncomfortable, though he wasn’t totally sure why now that they knew Sirius, his fake father, was innocent and not trying to kill Harry.

“Have you seen Padfoot?” Regulus asked, dragging his eyes away from Harry and the others.

“I didn't have time,” Lupin said. “I had to come straight here. But I sent him an owl.”

Regulus nodded. He opened his mouth to say something else when he was interrupted by Amos Diggory’s loud booming voice.

“There you are,” he said, glaring at Harry who just looked confused. “I reckon you aren’t feeling so full of yourself now that you’re in last place, are you?”

Harry tilted his head slightly, looking bewildered. “What?”

“Ignore him,” Cedric said quickly before Regulus could speak, he had already taken a large step toward them. “He’s just angry because of that article Rita Skeeter wrote — where she made it seem like you were the only champion from Hogwarts.”

“Well, he didn’t bother to correct her, did he?” Amos said loudly as he and Cedric left the chamber. Regulus had to take a very long deep breath to keep himself from hexing the man. Harry only looked befuddled.

They spent the rest of the morning walking around the grounds, enjoying the sun. Harry was clearly thriving under the attention, but Regulus could tell that he was itching to ask Lupin about his absence. He was glad the Weasleys were there to act as a buffer between them. Harry didn’t need anything else to worry about.

Unfortunately, this meant that Regulus also couldn’t ask Lupin about his trip given how closely Harry was watching them. They ate lunch with Ron and the other Weasleys. Harry sat between Lupin and Regulus. His face was bright with happiness. He nearly glowed with it. Hermione joined them halfway through lunch.

“Hello, Hermione,” Mrs. Weasley greeted stiffly.

“Hello,” Hermione said with a smile that instantly faded when she noticed the way Mrs. Weasley was looking at her, a cold expression on her face. Harry frowned, the joy from his face faltering.

“Mrs. Weasley, surely you know that Rita Skeeter lies in most of her articles,” Regulus said, perhaps a tad too sharply given the way everyone at the table turned to look at him in shock. “Especially about Hermione, who has been the target of attacks for months now because of what Rita wrote about her.”

“Oh, right, of course, I know that,” Mrs. Weasley said, stumbling through the words.

“I’m sorry you had to deal with that, Hermione,” Bill said magnanimously, though he was giving Regulus an odd look out of the corner of his eye.

“That’s all right,” she mumbled. Her gaze finally settled on Lupin who had been watching the proceeding with shock and interest. Her face lit up, a slight blush across her cheeks. “Hello, Professor Lupin!”

“Hello, Hermione,” Lupin said warmly. “Though I am no longer your professor, please feel free to call me Remus.”

“Oh, okay,” she said, blushing even brighter.

“What have you been up to since you left your teaching position?” Bill asked. He said the words kindly, but Regulus could see the way Lupin froze for just a moment.

“This and that,” Lupin answered vaguely. “I hear you’re a curse breaker?” Bill grinned and immediately launched into a long spiel about his latest case. Lupin listened politely, nodding along and asking questions when appropriate, but Regulus could see the tension around his eyes.

Regulus shifted so that he was facing Harry, turning sidewise on the bench. He knew they would call the champions down soon, and he didn’t know if they would have another chance to talk. “You still have the —”

“Yes, yes, I do,” Harry said quickly touching his fingers against the amulet that was resting below his shirt. They spoke quietly, doing their best not to draw too much attention to the rest of their group.

“Take your time, okay?” Regulus said. Harry nodded. “You’ll be entering last so the others will already have an advantage. I’m sure one of them will win relatively quickly. If you find somewhere safe to wait, do so, and only move forward if you absolutely have to.”

“I know,” Harry said with another nod, a light smile on his face like he thought Regulus was being ridiculous.

“You are not supposed to win,” Regulus reiterated. “If you win, I’m going to be mad.”

Harry chuckled quietly. “Yes, I’m aware. I won’t win.” Regulus gave him a long, searching look but Harry stared back without flinching.

“Okay,” Regulus said quietly, finally turning back to his meal. Ginny was in the middle of explaining a new hex she had learned to which Mrs. Weasley looked horrified. Ron and Hermione were bravely holding back laughter at her reaction. Bill and Lupin were still tied up in a conversation about Egypt.

“Ladies and gentlemen,” Dumbledore’s voice boomed at the end of lunch. “In five minutes’ time, I will be asking you to make your way down to the Quidditch field for the third and final task. Will the champions please follow Mr. Bagman down to the stadium now.”

Harry got up before anyone could say anything to him. The easy energy had fled and Regulus could now see the way Harry was shaking just slightly. The Gryffindors applauded him as he left, the Weasleys and Hermione all wished him good luck, while Lupin stood to walk him out of the Hall.

Lupin was waiting for Regulus when he walked down to the Quidditch pitch just a few minutes later.

“Nervous?” he asked.

“Harry’s prepared,” Regulus responded. Lupin continued to watch him. “Yes,” Regulus admitted. Lupin smiled briefly before it fell.

“At least he’s prepared,” Lupin said. Regulus thought he was making fun of him for a moment before he noticed the way he was watching the maze, that it was a creature all on its own, preparing to swallow Harry whole. Harry and the other champions were already out on the pitch standing in front of the entrance to the maze. “They’ve charmed it so that it’s larger on the inside. I wonder how long it’ll take one of them to win.”

“Hopefully not long,” Regulus said. He spotted Moody right away, standing near Harry but not speaking to him thankfully. “Accio.” Nothing happened. Regulus was almost hoping that he would have it on him this time, but of course, he was out of luck. “I’ll be back.”

Lupin nodded at him, already aware of his plan, and headed into the stands to take a seat. Once Regulus was out of sight of the Quidditch pitch, he took off running. He needed to make it there as fast as possible. He was panting heavily by the time he reached the office and had to double over and put his hands on his knees to catch his breath. He was in much better shape during his first life with Quidditch practice multiple times a week keeping him sharp.

The wards were thick and extremely complicated. Regulus wasn’t exactly surprised, Moody was an Auror after all, surely they were trained on how to create intricate wards. The surprising thing was the way the wards felt familiar to him. As he worked to untangle them, a bead of sweat starting to slide down the back of his neck, he couldn’t help but feel like he had done this before. It was like an unsettling form of déjà vu.

It took him nearly half an hour to get the ward down, and Regulus was exhausted by that point. Not to mention that he was almost certain that Moody would have some alert set up for if someone tampered with his wards. Regulus knew a lot about wards thanks to his research a few summers prior, but he wasn’t skilled enough to hope to sneak in without detection.

He shoved into the cluttered office and immediately spotted the map. It was lying open on Moody's desk as if he had just been looking at it before heading down to the task. Regulus wondered why he didn't bother bringing it with him. Who was he watching for? Regulus glanced over it quickly, checking that no one was in the castle with him, Moody especially, before pulling out the mirror.

"Sirius," Regulus spoke quickly. There was a shuffling noise and then Sirius's face filled the mirror. He was in the forest, probably as close to the grounds as he could get without being spotted on the map while waiting for Regulus to call. "I have the map. Lupin is in the stands at the pitch if you want to find him."

"Excellent," Sirius said. "There have already been some red sparks, I think one of the students was taken out of the maze."

"Oh," Regulus said surprised. "Okay, well, I'll meet you back down there."

"Sounds good," Sirius said distractedly before he disappeared, the mirror settling back into his neutral state.

Regulus turned to grab the map before a chest in the corner of Moody's office began rattling back and forth, a loud shout coming from inside it. He jumped in shock, the noise startling him. He watched the chest uncomfortably until the noise stopped. What could Moody possibly be keeping in there? He was almost tempted to try and open it, but given how unstable Moody seemed, he doubted he wanted to know what he kept locked up in his office.

He glanced down at the map, preparing to grab it and head back to the pitch when something caught his eye. There was now someone rushing toward him through the empty halls of the Hogwarts. Regulus repressed a shiver, there was something very unsettling about the way the person was moving, the way their name seemed to jolt left and right as they ran.

It wasn't Moody though. No, instead it was Bartemius Crouch. Crouch had been missing for weeks now, even Percy was under investigation for his disappearance. How had he managed to get passed everyone outside, everyone that was looking for him, and into the castle without detection? And more importantly, why was he headed for Moody's office?

Regulus thought that maybe he was coming in search of help, maybe he thought Moody would be able to offer him safety. Regardless, it wouldn't do for Regulus to be there, having broken into Moody's office when he arrived.

"Mischief managed," Regulus said, touching his wand to the map as he spoke. He folded it up and stuffed it in his pocket before heading out the office door. He didn't bother to lock it, Moody would know someone had been there regardless, there was no way that Regulus could replicate his original wards, especially not in the short amount of time he had left.

He was rushing down the steps outside the office and halfway through the Defense Against the Dark Arts classroom when the door flew open. Regulus pulled out his wand. Crouch must have been moving faster than he originally realized. He should have thought to bring Harry's cloak with him, but he figured he wouldn't have to hide from anyone. He looked up at the door.

“Of course, it’s you,” Moody spoke. Regulus’s eyes widened. Moody stood blocking the door that slammed closed behind him. Where was Crouch? He hadn’t seen Moody approaching on the map.

Regulus lowered his wand, but he didn’t put it away, he still didn’t trust Moody, but he didn’t want to point his wand directly at the Auror and accidentally escalate things before necessary.

“You were breaking into my office,” Moody said, his voice sounded vaguely impressed, like the mere audacity to break into an Auror’s office was something to commend.

Regulus sighed, putting on his best caught expression, trying to look both abashed and desperate like a fourteen-year-old in this situation should. “Fred and George dared me to break in,” Regulus lied quickly. “But I couldn’t get passed the wards.”

Moody’s face twitched freakishly, his eyes unreadable. “Clever,” Moody snarled. “But not clever enough.”

the third task.

“Sounds good,” Sirius said distractedly, already tucking the mirror into his pocket, Regulus’s voice fading instantly. He would see him in a minute anyway. He had been itching for the mirror call the moment Regulus told him his plan. He had spent all morning pacing the Forbidden Forest waiting. He transformed into Padfoot and took off. He wasn’t far, just a bit into the forest near Hagrid’s hut. He wouldn’t be seen here, but he was at least close enough that he could make it to the pitch quickly.

The run there was exhilarating. Not a single person was out on the grounds, all of them packed into the Quidditch pitch like a bunch of sardines, the noise coming from the area comically loud compared to the barren and silent grounds. He slinked into the pitch, doing his best not to draw attention to himself. It was difficult given his size, but he did his best, moving quickly and quietly.

It was overwhelming with the amount of noise and scents permeating the relatively small area, but he was able to pick out Remus’s smell almost instantly. He was very familiar with it, and very used to tracking it down. He followed it quickly, up into the stands to find Remus sitting next to Harry’s friends: Hermione, Ron, and Luna.

“Regulus was successful then?” Remus asked lightly. He tossed out a hand and buried it in the fur around Sirius’s neck. Sirius sat right in front of him, leaning sideways so that he was propped up on Remus’s shin. He missed him so much, it was almost worse than the time he spent in Azkaban, and he found himself breathing in his comforting scent over and over again.

Sirius nudged him on the knee, silently asking who the red sparks he had seen belonged to. He wondered if Harry had just forfeited immediately. Sirius wouldn’t be surprised if that was what Regulus had told him to do. It would keep him safe at least. He hoped Remus understood his question.

“It was Cedric Diggory,” Remus said helpfully, always in tune with what Sirius wanted. “They brought him through on a stretcher not long ago. I was going to go down and ask if he was okay in a minute or so.”

Sirius leaned his cheek up against Remus’s knee as if to say yes, let’s do that. Sirius felt a few small fingers brush up against the top of his head, and he lifted up to see who it was.

Luna was watching him a delicate smile in place. She didn't say anything, so Sirius just dropped his head back into Remus's lap, allowing her to scratch him.

About ten minutes passed before Remus stood, Sirius following close behind him. "I'll be back," he told the others who just nodded. They headed down the stairs and into the champions' tent. Cedric was lying flat on his back in one of the beds, his eyes closed tightly. Amos and his wife were sitting on the bed next to him, arguing in whispered tones.

"This tent is for champions only," Karkaroff said gruffly. He had his wand drawn for some reason, though he was holding it low next to his hip. Sirius growled loudly, and Karkaroff's nervous eyes flitted down to Sirius's face.

"We just came to check on Cedric," Remus said easily, brushing his fingers against the top of Sirius's head to calm him. "He is an ex-student of mine."

"You're Professor Lupin?" Mrs. Diggory asked. She had stood up from where she was sitting and walked over silently without Sirius noticing.

"I am," Remus replied politely with a small nod.

"Cedric mentioned you, he said you were the best Defense Against the Dark Arts teacher he'd ever had," she said kindly.

Sirius could practically smell Remus blushing. "Oh, well, that's too kind," he said. "Is he all right? We saw him taken out of the maze and just wanted to check in."

Mrs. Diggory's face did something complicated, and Sirius noticed her glance over at Karkaroff who was watching the conversation with keen interest. The smell of fear was heavy, rolling off of her in waves.

"Oh, yes, he's — he's quite all right," Mrs. Diggory said before clearing her throat uncomfortably. Remus looked over at Karkaroff as well.

"Is there anything I can do?" Remus asked.

"No, no, he'll be fine," Mrs. Diggory said, the calm, polite mask back in place. "But thank you for your concern, it is much appreciated."

"Of course," Remus said and turned to leave the tent. Sirius was unsatisfied, nudging Remus the entire time out to get him to go back and ask again. "Stop nudging me, you daft thing," Remus whispered quietly.

Quite rude, Sirius thought, given that they had barely spoken in nearly two months. He huffed unhappily.

"They're not going to say anything with Karkaroff in the room, and I can't very well make him leave, can I?" Remus explained quickly before turning away. "Albus!"

Sirius hadn't noticed Dumbledore standing just a bit off from one of the entrances to the pitch, he had his hand clasped tightly behind his back and was talking in hushed tones to the headmistress of Beauxbatons, Sirius could never recall her name.

“Ah, hello, Remus,” Dumbledore said blandly. The headmistress turned away, her face twisted with a strain that Sirius did not understand. “And Padfoot. Good to see you.”

“Did something happen to Cedric Diggory?” Remus asked bluntly, speaking low enough that they wouldn’t be overheard.

“He has claimed that he was attacked,” Dumbledore said evasively.

“Attacked by what? I know there are monsters in the maze,” Remus said quickly.

“How you are aware of that is a mystery to me,” Dumbledore said with a twinkle in his eye, before his sober expression was back. “But no, it was not a monster. He says that he was attacked by another champion. Viktor Krum.”

“Oh,” Remus said faintly. “That’s very ruthless, but it explains Karkaroff’s reaction. Are they forbidden from attacking each other?”

“They are not, it is a competition after all, but he used the Cruciatus Curse on him. Cedric was forced to call for help as he was no longer able to move correctly and was in grave danger.”

“The Cruciatus — why would he do that?” Remus asked a bit too loudly.

“That is the question. Until he is returned to us, we do not know. Cedric will recover, and no lasting harm has been done, but it is concerning.”

“Do you think he would attack the others?” Remus asked. Sirius huffed again, the answer seemed obvious to him. If Krum was willing to use Unforgivables, then clearly he would have no issue using them freely on anyone that got in his way. “Are there any plans to pull him out of the competition?”

“I have attempted to do so,” Dumbledore said, frowning tightly. “But Minister Fudge has disagreed with my opinion. He sees no present danger.”

“I forgot Fudge was here,” Remus said. “He’s taking over for Crouch?”

“That is correct,” Dumbledore replied.

“Any word on that?” Remus asked tightly. Dumbledore shook his head.

“He seems to have vanished into thin air,” Dumbledore said. Dumbledore was distracted away from them a moment later and Remus and Sirius were left alone, both of them looking uncomfortably at the entrance to the maze. Sirius wished he could just run in and find Harry. He worried that he was out there with Krum on the loose. He didn’t even realize that he was whining quietly until Remus began scratching behind his ears.

“Harry will be okay,” Remus said quietly. “Regulus would have prepared him for this. He’ll be fine.”

Speaking of which, where was Regulus? Sirius would have expected him back by now, but he hadn't noticed him. He nudged Remus toward their seats, hoping that Regulus might be there with his and Harry's friends, having missed Remus and Sirius completely. Remus acquiesced, walking up the stairs.

Regulus wasn't there, but Remus sat down, so Sirius did too. His emotions were narrowed as a dog, much less complicated than they were as a human being, and though he had the ability to think critically in that form, it wasn't nearly as clear as it could have been. He kept looking around, feeling like he was missing something. Surely Regulus would be back soon, but every time he thought about it, his thoughts would zero back in on whether Harry was safe in the maze.

The event stretched on for a long time. Sirius couldn't be sure how long, but long enough that he was worried. Remus was worried too, he could tell by the way his leg bounced anxiously. Ron, Hermione, and Luna had stopped speaking altogether. Ron was running his fingers through his hair, pulling on the roots over and over again, his eyes scrunched up like he was being forced to look at something that was causing him pain. Hermione was biting her nails viciously while Luna was sitting as still as a statue.

After what had to be nearly an hour of time, Lucius Malfoy's son jumped to his feet startling the other Slytherins and Durmstrang students who were all sitting quietly. They weren't far off from where Sirius sat with the others, so he could see his face rather clearly. He looked like he was going to be sick, his face green and covered in sweat. He took off out of the stands like he was on fire, sprinting down the steps and running toward the exit.

"What's that about?" Remus asked quietly. A small girl with black hair jumped to her feet as well after a few-second delay and started running after Malfoy.

"Draco, wait!" she called, her voice high-pitched and sharp.

Ron groaned suddenly, bending forward to put his head between his knees. "Ron, what's wrong?" Hermione asked.

"Nothing," Ron muttered, his voice muffled. "Just a headache. It'll pass. It has to." He whispered the last words, so low that Sirius wouldn't have caught it had he not been in his animagus form. Remus stiffened beside him, clearly having heard the words as well with his advanced werewolf senses.

The crowd was silent as the minutes clicked by, the tension in the air palpable and uncomfortable. Sirius was leaning heavily against Remus's leg, he was like an anchor in a sea of disquiet. Sirius noticed Karkaroff whispering harshly to Snape. Snape sneered at the man, before snapping something and shaking his head. Karkaroff's face grew pale with anger before he turned on his heel and left the pitch.

A few minutes later there was a whooshing sound and right in front of the maze was Harry holding the Triwizard Cup. He was curled around it like a child sleeping with a stuffed animal. He wasn't moving.

Sirius was up and running before he could even consciously think to do so. “Harry,” Remus shouted behind him, the noise nearly drowned out by the torrent of sounds that erupted upon Harry’s arrival. Sirius sprinted toward Harry’s still form, moving so quickly that no one was even close to him by the time he arrived.

He hunched over Harry’s sniffing him and nudging him. He smelled alive, but there was a rotten scent drifting off his clothes and skin. And blood. He could smell blood. Harry was bleeding. Harry curled in on himself even further, gripping the Cup tighter against his chest.

“Harry. Harry!” Remus’s voice was suddenly above them. He had run out to Harry as well, though a bit slower than Sirius was able to. He kneeled next to the boy, reaching out to lightly touch his face. Harry turned his head very slowly, his hazy eyes blinking open.

“He’s back,” Harry whispered. “He’s back. Voldemort.”

“What?” Remus breathed. Sirius wiggled closer, dislodging the cup from Harry’s fingers and replacing it with his own body. Harry buried his fingers into his fur, his hands shaking slightly.

“What did he say?” Dumbledore said faintly.

“He’s back. Regulus told me not to win. It’s my fault that he’s back,” Harry said, he stared up unseeingly at Dumbledore’s worried face.

“Harry, no, it’s okay,” Remus said quietly.

“What’s going on?” Fudge yelled. He was frowning down at them.

“Okay, let’s go into the champions’ tent,” Remus said.

“No, you don’t understand! You’re not listening.” It was odd to hear someone yell while they were lying on the ground cuddling a giant dog.

“I am,” Remus said placatingly. “But there are a lot of people here. Let’s get you out of the public eye.”

Harry scrunched up his face, and Sirius couldn’t tell if he was about to argue again, or if he might start crying when he relaxed slightly and nodded. “Where is Regulus?” he whispered.

Sirius froze. Regulus. He had been so distracted, he had been so focused on Harry. Where was Regulus? He had never come back.

“Can you alert the professors to pull Ms. Delacour and Mr. Krum out of the maze?”

Dumbledore said to Hagrid who had just walked up. He, like many of the other professors, had been patrolling the outside of the maze.

“O’ course, Professor Dumbledore, Sir,” Hagrid said. “Congratulations, Harry,” he added before stomping off.

“I think Krum was imperiused,” Harry muttered.

Remus shifted down, put his hands under Harry’s arms, and lifted him to his feet. Harry was unsteady, but he stayed standing up. Sirius glued himself to his side until they made it into the champions’ tent.

“Is it over?” Mrs. Diggory asked frantically.

“It is,” Remus said. “Would you mind giving us a moment?”

“Oh — oh,” she said, looking at Harry who was pale and distraught-looking. “Of course. Amos, let’s step outside.”

The moment they were alone, just Remus, Harry, Sirius, and Dumbledore, Sirius transformed. Cedric was still unconscious and Sirius wasn’t worried about being spotted.

“Where is Regulus? Has anyone seen him?” Sirius asked instantly. Remus tried to guide Harry over to the bed.

“He’s not here?” Harry asked, pulling away from Remus, his eyes wide with terror.

“He went to —” Sirius eyed Dumbledore for a moment before giving in. “He was breaking into Moody’s office. He had to get something back from him so that I could be here.”

“Where is Moody?” Remus asked, though, by the look on his face, he had just realized something horrible.

“He said he needed to check on something. He hasn’t been back,” Dumbledore said, his frown deepening even further. Moody was gone, most likely back to his office where Regulus was. Regulus had never come back. Moody, the madman, had him.

“Sirius,” Remus said quietly. “I’m sorry. I didn’t realize he had left. I would have warned him. I’m sorry.”

Sirius felt like he might be sick. Harry’s already shaky legs gave out beneath him, but Remus was there to hold him upright.

“I think you should take Mr. Potter here to the Hospital Wing,” Dumbledore said. “We can talk more there.”

“No, I want to —” Harry started to say.

Sirius didn’t wait to hear what he wanted. Remus would watch out for Harry and together they would figure out what happened. For now, Sirius had to find Regulus, he needed to make sure he was okay. He transformed back into Padfoot before leaving the tent. Cedric’s parents were right outside, whispering to each other. Mrs. Diggory yelped in surprise when Padfoot ran past her.

He ran as hard as he could, sprinting up to the castle. It was still empty, no one in sight, as he made his way up to the Defense Against the Dark Arts classroom. Only a corridor away, an awful smell filled his nostrils. It was like something rotting, but as if someone had tried to cover the smell with the scent of flowers. The mixture made him gag.

He transformed back, freezing in place. He couldn't bear to smell that as Padfoot. It was too much. He felt dizzy all of a sudden. What if Regulus was hurt? What if Moody had done something to him? Regulus had been complaining about the way Moody watched him, about the way he treated students who had "Death Eater" parents, and Regulus had broken into his office just so Sirius could be on the grounds.

Why did he do that? It was so stupid. Sirius was so stupid. Why didn't he tell him not to? He swallowed harshly and drew his wand, slowly walking toward the silent classroom. He couldn't smell the rot as he could before, but the moment he opened the door, another scent hit him square in the face.

He spotted Regulus immediately. He was lying in the middle of the room on his back, his eyes closed. He'd been tortured, Sirius realized as he took him in. That was the only explanation for why he would have lost control of his faculties. That's what the smell was then. Sirius kneeled next to him, his eyes never straying from Regulus's blank face.

"Regulus? Regulus, can you hear me?" Sirius whispered. Regulus did not respond. He checked for a pulse, it was faint, but it was there. He watched Regulus take a shuttering breath. "Enervate."

Regulus groaned so quietly that Sirius almost didn't hear him. "Please," he rasped. His eyes never opened and right after he spoke, his breathing deepened again. He was too weak to awaken. Sirius needed to get him help.

He stood up, preparing to lift Regulus, when something caught his eye. The room itself was disheveled as if there had been a fight, desks knocked over and two of them broken. What had happened here? More than that, Regulus wasn't alone in the room. He hadn't noticed when he was so focused on his little brother, but on the other side of the room lay another body.

Sirius couldn't see who it was at first, he inched closer, wondering if he should just take Regulus out of the room and come back to check, but what if this person was a threat? He took a steadying breath.

"Expecto Patronum," he said, the memory of his first Christmas at the Potters' flowing through him like sunlight. Padfoot leaped from his wand. "Go get Dumbledore, tell him his assistance is needed in the Defense Classroom." Padfoot spun in a circle before leaping off, disappearing through a wall.

Sirius turned back to the other person in the room. He could only really see their legs from this angle, but they didn't appear to be moving. He inched forward uncertainly, feeling as if something might jump out at him.

"Hello?" he called. There was no reply. He took a deep breath and stepped out around a desk that blocked his view.

The first thing he saw was blood. A lot of blood. He almost couldn't see their body because of how much blood there was. He took a step forward, muttering to himself, "Don't be a coward." When he stepped closer, he realized it wasn't just blood he was seeing. The entire chest cavity of the person looked like it had been torn open. It was as if someone had hit the person with a blasting curse from the inside.

Sirius covered his mouth and nose with his hand, but he couldn't look away. He stepped just a bit closer and was finally able to make out the person's face. He was very obviously dead, his eyes wide and vacant. Sirius stared at the man for a long moment. He was sure that he recognized him, but he couldn't place him at first.

He stared and stared and finally, it clicked.

"Barty."

Chapter End Notes

i saved that stupid fucking hufflepuff, aren't you happy? (i have no reason to be this antagonistic) the disbelief.

“No, I want to —” Harry started to say but Sirius didn’t stay to hear him. Remus caught the look Sirius threw his way, the look that said I have to find, Regulus. Please take care of Harry. Remus nodded solemnly, though Sirius wasn’t watching him long enough to see it.

“Let’s get to the Hospital Wing,” Remus said gently. Harry turned a vicious glare on him, and Remus had to work not to recoil. Harry was distraught and upset, he wouldn’t be intentionally cruel. “Wherever Regulus is, Sirius will bring him to the Hospital Wing.”

Harry’s shoulders dropped, the slight tremble returning to his hands. “He’s going to be so mad at me,” Harry muttered, hanging his head in shame.

“He will be very glad that you’re alive and that you’re safe,” Remus corrected. “Come on. Let’s go, then you can tell me what happened.”

His heart raced in his chest as they walked together. He put an arm around Harry’s shoulders, just a reminder that he was there with him, that he wasn’t alone. Harry immediately leaned into his side and the two of them walked together in silence. Dumbledore let them go alone, pulling away to talk to the other judges.

“Oh, Harry, is it over then?” Madam Pomfrey asked when they walked into the Wing. She looked frazzled. The nurse’s cap on her head was tilted to the side, her usually neat hair frizzing outward.

“Can we get a calming draught, please?” Remus asked. “And Harry has a wound on his arm.”

Madam Pomfrey nodded immediately, gesturing over to the bed closest to the door. Harry didn’t speak or even react as she cleaned and wrapped his forearm in gauze. Remus looked around the Wing. There was only one bed occupied in the farthest corner of the room. Remus hadn’t noticed it at first, but there was a tuft of white hair sticking out from the top of the blankets.

Next to the bed sat Pansy Parkinson. Her face was streaked with drying tears, but she was looking up at Remus with resolve like she was expecting to be challenged. It was no doubt Draco Malfoy lying next to her, but Remus had no idea what might have happened to the boy.

Remus wondered how long it would take Sirius to find Regulus. He wished he had thought to ask for the mirror. He felt like he was in limbo.

Madam Pomfrey walked off to get something from her office, and Remus took a seat in the conjured chair next to his bed. Harry was staring blankly at his stretched-out legs. Remus wondered how long it would be before Harry’s friends arrived from the pitch. It couldn’t be very long.

“Harry,” Remus said. Harry didn’t respond. “Harry, can you tell me what happened?”

Harry finally looked up at him, but the moment they made eye contact, his eyes filled with tears, his face scrunching up in the beginnings of a sob.

“Oh, Harry,” Remus said softly. He moved so that he was sitting on the edge of the bed instead, and wrapped his arms around Harry, pulling him into a hug. Harry dug his fingers into Remus’s clothing, gripping him tightly like he was afraid if he let go, Remus might be ripped away.

“Regulus told me not to win,” Harry said miserably.

“It’s okay,” Remus said. “Just tell me what happened.”

Harry pulled back slightly, wiping off his face with the un-torn sleeve of his dirty shirt. “The cup was a Portkey,” Harry said finally. “It took me to a graveyard. Voldemort was there.”

Remus squeezed his shoulders. “How?” he asked, not meaning to let the words out. His heart raced at the thought of Voldemort, the man who had murdered his friends, who had killed Harry’s parents. He knew that he would be back, the knowledge of the Horcruxes weighed heavily on his shoulders, but he hadn’t thought it would be so soon.

Harry shook his head. “They made a potion, using my blood, and he got his body back,” Harry said.

“Who is we?” Remus asked.

“Voldemort and Wormtail,” Harry said, looking down at his hands which were now cradled in his lap.

“Peter?” Remus asked, his chest clenching painfully. He suddenly felt like the last full moon hadn’t actually gone, as if he might transform in the middle of the Hospital Wing against his will. The control against his building rage was hard won, but he thankfully managed not to lose his cool.

“Your eyes,” Harry said faintly, staring at Remus’s face.

Remus blinked several times. “Ignore them. What happened next?”

Harry shook his head as if to clear it. “Voldemort called the Death Eaters and then we... dueled.”

“You dueled Voldemort?” Remus asked. His hands tightened around Harry’s shoulders again. He consciously loosened them, not wanting to hurt him.

Harry nodded. “He tried to torture me.” The words were choked out with a whine. “But it didn’t work.” He reached for something beneath his shirt and pulled out a black amulet. It was cracked down the middle, the magical light within it had already faded.

“I’m so sorry,” Remus said, his throat tight.

“I got away. My wand — my wand did something funny, and I saw my mum. She came out of his wand,” Harry said, his eyes far away in a memory.

“You saw Lily?” Remus asked. Harry nodded. “Is that how you got away?”

Harry nodded again, smiling slightly. “She was able to hold him off, and I accioed the cup. It brought me back to the pitch.”

“I’m so glad you’re okay,” Remus mumbled helplessly, hugging Harry to him again. Harry slumped against him, burying his head in Remus’s shoulder.

“Harry! Is he okay? What’s going on?” Hermione’s voice came echoing through the mostly empty Wing. Remus looked up at her, Harry pulling away. Madam Pomfrey came back out of her office, Remus just now realizing that she had left to give them a moment.

Remus stepped back as he was swarmed by his three friends. They wrapped around Harry like a protective shield. Molly Weasley and her son Bill entered just a second after the three children arrived. Fred and George Weasley along with Ginny brung up the rear and shut the doors behind them.

“Miss Parkinson, you may go,” Madam Pomfrey said as she shuffled through the Wing. Pansy glared at her, before standing up and pulling the curtains closed around Draco’s bed to shield him from the hoard of Weasleys. She left a moment later, stomping out of the Hospital Wing, her footsteps echoing loudly.

She had only been gone for a few moments when the doors flew open again. McGonagall came in first, her face stern and pale. Behind her were two floating stretchers. The first one carried what looked like Mad-Eye Moody, except he was much thinner than he had appeared earlier. He was also without his wooden leg and his magical eye was missing. The second stretcher held Regulus, also unconscious. Padfoot was with them, walking right next to Regulus’s floating stretcher like the guard dog he was.

“What happened?” Harry asked sharply, already standing up.

Madam Pomfrey bustled over to McGonagall as she slowly lowered the stretcher onto beds on opposite sides of the room, the stretchers vanishing once both Moody and Regulus were lying on top of the mattresses. Harry ran over to Regulus before Remus could stop him, not that he wanted to. He was over there as well, leaning over Regulus’s prone form. He stank of cleaning charms as if someone had cast scourgify on him several times before bringing him to the infirmary.

“There are too many people in my Hospital Wing,” Madam Pomfrey said sharply after she finished whispering to McGonagall. “Everyone except my patients needs to leave.”

McGonagall was already leaving as she spoke, looking like a woman on a mission. The Weasleys and Harry's friends looked stricken and torn. Harry gave them a small, uncomfortable grimace as an apology as they all slowly started drifting out of the Hospital Wing with promises to talk to him first thing in the morning. Remus didn’t move, and neither did Sirius, though Madam Pomfrey said nothing, moving to attend to Moody who was talking to her in a low voice, having been woken up by the noise of her dismissal.

“What happened?” Harry asked again, looking at Sirius. Sirius didn’t move or react for a second, but finally, the Hospital Wing doors closed for the last time, and he transformed back into his human form. Remus looked over at Moody uncertainly, but the man seemed completely unbothered by the appearance of Sirius.

“Regulus was attacked,” Sirius said, his voice devoid of emotion. Remus wanted to hold him, but he couldn’t make himself move. He doubted his affection would be well received at the moment anyway.

“Is he going to be okay?” Harry asked frantically.

Sirius waited just a beat too long before responding, “I’m sure he’ll be fine.” It wasn’t convincing, and Harry immediately crumbled.

“Do you know what spells were used on him?” Madam Pomfrey asked as she came over, Moody now sleeping peacefully in his bed.

Sirius looked at Harry for a moment before turning to Pomfrey. “Harry, let’s give them a moment to talk,” Remus said gently.

“No! I want to know what happened. Who attacked him? Was it him?” Harry turned his ruthless glare on Moody’s sleeping form.

“No — no, it wasn’t him,” Sirius said quickly like he expected Harry to just pull out his wand and hex the ex-Auror on the spot. He probably would if he got the chance, Remus realized. Remus looked at Sirius questioningly. If not Moody, then who could have attacked him? “I’ll explain in a moment, okay?” he said imploringly.

Harry looked deeply unhappy and borderline distressed with the request but ultimately acquiesced and went back to his bed. Remus went with him. He wanted to hear what Sirius had to say too, but Harry needed to not be left alone, especially after what he just went through. Making sure Harry was okay was more important than hearing everything right that moment. Sirius pulled the curtain to separate them and cast a silencing charm so he and Madam Pomfrey couldn’t overhear.

Harry and Remus didn’t speak as they waited. Harry didn’t initiate anything, and Remus had nothing to offer. Harry, Remus noticed, looked extremely exhausted. The moment he was lying down, his eyes started to droop, though they would shoot open again as if in a panic every couple of seconds. Remus, without saying anything, reached out and grabbed Harry’s hand.

That seemed to do the trick because a second later Harry’s eyes were fully closed, and his breathing was already beginning to even out. Remus felt his own exhaustion settle into his bones. He was about as far from a full moon as he could get, the last one being twelve days prior, yet the bone-shifting feeling was still there. He had barely slept while in Albania, trying to make use of the limited time he had available. It was a fruitless journey anyway. He would have been better served spending those months staying in Hogsmeade and taking care of Sirius who looked gaunt and disheveled.

Sirius came out from behind the curtain after a while, rubbing his face tiredly. Remus watched him carefully from where he was sitting next to Harry's bed. Harry had begun to snore softly.

"Are you okay?" Remus asked. Sirius squinted, looking off to the side while he placed his hands on his hips. Remus instantly conjured a chair next to his own, and Sirius slumped down into it like a broken doll. Remus kept his one hand linked with Harry's and reached the other up to pull Sirius to him.

Sirius clung to him tightly, taking heavy breaths in through his mouth. Remus felt a zing of fondness slip through him. He could still remember the first time Sirius had done that, explaining to Remus that after he first became an animagus, he suddenly couldn't get enough of the way Remus smelled.

Back then, it had made Remus feel unsettled, he was so disconnected from his own wolfishness, and he was mildly disgusted by any display of animalism in anyone else. After their falling out in fifth year, and especially after they finally got together in seventh year, Remus finally understood that Sirius wanted to breathe him in like that because he loved him. It was the first — and only — time he had been glad that he was a werewolf.

He did it now again, breathing Remus in like it was the only creature comfort that could save him. His breath hitched as he did so though, his arms tightening and loosening periodically. Remus waited for him to relax before asking anything.

"It wasn't Moody," Sirius finally said. Remus hummed quietly, urging Sirius to explain. "The entire time. The whole school year. It wasn't Moody that was teaching them. He was being kept in a trunk in his office."

Remus pulled back just enough to see Sirius's face, but Sirius dropped his arms and sat back in his chair. Remus regretted the lack of contact. "How did no one realize?"

"He didn't show up on the map," Sirius explained. He was staring at one of the buttons on the sweater Remus was wearing, his eyes distant and unfocused. "The trunk he had — Moody made it himself — the inside is basically unplotable. I didn't even know that was possible, but it meant that he couldn't be seen on the map."

"Who was it then?" Remus asked. Sirius finally looked up at him, his eyes suddenly blazing with anger.

"Barty Crouch Jr.," Sirius said with a sneer.

"Junior?" Remus asked. "I thought — didn't he die?"

Sirius shook his head. "That's what I thought," Sirius said. "I remember him in Azkaban. He was so loud at first, but after a month or so he stopped screaming. That wasn't uncommon."

Remus cringed. The mentions of Azkaban always flooded him with self-loathing and regret.

"I remember there were mentions that he died, other prisoners talking through the walls about how his body had been removed. The dementors just buried him outside the prison walls."

"Then how?"

"I don't know," Sirius said shaking his head again. "We might never know. They'll have to exhume the body that was buried there — if there even is one." He was silent for a moment, clearly deep in thought. "Apparently, I'm not the first person to escape Azkaban though."

"Apparently not," Remus muttered. "Where is Barty now?"

"Dead," Sirius said harshly, clenching his teeth tightly.

Remus widened his eyes in surprise. "Did you?" he asked vaguely. Sirius shook his head. He was going to get a headache if he kept doing that, Remus thought.

"I wish I had," he muttered lowly. "No, he was dead when I arrived."

"How?"

"I'm not sure," Sirius said. "Dumbledore checked Regulus's wand, but he hadn't cast a single spell that would have caused the damage Barty had endured."

Remus sighed. There were so many unanswered questions. He felt like everything that could possibly have gone wrong today had gone wrong. He still had yet to think about the implications of Voldemort being back from the dead — or the half-dead.

"What happened to Regulus?" he whispered.

"Barty attacked him," Sirius said, squinting again like he was trying to control his tear ducts by pure force. "He tortured him. Regulus. He wouldn't wake up. Barty was with Bellatrix and the Lestranges when they —"

Remus didn't think about it, he just grabbed Sirius and dragged him back in. "I'm sure he'll be okay," Remus muttered right into Sirius's ear. "He's very resilient." Sirius let out a quiet, choked sob. "He already came back from the dead, he can recover from this too." Sirius chuckled wetly. It was the best noise Remus had ever heard.

Madam Pomfrey came out from behind the curtain then, walking swiftly to her office, before returning with a handful of potion vials, disappearing once again behind the curtain.

"How is Harry?" Sirius asked, pulling away again and scrubbing his face clean of tears. It was a move so similar to Harry's that Remus nearly laughed. He sobered though when he thought of Harry. He was far too young to have gone through so much.

"Traumatized," Remus said. "I don't know how he made it back, how he could have lived through something like that, and now..."

“Is he really back?” Sirius asked tonelessly.

“Harry fought him,” Remus said. Sirius gasped quietly, and Remus nodded in acknowledgment. “He says they dueled after Voldemort called his Death Eaters.”

“How did he survive?” Sirius asked.

“I’m not sure,” Remus said. “He says that he saw Lily, that she came out of Voldemort’s wand and protected him long enough so that he could get away.”

“Lily?” Sirius whispered, looking once again like he might start crying before schooling his expression.

“There’s something else,” Remus said regretfully. Sirius tilted his head in question. “Peter was there.”

Sirius looked like might start screaming, but was interrupted immediately when Madam Pomfrey stuck her head out of the curtain. “He’s awake if you’d like to speak to him.” Sirius stood up, but before he could walk over, the Hospital Wing doors opened, and he had to quickly transform back into his animagus form to avoid being spotted.

Fudge came barging in, Dumbledore close behind him looking uncharacteristically worried. McGonagall entered a second later looking enraged. Remus tensed immediately.

“Where is Mr. Black?” Fudge demanded loudly. Harry startled awake, his fingers tightening around Remus’s hand as he shook awake. Padfoot snarled deeply, his hackles rising intimidatingly. “Control your pet, Mr. Lupin.”

“Why do you need to talk to Mr. Black?” Remus asked stiffly, ignoring Fudge’s request.

“A man is dead,” Fudge said sternly.

“I do not believe that is quite fair,” Dumbledore interrupted to say, frowning deeply at Fudge.

“Not fair?” Fudge yelled belligerently. “One of your students murdered someone. We should be bringing him into the Ministry for questioning. I am only speaking to him here as a professional courtesy.” Sirius snapped his teeth at Fudge who jumped in shock, though he was clearly trying to hide it.

“You are not speaking to him at all,” Remus said, dropping Harry’s hand so that he could stand between Fudge and the silenced curtain that Regulus was laying behind.

“That boy is a murderer,” Fudge spat. “For all we know, he is responsible for the death of Bartemius Crouch Senior as well.”

That caused quite an uproar. McGonagall scoffed dismissively. Harry was shouting immediately. “He wasn’t even near us when Crouch was attacked. Regulus had nothing to do with that.” Remus bent forward to hold Sirius by the scruff of his neck, afraid that he might take off and attack Fudge.

Moody had been woken by all the shouting as well. “Mr. Black is the only reason I’m not still trapped in a trunk being tormented by an escaped Death Eater.” Fudge yelled something back at him that Remus didn’t quite catch. Sirius was growling so loudly that he could barely make out any words.

“Silence!” Dumbledore said sharply, his voice louder than Remus had ever heard of it.

“There are more pressing issues than Barty’s death,” Remus said when the others quieted in surprise.

“What could be more pressing —”

“Voldemort has returned,” Remus interrupted Fudge to say. Fudge flinched at the name.

“You-Know-Who... returned? That is preposterous,” Fudge said.

“What?” Harry said, looking outraged. “He’s back. I fought him.”

Fudge looked worried, but he let out a strangled and dismissive laugh. He glanced at Dumbledore who was watching Harry with a serious expression. “You can’t seriously believe that.”

“There was a Death Eater in the school,” Dumbledore said. “It is possible —”

“I am not going to believe that on the word of a boy who... well...”

“A boy who what?” McGonagall demanded.

Harry’s eyebrows lowered on his face into a flat expression of disdain. “You’ve been reading Rita Skeeter, Mr. Fudge,” he said, deadly quiet. Fudge’s face reddened hideously, but he looked defiant and obstinate.

“And if I have?” he said, before looking over at Dumbledore. “If I have discovered that you’ve been keeping certain facts about the boy quiet? A Parselmouth, eh? And having funny turns all over the place —”

“Look!” Harry interrupted. “I saw Voldemort come back! I saw the Death Eaters! I can give you their names! Lucius Malfoy —” Remus heard a very small gasp come from behind the curtain where Draco had been sleeping earlier. He was definitely awake now. Remus hoped he hadn’t been awake long enough to see Sirius in the Wing.

“This is nothing but a distraction,” Fudge said. “You are all just trying to protect Mr. Black from the consequences of his actions.”

“He didn’t do anything wrong,” Harry snarled.

“Regulus was attacked,” Dumbledore said. “For all we know he was just protecting himself.”

“Well, let’s ask him if that is the truth,” Fudge said, taking a step forward. Sirius tried to lunge at him, but McGonagall stepped in Fudge’s path before he could take a second step, her face white with rage.

“That is enough,” McGonagall said sternly. “I will not allow you to question one of my students while he is recovering from injury.”

Fudge glared at her, and Remus thought he might sidestep her and carry on. His eyes flitted down to Sirius, who was bearing his teeth at the man. “Then he will be required at the Ministry. And I will be keeping his wand. The Aurors —”

“You can’t keep his wand, he needs it,” Harry said.

“He will have to make do,” Fudge said. “I cannot risk him endangering the rest of the students.” Fudge turned quickly and left the Hospital Wing. No one followed him.

“Mr. Potter, you should be lying down,” Madam Pomfrey said in the empty space that Fudge’s absence had left. Harry sagged slightly.

“I want to talk to Regulus first,” Harry said.

“We’ll make sure he rests right after that,” Remus said. Madam Pomfrey gave him a measured look but finally nodded.

“Both of them need to rest if they are to recover,” Madam Pomfrey said. “For Regulus, he will need to be looked over by a specialist. I have a friend at St. Mungo’s. I can call them to come in the morning.”

“That would be excellent, thank you, Poppy,” McGonagall said tenderly. The two of them left for Madam Pomfrey’s office a moment later.

“Harry, I must ask —”

“Not tonight,” Remus said quickly. “You can talk to Harry in the morning.”

Dumbledore looked like he might argue for a moment. “Very well,” he agreed. “I need to attend to the other champions. Excuse me.”

Harry watched him go, before turning toward Regulus’s bed and walking behind the curtain. Regulus was awake and watching them, his eyebrows furrowed. He could probably hear everything going on in the Hospital Wing but would have been unable to respond even if he tried to with the silencing charm in place.

“Regulus,” Harry whispered very quietly before running forward to swarm Regulus with a hug. Regulus tilted his head so that it was leaning against Harry’s shoulder, but he did not hug him back. It took Remus a moment to realize that he couldn’t. It didn’t look like Regulus could move his arms at all.

It started with the dark. He was not sure if he experienced any moment of being fully gone. His final memories were a jumble of emotions that he could no longer understand. They didn't belong to him anymore. All of them spoken in a foreign language that James had never been taught. He thought he might have been gone for a while, but those memories, those moments, were stolen from him the moment the dark descended. He was not allowed to know.

James couldn't see anything, but he could feel. He wasn't sure how to describe it, but he could sense someone with him. It was like being ripped away from a nestle of safety and comfort, except that comfort came with a prison sentence and a never-ending span of emptiness. When he was ripped from it, he was jostled right into a hurricane of magical binding that he couldn't hope to understand. It was so beyond what any human man could interrupt, especially James, alone in the dark.

Through the madness that seemed infinite, he found one second of light, one guiding form.

"Regulus," he said. He hadn't spoken words in a long time, he hadn't needed to. These words were spoken without a body, without a form. He wasn't anything but wind. He was magic itself and that magic wanted Regulus to hear him.

"Regulus, please," he urged, his voice like a whisper, but without a sound.

"James," Regulus choked on his name. James couldn't quite see him, he was blinded by Regulus.

Regulus was a shepherd's light, a guiding star, and James was a man lost at sea.

He was nothing again, but somewhere, far away, he could feel the very core of his existence wrapped around something, tethering him to the world, to life.

The next moment was a memory.

"How did you find me?" Regulus asked. James remembered this moment well. He was full of righteous fury and impotent frustration that he didn't understand yet. Regulus had his back to James. He looked like that a lot, he always had in those days.

“I have my ways,” James said without meaning to. The words existed without him, spoken through his body by another, by his past self. “I needed to speak to you.” Regulus turned to look at him, taking in his stance. He could feel the emotions in his body, but they didn’t quite belong to him. It was like being possessed.

“Are we not already speaking?” Regulus said dismissively, his eyes bored even as he looked James up and down. The first time James lived this moment, he thought Regulus was judging him. Now James knew better, Regulus was checking him out and hiding it in plain sight.

“Why were you fighting with Sirius yesterday?” James used to wish that he had a sibling before he met Sirius. The way Sirius and Regulus tore at each other made James so thankful that he was an only child.

“Because he’s annoying,” Regulus replied. “Besides, it is hardly any of your business what we fight about.”

“It’s my business when he spends all day sulking because his baby brother is being awful to him. Hasn’t he already been through enough?”

It was a low blow, and James could see the moment the words landed, Regulus tensing up, preparing for more wounds to follow. James had been so angry at him, and in those days he had nowhere to put his anger, it went flying out at anyone he thought deserved it.

“What is that supposed to mean?” Regulus spat.

“You know exactly what I mean.” James advanced toward Regulus, his legs moving without permission. He was always trying to corner Regulus as if he could lock him down simply by being too big to move around. “How could you treat him like that after what happened this summer?”

“My argument with Sirius has nothing to do with what my parents did to him. You and Sirius are exactly the same. Always quick to compare me to them,” Regulus said. At the time, James couldn’t clock the defeat in his voice, now he heard it as clear as day.

“I don’t think you’re like your parents,” James said the words with shock, not because he was surprised Regulus accused him of thinking that, but because he hadn’t realized he didn’t think that. He certainly did the first couple of years Regulus was at Hogwarts, Sirius was very sure they were all the same, but something had changed his opinion. Now Regulus stood on his own.

“Whatever, it doesn’t matter what you think anyway. Sirius sees me as the same as them.” Regulus sounded so pathetic that James wanted to laugh, his pouty lip sticking out adorably. It was a cruel response, but he couldn’t help it. He was glad that he wasn’t in control, he didn’t think this Regulus would appreciate his laughter.

James walked up to stand next to him, Regulus was looking out at the stars again, always so distracted. James would have given anything to hide those stars, he wanted to be the only thing Regulus could see.

“Why didn’t you tell him what you did this summer? Or at least let me tell him.”

“Leave it,” Regulus said with a warning glare. James practically melted, he could never fight that look.

“Come on, Reggie. Don’t you want him to know? I mean, I hate to say this, but he probably wouldn’t be alive if you didn’t get him out.”

The memory of James discovering Regulus and a very bloody Sirius right next to his parents’ floo hit him like a runaway train. He had done what he could for Sirius, letting his mother take over the moment she found them. After that, he spent nearly an hour in the bathroom sicking up, hoping to dispel the memory of how Sirius smelled as he lay half-dead on his living room floor.

“You said you wouldn’t say anything.”

“And I won’t,” James replied. “But that doesn’t mean I agree with it.” He always resented the fact that he couldn’t tell Sirius that Regulus rescued him. Though he understood it. Not at the time, of course, he had never been the most empathetic kid, but once he was a man, he understood.

“He doesn’t need to know. It’s better that he doesn’t anyway.” That signature Regulus Black pout was back. James wanted to sink his teeth into Regulus’s lower lip and draw out one of those sharp gasps that meant Regulus had already lost control.

“So what? You’re just going to keep fighting and bickering with him every moment of the day?”

“If I must,” Regulus said. “You don’t have any siblings. You wouldn’t understand.”

“Sirius is like a brother to me.”

“And that’s exactly the problem, isn’t it?” Regulus spat. “He’d rather be your brother than mine. Listen. Just because I didn’t want Sirius to die on the floor of my father’s study, doesn’t mean that I want to be best friends with him. Besides, he’s made it more than clear that he has enough friends without me ruining it for him.”

“You both are so stubborn,” James muttered. “You would both be so much happier if you would just try and speak to one another.”

Regulus let out a long sigh. “I’ll think about it.”

“That’s all I’m asking,” James said happily. He turned to leave, but as he reached the top of the stairwell, Regulus called out.

James spent the weeks after that conversation fantasizing about Regulus running away just as Sirius did. He would lose himself in the middle of the day thinking about which room Regulus might stay in. In retrospect, it was embarrassing how long it took him to realize he was attracted to Regulus. He just thought he wanted to steal both of the Black brothers away from their family. His heart broke for his younger self, knowing that his deepest wish would never come to pass.

He existed as a magical shield for a while after that memory. He drifted here and there, pulled by some force he couldn't see or understand. The next time he was aware, he was in another memory. If this was death, then he figured it could be worse.

"We have to stop meeting like this," James purred.

James had been watching Regulus's name hover in the Astronomy tower for a few weeks at that point, every night he would look at it, waiting to see if Regulus would make the long journey up from the dungeons, and nearly every other night, Regulus would. He tried to talk himself out of going, but it wasn't ever plausible. He needed just a moment alone with Regulus, and James — the only son of parents who loved him too much to say no — was very much used to getting his way.

Tonight, Regulus avoided the Astronomy tower. Instead, he ventured out of the castle, his name dancing along the bank of the Black Lake.

"Really, James? How is it that you keep finding me?" Regulus said, turning around to see James standing in the grass.

"I just wanted to bring you this," James said, sidestepping the question. He sat down next to Regulus, their shoulders only an inch apart. James handed over a sandwich.

"You just wanted to bring me food?" Regulus asked.

"I noticed you weren't at dinner," James said simply. Regulus rolled his eyes at him. "Actually, I've noticed that you are almost never at dinner anymore."

"Stalking me now, are you?"

Yes, James thought. He was. He had been. Regulus occupied an unreasonable amount of space in James's head, and anytime he might end up in a room with Regulus, he would look for him. He always noticed when Regulus was missing.

"Not stalking," James said slowly. "Just... looking out for you."

"Why? Did Sirius put you up to this?"

"No! No, of course not," James said.

"Of course not?" Regulus said with a derisive laugh.

“Stop that,” James said firmly. Regulus looked at him in surprise. “Sirius does care about you, he’s just... he just has trouble showing it.”

James had no idea how to explain that Sirius acted far more recklessly after he and Regulus had a fight. It was like Regulus was a grounding point for Sirius, and anytime Sirius was without it, he went barreling off the edge of the Earth. Remus seemed to be the only one who could pull him back, but Remus was compromised, in the throws of coming to terms with the fact that he was dreadfully in love with Sirius.

Regulus laughed. “It’s fine, James. I’m just messing with you,” he said.

“Right,” James said, “of course.” James paused for a long moment. “So why haven’t you been at the Slytherin table then?”

“Worried about me?” Regulus replied, looking over at him. His eyes dragged along James’s shoulders, down to his crotch so quickly that James almost missed it, before they snapped back up to James’s eyes.

“And if I am?” James said. His body warmed under the attention. He didn’t understand it, his poor teenage self.

Regulus sighed. “I just haven’t felt like spending time with my fellow Slytherins much, that’s all.” James didn’t like any of Regulus’s fellow Slytherins and had no problem with Regulus keeping his distance. At the time it seemed like an in.

“But you are still eating, right?” James asked worriedly.

“Yes, James,” Regulus said. “You guys aren’t the only ones who know how to get into the kitchen.” James chuckled.

“So,” James said after a long moment of silence, “what else is new?” Regulus looked like he couldn’t help the genuine laugh that poured out of him.

“We’re going to make small talk now?” Regulus asked.

“We can talk about whatever you like,” James said. He knocked his shoulder against Regulus’s. It was a friendly gesture, but James grew half hard because of it.

“And if I don’t want to talk?” Regulus asked. He looked out at the Black Lake, avoiding James’s eyes.

“Then we can just sit here,” James replied. He knocked his shoulder against Regulus again, but this time he didn’t move away. He just let it sit there. He remembered being in so much denial about his body’s reaction.

“Okay,” Regulus replied. All Regulus had done was allow James to stay there, but James remembered being happier than he had been in months.

The storm James lived in was growing weaker. When he was very young, he was afraid of storms. His parents loved them, would open every window in the house just to hear the rain, using magic to keep out any water. They would ask James, “Don’t you love the sound?” And James would tuck his lips in and nod, pushing away the fear that always rattled him when he heard thunder.

As he grew older, he learned to appreciate the storms, but he never loved them as much as his parents did. Now that he lived in one, he finally understood the comfort that came with chaos. The comprehension of how storms lived and breathed, how he was merely a grain of sand swaying in the power of the world around him. Storms were magic, and magical storms made all the sense in the world.

That’s why when the storm grew weaker, James didn’t feel safe. He wasn’t comforted by the thought of the storm passing. Instead, he felt the weakening storm for what it was, a drag back to the dark.

Like a flash of lightning, James was in another memory.

“Come to gloat?” James asked.

He remembered this moment so intensely. It was after they had lost their first Quidditch match of the season, Slytherin was just too good that year to even begin to compete with. It didn’t help that James was horribly distracted by watching Regulus fly. Add onto that the fact that he had a very salacious dream about him the night before. James couldn’t be sure if that was the first time he realized why he was so obsessed with Regulus, that it was actually because of his ridiculous crush, but he knew that by the time that Quidditch game was finished, he would do anything to kiss Regulus Black.

“Yes,” Regulus responded with false innocence. “That was truly a pathetic display out there.”

“I’m so sorry for disappointing you.” James’s voice was husky and deep, he had never heard himself speak like that before.

“Who says I’m disappointed?” Regulus said. He moved closer like a snake slithering through the weeds. “Maybe I like watching you fail.”

“In that case, I will have to lose more often, if only to impress you.”

“You would throw away the Quidditch Cup? Just for me?” Regulus whispered.

“If you asked me to,” James replied. After that, the conversation was lost as they finally kissed. James didn’t know that they had been heading there from the start, but now that his lips were on Regulus’s, he never wanted to give it up. He would do anything to keep Regulus right where he was.

He was torn out of the memory quicker than usual as if something jettisoned him out of place.

The first time James saw Regulus naked was a week before Christmas break when they went to the Prefects' bathroom together. James had taken all his clothes off without a second thought, jumping into the water like it was an outdoor pool. He turned to see Regulus watching him, his cheeks bright red.

"Come on in," James said cheerfully. Regulus carefully took his clothes off, leaving his pants on while he walked carefully into the water. It reminded James of someone trying to force a cat to take a bath. Regulus waited until he was fully submerged in the bubbly water before stripping off his pants and throwing them off to the side.

That was the first time James had the conscious thought of, "Oh, we're going to have sex."

James had no idea what sex between two men was like and he couldn't very well ask anyone considering all of his friends were very certain that he was still in love with Lily Evans. They didn't have sex that day, though James might have brushed his fingers against the skin of Regulus's chest, lingering downward as he watched Regulus's flushed cheeks, his eyes dilated and focused. James had gripped one hand around Regulus's, who was already hard beneath the water, and had pulled him off while he kissed down his neck. He fantasized about that moment for days afterward.

The first time they had sex was a few weeks later. James had spent the entire Christmas holiday distracted with thoughts of Regulus, naked and flushed. Sirius kept snapping his fingers in front of James's eyes trying to bring his attention back.

"What's got you so distracted?" Remus asked, a keen look in his eye.

"Nothing," James said quickly. Remus dropped it, but Sirius kept shooting him suspicious looks all break that James did not appreciate.

He and Regulus basically collided when they met up in one of the unused classrooms that they frequented.

"I want you," James groaned against Regulus's mouth.

"Okay," Regulus responded because he was never one to over-emote.

James scrambled to take Regulus's trousers off, leaving the rest of their clothes untouched as he turned Regulus around and bent him over a dusty desk. Regulus went willingly, the air knocked from his lungs as James manhandled him.

"I've never done this before," Regulus said quietly.

"Me either," James said. He lavished his tongue along Regulus's neck causing him to whimper softly, pushing his bare skin back to grind against James's covered cock. "Hold on." James pulled back to grab his wand, casting a quick lubrication spell that he had found in a book over the holiday.

He couldn't do too much research, especially not with Sirius, Remus, and Peter around all break, but he had managed to learn a thing or two. Mostly by breaking into Sirius's trunk while he and Remus were out on a walk and finding some very obscene muggle magazines that he was keeping in there. Sirius was such a pervert.

When James brushed his lubed-up fingers across the furled skin of Regulus's hole, Regulus jumped in surprise.

"I'm sorry," James said immediately. "Do you want me to stop?"

"No, no," Regulus said. "Keep going." It was too dark to see him, but he could hear the determination and lust in Regulus's voice. James wanted to eat him alive.

Regulus tensed when James pushed one finger in a little too quickly. James apologized again before reaching his hand around his hips so that he could close his fist around Regulus's cock. He felt like they were jumping forward a few steps, but that seemed to always be his modus operandi. Always jumping ahead, always pushing. But Regulus was pushing right back, caught between James's two fingers as he gasped and twitched with pleasure.

By the time James shoved his pants down just far enough to free his cock and pushed into Regulus, Regulus was so far gone that he was beyond words. He was gripping the desk so tightly that James could hear the wood creaking.

Regulus was so hot and so tight around him that he couldn't move at all for a long minute when he first entered him. There was a voice deep in his head saying over and over again, "Oh Merlin, I'm losing my virginity. I'm having sex. I'm inside Regulus." But James was doing his best to ignore it.

James didn't last long and neither did Regulus. The two of them collapsed into a tangle of limbs on the dusty floor, James kissing Regulus all over his face and lips for a long time afterward. Regulus was soft and pliant in his arms, so sweet that James thought he would never need to go to Honeydukes again.

Regulus left first, and James waited an entire fifteen minutes before leaving. He was immediately startled when he noticed Remus a few paces away, watching him.

"Moony, what are you doing here?" James said casually, or as casually as he could manage.

"I don't know what you're doing, James," Remus said softly, the curious look in his eyes the only indicator that he might be telling the truth. "But you should know that Sirius loves using these classrooms. You should probably find somewhere else to sneak around."

James choked on his tongue. "I don't know what you're talking about," James said swiftly.

"All the better," Remus said tiredly before walking off.

After that, they spent every intimate moment together in the Slytherin dorms. Regulus could kick his dormmates out with little to no explanation, and James would sneak in under the invisibility cloak, double-checking that he had the map on him every time so that none of the other boys would notice his name right on top of Regulus's.

That's where they were in this memory. James was spread out on top of Regulus, all his soft bare skin on display. James kept running his lips, tongue, and teeth along Regulus's collarbone, enjoying the way Regulus would squirm in his grasp. He was so responsive and so vocal despite his usually stoic nature.

"As much as I'm enjoying this," Regulus mumbled, his voice thick with lingering arousal, "I think we should probably wrap it up soon." James lifted his head to look at Regulus who was watching him with a soft smile.

"And why is that?" James asked curiously.

"Aren't you worried that someone might come in?" Regulus asked. "You know, like your very notable dormmate who just so happens to be my disowned brother?" James laughed at Regulus's snide phrasing. His lips were so distracting as he spoke, James couldn't stop himself from claiming them again.

Kissing Regulus was like taming a star, he was burned alive even as he felt Regulus fold into him. Regulus would just let James do whatever he wanted, and James had always been a selfish man. No one knew it, they all thought he was selfless, but Regulus knew the truth, and Regulus never objected.

Until he did.

"Wait," Regulus said. James froze. Regulus's tone pulled him out of his focus. "Let's at least lock the door."

James had no idea what he was talking about, his thoughts sluggish with lust. "Why didn't we lock the door?" He looked back at the dorm door. There was something off, but he wasn't sure what.

"I — I don't remember," Regulus mumbled. He kissed James gently on the lips. "But we forgot, didn't we? There was a reason we'd forgotten." James watched him for a long moment. Regulus's eyes were glazed and unfocused in a way that made James uncomfortable.

"This is strange, isn't it?" James said though he was immediately distracted by the feel of Regulus's collarbones under his fingertips.

"What?" Regulus asked.

"It feels so good to touch you," James groaned. Regulus was so warm and alive, James never wanted to move from the cradle between Regulus's legs. "I've missed you."

"Missed me? Where have I been?" Regulus asked confusedly. His face cleared for just a moment before he was kissing James again. The memories were so odd, almost like floating through a dream, but now it was like waking up. As if Regulus's lips were pulling him out of sleep with a gentle tug. It wasn't right, James realized.

"Something is wrong, right?" James said against Regulus's mouth. "Something is wrong."

“What could possibly be wrong?” Regulus asked gently, his fingers toying with James’s hair. It was distracting, so James reached up to stop him. “What?”

“Why are we here?” James asked, something finally clicking into place.

“What? In your bed?” Regulus asked with a chuckle. “I would think you would remember inviting me here.”

“No, I didn’t invite you here.”

“What do you mean?” Regulus asked, sounding miffed.

“To the dorm. I never invited you to the dorm. Why are we in the Gryffindor dorms?”

“I — I don’t remember, wasn’t Sirius busy with something? You were able to get away?”

“Right, he was sneaking to Hogsmeade with Remus. But we weren’t here, you never wanted to come here. We were in the Slytherin dorms.”

It was like every word James spoke, the dream cracked away more and more. Why would the memory be wrong? He knew it was a memory. It had to be. Otherwise, how did he get here?

“But how?” Regulus looked frustrated

“I imagined you here so many times, wrapped in my bedding, but now... it seems off.”

“James, darling, I don’t know what you’re talking about. Everything is fine,” Regulus said gently. Regulus was lost to the dream. His eyes were hazy.

“No, Regulus —”

James was ripped away again, torn into the magic that he lived in, broken away from the world as he knew it. He wished he could just relive the memories without the rest, but now that he knew the memories were wrong, he didn’t know if he should go back. He didn’t think that he had a choice.

Chapter Notes

i know everyone wants to know what happened between regulus and barty, but i just have to share all these little tidbits of james's pov of the scenes we have already seen him in.

After his first moment awake, James felt the shift in the magic. He didn't even realize that magic had a taste and a specific feel to it until he felt the venomous magic seep in. The magic he lived in was growing weaker, that he knew, but it took him a while to realize that something else was growing stronger in the meantime.

If he could breathe, he would be choking on it. He barely existed, and yet he could feel himself fading away. He was rattled out of the magic and into another memory like he was spontaneously apparating.

"Not all of us have the option of running away," Regulus spat. They were in the Astronomy Tower again, and James did not want to relive this memory. Why couldn't it be another memory where Regulus was docile and naked?

"I would have helped you. I can still help you," James said because he had said it before. He still meant the words. He would have helped Regulus at any time, he would help him now if he could.

"It's too late, James."

"Please don't say that. Don't say that. Reg, please, I —" James forced the words to stop flowing. The first time he lived this moment, he was gutted and destroyed. He had had all these plans for the future for him and Regulus, and then Regulus came back to school and destroyed them all. He squeezed his eyes closed, he didn't want to relive it. When he opened them a second later, a flurry of white caught his eyes. "I don't remember it snowing during this."

Regulus paused, looking out into the sky. "How odd," Regulus mumbled distractedly.

"This happened in October. Too early for snow, wasn't it?" He could still remember the way Regulus avoided him during the entire month of September, escaping every time James even got close to him. He walked forward and wrapped his arms around Regulus's body — mostly because he could, he didn't do this the first time, but he felt control over the memory. Reg was distracted for now, and if he could stop this memory from repeating, then he would do it.

“It’s so cold,” Regulus said, his teeth chattering quietly. The snow began to pick up around them as if Reg’s interpretation of the world was actively changing it. That’s what was happening, he realized. It was Regulus all along summoning these memories and causing them to change. He didn’t understand how or why.

“I don’t think these are my memories.”

“What do you mean?” Regulus asked as he turned to look at James properly.

“I thought they were mine at first, that something was happening to me to make me relive these moments. I can’t remember though. I can’t remember what was happening before, but the memories are changing, and it’s not me doing it.”

“How do you know that it isn’t you changing them?” James didn’t quite know how to explain, but he could see one piece of the world that wasn’t touching him.

“Because I’m not getting cold. Or wet for that matter.” Regulus looked him over with a confused tilt to his mouth.

“So it’s me, I’m affecting them,” Regulus said unhappily.

What’s going on? How is this happening?” James asked. Regulus stared up into his eyes, his unhappy face growing even more distressed.

“You died, James,” Regulus said quietly.

James shifted in surprise and pulled back slightly. He knew that he was gone, he knew somewhere deep within him that he had been gone, but it didn’t feel right to hear Regulus say it. Because wasn’t he dead too? The memory hit him like a wall of bricks, the sinking of pain that came with knowing that Regulus was gone from the world, Sirius sobbing on his living room floor about Regulus’s death. Regulus died before him, and then James was gone too, but now? Regulus felt alive, he felt real. It didn’t make sense to him.

“No, no please,” Regulus begged. He turned slightly as if to pull James in closer. He was shivering now. James could feel his body growing colder. He couldn’t feel the chill himself, the snow having no effect on him, but he could feel Regulus. James relented, curling his arms back around Regulus’s frame.

“What do you mean? I died?” James asked. He couldn’t actually remember dying, though he knew it was true that he was gone.

“You’re dead, you died. I don’t know how you’re here, in my dreams, maybe I’m just imagining it.”

James searched his thoughts. The memories seemed to come sluggishly. They were more powerful when Regulus was in them, or at least related to them, everything else seemed to exist beyond his grasp. It was like trying to remember a dream he’d had, hazy and jumbled. What had he been doing after Regulus's death?

He remembered the conversations he had with Lily about Regulus, the night she figured out about their failed relationship. He remembered her quiet confession of not wanting to be married anymore, the shame in her eyes. He loved her so much it ached, but it wasn't ever the way he loved Regulus. She was begging him for freedom, and he was helpless to give her anything less.

She would have left him, he remembered. She was planning to leave after the war. He remembered feeling relieved by it. He would be lonely without her, but he also knew that he never loved her the way he should love a wife. He spent so much time convincing himself that he was over Regulus, that he was only about Lily, as he should have been from the start. But he couldn't force himself to feel what he didn't feel.

He remembered being excited about her plans to travel, she would share with him the journal full of all her bucket list locations. He remembered that isolation, those last few months when not even Sirius or Remus could visit, when they were alone just the three of them. He remembered staying up late into the night, talking quietly to Regulus even though he was long dead.

Finally, the memories all clicked into place with a satisfying pop like cracking a knuckle.

"Oh, that's right. It was You-Know-Who, wasn't it? He came to kill Harry. Oh no, Harry!" He jumped back. How could he forget? Lily and Harry had run upstairs as he turned to face the monster upon their doorstep.

"He's alive," Regulus said frantically. "He survived."

"Did Lily?" James asked softly.

Regulus shook his head. "I'm sorry." James nodded. He wondered where she was — if she was gone as he had been — if she was pulled in by the magical hurricane that had become his lifeline.

"Are you dead too? I thought... I thought I remembered grieving?" James asked. He remembered grieving very well, but what if Regulus hadn't actually died? What if it had been a lie, and he'd been out there allowing James and Sirius to mourn his death? He didn't want to think that Regulus could do something so cruel.

"No, it's complicated. But no, I'm alive," Regulus said, looking away with a tight expression. James watched him silently for a moment. Clearly, he was missing something.

"How do you know what the Gryffindor dormitories look like?" James asked. If they were Regulus's dreams — Regulus's memories — then why did he know things he shouldn't? Unless he had been there.

"What?"

"We were in the dorms last time, but to my knowledge, you never visited my dorm. It seems strange that you would know what they looked like in so much detail. Or did I make them that way?"

Regulus chuckled before answering, "It's very complicated, but I'm in Gryffindor now. I spend most of the year in the dorms."

James let out a baffled laugh. How could Regulus possibly be in Gryffindor? "This is so confusing."

"I know, I'm sorry," Regulus said, sounding regretful and a little sad. His voice shook as his body shivered against the cold.

"What is happening to you, Reg?"

"I don't know," Regulus said. "I think I might be dying again."

"Again?" James asked. So he had died. His death was real.

"It's not so bad," Regulus said distractedly. "I don't think I mind as much this time. Last time, I was so afraid and so lonely, but if you're here with me, then it can't be that bad."

"No!" James shouted. Regulus's words cut him deeply, the thought of Regulus alone and afraid was like glass shattering inside him. "You can't die, why are you saying all of this?" It sounded like he was giving up, and James couldn't stand it.

"It's okay, James. I'm okay," Regulus said. Regulus was shaking so badly now that his words barely registered, coming out through clattering teeth. He was dreaming, and he was dying.

"I think... I think you need to wake up. I think you need to open your eyes."

"Why?" Regulus swayed, and it was like the environment shifted. Gone was the Astronomy Tower; instead, they were in a place James had never seen.

"Where are you?" James asked, spinning in a full circle. He had meant to say "where are we," but the sentence didn't sound right. He hadn't noticed before, with nothing to compare them to, but the other locations had felt like wallpaper, while this felt real. "I don't recognize this place."

Regulus looked around but his face didn't change. He seemed impassive and disconnected. When he looked back at James, James simply opened his arms and let Regulus fall into him. He wished he could warm him. Regulus was already shaking so badly that he didn't notice he was crying until a sob tore out of him.

"Oh, darling," James said. It had been so long, he missed calling Regulus darling. "Just open your eyes, please. Just fight. I don't want you to die."

"I miss you. I don't want to be alone anymore."

James squeezed his eyes shut. His poor Regulus, he felt like he could feel Regulus's loneliness as if it was his own. When he opened his eyes, there was someone looking at him. Or not at him. Through him. He looked like James, like a tiny version, except he had bright green eyes. He followed the boy's eyeline and found a tiny Regulus.

He gasped softly, looking back up at the boy with the green eyes. Of course. It was Harry. He couldn't believe he didn't recognize him right away. His son was now crouching over a passed-out child Regulus, lying in a puddle of water before them.

James chuckled softly. "You're not," he said. In an instant, he felt Regulus ripped from his arms. He was gone the moment Regulus left, but he knew, somewhere deep inside him, that Regulus was in that tiny body. He didn't know how — he didn't understand anything — but he knew Regulus was alive. That was enough.

The venomous magic was gone for a while. He had no sense of the passage of time in the storm, but he could feel that it was gone. The only way he knew that any time had passed was because the moment the venom was back, James was angry at himself for not enjoying the peace while he had it, like waking up with a sore throat and remembering all the easy time without the pain.

Now it wasn't just the venomous magic, now it was something else too, something that was highly interested in tearing James limb from limb. If he had limbs, that is. He didn't quite have a body when he was in the storm, he was more a mist than a corporeal being, he thought.

When he could see, it was Regulus before him. It was always Regulus.

He was lying flat on the floor of a room James couldn't see, everything that wasn't Regulus was a blur of nothing. He could see the ground beneath him though, an extremely ornate rug that looked to be about five hundred years old.

The most confusing thing was the way Regulus seemed to morph. He looked as James remembered him, nearly seventeen and about to finish his sixth year at Hogwarts, but then he would shift and suddenly he seemed much younger. The two beings seemed to blend together, flickering back and forth so quickly that he couldn't even spot it. Then both were gone and instead Regulus looked older, maybe twenty, James would guess.

He looked a bit pathetic lying on the ground as he was, but James could feel the magic around them. He knew that something was holding him down. The venomous magic was attacking him.

"Oh, darling. Not again," James said, leaning over Regulus to get a better look at him.

"Am I hallucinating?" Regulus mumbled pitifully.

"I'm not sure," James said before kneeling down to run a comforting hand through Regulus's hair. It was longer than he usually wore it, but it was soft between his fingers, and James reveled in the fact that he could feel it. "I don't think so."

"What does it feel like to you?" Regulus was losing consciousness, James could see the way his eyes kept closing against his will.

“It feels like drifting, I think,” James said, trying to parse what he was experiencing into words. “It’s not exactly clear in moments like these when things get sharp and clear again.”

“I almost got Harry killed,” Regulus said with a tragic tiny sob.

“No, no, you don’t understand.”

“I do. I do,” James said softly. He wanted to explain, to tell him that he knew Regulus didn’t do it on purpose. He didn’t know what happened but knew he wouldn’t hurt Harry. He didn’t get the chance though as the moment Regulus lost consciousness, James was lost as well.

Most of the time, the storm was nothing. There was chaos to it, sure, but that chaos was continuous and unchanging. It was his home, but once in a while, he would feel something tug at him. It was like a drowning pain, like his lungs — if he had them — were filling with liquid and smoke. It never lasted long and it never attached to any of his memories. It was like anxiety over forgetting something. As if he knew there was a reason he should be upset, but he had misplaced the thought about what he should be upset over.

He thought that a long time passed like that, the chaotic storm and the occasional pain. Beyond that, he was left as nothing. He was without substance. Yet at the same time, now that he knew how to recognize him, Regulus was always there. Regulus was like a lightning rod, always drawing James in, though not enough for him to strike. Never quite enough. Until it was.

“Oh, you’re back,” James said immediately. Though he really meant oh, I’m back, because Regulus was always there. He had a body again, even more real than most of the memories he had experienced. He leaned against the door and crossed his arms. He didn’t recognize this room, but based on the decor he would guess it was the home Sirius grew up in.

“James?” Regulus turned to look at him. He looked twenty again. James’s heart ached thinking about how he never actually got to see Regulus grow up like this.

“Has it been a long time? It feels like it’s been a while.” He wished Regulus would tell him what was going on, he felt like Regulus knew more than he was letting on.

“James,” Regulus breathed. James was across the room in a second, suddenly remembering that he could touch him, that Regulus was really there with him.

“I miss you so much.”

“I know,” James said. He didn’t miss Regulus though. How could he, when he existed just for him? He was always with Regulus, but Regulus was always alone. He ruled his back comfortingly, reveling in the feeling of Regulus sinking into him, leaning his head on his shoulder like they used to do. He could spend eternity holding him.

“You’re not really here, are you?” Regulus said miserably.

“I’m not sure exactly. I keep getting stuck places.” Sometimes when he went to explain it was like something else spoke for him. How could he explain the storm to Regulus? It would be like the moon explaining the gravitational pull of the sun, inconsequential and irrelevant to something of such power and brightness.

“Why didn’t you tell me about Peter?” Regulus suddenly snapped.

“Peter? What about him?” What did Peter have to do with anything?

“That he was the one who betrayed you, that he was a Death Eater. Why didn’t you tell me?”

James had realized the moment You-Know-Who showed up at his door that Peter had betrayed him. There was a moment of wonder and worry, thinking that perhaps something had happened to Peter, that he had been hurt, captured, or tortured. In the end, though, he knew the truth. Peter had been drifting for a long time, and James hadn’t done nearly enough to keep him safe. He had failed him, and Peter turned away.

“Oh, Peter. He was always complicated.”

“Complicated?” Regulus said sharply, yanking out of James’s arms. “He’s the reason you’re dead. He betrayed you to the Dark Lord. He’s the reason that Sirius —”

“What about Sirius?” James felt a surge of guilt. He hadn’t thought about Sirius or Remus for a long time. In the storm, nothing else mattered.

“How can you not know? I thought — I thought you knew everything I knew. I don’t understand how any of this works. Are you some kind of ghost? Are you just a figment of my imagination?” Regulus shouted, growing visibly frustrated. James wanted to consume him.

“I don’t know,” he replied calmly. “I’m sorry, Reg. I’m sorry.” He hoped the words would draw Regulus back in, that he would be able to touch and hold him again.

“Don’t call me Reg,” he said instead. James slumped as Regulus kept yelling. “Sirius spent twelve years in prison because of your friend Peter.”

A lot had happened since James had died. Apparently, Sirius took the fall for Peter and spent years wasting away in Azkaban. Remus had been left alone. His friends had paid the price for his death. And Harry. What had become of Harry?

“And another thing. You’re an animagus?”

James’s eyes widened. “Did Sirius tell you that?”

“He didn’t have to. I watched him drag a kid down the passageway under the Whomping Willow trying to get to Peter.” James had no idea what that meant. So Sirius was out of prison? But how? Was he finally proven innocent? Though he was apparently still after Peter?

“This is so confusing,” James said honestly.

Regulus made a growling noise that James had never heard come out of his mouth. “Peter was hiding out as Ron Weasley’s pet. Harry was in danger for three straight years, and I had no idea because you never bothered to tell me about your stupid secret ability.”

“Er, well, it wasn’t just my secret to tell.” James was doing his best to take in everything Regulus was saying, but it was all disjointed. He wished they could sit down and talk about it, that Regulus could explain everything. Or maybe not sit down, maybe lie down. Perhaps in a bed. Naked. James shook his head. He needed to focus.

“I don’t care! I wish — I know I didn’t deserve it, but I wish you would have trusted me.”

James felt like he had been stabbed. “I’m s —”

Regulus looked instantly regretful. “Just don’t. I shouldn’t have said that.” James knew he could have never made the choice to tell Regulus about his animagus form. There was far more at stake than just his secret, but his friends’ and Remus’s as well. Still, he wished he could have. He would have given anything for Regulus to know, to be included.

“Where is Sirius now?” James asked.

Regulus rolled his eyes so hard that it looked like it hurt. “Of course, that’s what you’re worried about. He’s with me at Grimmauld. Don’t worry, Lupin is taking care of him.” James breathed a sigh of relief.

“Oh, that’s good. How are they? Are they, you know?”

“Together?” Regulus asked with a raise of his eyebrow.

“You know about that?” Sirius and Remus had been incredibly secret about their relationship. So secret that neither of them even knew they were in one for the first several years. James had known they had feelings for each other for years before they finally officially started dating. It was truly exhausting. Honestly, everyone thought that James spent too much time pining. Little did they know, James learned from the best.

“Lupin wasn’t exactly subtle. But I’m not sure if they’re really... things are different now. Sirius still has a long way to go I think. I don’t know. I don’t really care either way.” James could hear the truth in his words. Regulus clearly cared about Sirius, he always had, but his romantic life didn’t matter to Regulus.

“Lily was always jealous of them.” He said it without thinking, the words just slipping past his lips. He didn’t even know where they came from. It wasn’t like Lily ever told him as much, but he still realized it. It was in the way she would watch them, the way her eyes tracked them in a room when they were being sweet with each other. He just knew. Regulus had never looked more hurt, though it was masked quickly behind anger.

“Right. I’d like to leave now. Is this a dream? Can I just wake up?”

When James and Lily first started dating in seventh year, James was still heartbroken over his breakup with Regulus. He had avoided even looking at the Slytherin table for weeks and weeks. Lily was a cooling balm on a terrible burn, she stitched him back together without even realizing it. They fell together slowly, though they never quite fell in love.

James could never say that he fell in love with her because he felt like he was always a tiny bit distant. There was always the fact that his heart was stretched and sheared out of his body, lingering elsewhere in the castle, with a man who wouldn't even look at him. James had moved on, and he felt good about it, he didn't need Regulus to feel any certain way about it. Not that Regulus did. He never looked at James. It hurt him every time.

He had been so stupid. He saw it now though, in that split second before the mask fell into place. Regulus had been upset by him and Lily, it should have been obvious but James was so wrapped up in his own hurt to see it back then. Now though, he could feel it in the way the magic around and within him soured slightly. It felt inhospitable. James wondered if he would disappear for good.

"I'm sorry I didn't tell you about my animagus form. I'm not sure if I would make a different decision now, but I'm sorry I hurt you either way." He needed to atone for something, especially if this would be his final moment. He didn't know what else to apologize for beyond his relationship with Lily, but he wouldn't say her name again if Regulus was going to make that little hurt face. He would tear himself apart before doing that.

"You don't owe me an apology, James. Whatever you did to me? I deserved it."

James didn't think he had ever heard Regulus sound so defeated. "How can you even say that?"

Regulus disappeared and in his place was himself. That was certainly different and unexpected.

"You're too late," the other James said. "You had your chance to destroy this years ago and you blew it."

"Huh?" James said.

"What?" he heard Regulus say at the same time. He looked around, but he couldn't see him. It was like he was hidden behind the other James.

"If you had been better, if you hadn't died trying to steal the locket, maybe I wouldn't have paid the price. I was murdered because you weren't good enough." The other James spoke in a dead, empty voice. James gasped at his words though, placing his hands on his hips in the way his mother used to when she was disappointed.

"I know. I'm sorry," Regulus whispered. James gasped again, but louder this time.

"Do you think I care that you're sorry? I died because of you. Lily died because of you."

"Please," Regulus begged. James huffed, irritated.

“Excuse me?” he said loudly, but the cruel James didn’t look at him. “What exactly do you think you’re doing? I would never say these things.”

The other James ignored him, he looked through him, staring down at something on the ground that James couldn’t see. James waved his hands around in front of his eyes, but they didn’t so much as blink.

“Do you know how I felt when I found out you died? Relieved. Not a day went by that I didn’t regret being with you.”

“How dare you?” James shouted. Regulus made a noise like he’d been stepped on. James, frustrated, swung out a fist to hit the other James that stood before him. However, his hand merely disappeared when it collided with the other James as if it was being sucked into him. “What?” He pulled his hand out, just to check that he could, before reaching back in. He couldn’t feel anything.

“I never wanted you,” the cruel James snarled. “You were my biggest mistake.”

“Okay, that’s quite enough of that,” James said, he sounded uncomfortably close to how his dad used to sound when he was lecturing James. Had it been any other moment, James might have felt embarrassed. He shoved forward without thinking. The other James worked like a portal, though James had no idea how. He stepped through and he could see Regulus again.

He was small now. He looked like he had when he’d been lying on the stone floor puddled in water, except now he was a bit older. Maybe thirteen or fourteen, James thought. He looked like he was drenched in pain. As if the cruel James’s words were a truth that Regulus had just been waiting for someone to confirm. James knelt down beside him.

“Don’t listen. It’s not me,” he said softly, touching Regulus’s cheek gently with the tips of his fingers.

“No one could ever want you,” the cruel James said. James turned to snap at him and finally noticed something lying on the ground. It looked like an expensive locket, and the terrible James was coming from it like a deadly smog.

“You have to destroy it,” James said, thinking out loud. It was then that he realized that Regulus wasn’t just on the ground, he was being held down on the ground by some other force. The venomous magic was back. James hadn’t noticed, he had been so distracted. “Just a little farther.”

Regulus’s resolve seemed to grow and finally, he began dragging his body forward.

“That’s it,” James cheered. “You’re so close now.” Regulus groaned in pain as he pulled himself further a bit more. He was growing visibly weaker.

“You’re pathetic. You should have stayed dead.” James was going to kill himself. Or the other James. Whatever.

“That’s enough from you, I think,” he repeated, stepping up to look at the man. He wondered if he could help Regulus. He could touch him, he could feel him, why couldn’t he touch anything else? “I think if I just…” James muttered to himself, stepping back into the smog.

“No,” Regulus groaned. James was back on the other side and now that he was paying attention, he could see the locket that the evil James was coming out of. He reached down and tried to push it but his fingers brushed right through. James shook his head and focused. Regulus was weak, he couldn’t survive like this. He had to help him. He took a deep breath in his un-living lungs and tried again. He felt the cold against his fingers, burning up through his bones.

He walked back through to see that it was right in front of Regulus. “Destroy it. You can do it,” he said softly. Regulus lifted something and brought it down hard on the object.

The moment he did the smog swarmed Regulus’s small frame, and the door of the room they were in burst open. In came a man that James didn’t recognize right away. He almost looked like Walburga. A second later he realized who it was.

“Oh… I see Sirius now,” James said faintly.

Sirius was screaming for Remus, falling to his knees next to Regulus who was losing consciousness quickly. James knew he only had a minute longer, but he took in as many details as he could of Sirius’s face. He looked much older than the last time James had seen him, and he was far too thin like he hadn’t eaten in a long, long time. But he was looking at Regulus with so much love and worry that James felt a content smile stretch across his face. As he drifted back into the storm, he felt satisfied for the first time. Regulus wasn’t alone. Not anymore.

the brotherhood.

The first time James Potter saw Sirius Black was on the platform when he was about to board the Hogwarts Express for the first time. Sirius's mother was fixing his shirt, brushing off invisible dust from his shoulders. Sirius stood tall — or as tall as an eleven-year-old could — and looked stern and serious. His mother looked exactly the same, her sharp features intimidating even from far away.

“Behave. Listen to your teachers. Try to have fun,” James's mother repeated for about the fourth time that morning. “And —”

“I know,” James said quietly. “If someone's alone, make sure they have a friend.” His mother smiled.

“That's right,” she said. Both of his parents were staring down at him, misty-eyed. James was a bit misty-eyed himself, though he was working hard to hide it. He tipped his chin up and hugged them both once more before boarding the train.

He found Sirius Black — though he didn't know that was his name at the time — in a compartment with a red-headed girl and a boy with straight black hair. Sirius Black, who on the platform had looked stern and stoic, now looked nervous, uncomfortable, and alone. James sat next to him and the rest was history.

The first time James Potter knew he loved Sirius Black was the second to last day of first year. They had spent all year becoming friends, best friends, but on the second to last day of school, after all their exams were finished, and they had nothing to hold their attention except exploring the castle, Sirius pulled James aside and, in a very important voice, told him all his prank ideas for second year.

“Woah,” James breathed, his voice filled with awe. “How do you remember all that?” They were in a small area of the Gryffindor common room, though it was mostly empty this time of year.

Sirius grinned in the wide, wild way that no one else could hope to mimic. “Because I'm smarter than you,” he taunted.

James scoffed, but it was ruined by the smile that was permanently fixed on his face. “You wish,” he said. “I'll probably end up with better marks than you.”

“Yeah, right!” Sirius shouted, laughing loudly. “You wish you were me, Potter.”

“Please,” James said, rolling his eyes. Sirius's smile faltered for a split second before he spoke again.

“Besides, Remus’ll probably beat us both,” he said quietly, looking over his shoulder nervously.

“Yeah, suppose he will,” James agreed. No one worked harder than Remus.

“Best not to tell him, we don’t want him to get a big head,” Sirius said.

“Yeah.” James barked a laugh. “He’s the one at risk of getting a big head.”

“Shut up!” Sirius said, his wide grin back on his face. “Now, are we going to plan these pranks or not?”

“Let me get a quill!” James shouted excitedly. He went to bed that last night thinking about how Sirius was the best friend anyone could ask for. He was practically his brother. James would do anything for him.

The first time James Potter got angry with Sirius Black was right before the Christmas holidays during their second year at Hogwarts. James was very sure that Remus Lupin was keeping a secret, and he was pretty sure that he knew what the secret was, yet Sirius kept changing the subject every time James brought it up.

“Listen, we have to talk about this,” James said solemnly.

“Talk about what?” Sirius asked, stuffing his mouth full of toast that he had stolen from the kitchens. He had been hiding out in the library, somewhere he knew James would usually almost never look for him, but James had no idea why.

“You know what,” James said.

“I think you’re crazy,” Sirius said distractedly. He was looking down at an open book on the table, but James could tell that he wasn’t reading it.

“I’m not crazy!” Someone shushed them. “I’m not crazy,” he whispered. “He disappears during every full moon and when he comes back he’s limping and tired. I looked it up. Werew —”

“Why can’t you just drop it?” Sirius shouted.

“You two! Out!” Madam Pince said suddenly, having just come careening around the corner at the sound of their voices.

“Look at what you’ve done,” Sirius said grumbly and stomped out of the library, James close at his heels.

“Well, if you’re not going to believe me, then I guess I’ll just have to ask Remus myself,” James said once they were safely in Central Hall. He hadn’t really meant the words as a threat, but Sirius must have taken them as such.

He growled and grabbed James by the front of his robes, dragging him roughly into the long corridor near the Potions classroom.

“You can’t do that,” Sirius said, shoving James so roughly against the wall that his head knocked against the stones, and his teeth clicked together.

“What is your problem?” James shouted and shoved Sirius back. Sirius was ready for it and didn’t move.

“You’re my problem,” Sirius snarled. James threw a punch, a rather good one he thought, and the next thing he knew he and Sirius were rolling around on the floor trying to hit each other.

“Er, what’s going on?” an uncertain voice cut in. They stopped rolling — James perched on top of Sirius — and looked up to see Remus and Peter looking down at them uncertainly.

“How did you find us?” Sirius asked, knocking James in the leg with his knee and forcing him to roll off to the side. Sirius jumped to his feet, quickly brushing himself off.

“I could hear you both shouting,” Remus said with an uncomfortable laugh. “What are you fighting about?”

James, who was still lying on the ground, started to stand. “We were talking about —”

Sirius spun around and kicked him hard in the stomach. James collapsed back on the floor, curling in on himself. Peter gasped loudly.

“Hey!” Remus shouted and yanked Sirius back.

“We weren’t talking about anything,” he said sharply. “Let’s go.” He grabbed Remus by the wrist and dragged him away.

“But what about — let me go, Sirius — what is happening?” Remus said, though James noticed he let himself be dragged away. He was looking back at James who was unsteadily climbing to his feet, Peter watching him nervously, and offered a small apologetic smile that James knew meant he was going to try and smooth things over with Sirius.

James had never been on the receiving end of one of those looks. Honestly, he was usually the one giving other people that look. To see it aimed at him made him grind his teeth together and clench his hands into fists.

They didn’t get another time to talk before leaving for break. James thought about approaching Remus on his own, but Sirius was always right there next to him. He was like an annoying guard dog with his sharp eyes that always seemed to track James wherever he went. James was so mad that he vowed to never talk to him again.

“What has you so worried?” his mother asked him the day before Christmas.

James shrugged. He knew he’d been sulking all break, but he couldn’t get himself to stop. “It’s nothing,” he mumbled.

“Jamie,” she said softly, rubbing a hand gently on his shoulder. “You know you can talk to me. I won’t judge.”

James sighed. “Sirius and I aren’t friends anymore.” The moment the words were out of his mouth, he broke down into tears. He told his mother everything, skillfully leaving out his suspicions about Remus, and she listened quietly, rubbing his back the entire time.

“I think you should give Sirius an opportunity to explain himself,” she said once James was left with only small pathetic sniffles. “He might surprise you.”

He didn’t want to at the time, still angry at his friend, but when he found Sirius sitting alone on the train back to school, curled up on himself and a healing bruise on his jaw, James knew he would have to hear him out. He opened the door and quietly walked in to sit across from him. Sirius looked at him for one second before staring resolutely out the window.

“Where are the others?” James asked.

Sirius shrugged. “Think Peter’s with the girls. I don’t know where Remus is.” James immediately knew he was lying, he could always tell.

James sighed. “Can we talk? Please?”

“What’s there to talk about?” Sirius asked. He was always more irritable when he first came back from breaks, it always took him a bit to get back to himself after spending time with his family.

“I’m not trying to fight,” James said. “Why do you not want to talk about what’s going on with Remus?”

“There is nothing going on with him,” Sirius said sharply. “Just leave him alone.”

It was a fatal error. Those words and the way Sirius said them, with desperation and pleading layered in his voice, caused the realization that James needed. He gasped, pointing directly at Sirius’s face.

“You already knew!” James shouted.

“Stop yelling,” Sirius hissed.

“Did he tell you? Does Peter know? Am I the last to know?” James asked the questions quickly and would have kept going if Sirius hadn’t jumped forward and covered his mouth with his hand.

“He didn’t tell me anything, and he doesn’t know that I know,” Sirius said.

James pulled Sirius’s hand away from his mouth. “And you don’t want me to mention it because?”

“I just think he would be happier if we didn’t know,” Sirius said before shrugging awkwardly.

James softened immediately. “I thought maybe you were stopping me because you...”

“Because I what?” Sirius asked.

“Because you didn’t like werewolves.”

“I’m not like my family!” Sirius shouted, jumping to his feet.

“I know that,” James said, throwing his hands up in surrender. “But what else was I supposed to think? You literally kicked me in the stomach to keep me from mentioning it.”

“Whatever, Potter,” Sirius huffed, sitting back down and crossing his arms over his chest.

They fell back into an easy friendship after that, except now James had a much deeper appreciation for Sirius. Sirius could be loud and brash, but he cared fiercely for his friends. It would be another two years before James realized why Sirius treated Remus like that.

The first time James Potter hated Sirius Black was in the middle of fifth year when Sirius decided that getting back at Snape was worth more than protecting Remus’s secret.

Remus and Sirius had been orbiting each other for months at that point, and James was pretty sure he was the only one who noticed. Merlin knew that neither Remus or Sirius were aware of it. Then Sirius did that terrible thing, and Remus was heartbroken. Sirius tried to apologize, tried to follow Remus around and trap him in rooms so the two of them could talk, but Remus was desperate to get away from him.

James had to be the one to tell Sirius to leave Remus alone. He hated that Sirius made him do that. He hated Sirius, and he didn’t think he would feel anything other than that ever again. It was the first time he really yelled at Sirius, they had fought before but it was nothing like this. Sirius didn’t fight back when James screamed at him, just stood there, pale and distant-looking.

The next few months were some of the worst of James’s life. Remus had sunken into himself and was barely alive. Peter was trying to keep them together, doing his best to make sure they all ate and finished their classwork. And James — he was just trying not to look at Sirius.

Sirius, to his credit, made it very easy. After James shouted at him, Sirius disappeared from their lives. He no longer showed his face in the dorm room or the common room. James had no idea where he was sleeping, but he didn’t let himself dwell on it. He didn’t show up for meals or in the hallways. He was barely even present in classes, coming in at the very last second and leaving the moment the class was over.

A month passed before he realized how poorly Sirius was doing. He had been so focused on not looking at him, that he had failed to see how Sirius had been swallowed by guilt, how it was tearing him apart. He was called on in one of their classes, a rare occasion those days since Sirius was dead silent in every lesson, but their Defense professor called him, and Sirius couldn’t perform the spell. Gryffindor lost five points, and Sirius slumped down in his chair even further.

That's what made James notice him, what made him really see. Sirius's long hair was stringy and unkempt. He was thinner than the last time James had seen him. James knew he hadn't been in the Great Hall, but it hadn't occurred to him that he wasn't eating at all. He felt like shit all of a sudden. He'd been so focused on his own anger and hurt that he'd failed to notice how poorly his friend was doing. Ex-friend, he mentally corrected, looking at Remus out of the corner of his eye. Remus was doing just as poorly, and it was Sirius's fault. James shouldn't feel bad.

Even with that knowledge, James couldn't stop himself from checking the map for Sirius's name multiple times a day after that. Not once did he enter the kitchens or the Great Hall, even when they weren't there. He returned to the dorm at odd times, usually waiting around the corner like he was watching them all leave, and knew he could do it without them seeing him. He slept tucked away in the common room most nights, but wouldn't arrive until well after midnight when almost everyone was in bed.

James ached for him. He hated him, he reminded himself, but it also hurt so, so badly to see him suffer. James redoubled his efforts in taking care of Remus. He hadn't been a very good friend to him, too caught up in his own feelings of betrayal to realize how much Remus was struggling. It wasn't until he started really paying attention that he realized that Remus was watching Sirius just as much, but only when he thought no one was looking.

James was at a loss for what to do, but one day, everything shifted again. One morning, James was at breakfast, Remus and Peter sitting across from him, as he gnawed slowly on a piece of sausage. He had taken to watching the door these days without even realizing it, so he noticed immediately when Sirius entered the hall.

He was staring at the ground and walking slowly like he might turn and leave at any given second. Next to him was Lily Evans. She made eye contact with James the moment she noticed him watching and lifted her chin defiantly. She grabbed Sirius by the arm and dragged him to the far end of the table, as far away as they could get from James, Remus, and Peter, and began filling Sirius's plate with food.

He didn't look at her, but he did slowly start to eat, his hands shaking slightly. Lily sat right next to him and talked to him quietly through the entire meal. James watched them closely, unable to drag his eyes away. Remus, he noticed, was watching them too, but with a look of such intense jealousy that James thought he might light them both on fire with just his eyes. That's what made James realize that he didn't feel the same jealousy. Months ago, he might have felt jealous if Sirius managed to befriend Lily, but now, he just felt relief.

Lily stayed next to Sirius for the next few weeks. She walked with him to and from classes, she sat with him at meals, and she studied with him in the library. Slowly, Sirius came back to life. He tried to do the same to Remus, but he kept finding himself wondering how Sirius was doing now that someone was watching over him. He couldn't help himself, and one afternoon, he noticed Sirius in the library alone, and Lily heading out of her dorm to meet him. James stopped her in the corridor.

"Lily," he called, trying to sound casual. She turned to look at him and instantly narrowed her eyes.

“What?” she asked.

“You and Sirius,” he said awkwardly.

“Yes?” She asked, keeping her tone light.

“You guys are friends now?” he asked.

“We are,” she replied, raising her chin in defiance like she always seemed to do these days where Sirius was concerned.

“And he...” James paused, he should have made a plan of what he was going to say before approaching her. “He’s doing okay?” he asked.

“I imagine he’s been better,” she answered, looking away. “But yes, he’s okay.”

“Good,” James said, relaxing, though his chest was still tight. “Good.”

“Is that all?” Lily asked, raising one eyebrow at him.

“Yes,” James said and Lily began to turn away before he spoke again. “I just... I was worried about him. I am worried about him.”

“You could have checked on him yourself,” Lily said, turning back to him. “I’m sure he would have appreciated feeling less alone.” James felt the guilt that had been bubbling inside him twist into a vicious snake that began crawling up his throat.

“I know, but Remus —” James choked. “Remus needs support, and what Sirius did, well it was hard on all of us, but Remus needed someone to take his side.” He needed her to understand that he wasn’t doing this because he was a bad person, he had a reason. That reason felt stupid in the face of her condemnation.

Suddenly, her shoulders dropped in acceptance. “I get it. I’m glad Remus isn’t alone.”

“Will... will you tell Sirius...” James struggled to say. “Just tell him that —”

“Potter,” she said finally, “you should just talk to him. I don’t know what he did to Remus exactly, but I think he’s punished himself enough.” Lily turned to leave, and this time James didn’t stop her.

He rushed back into his dorm, feeling like he might be sick, and closed himself up inside his bed curtains. He didn’t leave his bed for two days. Peter kept bringing him food from the kitchens, which James did his best to eat, and Remus stayed close when he could, though neither of them pried into what he was feeling.

“James,” Remus said on the third morning, James looked up at him. “You need to shower. You reek.”

James huffed a laugh. “I know,” he said, though he made no move to get up. Remus sighed.

“All right,” Remus said. “I think we need to talk about Sirius.”

James stiffened. “What about him?” Remus gave him a measured look.

“You miss him,” Remus said.

“No, I don’t,” James said instantly. “I hate him.” Remus rubbed his eyes tiredly.

“I’m not going to do that, Remus. What he did to you was unforgivable.”

“Was it?” Peter asked. James had forgotten that he was in the room with them, he had been so quiet sitting on his bed.

“What do you mean?” James asked sharply. Peter didn’t even look shocked, just thoughtful.

“I don’t think he meant to hurt Remus. You both know how Sirius is. He acts without thinking sometimes, but he wasn’t doing it to be cruel. Not intentionally.”

“How do you know that?” Remus asked. His face was doing something odd, like he was trying to glare, but the effect was being ruined by the way his eyes were welling up.

“I’ve had a lot of time to think about it with how quiet you both have been,” Peter said logically. “I just don’t know if I would qualify what he did as unforgivable.”

“That’s not for you to decide,” James said. Peter raised his eyebrows in surprise.

“Why not? It’s not like either of you are going to admit you miss him. Someone has to do it.”

Remus was quiet for a long moment. “Sirius never makes the same mistake twice,” he mumbled quietly. He was opening the door, just a crack, but that was all James needed.

“You’re right, he doesn’t,” James said. “And we don’t have to be friends with him right away. Maybe I could just talk to him. See what he says.” Remus shrugged, but James took it as permission.

“Er, James,” Peter said. James looked over at him. “You better shower before you do that.”

“Right,” James said, embarrassed.

Pulling Sirius back into his life was easier than he expected. Sirius looked like a skittish animal when James first approached him. He looked like a dog that had been scolded and left out in the cold. James hated himself a bit. Sirius was cagey and short with James, but James could tell he was just nervous.

“I think you should come back to the dorm,” James said finally.

“Remus doesn’t want me around,” Sirius said. “You were right. I was just hurting him by trying to speak to him. I won’t make that mistake again.”

“Remus would have told me if that was true,” James said sternly. “Come on, let’s go back.” Sirius hesitated for only a second before following. Remus, James realized later, had just been waiting for someone else to suggest forgiving Sirius before he said anything. He realized the moment they were back in a room together that Remus had already forgiven Sirius, that he was just waiting for him to come back. Remus would have never reached out on his own, it wasn’t his way, but Peter had bridged the gap, and now Remus felt like he could.

It took a while for their friendship to recover, but time heals all wounds.

The first time James Potter was scared of Sirius Black was in sixth year after Remus told James to stop using the unused classrooms to meet up with Regulus. He didn’t know how much Remus actually knew, but he couldn’t bring himself to ask. If Remus confirmed it to his face, that meant that James would have to ask Remus to lie to Sirius for him, and he didn’t think he could do that.

So instead, James grew paranoid. Every time Sirius would say something that sounded even a little off, James was terrified that he and Regulus had been discovered. Sometimes he would have nightmares that started out as blissful dreams of him back in Regulus’s bed before Sirius would burst into the room and kill them both.

In all reality, James had no idea how Sirius would react to his relationship with Regulus, but after Sirius had been nearly killed by his parents and subsequently disowned, he had been complaining about his brother more than usual. Sirius, of course, had no idea that Regulus had risked his life, and his place in the family to save Sirius’s life, so he thought Regulus had just stood by while Sirius was punished.

The result was that James had to sit there and listen to Sirius's rant about Regulus and every bad thing he had ever done. Remus, who was very clearly tuning Sirius out, would sit there and rub Sirius’s back placatingly. They weren’t dating yet, but honestly, who did that with their friends? James was just waiting for them to realize that they were together.

Regardless, his biggest fear was that Sirius would discover James and Regulus together, and Regulus would break up with him. He was living life on the knife’s edge, and he was constantly afraid that he was going to end up bleeding out. He couldn’t help it though. He loved them both. He needed them both in his life.

The first time James Potter missed Sirius Black wasn’t until he was already long dead. James never had to miss Sirius. He got to have him the entire time. He had to miss Regulus, but that was a different story altogether.

Once he was dead, his life was only Regulus, and truly James had no complaints about that fact, but when he realized that Sirius was right there with Regulus, that Regulus and Sirius had been given a second chance at being brothers, James missed him.

After Regulus destroyed the locket, James was more firmly in the world. He had no idea how, but it was enough that he could see beyond what Regulus was doing and could venture out from the odd memories that Regulus's mind was creating.

Regulus was unconscious for days after the locket was destroyed, so James got to watch as Sirius worried over him. Harry and Remus were there too, but seeing both of them was just painful. Remus looked far older, the years without his friends and Sirius prematurely aging him, and Harry just looked too skinny and constantly stressed. Though James wouldn't deny that he loved watching his son worry about Regulus. He wondered what Lily would think if she could see them interact.

Sirius though was the worse off of the four of them. The years in prison had done a number on his body and his mind, he was very clearly struggling, and living in his childhood home wasn't doing any favors. He was also the only one who could see James. Although, he would also see vivid hallucinations of a bunch of other people. James would constantly spot him arguing with someone that no one else could see, so when James would show up, Sirius would proceed like he was just a figment of his imagination.

James, because he had no other choice, took what he could get. He loved Sirius, and he missed Sirius. If he could spend even a few minutes with him, he would take it.

the curse.

As much as James Potter loved Sirius Black, he hated Barty Crouch Junior.

Okay, perhaps that was a bit of an exaggeration. Honestly, he hadn't ever had strong feelings about Barty while he was alive. There was that one moment when he noticed that Barty had grown a lot over the summer, and James felt a spark of attraction while looking at him, but beyond that, he didn't think about the man.

He never quite realized how close Barty and Regulus were. He was too busy avoiding looking at Regulus to see that happening during his seventh year. It wasn't until Regulus mentioned that he and Barty had been together before Regulus died that James decided that he hated him. He didn't know what happened to Barty, or where he was, but James started hoping that he was having a terrible day.

James didn't even realize that Barty was supposed to be dead until the day of the third task.

Regulus had been swamped with anxiety leading up to the task. James, as he became more and more real, could feel Regulus's emotions. Not that he needed to, it was painfully obvious how nervous he was. He was running himself ragged working up to it, and James was beginning to worry.

The past year had been an odd one with James existing only in the presence of Regulus. There were times when he could seek out and find Sirius, but even that was rare. In the moments when he managed it, he would be gone for days after recuperating. Not to mention that it took a physical toll on Regulus. He didn't think that Regulus noticed exactly, but James's life was tied to Regulus's, and whenever James used too much magic to find Sirius, Regulus would look more exhausted than he did the day before.

James wasn't really sure what he was exactly, all he knew was that Regulus was the reason he was there. He had no other option but to hang around and watch Regulus move through life, though he showed up when he could. That had its pros and cons though. He, of course, loved to see Regulus alive and surrounded by people who cared about him. Harry for one treated Regulus like he was one of the most important people in his life. Sirius seemed to be working overtime to repair their relationship and Remus, who had never really known Regulus, was going out of his way to watch out for him.

There were others too. Their friends who knew who Regulus really was, yet welcomed him with open arms. Like Hermione, a muggleborn girl, who reminded James a bit of Lily at that age, though Hermione was far more intense. Or Luna who, for some reason, could see James. He never had figured that bit out. Regulus didn't seem worried about it though, so he didn't dwell. James didn't think that the other girls Regulus was friends with knew who he was, but it still tickled him to see the way they latched onto him.

The cons weren't terrible, but they were still there. Alexander was a big one, the young man from another school who wanted to date Regulus. Or at least wanted to take him to the Yule Ball. James had to watch them flirt and dance, which was bad enough, but then he had to watch them kiss too. He never wanted to relive that moment. He hadn't quite figured out how to look away yet, how to let go.

There was also the fact that James had to watch as Regulus was tormented by Moody. James had known Moody at one point, and he had never been the most stable, but now there was something very clearly wrong with him. His magic felt like sulfur smelled, and he was very intent on harassing his students. The day James watched Moody cast the Imperius Curse on Regulus was one of the worst days of his afterlife.

He wasn't sure how he did it at the time, all he knew was that he wanted it to stop and that Regulus couldn't fight off the curse on his own. He had hoped that he could just add to his power, that he could just swarm in and make him stronger. Instead, whatever James did just caused Regulus to immediately lose consciousness. It also meant that James was oddly trapped within him like their magical cores were braided together. When he pulled away, so that he could talk to Regulus again, it felt like every part of his incomplete body was being lit on fire.

So they were not all good days, but they weren't all bad either. But the day of the third task — that was a bad day.

Regulus had rushed to Moody's office to steal back the Marauder's Map that Moody had taken from Harry earlier in the year. Sirius couldn't safely come to school without Regulus stealing it back, and all Regulus had to do was take one look at Harry to decide to risk it. James wasn't totally sure about the plan, but he figured the worst that could happen would be that he was caught and given detention. In all honesty, he didn't know why Moody wasn't told that Sirius was innocent. It seemed imperative that the ex-Auror be informed.

James was hovering near Regulus as he made his way out of the classroom. He wasn't really there at the moment, he was more just in the air that surrounded Regulus, almost as if he lived in his aura.

"You were breaking into my office," Moody said. There was something odd about his voice. James felt like he could feel the magic in the room shift, but he didn't think Regulus could sense it.

"Fred and George dared me to break in, but I couldn't get past the wards," Regulus said. It was a good lie, and he sounded convincing. For anyone else, it probably would have worked, but James could see that Moody had already made up his mind about Regulus. He probably had made up his mind about him long before that moment given the way his one good eye narrowed.

Moody's face twitched. "Clever, but not clever enough." He flung a silent spell at Regulus so quickly that even James couldn't spot it. Regulus had his wand out, but he was useless against Moody who had come ready for a fight.

Regulus went flying into the desks behind him. James could feel the physical pain of his back clattering against the wood, deep bruises already forming. Regulus tried to throw a spell back at Moody, but Moody blocked it and disarmed him easily, moving his wand almost as an afterthought.

“You always thought you were the smartest in the room,” Moody growled, the words spoken so low that James almost couldn’t make them out. Regulus tried to climb to his feet, but Moody hit him with another spell. James wasn’t sure what it was, but he could feel a burning sensation spreading up his arm, like someone had just injected him with poison that ate away at his flesh.

“Ah!” Regulus shouted, cradling his arm against his chest.

“Reg, get up,” James said quickly, pulling himself from the aura so that Regulus could see him. “You have to get out of here.” He realized only a second after he said the words that they were useless, obviously, Regulus knew they had to escape Moody.

“Did you know that I —” Moody started to say before he choked on the words. He shifted his head around in a way that reminded James a bit of a snake. A boil formed on the side of his face then skittered across like an insect running under his skin.

“Regulus, now, you need to get up now,” James said urgently. Regulus stumbled to his feet finally, his eyes glued to Moody who seemed to be struggling to remain standing, his entire body vibrating.

Regulus gave Moody a wide berth as he jogged toward the door, still cradling his arm. “Fuck,” Regulus hissed.

“What?” James said, appearing next to him. He wasn’t moving consciously, he had to work to do that, instead, he was just letting Regulus drag him around.

“The door — he’s locked it. I can’t get out without my wand,” Regulus said frantically. James turned to look at Moody who was now ripping off his magical eye while grunting in pain. It was grotesque to witness, his skin bubbling and shifting.

“Oh no,” Regulus said quietly.

“What’s happening to him?”

“That’s not Moody. He’s been drinking Polyjuice. Fuck, I’m so stupid. Snape mentioned — I should have realized,” Regulus said.

James was having trouble following the words, but there were more urgent things, like who Moody actually was. “Maybe the window? Could you get out that way?”

“We’re way too high off the ground, I wouldn’t survive that jump,” Regulus whispered.

“What if your magic just kicked in and saved you?”

“Please,” Regulus said dismissively.

“Who are you talking to?” Moody growled before falling heavily into a chair. His body was slowly going through its final metamorphosis. James watched in horror, unsure of what to do. He didn’t know where Regulus’s wand was, but he was pretty sure Moody — or whoever it was — had stuffed it in his jacket.

Regulus edged around the room, looking for something to use as a weapon. James stayed close to him because it was all he could do. James heard the sound of Moody's wooden leg clattering to the floor before silence filled the space. Finally, Moody had stopped shifting around, and James was able to look at him. He didn't recognize him right away, but Regulus did.

"Barty?" Regulus breathed, dropping whatever he was holding and taking two long steps forward.

"Reg, stop," James said in a panic, though his eyes were focused on the man's face. Barty. Barty Crouch Junior. The man that Regulus had gone to when he and James had broken up. The thought made him feel sick. He had always been a possessive person, though he tried hard not to act on it, but sometimes it just overwhelmed him.

"I thought — the Prophet — I thought you were dead," Regulus said, taking another step toward Barty as if he hadn't just attacked him and thrown him across the room.

"I guess I wasn't the only one then," Barty snarled, jumping to his feet and pointing his wand right at Regulus's face. Regulus flinched.

"What?" Regulus breathed.

"It took me a bit to figure it out," Barty said. "But you didn't work hard enough to hide it."

Regulus's face paled, and he staggered back a step. "Why are you here?" he asked softly.

"I looked for you. Did you know that? I looked for you for months. Even after they said you were dead. I thought there was no way you could have betrayed the Dark Lord."

"Barty," Regulus said quietly.

"Not weak little Regulus." Regulus flinched again. "There is no way he could have done that. No way that he could have left me there. Alone."

"I didn't —"

"But you did, didn't you? You never even died."

"I did die," Regulus said, his voice growing sharper. He looked angry, but James could feel the fear and unease building inside him.

"And look what's become of you. What was it? A de-aging option? I've read about them before, but I didn't think they were real."

"Barty!" Regulus yelled. "Why are you here?"

"The Dark Lord sent me," Barty said with a cruel twist of his mouth. Regulus took another step back.

"No," Regulus said. "That's impossible."

“He wanted your boy,” Barty said. James felt the way Regulus spasmed, though he was clearly trying to maintain control.

“My?”

“Harry,” Barty snapped. It seemed to take Regulus a long minute to process what Barty had just said. James himself was struggling to understand it. Barty had come for Harry. He had pretended to be Moody for months just to get to Harry. Regulus had been right, someone had entered him in the tournament to hurt him.

“If you touch him —” Regulus started to say.

“It’s a little late for that, don’t you think?” Barty said, pulling up his sleeve to show his Dark Mark. “Can’t you feel him?”

Regulus growled, and in the moment that Barty wasn’t pointing his wand at him, charged forward. He used his good arm to grab at Barty’s wand. James stood uselessly to the side unsure of how to help or what to do. Regulus just about got it, he just about managed to steal it, but Barty was bigger and stronger, he was faster.

He shot a spell at Regulus that caused him to stagger backward. “Traitor!” he yelled, his wand hand shaking slightly.

“I’m not —” Regulus said, trying to regain his footing, but it was too late.

“Crucio,” Barty whispered the word like it hurt him to say it, he didn’t even look angry. He looked hurt.

James didn’t feel the pain right away. He felt like he was watching in slow motion as Regulus crumbled to the ground, his screaming tearing out of his throat. For James it wasn’t immediate, instead, it was like touching something that was so hot that it felt cold at first. The pain came a moment later.

It was excruciating, but he knew that he was only feeling a fraction of what Regulus was experiencing. All of the feelings he got from Regulus came through like sound underwater, distorted and slow. Yet James was completely incapacitated by the pain. He couldn’t even imagine how Regulus was feeling.

Despite the sensation of his skin tearing from his bones, the worst part about it was the way Regulus screamed. It seemed to rip through James. He was on his hands and knees, though his form was fading. It was like Regulus was growing weaker, and James’s ability to appear was going with it.

He looked back over at Barty who looked like a madman, disconnected from the pain he was causing. The only indication of hatred was the slight curl to his top lip, a look of disdain that James would never forget. He had to stop him. He had to do something. Barty wasn’t lifting the spell.

James had to use every ounce of willpower that he had to move to Regulus's side. Regulus's eyes were open, but he couldn't see James. James didn't know if it was because of the spell or if James was no longer showing up. At first, James hoped that he could help Regulus in the same way he did with the Imperius Curse. Of course, that meant that Regulus would just be unconscious and at the complete mercy of Barty.

He had to come up with something else, but he didn't know what. The pain made it so he could barely think clearly. He brushed his fingers against Regulus's face hoping to provide some semblance of comfort. Regulus's eyes seemed to focus on him for a second when he felt the touch — storm clouds right before they burst — before they rolled back in his head.

It was then that James felt it. Magic. Before he had just been in the magic, but now he realized it was just Regulus's magic. He existed only because Regulus existed. He merely orbited him. But as Regulus suffered, as he was cracked open by the damaging Unforgivable curse, his magic seemed to escape, flowing out and wrapping around James like a shield. Like a weapon.

He felt the moment Regulus lost consciousness, the curse too much for his young body to bear. The pain for James ended almost completely, though Barty didn't lift the spell. He just held it on Regulus's unmoving body, attacking him and no doubt doing extensive damage. It didn't even appear to affect Barty. James had no idea how it couldn't. He had never cast an Unforgivable, but he couldn't imagine that it was easy.

Really, he thought that Barty cared about Regulus. How could he do something like this to him? And Harry. Where was Harry? Did Voldemort have him? James was useless. He couldn't do anything to help any of them. And worse than that, if Regulus survived this he would blame himself. If he survived, he thought again. James couldn't let that happen, he couldn't let him die.

The magic, Regulus's magic, he could feel it, and now that the pain was gone, he could wield it.

James had never cast an Unforgivable. He hadn't ever needed to. But he had already let this go on too long and without his help, Regulus wouldn't survive. He wondered if he could cast one now, in his moment of desperation.

Luckily, or unluckily, the decision was taken from him. He couldn't cast spells even with this magic, but he could feel that it would respond to him, that it would do what he asked, what he wanted. James stood, or he hovered, he couldn't be sure. All he knew was that he was face to face with Barty.

He planned to use the magic to stop him, to knock him out, to distract him, but the moment he stretched out a hand, Regulus regained consciousness. He woke up, and the pain from the Cruciatus Curse flooded back into his body. It swelled in James and in the magic that existed between them. All that pain and fear expanded the effects, he was sure of it. That was the only explanation for the way it reacted to his desire to stop Barty.

Barty shouted in distress, dropping his wand and looking down at his chest. He had only a moment to understand that something was very wrong, only a second to realize he was about to die. James wanted to stop him, and he did. Regulus grunted in pain as his magic was used to tear open Barty's chest, blood splattering across the desks and chairs. It would have been all over James's face had he been real.

The power behind it — the damage it did — caused Regulus to lose his last shred of energy. His body had been severely weakened from the curse, and now his magic had been ripped from him to kill someone. Regulus's head fell heavily against the ground, and James had only a second to look at him before the magic weakened too much, and he was gone.

the fight.

Chapter Notes

sorry in advance

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Before Barty, James could never figure out how to let go on command. He would come and go, drifting in and out of existence like a fish drifts through streams of water, but he didn't have control over it. And if he was present, he couldn't look away.

After Barty, James couldn't figure out how to hold on. Everything came in flashes, James would try to grip them, try to dig his proverbial nails in and stay, but he was always dragged away.

He witnessed Regulus in the Hospital Wing surrounded by Harry, Remus, and Sirius. He wasn't moving, but the sharp anxiety that surged through him felt like an attack. Something terrible had happened, and Regulus was worried about it.

The next moment it was Regulus sitting in the same hospital bed, but it was daytime, and the room was empty except for Snape who was slowly pouring a potion into Regulus's mouth. James would have rolled his eyes if he could.

Regulus and Snape were talking about something, but the words were muffled and indistinguishable. Snape stood up to leave and finally, a few of Regulus's words came through.

"He was my — he used to be my friend," he said roughly. James could feel the way his throat ached like he might start crying. Snape didn't respond, only looked on dispassionately. After a moment, Snape placed a firm hand on Regulus's shoulder. Regulus squeezed his eyes closed. James was swept away right as the feeling of hurt overcame him.

He witnessed Regulus walking into the Ministry. James could feel the licks of pain shooting down his back and legs as he moved. His walk was slow and wobbly, but Remus was right next to him, his arm discreetly tucked under Regulus's to help him stay standing. Regulus was worried about something again, but James didn't get to stay long enough to know what it was.

He thought the next moment might have been Regulus's birthday. He was sitting in a wide wingback chair surrounded by presents. He had a quiet smile on his face, and to any outsider, he looked content, but James could feel his emotions. Inside there was a yawning loneliness that was taking over, burrowing its way out of Regulus and making a home on the surface.

Someone handed him another gift, James couldn't see who it was, but Regulus opened it slowly. His hands were shaking, but the pain wasn't that overwhelming. In the wrapping paper were three books that were tied together with a small pink ribbon. Regulus laughed when he read the titles, his cheeks blazing with good-natured embarrassment. The smile on his face didn't touch his eyes.

Regulus was at dinner the next time he saw him. It took him a few seconds to realize that the room must have been at Grimmauld. It was the most present that James had felt since Barty's death. He could make out the rest of the room and all its occupants. And there were so many occupants.

Regulus was sitting between Harry and Hermione, though he wasn't speaking to either of them. He was quietly contemplating all of the other people at the table with him, looking at each of them in turn, the feeling of loneliness only growing with every person.

Harry and Ron were caught up in a lively conversation with a pair of twins that James didn't know. A red-headed girl was listening to them, her eyes lingering on Harry's face. It was sweet, the way she watched him. However, James wondered if he was the only one who noticed the way her gaze flicked over to another woman sitting a few seats down every couple of minutes.

James had never seen the woman before. She had bright violet hair that was cropped short so that it stuck up in a spiky hairstyle. She was talking excitedly to Remus, a light blush on her cheeks and a twinkling in her eyes. Remus was listening attentively, nodding along with whatever she was talking about. Oh no, James thought. He immediately searched around for Sirius.

Sirius was sitting at the head of the table, looking forlorn and irritated in equal measure as he watched Remus and the woman speak. His hands were tucked under the table, but James could see the way he was fidgeting restlessly, dark circles under his eyes. He looked like he hadn't eaten properly in weeks.

There were others too, a whole hoard of other people that James didn't know. Regulus clearly knew them all though, and every now and then James would feel a small flash of emotion as Regulus looked at them. James wondered if Regulus would be able to see him now, he felt almost like he had before Barty, but not once did Regulus's eyes linger on his.

James blinked out of existence and blinked back a second later, except now it was to Regulus sitting on the roof of Grimmauld Place. Sirius had explained the area to him enough times for him to recognize it immediately. Harry climbed through the window to sit next to Regulus.

"Sure you don't want to come down and join us?" Harry asked, a hopeful look in his eye.

"I will in a bit," Regulus said with a small smile. Harry looked concerned.

"Want me to help you climb down?" Harry asked uncertainly. Regulus scowled, though he turned his face away so that Harry wouldn't see it.

“That’s all right,” Regulus said. Harry was quiet for a second, before he got up to leave. “Oh, before you go.”

“Yeah?” Harry said, the hopeful look was back.

“I wanted to give this to you in private. Don't show it to anyone, okay?” Regulus said, handing a book to Harry whose eyes widened. “Happy birthday.”

“Really?” Harry breathed, the smile on his face growing comically wide. James tried to get a look at the book, dead curious about what it could be, but he drifted away before he could see it.

James came right into an argument the next time.

“I want to visit them. It’s not fair that I’ve never gotten to,” Harry said sharply. Regulus was sitting on the couch nearby, rubbing his eyes tiredly. Sirius was frowning at Harry.

“I know that —” Sirius said.

“It’s never going to be safe at this rate,” Harry shouted. His eyes were bloodshot like he hadn’t slept well. The scar on his forehead was inflamed making it look like he was bleeding.

“It will be,” Remus assured. “One day it will be perfectly safe.”

“Oh, safe like the years you spent pretending Voldemort wasn’t alive anymore?” Harry said. Regulus didn’t flinch, but his nerves seemed to light on fire for a second upon hearing the name. He gasped in pain, though it was very quiet.

“Harry, now is not the right time,” Sirius said. “Let’s at least wait to see what Dumbledore says.”

“Of course,” Harry said petulantly, stomping out of the room.

“He’s not going to let this go,” Sirius said softly. His eyes lingered on Remus’s face, but Remus wasn’t looking at him. James’s heart hurt watching them. Regulus just looked tired.

“Please, Regulus. We’ll be careful. I’ll stay under the cloak. Come on, just for an hour,” Harry said. James hadn’t even realized that he’d drifted, but he was in a different moment now. Harry and Regulus were talking in a bedroom.

“I’m not strong enough to protect you on my own,” Regulus said, a thick layer of shame dusting over his skin.

“No one is going to spot us,” Harry argued. “You won’t even need to protect me.”

James didn't know what they were talking about, but he was inclined to agree with Remus and Sirius if they said it wasn’t safe. Still, Harry was very hard to say no to. James finally understood why his parents were so inclined to give in to almost every whim he had when James was a child. Harry asking for something was like someone trying to carve out your organs one by one, the pain of denial too intense to bear. He didn't think he would be able to say no, so he didn't blame Regulus when he sighed and rolled his eyes.

"Just for an hour," Regulus said.

"Yes!" Harry whisper-shouted.

It took James a long moment to figure out where they were the next time he saw them. It's odd to look at them through the invisibility cloak. Regulus was clear as day, but Harry looked like a wraith floating in the space beside Reg. James glanced around as their surroundings came into focus. They were in a graveyard.

Oh. Coming face to face with his own headstone had not been what he was expecting. James Potter and Lily Potter, a couple doomed to fail sharing a gravestone for the rest of eternity. It felt a bit like being mocked. James wondered if seeing Lily's name hurt Regulus. If it had been Regulus and Barty's grave, he would have been hurt.

"The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death," Harry said quietly. "Isn't that a Death Easter idea? Why is that there?" Harry's voice grew vaguely frantic as he spoke. Regulus shook his head.

"No, I don't think so," Regulus said quietly. "I think it means living after death." His face twisted as he said it, a frown tugging at his lips. That lonely feeling was back, gnawing and all-consuming for a moment. James was so busy looking at his face, feeling his pain, that he almost missed the way Regulus started to feel sick.

Harry shivered suddenly. "Bit cold for August, isn't it?" Harry said. Regulus tore his eyes away from the gravestone, and his face instantly paled.

"What is that?" he breathed, though they all knew what it was. A huge, hooded figure was gliding toward them, floating right above the ground, weaving between gravestones. Pain flared in Regulus's body, his knees buckling. "Harry, run!"

James didn't see what happened next. This time as he was ripped from existence, it felt like someone was trying to skin him alive.

"I cannot believe you! You knew how dangerous it was." Sirius was yelling, his voice sharp with anger and deeply buried worry. Regulus was sitting on a bed, the pain in his body worse than it had been all summer.

"I know," he replied weakly.

"Do you? Do you know? Because we already discussed this, but you went behind our backs to lead Harry directly into danger. You're barely strong enough to walk, let alone perform magic."

"I'm sorry," Regulus voice was rough.

“You both could have been killed or worse!” Sirius shouted. Regulus flinched.

“Sirius, I think that’s enough,” Remus said, slipping into the room. Sirius sneered at him so viciously that Remus visibly recoiled before Sirius turned back to Regulus.

“If Harry gets expelled because of this, it’s your fault,” Sirius snapped.

“I know,” Regulus repeated softly, closing his eyes in pain.

“Get out of my way,” Sirius snarled at Remus, shoving passed him to storm out of the bedroom, slamming the door behind him. Remus watched him go with an indecipherable look on his face, he turned to stare at Regulus a second later.

He gave Regulus a long look, though Regulus still had his eyes closed and couldn’t see him. “Do you need a pain draught?” he asked.

“No,” Regulus said through clenched teeth. It was obvious that he was lying, it would have been even if James wasn’t experiencing the pain Regulus was feeling.

“Sirius will —“

“Just leave it, Lupin,” Regulus said. “I doubt you’re the expert on Sirius.”

Remus froze for a second. “What do you mean?” Regulus rubbed his eyes with one hand before dropping it to glare at Remus. The anger Regulus was feeling was suddenly overwhelming.

“I’ve never liked the way you abandoned Harry,” Regulus said, his voice deadly calm. “But I understood that you didn’t do it on purpose. I knew you were suffering. I never thought you were cruel. But now...”

Remus’s face twitched dangerously. “Now?”

“Perhaps you should consider courting my cousin somewhere other than the house where my brother lives,” Regulus said cuttingly. The words landed like a hailstorm, just as Regulus intended them to.

“I don’t know what you’re talking about,” Remus said, though he looked vaguely haunted.

“Of course, you don’t,” Regulus said with a dismissive smirk. It didn’t touch his eyes, but the cruelty was clear as day. James wanted to yell, to tell Remus not to trust it, to tell him that Regulus was just lashing out because he was angry with himself and in so much pain that he could barely think straight. He couldn’t warn him though, and Remus reacted as emotionally as James, and Regulus, expected him to.

“You should be careful, Black,” he snapped. “I’m not the only one who’s been cruel to Sirius.”

Regulus’s eyes narrowed. “If you’re talking about when we were kids —”

“No,” Remus said, a feral glint in his eyes. “You know exactly what I’m talking about. Sixth year, wasn’t it? Or I guess it was fifth year for you.”

The room seemed to freeze. Regulus’s eyes widened for only a split second before his face settled into an empty mask. Remus just stared back looking equal parts horrified and triumphant. As James was swept away, he audibly shouted. He desperately wanted to know how that conversation was going to end. He should have realized that Remus knew. He knew this entire time, and he never said anything, though James had no idea why not.

“You’re not mad at me too, are you?” Harry asked moodily. He was sitting cross-legged on a bed, picking distractedly at his pajama bottoms.

Regulus sighed, he was leaning heavily against the doorframe. James could feel the way his legs ached. “Harry, of course, I’m not angry with you. It was my fault.”

Harry gave a very put-upon sigh. “No, it wasn’t. I shouldn’t have convinced you to go.”

“I shouldn’t have been convinced,” Regulus said with a small chuckle. “Honestly, we could do this all night. Let’s call it even, yeah?” He sighed again, this one laced with pain. Harry must have grown accustomed to the noise.

“Do you want to sit?” Harry asked. Regulus shook his head.

“I’m fine,” he responded. Harry didn’t look satisfied, but he didn’t argue. He looked away distracted for another long moment and neither of them spoke.

“If they do expel me —”

“They won’t,” Regulus said swiftly. Harry looked up for only a second before looking away again.

“But if they do. Can I still come back and live with you?”

“Harry,” Regulus said softly. “Of course.”

“They’ll snap my wand,” Harry said sullenly. He looked like he was working hard not to spiral.

“If they do that, then we will get you a new one, just like Lupin did for Sirius. Then I’ll teach you myself, okay?”

Harry smiled slightly and finally relaxed. “Thanks, Reg.”

Regulus smiled at him before leaving to slowly walk to his own bedroom. The moment he was alone, the aching loneliness was back. It had been there for weeks, only growing worse as the days passed. Regulus sat down heavily on the bed, rubbing his legs as if to warm them.

It was the first moment of quiet contemplation that James had since Barty’s death, but now that he had a second to really think about how Regulus had been feeling, he saw something that he hadn't before. The loneliness that Regulus was battling had been there for a long time, but it had grown worse. It seemed to consume him now, any second that his thoughts got away from him, his loneliness crashed into him like a violent wave.

All James wanted was for Regulus to be surrounded by people who loved him, and he was. Even with the fight with Sirius, and the argument with Remus, there were still people who cared about what happened to Regulus. Yet that loneliness persisted. If anything, it seemed to be getting worse. James wished he could fix it, he wished he could settle into his life and cradle Regulus in his arms. He wished he could heal all the gaping loneliness, sealing it up so that it could never hurt him again.

He would never be able to though. He was dead. He was gone. Though he lingered here, imprisoned in this middle ground, tied to Regulus and his magic, he wasn't really here. And he never would be.

James was in limbo, and he was keeping Regulus there with him. He was trapping him without even realizing it, and unless he did something, the loneliness would get worse and worse until all Regulus had was James, a dead man anchoring to a half-life.

Regulus gasped. James hadn't noticed that he was looking at him. "You're back," Regulus said, he smiled softly. He was so beautiful, those glittering eyes and dark curls. James wanted to cry.

"I am," James said stiffly. Regulus's smile faltered.

"What happened? I haven't seen you in so long. Not since —" Regulus said, he tried to stand, but his legs wouldn't hold him anymore.

"Not since Barty," James said. He wanted to go to him, to touch his hand, to hold him. He didn't let himself move.

"Right," Regulus said faintly. "What — how — what happened exactly?"

James sighed. "He was going to kill you," James said. "I had to stop him. I didn't mean to kill him."

Regulus nodded stiltedly, looking down at his hands for a moment. "Thank you."

James grimaced slightly, though he wasn't sure if Regulus noticed. "I'm sorry that happened. How have you been since..." he trailed off.

Regulus shrugged. "Fine. A bit of pain." That was an understatement. "And my magic was a little damaged afterward, but I'll make a full recovery." James had no idea if that was true. He hoped it was.

"What's been going on since then?" James asked, edging the conversation in the direction he needed it to go. The look of shame that crossed Regulus's face was so potent that it made James feel a bit sick.

“Have you seen anything?” Regulus asked, appearing a bit like a child who was holding a stolen piece of candy behind their back.

James shrugged. “A few things,” he replied. Regulus nodded.

“I made a stupid mistake,” Regulus muttered. “Harry and I were attacked by dementors.”

“Are you both okay?” he asked.

“Yes,” Regulus responded quickly before hesitating. “Thanks to Harry. I wasn’t able to — I can’t cast the Patronus Charm.”

James sighed so quietly that Regulus couldn’t hear him. The in he needed it. He didn’t want it. “Why not?”

Regulus shrugged again. “I’ve just never been able to.” James understood what Regulus wasn’t saying, that he never had a happy enough memory to summon a Patronus. Sirius had had a similar problem when they were young, it took him a long time to cast one, though he eventually managed.

Regulus clearly hadn’t had the same encouragement that Sirius had. James squeezed his eyes shut for a second. He thought about Regulus that night when the two of them watched Harry surrounded by his friends after the first task. “He’s all you,” Regulus had said with a sad little smile.

“No, no, he’s not,” James had responded thoughtlessly. At the time, he had been thinking about how much like Regulus Harry was. Almost as if Regulus himself had raised him. He could see so much of him in the way Harry talked and acted. He didn’t realize until later how Regulus had taken his statement. He thought he meant Lily, and that idea wounded him deeply. And now here was James, preparing to rub salt in that wound.

“It’s all about finding your happiest memory. Or your most content,” James said. Regulus rolled his eyes like he was about to say something, but James forged on. “For me, it was Lily.”

Regulus froze, staring at James like a wounded animal. He didn’t even have time to remember to hide his emotions before James continued.

“Before Lily, I never really had a memory that was happy enough. Sure there was stuff with my parents and my friends, but Lily was really the reason I was able to cast one.” That was a lie. James had figured out how to cast one shortly before he and Regulus began dating, using the memory of becoming an animagus to conjure one.

“Oh,” Regulus breathed. James could feel Regulus’s pain, the way it mixed in with his own, creating a dangerous concoction of suffering that he had never experienced before.

“Did you know that she had a similar Patronus to me? Mine’s a stag, her’s was a doe. My mother said that meant we were soulmates,” James said. He looked away, trying to appear wistful, mostly he was trying to keep hold of his emotions. In truth, his mother said nothing of the sort. What she actually said was, “Just because you think she’s meant for you, doesn't mean you own her.”

Regulus didn’t respond. He was still frozen on his bed, the pain in his limbs growing by the second. James wasn't just causing him emotional pain, he was physically hurting him, but it couldn’t be helped.

“Honestly, I don’t think I was satisfied until I was with her. Before we got together, I always just felt so... empty.”

“I didn’t realize you felt like that,” Regulus said, the words seemed to cost him a great deal.

“You never asked,” James said even though it wasn’t fair at all. Regulus wasn’t one to ask questions like that, but it didn’t mean he didn’t care. James knew this fact well. Still, he could see the way something cracked behind Regulus’s eyes.

“Right,” Regulus said, swallowing harshly.

James didn’t know what he would say next, if he would yell or say something cruel, if he would turn mean. Or if he would call James out on his lie, if he would fight him on it, tell him that he knew the truth of how James felt about him. James almost wished he would do that, he wished Regulus would give him an excuse to stay. He figured anything was possible.

Instead of that, Regulus just clenched his jaw and looked away. “I think you should leave,” he said.

“What?” James said stupidly as if he hadn’t been pushing for this.

“I don't want you here,” Regulus said. “I don't want to see you anymore.”

James waited a moment to see if Regulus would turn back to look at him one final time. He didn’t though. Regulus was looking resolutely the other way. James nodded, even though he couldn't be seen. He didn't say anything else.

James hadn’t known how to look away before, and then he hadn’t known how to hang on. He knew how to do both now, he understood it all. That’s why he was able to let go, to really let go, to drift off into Regulus’s magic, back into the storm where he was formed.

James let go, and he didn’t feel anything for a long time.

Chapter End Notes

so the original plan for this chapter was to have it all from regulus's point of view, but i realized that that might be perhaps a bit too cruel given the content.

the toad.

Regulus's bones ached on the walk to the Hogwarts Express. They'd been hurting all summer, but they hurt especially bad today. Harry kept close to him, watching the way he walked to check in and see if he might fall over randomly. Regulus wanted to be annoyed by it, he hated feeling so helpless, but mostly he was glad for Harry's presence.

"Should we go and find a compartment, then?" Harry asked just as Fred and George left them to trail after their friend Lee, mentioning something about 'business' that they had to deal with. Regulus wasn't about to ask about it, it was bad enough that they were building it off all the money he had given them last year. No wonder Molly didn't like him. Harry had also given them his winnings from the Triwizard Tournament as an investment, but Molly seemed to brush right over that fact.

"Er. Well, Ron and I —" Hermione started to say, looking supremely uncomfortable, as she had many times over the past week.

"They have to meet up with the other prefects," Regulus said. Hermione looked grateful like she didn't want to mention it herself. She probably didn't given how upset Harry had been that he was looked over for the role.

"Oh, right," Harry said with a slight frown. Ron was looking away like something out the window was terribly interesting.

"Let's see if we can find Luna and Neville," he said, already heading away from Ron and Hermione. Harry kept speaking with them for a second before following.

"Hermione's upset that Padfoot came with us, says that he shouldn't have risked it," Harry complained as they walked. He should have expected that, over the summer, she'd grown very annoyed with Sirius.

Regulus shrugged. "She might be right, but I'm not sure that we could have stopped him." Sirius had always been impulsive and strong-willed, though that was only growing worse by the day.

Harry was quiet for a second. "Are he and Remus fighting?"

"Yes," Regulus answered honestly. He had vowed not to lie to Harry when he didn't have to. They maneuvered around a bunch of students who were loitering outside of one carriage, a group of them stuffed inside, all of them surrounding the smallest Puffskein that Regulus had ever seen.

"Why?" Harry asked once they were clear of the group.

"They're always fighting," Regulus mumbled. "But I'm pretty sure it's about Tonks this time."

“Sirius doesn’t seem to like her,” Harry said quietly. Regulus burst out laughing against his will. That was putting it lightly.

“No, I can’t imagine that he does.”

“But you both are related to her, right? I mean, you’re family. Shouldn’t you get along?”

“You are related to the Dursleys, do you get along with them?”

“Well, no. But that’s different. Tonks isn’t anything like them.” Harry, like many of the teens in Grimmauld, had grown fascinated by Tonks. He didn’t blame them, she was kind and lively. She had an air about her that made it easy to approach her and talk to her, not that Regulus did himself, but he noticed the rest of them do it.

“She’s much more palatable, that’s true. Perhaps a bit too palatable for Sirius’s liking.”

Harry didn’t get a chance to respond as they arrived at the last carriage where Neville and Luna were sitting. Regulus was grateful for the interruption though, he wasn’t keen on explaining the love triangle spawning between his brother, his cousin, and Remus Lupin. It was bad enough having to witness it, especially with Lupin’s supposed knowledge about him and James.

Right after Lupin had let slip the accusation, Regulus had been distracted by the sound of far-off shouting, and by the time he looked back up, Lupin was gone and they hadn’t spoken again since. He was afraid at first that Lupin would mention it to Sirius, but for the time being, he was staying silent. Or Sirius was just avoiding Lupin, that was very possible.

“Hey guys, hey Ginny,” Neville said. Regulus had forgotten that Ginny was behind them. She had been sticking close to Harry all summer.

“All right, Neville?” Harry asked as they all shuffled in. “Hi, Luna.” Harry quickly stowed his trunk, grabbing Regulus’s out of his hand before Regulus could even protest. Not that he was going to, he was sure he wouldn’t be able to lift it. He slowly sat down in the seat by the window, Ginny grabbing his arm to steady him seemingly without thinking.

“Are you well, Regulus?” Luna asked, setting down her copy of The Quibbler to look at him.

“I’m fine,” he said. “Just a bit sore.”

“Don’t worry, Regulus. We don’t believe what they’ve been saying about you in the papers,” Neville said solemnly. “You either, Harry.”

Ah, yes, the Prophet. They had been quite the pest all summer. After Fudge had dismissed everything Harry had said about the Dark Lord rising again, he had focused nearly all of his energy on making Regulus out to be a murderer and depicting Harry as an insane, attention-seeker.

Harry was beyond irritated by it. He clearly felt hopeless about the situation, not to mention that he had been having nightmares all summer about his confrontation with the Dark Lord.

Sirius had taken to sleeping in Harry's room with him, curling up as Padfoot and snoring at the foot of his bed.

Regulus just felt apathetic. He didn't murder Barty, James had confirmed that, but it hardly mattered. Barty was still dead. Regulus had been brought into the Ministry several times throughout the summer for questioning, but they had yet to make any decision or claim about how he'd done it. Tonks kept telling him not to worry about it, that most of them knew he was innocent, or at the very least only killed Barty out of self-defense, but Regulus wasn't sure that he cared either way.

The Dark Lord was back, and they were no closer to finding the remaining Horcruxes. What would it matter if he was thrown in Azkaban? Most of the time, he just felt numb. After his final conversation with James, he had shut down his thoughts so thoroughly that he couldn't feel anything at all. It was better that way.

"Thanks, guys," Harry mumbled when Regulus didn't bother to respond. Regulus looked out the window as the train began pulling out of the station, letting Neville's and Harry's voices fade into the background. His mind drifted into a pleasant quiet as he watched the world around them pass by. They made it out of London quickly, and before he knew it, they were surrounded by greenery on all sides.

In retrospect, he should have paid closer attention if he didn't want to get a face full of Stinksap. He should have known better by now than to trust anything these Gryffindors would do when left to their own devices.

"Er, sorry, I've never tried that before," Neville said uncomfortably, shaking his head around to clear the Stinksap out of his eyes. It had come from the odd plant that sat in his lap, something that Regulus didn't recognize or care to learn about.

Ginny cleaned them up of the Stinksap right away, before Regulus could even pull out his wand. He wondered if he would be able to complete that spell on his own. Probably not. He drifted back into the silence of his mind, leaning his head against the window. He hadn't slept well in weeks, but last night was especially restless. Every time he drifted off even a little bit, sharp pains would shoot down from his back to the bottom of his feet and wake him up. He didn't fall asleep in the carriage, but it was a close thing.

It took a while for Ron and Hermione to show back up, with Draco arriving just a bit after for the explicit purpose of taunting Harry. Harry, as usual, rose to the bait and snapped back at him. Regulus just watched idly as they spoke, Hermione and Ron both growing angry as the argument carried on.

"I seem to have touched a nerve," Draco said with a mean smirk. "Well, just watch yourself, Potter, because I'll be dogging your footsteps in case you step out of line." Harry froze, Hermione already jumping to her feet to tell Draco to leave. His smirk widened just a bit more, but his eyes lingered on Regulus's for a split second before he turned to leave. There was an unsettled look there that Regulus was having trouble deciphering.

He stomped off a second later, and Regulus debated whether he should follow him. Surely the use of the word 'dogging' wasn't accidental, but did that mean that he knew about Sirius?

Perhaps Peter had told them, at least the other Death Eaters, but Draco? That seemed odd. He would have to ask Snape what he knew once he arrived at the castle.

They made it to Hogwarts without another incident, but by the time Regulus sat at the Gryffindor table, he was limping badly. He doubted he would be able to make it up to the common room on his own. It didn't help that the entire student body seemed keen on whispering about him and Harry, many of them glancing over their shoulders or openly staring at them. They would no doubt be under heavy surveillance this year.

Hagrid was missing from the professors' table, Regulus noticed, though based on the last thing Sirius had mentioned to him before they stopped speaking, he was probably still out on the mission that Dumbledore had given him. Harry, Hermione, and Ron seemed very worried though. They weren't permitted in any of the Order of the Phoenix meetings and weren't as up-to-date as Regulus was. Not that Regulus was exactly allowed in either, Dumbledore thought it would be too dangerous for that many people to know who he truly was, but he was given a run down after each gathering.

"Who is that?" Hermione asked sharply, pointing discreetly at the staff table. Regulus followed her finger and noticed a woman sitting right next to Dumbledore, his head inclined toward hers as she spoke in his ear. She was dressed in a bright pink cardigan that she wore over her matching robes. Regulus's stomach sank the moment he saw her.

"It's that Umbridge woman!" Harry squawked.

"Who?" Hermione asked.

"She was at my hearing, she works for Fudge," Harry explained.

Regulus had been called into Harry's hearing to act as a witness for the dementors that attacked them — not that his testimony meant much considering more than half of the ministry thought he was a murderer. Regardless, he got to witness firsthand as Umbridge, Fudge's right-hand woman, worked to ensure that Harry was expelled. Regulus wanted to tear her apart with his bare hands, though he at least felt comforted by the fact that he would never see her again after the hearing. At least, that's what he thought at the time.

"What on earth is she doing here, then?"

"The ministry passed a decree over the summer saying that they could appoint professors if Dumbledore couldn't find anyone to fill the spot," Regulus explained. "Fudge probably planted her here so that he could have some semblance of control."

"You think she's a professor? What is she going to teach?" Hermione asked though he could see from the dawning horror on her face that she already knew the answer to that question.

"It's obvious, isn't it? There is only one position that needs to be filled every year," Ron muttered.

This was bad. This was very bad. They would have to be extra careful. There was no doubt in his mind that she would be doing everything in her power to get both Harry and Regulus expelled. He didn't much care if he was expelled, but he would need to protect Harry. They settled into a conversation about their O.W.L. year as they ate the feast, dropping the conversation about Umbridge for the time being. Regulus wasn't able to stomach much of the food, and his hands still shook slightly, making controlling a fork and knife a bit too difficult to manage in shared company.

"Who is captain of the team this year?" Neville asked.

"Angelina Johnson," Harry replied. "I'm interested to see how she runs practice."

"I think I might try out this year," Ron said with great pride. Harry smiled brightly.

"You definitely should."

"Have you thought about trying out?" Hermione asked, directing her question at Regulus. He laughed quietly.

"No," Regulus said. "I definitely won't be doing that."

"Why not?" Ginny asked keenly.

"Just doubt I would be able to beat Harry for a spot on the team," Regulus said with another laugh.

"You're a seeker then?" Neville asked. Regulus shrugged, but Harry was watching him with surprise like he had forgotten that fact.

"Not a very good one." He actually hadn't been that bad during his first life, but given the physical pain he was in, he had no desire to try out even as an alternate.

"Maybe I'll try out," Ginny said with a small smile.

By the time the food disappeared, Regulus was feeling pleasantly tired. He was looking forward to sleeping in his bed in Gryffindor Tower. He'd grown tired of his bed at home, often feeling suffocated and uncomfortable, and he was excited to get away from it. Dumbledore began his yearly announcements a moment after the food disappeared.

"We have had two changes to our staff this year. Please welcome back Professor Grubbly-Plank who will be taking over Care of Magical Creatures for the time being," he said. Regulus shared a look with his friends. "We are also delighted to introduce Professor Umbridge, our new Defense Against the Dark Arts teacher."

Dumbledore tried to continue with his announcements when he was interrupted by Umbridge clearing her throat with a high-pitched hem, hem. She spoke like she was trying to trick little kids into jumping into an oven, her voice like nails on a chalkboard. Regulus hated her.

"I'll be her friend as long as I don't have to borrow that cardigan," Pavarti whispered to Lavender as Umbridge spoke, both of them falling into silent laughs that made Regulus's lips twitch into a small smile.

He found that he missed how lighthearted both of them could be, even in the face of something awful. During the summer, he had exchanged letters with both of them. They were very interested in his recovery, though they didn't know the full details about what had happened to him. They even sent him a new stack of romance novels for his birthday, a gift that kept him going in the lonely summer months.

Umbridge talked for a long time, mincing words and dancing around the subject matter that she was clearly intent on actually discussing. Regulus wondered if the rest of the student body was following what she wasn't actually saying.

"Let us move forward, then, into a new era of openness, effectiveness, and accountability, intent on preserving what ought to be preserved, perfecting what needs to be perfected, and pruning wherever we find practices that ought to be prohibited," she said before finally sitting down.

It reminded Regulus of the way his mother used to speak at family gatherings, often going on long tangents about "protecting tradition" and "ensuring that wizarding society was not tainted by those who do not understand it." He never really understood what that meant, not until it was far too late for him. Sirius somehow figured out that it was wrong, but Regulus had missed that train. That, or he was just too complacent to question the words coming out of his family's mouths.

"Yes, that was certainly illuminating," Hermione grumbled, her eyebrows furrowed in a scowl.

"You're not telling me you enjoyed it?" Ron asked.

"No," Regulus said. "She's saying that Umbridge just revealed her cards. She was speaking directly to those who already agree with her."

"What does that mean?"

"Progress for progress's sake must be discouraged?" Hermione repeated. "Pruning wherever we find practices that ought to be prohibited?" She said the words like it was obvious, which to someone like her, it probably was. Harry and Ron just looked confused. Even Ginny and Neville, who were listening in none too subtly, looked bewildered.

"Well, what does it mean?" Ron asked.

"It means that the Ministry is interfering at Hogwarts," Hermione said ominously.

Harry's eyebrows raised, and he looked questioningly at Regulus. "I'll explain later," he said. "For now, we need to get back up to the Tower. I have to meet with Snape first, so I'll meet you up there."

"Want me to go with you?" Harry asked.

"No, that's fine. I need to ask him something, and I doubt he will give me an honest answer if you're with me."

Harry nodded before standing to head out of the Great Hall. Ron and Hermione left to guide the first years to the dorms. Regulus stayed where he was, waiting until the Great Hall was slightly more empty before attempting to walk. The hard seats at the Gryffindor table had made his legs go numb and he already knew he would have trouble standing. He watched closely as Umbridge left the room, her eyes never once landing on him, which he was grateful for. He didn't think he would be able to deal with a confrontation with her tonight.

"Mr. Black, what are you waiting for?" a stern voice asked him. He looked up to see McGonagall frowning down at him.

"Sorry, Professor," he said. "I need to speak with Professor Snape."

"What about?" she asked, giving him a suspicious look that almost made him want to start laughing. He looked around quickly, but the table was nearly empty, and no one was close enough to hear him.

"He has been providing me with potions to help with my nerve damage. I need to take some before I can walk up to Gryffindor Tower," Regulus said. He tried to keep his voice matter-of-fact, but he couldn't help the slight blush that spread across his face. McGonagall softened.

"Of course," she said. She turned to walk away and he only barely noticed her pulling her wand out of her sleeve. She cast a silent spell at him that seemed to numb his back and legs. He breathed a sigh of relief, having forgotten what it felt like to not be in constant pain. He knew it wouldn't last, but it would at least help him walk to Snape's office.

The spell was odd because although it worked extremely well when cast by a skilled witch or wizard, long-term use could cause nerve damage of its own. It was heavily discouraged by the healer Regulus had seen at the end of last year before he regained the use of any of his limbs. He wasn't sure that he cared that it would cause more issues though, he wished he could cast the spell on himself every day. Unfortunately, whatever James had done with his magic had torn his magical core to shreds, and he could barely cast wingardium leviosa without getting winded.

He still had to walk slowly to Snape's office, but it wasn't nearly as bad as it could have been. He knocked once on the door, waiting until he heard the faint, "Come in," before entering.

Snape looked up for a moment to see who it was before looking back at an old book that he had opened on the desk in front of him.

"We need to talk about Draco," Regulus said the moment the door was closed behind him. Snape's eyebrows twitched, but that was the only reaction that he gave, looking blandly at Regulus's face.

"I believed you were here for this month's dosage," Snape said mildly.

"I am," he said. Snape had been providing him with potions all summer to help with the pain and the damage that was done to his magical core. They were helping, but very, very slowly.

“Does Draco know about Sirius’s animagus form?”

Snape gave him a long silent look before answering. “I don’t see why he would,” he said finally.

“But the other Death Eaters know?” Regulus asked.

“Yes, Peter told them,” Snape answered, saying the words like they meant nothing. All the Death Eaters knew. The Dark Lord knew. Sirius wouldn’t be able to leave Grimmauld again, not with this threat, and he was already doing so poorly there. “Anything else?”

Regulus closed his eyes and sighed quietly. His head already hurt and the year hadn’t even started yet. “One other thing,” Regulus said. Snape tipped his head, the only indicator he gave for Regulus to go on. “The snake.”

Snape made a small sound, so quiet that Regulus almost missed it.

“What do you know about her?” Harry had been talking about her all summer, she played a prominent role in his nightmares after the confrontation in the graveyard.

“Not much,” Snape admitted. “I have yet to see her in person.” Regulus knew that Snape had returned to the Dark Lord’s side under Dumbledore’s instruction. He had no idea how he managed it without getting himself killed. Though he would never admit it out loud, he was a bit impressed. He didn’t think he could make himself face the Dark Lord again, let alone lie to him.

“Can you find out more?”

“For example?” Snape asked.

“Like what kind of snake she is? It might be a good idea to develop an anti-venom if she attacks someone.”

“Attacks someone?” Snape said, the first hint of a smile on his face. Regulus rolled his eyes.

“Not that it matters, but Harry is very worried about it. Can you just look it up, please?”

Snape shook his head slightly but ultimately agreed to look into it. Regulus breathed a sigh of relief. He didn’t know why the snake put him on edge, but hearing Harry wake up screaming all summer hadn’t helped. Having anyone researching it made him feel better.

He walked back up to Gryffindor Tower after taking his potions. He moved slowly, enjoying the feeling of being back in Hogwarts, even if it was infested with Fudge’s poisonous toad. He felt safe here, and he felt grateful to be away from Grimmauld and all the drama held there. The corridors of Hogwarts seemed to welcome him home as he traveled through them like the castle itself was breathing a sigh of relief. Regulus breathed with it.

There were no memories of his and James’s final conversation about Lily and his patronus or the terrible loneliness that seemed to nest inside him at home. He had locked them away before leaving, but at Hogwarts, it was like they existed so far away from him that they could never touch him again. He couldn't even feel the pain that existed there. More than that he didn't have to try and avoid Molly, Remus, or his belligerent brother while at Hogwarts. For now, that would be enough.

surprise, surprise

It was a very long first day of classes. It seemed to be never-ending and by the time Regulus made it to Defense Against the Dark Arts, their final class of the day, he was about ready to shove his wand into his eye socket and kill himself.

When he had made it to the dorm the night prior, everyone had already been in bed and fast asleep, Ron snoring loudly, his legs hanging off the bed. It wasn't until the next morning that he discovered the feud that was brewing between Seamus and Harry.

"Seamus figures Harry is lying about You-Know-Who," Ron said succinctly.

"He's not the only one," Hermione muttered, though she didn't elaborate on who she meant. It wasn't a surprise that many thought Harry was lying, especially after the long summer of the Prophet trying to slander him, but it was bewildering to Regulus that one of Harry's dormmates would feel that way. Seamus had known Harry for years, and though they hadn't always been close, they were at least friends.

Tension just got worse as the day went on, and not just between Seamus. Ron and Hermione were at each other's throats right from the off.

"We will have to talk to them," Hermione said with a stormy look on her face.

"Why?" Ron asked, shocked.

"Because we're prefects. It's up to us to put a stop to it," Hermione said.

They continued to bicker about it all the way to the Great Hall and throughout breakfast. Hermione kept lamenting about how they were getting the money to run their illegal business, to which Harry was carefully avoiding eye contact. They hadn't talked about it with the others, how both of them had helped them, but Regulus hadn't realized it was actually a secret.

"Ask us no questions, and we'll tell you no lies," one of the twins said when asked about it.

They had a heavy schedule for the day: History of Magic, Potions, Divinations, and Defense Against the Dark Arts, all back to back. His body already ached just thinking about it. Lavender and Parvati pulled Regulus aside just as they were arriving at History of Magic after breakfast.

"Listen, we didn't want to ask this summer — while you were recovering and everything — but we need to know," Parvati said, looking supremely uncomfortable. She looked at Lavender helplessly.

"What do you need to know?" Regulus prompted. The girls seemed to have a silent conversation with just their eyes before Lavender sighed defeatedly.

"Is Harry telling the truth?" she asked. "About You-Know-Who."

Regulus felt an immediate surge of anger. How could they not just believe him? But he had to remember that they were just people, people who had been seeing a previously trusted source say for weeks that Harry was a liar. Plus, the idea that the Dark Lord had returned was a terrible, awful thing, probably the worst thing that any of them could imagine happening, so he couldn't blame anyone for wanting to believe it wasn't true. He took a deep breath.

"Yes, it's true," Regulus said. "He's not a liar."

Parvati looked shocked, her face draining of color. Lavender put an unconscious arm around her friend, squeezing her shoulder lightly.

"My mom wants to pull me out of school," Lavender said. "My dad doesn't believe it, says that there isn't anything happening beyond a teenage boy looking for attention, but if he finds out it's true..."

"You're not the only one," Parvati said. "Padma and I overheard our parents talking about what they would do if it ended up happening. They don't believe Harry, but my mom is big on backup plans. They want to move out of the country."

Regulus sighed. "I'm sorry," he said genuinely. "It's really scary, and I don't have much comfort to offer."

"What are you going to do? I mean, especially with your dad still out there," Parvati asked.

"My dad?" Regulus asked before remembering that the girls didn't actually know anything about Sirius. "Oh, right. Well —" The bell rang, indicating that class was starting. "I forgot that I haven't told you. Remind me tonight, we can talk about it."

Both of them looked extremely curious. He figured they were trustworthy enough to know that his father was innocent. He wouldn't tell them who he really was, no one needed to know that, but he couldn't bear being friends with people who thought Sirius was a mass murderer. At the very least, his brother deserved someone to tell the truth about him.

Class was long and extremely boring, as always, and Binns ended it by assigning a foot-and-a-half-long essay on the giant wars. Regulus had nearly forgotten that it was their O.W.L.s year, the homework for classes was probably going to be ridiculously heavy.

Potions began with a long speech about what O.W.L. grade they had to get to continue on with the class in sixth year. Outstanding was apparently the only appropriate score. Regulus didn't care either way, he doubted he would even take another Potions N.E.W.T., he had done it in his first life and hated every minute of it. Of course, that was with Slughorn teaching the class, and Regulus found that man impossibly unbearable. Snape was much more tolerable even with his sour moods.

"Mr. Black, please stay after class," Snape said in a dull voice a few minutes before the end of class. He had been in a particularly bad mood, vanishing several students' potions because they weren't quite correct. Harry was beyond annoyed about it and was complaining to Hermione and Ron as they packed up.

"What is it?" Regulus asked once he and Snape were alone.

"I was asked to give you this," Snape said, sliding a book over his desk to Regulus. The title wasn't in English, it looked like it might be Greek.

"Okay?" Regulus said, waiting for Snape to explain. Snape flipped open the book to a marked page.

"This describes a collection of magical exercises that should help repair your magical core. They are not used very often in the modern day, most healers consider them too rough and barbaric." He sneered. "But as you do not have infinite time to wait for your core to heal naturally, this may be a good option."

"Who gave you this book?" Regulus asked suspiciously. Snape gave him a blank look. Regulus rolled his eyes. "I'm just curious."

"Dumbledore had it in his office," Snape said. "This book was removed from the Restricted Section a few decades ago. It is your decision if you should use it. I have another class to prepare for."

Snape all but shoved him out of the classroom, not that Regulus was keen on sticking around. He shoved the book into his bag, he would have to translate it later tonight. If Dumbledore wasn't willing to give it to him directly, it had to be at least vaguely illegal. Snape was right though, Regulus didn't have forever to recover naturally. He needed to find a way to fix his magical core as soon as possible if he was going to protect Harry.

Regulus arrived at the Gryffindor table just as Hermione was turning to snap at Ron. "I think Dumbledore's probably got plenty of evidence, even if he doesn't share it with you, Ron."

“Oh, shut up, the pair of you,” Harry said sharply. Regulus’s eyebrows raised in surprise as he took his seat. Ron and Hermione looked furious and offended. “Can’t you give it a rest? You’re always having a go at each other, it’s driving me mad.”

Harry didn't wait for a reply, shoving away from the table and stomping out of the Great Hall. He had left his food only partially eaten. Ron and Hermione started whispering to each other, but Regulus tuned them out. Harry’s irritability had been growing over the summer. At first, Regulus just thought it was the nightmares and the stress from what he had endured, but now he thought maybe something else was going on.

He tried to remember being this age the first time. Was he angry all the time? He definitely had sharper and more intense emotions as he went through puberty, but he didn’t remember anything like this. Even so, it wasn’t like any of the other boys in their year were acting this snappish. He was worried about him, and he wished he and Sirius were on speaking terms. If anyone could get through to Harry, it was Sirius.

Regulus was halfway through his shepherd’s pie for lunch when he noticed Draco standing up from the Slytherin table, walking like he was going to leave the Hall, except he kept stopping to look over his shoulder, making direct eye contact with Regulus. Regulus sighed, he would have to tell him to be more subtle about wanting to meet, this was just painfully obvious.

“I’ll see you guys in class,” he said, standing to follow Draco who had finally left when he noticed Regulus moving.

“Sure,” Ron said, his mouth so full of food that it just sounded like the letter R.

Regulus headed outside to the Viaduct Courtyard. Draco was easy to spot, standing half-hidden behind a pillar. “What’s going on?” he asked once they were in front of each other.

“Listen, I’m not warning you because —”

“Draco,” Regulus said sharply, Draco’s mouth snapped closed. “I don’t care, just skip to the warning. I don’t have time to listen to your reasons.”

Draco looked distinctly unhappy, and Regulus wondered for a moment if he would abandon the conversation altogether, but he seemed to fortify himself and continued speaking.

“Umbridge, the new Defense professor, works for Minister Fudge.”

“Yes,” Regulus said, nodding for him to go on.

“You have to be careful,” Draco said, then lowered his voice even further. “My father said that she’s here to try and have you arrested, and based on the class I just had with her, she’s very good at provoking people.” He had a blotchy redness stretching across his face and neck like he was embarrassed to be doing something that was even mildly friendly.

“I’m not easily provoked,” Regulus said, he wondered if that was really true anymore.

“Yes, but —” his hands flailed out helplessly.

“But?” Regulus prompted. Draco gaped at him like a fish, as if he couldn’t quite decide what words to use.

“Other Gryffindors are,” Draco finally settled on.

“Ah,” Regulus said with a knowing nod.

Of course, this was about Harry. Draco and his silly, misguided feelings about the boy were almost too embarrassing to witness. Draco was lucky that no one else seemed to pay close enough attention. He was especially lucky that Harry was too busy being frustrated by him to evaluate why Draco might act that way.

“I’ll be careful,” Regulus said placatingly. “Do you know anything else about her?”

“Not yet,” Draco said.

“Let me know if you find out anything,” Regulus said, and in a rare moment of gentleness, reached up to grab his arm in comfort. “We’re family, and we have to stick together. That’s the only way we’re going to make it out of this.”

It was a bit manipulative, but there was no doubt in Regulus’s head that Narcissa and probably Lucius had instilled feelings of pride and protection when it came to “family.” It was certainly something done in the Black family, and Narcissa didn’t have nearly as bad a childhood as Sirius and Regulus did, she would probably push for Draco to feel the same way. Draco nodded seriously.

Regulus felt a pang in his chest, remembering how little Draco had been just a few short years ago, how he, like so many other kids at Hogwarts, took on responsibilities they couldn’t possibly carry. He was older now, taller certainly, but he still looked so young. He wanted to ask about the Dark Lord, if Draco had been forced to meet him or talk to him. He couldn’t imagine how terrifying that would be. But he couldn’t do that now, he would have to ease Draco into that conversation. For now, warnings about Umbridge would have to cut it.

He made it up to the Divinations classroom just a bit later, though his legs were aching badly now, and the climb up the tower was like torture. He had to stop more than once to lean against the wall, breathing heavily. Ron ran into him on his way.

“All right?” Ron asked cheerfully, though there was a pinch of worry between his eyebrows.

“Fine, just a bit sore,” Regulus replied. Ron, without asking, grabbed Regulus’s bag off his shoulder and carried it for him. The lack of weight made things slightly easier, though the ladder climb was still a bit tetchy. Ron was waiting for him at the top and walked into the classroom next to him.

Harry was sitting alone at their usual table. Lavender and Parvati were right behind him, sitting at their own table, their heads bent over their Divinations textbook. Both of them smiled at him and Ron as they ambled over.

“Hermione and me have stopped arguing,” Ron said as he plopped down next to Harry who looked up with a slight glare.

“Good,” Harry huffed.

“But Hermione says she thinks it would be nice if you stopped taking your temper out on us.”

“I’m not —”

“I’m just the messenger,” Ron said, throwing his hands up in surrender. They were interrupted from continuing their conversation by Trelawney starting class. Regulus wondered if Hermione was right, if Harry was just taking out his frustrations on them. She probably was, though again all Regulus could feel was concern. He felt like an old parent who no longer understood the life and personality of his teenage son.

Divination was much the same as past years, they were studying dreams now and their only assignment was to start keeping a dream journal. Regulus didn’t dream very often anymore, so he would probably have to make things up as he had done before. Even Ron seemed frustrated by the prospect, though like there always was with Divinations, there was a slight gleam in his eyes.

Defense was next, but Regulus wasn’t able to head right there. “I need to go see Pomfrey first,” he said.

“Want us to come with you?” Harry asked.

“Better not,” Regulus said. “I don’t want to risk you both being late, especially with Umbridge.”

They both nodded, heading off to class, as Regulus slowly walked to the Hospital Wing. He needed to start brewing his own pain draughts given how many he needed a week, but he hadn’t had the time yet since they just arrived at school, and Pomfrey was unwilling to give him more than a few each time he visited.

Regulus wasn’t really that late to Defense, less than five minutes, but the way Umbridge froze when he opened the door, and then slowly smiled that sickly sweet grin made dread pool in his stomach.

“Sorry Professor,” Regulus said immediately. “I had to stop by —”

“I do not require any of your excuses, Mr. Black,” she said. “Please take your seat. We will discuss this after class.”

Regulus just barely stopped himself from rolling his eyes, but took his seat next to Harry who gave him an uncomfortable smile. Harry pushed a copy of the textbook toward him. Defensive Magical Theory was the title.

“We’re reading chapter one,” Harry said softly. Regulus opened his book but didn’t start reading right away, instead, he noticed that Hermione, who was sitting across from them, still had her book closed and was staring at Umbridge. It didn't take long before Umbridge took notice and from there, a fight broke out.

Hermione was arguing with Umbridge about the importance of using practical magic in classes, and how they needed it for their O.W.L.s. Ron joined in, as did Harry. Even Dean Thomas started arguing with the woman. Harry though was growing increasingly irritated, so much so that Regulus could feel the spark of angry magic in the air near him. Regulus realized this was exactly what Draco was talking about, they were all being provoked.

Regulus thought of Sirius and the way he would act out when they were young, often taking credit for things Regulus had done so that Regulus wouldn't be punished. He never really understood why, it always felt short-sighted to him at the time, but he got it now. He wasn't going to let Harry get in trouble if he could help it.

Regulus had been struggling with his magic, but he had just taken a pain potion, and he felt up to it, he hoped he was up to it really. He was certainly angry enough and could channel that into spellcasting. Regardless, he had to do something to draw attention, otherwise, Harry was going to dig himself into a hole and immediately draw Umbridge's ire.

"Who do you imagine wants to attack children like yourself?" Umbridge said.

"Hmm, let's think..." Harry started to say.

"Incendio !" Regulus shouted, standing up out of his seat to do so. He had intended to light his textbook on fire, but his magic was off and his anger and desperation were heavy in his lungs. Every textbook in the classroom went up in flames, shouts of shock filling the classroom as students pushed away from their desks. Regulus nearly doubled over with pain, using a hand to steady himself on the desk. He gritted his teeth. "These books are rubbish and so is your teaching plan," he snarled, the words coming out way harsher than he intended given the way pain was rolling through him.

Umbridge gasped loudly, a spark of fear in her eyes for just a second before it was drowned out by glee.

"Come here, Mr. Black, dear." She reminded him of Walburga, of how she was the year before Sirius was disowned, the way she cracked. Regulus walked painfully up to her desk where she pulled out a small roll of pink parchment out of her handbag, scribbled something on it, and rolled it up. "Take this to Professor McGonagall."

Regulus didn't bother to grab his bag, he wasn't sure he would be able to walk all the way out of the classroom, let alone while holding all his books. Harry and the others would grab it for him. Everyone in the class looked shell-shocked and confused, he gave Harry a hard look that he hoped conveyed the meaning "do not do anything else to draw her attention."

"And fifty points from Gryffindor," she called sternly right as the door was closing behind him.

It took him a while to make it to McGonagall's office, but eventually, he made it to her door, knocking and waiting for her to call out before entering. She unrolled the piece of parchment right when Regulus handed it to her. He sat heavily in his chair, breathing out a heavy sigh of relief.

“Is it true?” she asked.

“Yes,” he answered, though he didn’t actually know what Umbridge had written.

“You lit all the textbooks on fire?” she asked incredulously. Regulus sighed, rubbing his eyes tiredly.

“Yes.”

She frowned at him for a moment. “Have a biscuit, Black,” she said. He gave her a sideways smile and took one from the tin of cookies on her desk.

“You need to be careful. Misbehavior in her class could cost you more than detention,” she said.

“I know,” Regulus said. “I know that, but it was either me or Harry. I had to draw her attention somehow.”

She pursed her lips. “I understand,” she said before sighing quietly. “You will have detention with her every evening this week starting tomorrow.” He nodded, he figured that was coming. “How are you otherwise?”

“Better all the time,” he said with an unhappy smile, already getting up to leave. She didn’t stop him, and he headed right for the dorms. The rest of them would find him there eventually. Of course, he hadn’t expected Harry to be quite so angry when he did.

“What the hell was that?” Harry shouted, bursting into the dorm alone. He wondered if the other boys were avoiding the dorm, perhaps waiting in the common room for Harry’s anger to burn out.

“What do you mean?”

“Why did you do that? Why did you burn up her books?” Harry looked so angry that his eyes were practically glowing.

“Because, Harry,” Regulus snapped back. The long day filled with pain and stress finally boiled over. “Umbridge is out to get you. You, specifically. She wants you to fight her. It doesn’t matter if Hermione or Ron argue with her, she doesn’t care about them, but she is here to mess with you. I knew if I didn’t intervene, that you would say something stupid.” It came out a bit meaner than he wanted it to, and he immediately regretted it.

Harry’s eyes narrowed dangerously. “I’m not an idiot,” he said, his voice low like a growl.

Regulus sighed. “No, I know that —”

“Do you?” Harry snarled. “Because you don’t act like you do.” Regulus paused for a second.

“What are you talking about?”

“Everyone treats me like I never pay attention,” Harry said. “But I do! I notice things.” The hairs on the back of his neck stood up, warning signs blaring in his head, as he took in the way Harry’s hands were clenched into fists at his sides.

“I don’t —” Harry threw his hands up.

“I know you knew my father,” Harry hissed. Regulus froze.

“What?”

“I know you knew him. You said you didn’t, but I know you were lying.”

“Harry, I have no idea —”

“You always call me James, when you’ve been knocked out or you’re just waking up. You always think I’m James ‘cause I look like him,” Harry said.

“Well, yes, we went to school at the same time,” Regulus replied.

“Stop lying! I know you’re lying! You went to school with Remus but you still call him Lupin. There is no reason for you to call my father James!”

Regulus’s mouth hung open in shock.

“Sirius has no idea though, does he? Does anyone know?” Harry looked halfway to feral, anger rolling off him in violent waves. Regulus felt like everything in his life was cracking at the seams, and now Harry knew. Harry knew. Regulus thought he was being so careful. How? How could he know?

“Harry, I —”

“Don’t bother,” Harry snapped suddenly, taking a large step backward. “I don’t want to hear anything from you unless it’s the truth.” With those words, he was gone, stomping back out of the dorm and down to the common room.

It had been a long day, far too long. Regulus collapsed onto his bed. Harry knew about James. And worse than that, he knew Regulus was a liar.

chapter 69 ;)

Regulus still needed to tell Lavender and Parvati about his “father,” but he didn’t think he had the energy to do it that night, not after the confrontation with Harry. He didn’t even bother to go to dinner. He was over it, over the entire day. He collapsed into bed and read one of the books Hermione had purchased for him over the summer until he was tired enough to go to sleep. It didn’t take long, all the walking and stress of the day settling into his bones and dragging him unconscious before he could protest.

He woke the next morning just before sunrise. He could hear the rain pelting against the window as he drifted up out of sleep. It wasn’t surprising weather for the time of year, but he did wonder when they would see the sun again. He wished he could lay out in direct sunlight like he had several times over the summer when things got too overwhelming, climbing up to the roof of Grimmauld for a bit of silence and relaxation, stretching out in the sunshine like a sleepy house cat.

He got out of bed and left for breakfast before any of his dormmates were up. The Great Hall was nearly empty, with only a few tired-looking seventh years here and there, and a few professors. Dumbledore wasn’t there which surprised him, but the headmaster had seemed oddly absent so far this year. He would need to find time to talk to the man in private.

Over the summer, he had seen Dumbledore only twice. He came for Order meetings, but would often leave right when they ended, avoiding everyone in the house who wasn’t old enough to join. It was driving Harry crazy for some reason.

The first time he saw Dumbledore was during the first day of summer break when he came to test the wards of Grimmauld and cast another layer of his own protective wards, including a Fidelius Charm.

“Who do you want as Secret Keeper?” Dumbledore asked Sirius and Regulus. Regulus was surprised at first when Sirius suggested offering Grimmauld as a headquarters for the Order. They were still on speaking terms at the time, so he asked Regulus first what he thought. At first, Regulus wanted to refuse, hating the idea of so many people coming in and out of his house, but he realized it would allow him to stay close to the action. He could barely walk during those days, and he needed to be close by.

“You should do it,” Regulus said to Sirius. Sirius’s eyebrows shot up, and he jolted slightly in his chair.

“I agree,” Lupin said. He was leaning against the wall, almost like he was trying to separate himself from what he felt was a family decision, even though they had specifically invited him in. “You’re the best person for it.”

Sirius’s cheeks colored, and his eyes looked suspiciously bright like he might start crying.

“Okay,” Sirius said.

“Very well,” Dumbledore said evenly.

He left before Regulus could stop him, right after he finished casting the spell. They spent a few weeks talking about Lupin’s fruitless trip to Albania, though the conversations puttered out once Tonks started spending a little too much time at Grimmauld Place. Regulus didn’t dislike her, he thought she was fine, though he didn’t love having to interact with an Auror every time he ventured outside his bedroom, Order member or not. However, he wished Lupin wouldn’t be so blatant about speaking to her, honestly, didn’t she have her own house?

Regardless, the conversations about Horcruxes were frustrating, to say the least. They had started researching Helga Hufflepuff’s cup, but beyond the fact that the Dark Lord had direct access to it at one point, there wasn’t anything helpful. They had no idea where he might have hidden it.

Of course, there was the possibility that it, or another Horcrux, was in Bellatrix’s vault at Gringotts, but unless they wanted to risk life and limb just to break in, it was inaccessible to them for the time being. Not to mention that beyond the diadem and the cup, they didn’t know what the Horcruxes could be.

It felt hopeless at times, and all Regulus wanted to do was go over everything with Dumbledore. He was sure the man knew more than he was letting on. He didn’t see him again until after Harry’s trial, but that was also brief, and he didn’t stay to chat with any of them. Apparently, Dumbledore had provided him the book with possibly illegal rituals to help repair his magical core, but even that he had done through a third party.

He ate breakfast slowly, watching students sleepily drag themselves into the Great Hall, before heading out to the library to work on homework for an hour or two before classes. He wasn’t avoiding anyone exactly, he just wasn’t ready to face any of them. Especially Harry. He sighed as he pulled out his potions book to start working on his essay.

“Good morning, Mr. Black,” Madam Pince said. She was ambling through the aisles, double-checking that all the books from yesterday had been properly put away. She had warmed up to him a bit over the years, as much as someone like her could warm up to anyone. Although she was far nicer to him when he was alone, she didn’t seem to trust any of the other students. Even Hermione, the bookworm that she was. Regulus thought it was because Hermione spent too much time pestering the woman with all her checked-out books.

“Morning,” Regulus said quietly. He turned back to his book before something occurred to him. “Excuse me, Madam Pince.” She paused and inclined her head. “I was wondering if there was a way to request more books on a certain topic.”

“Do you mean newly published books?” Madam Pince asked.

“Sure, or maybe older books that might not be here,” Regulus replied.

“I place orders for many new books four times a year. Is there something specifically that you are looking for?” she asked, giving him a vaguely suspicious look.

“I was hoping to read more about the founders of Hogwarts. Specifically some of the famous objects that were tied to them like the Sword of Gryffindor or the Lost Diadem of Ravenclaw. I believe I’ve read every book even tangentially related to them that’s in the library already.”

“I see,” she said thoughtfully. “There are not many new books about the topic. It is not a popular subject for newly published materials. I can check and see if there is anything I have missed if you would like?”

She said the words sternly, almost like they were a punishment, but Regulus wasn’t about to turn down the help. “That would be great, thank you. I appreciate it.”

She nodded again and turned to leave before stopping. “You may ask one of your Ravenclaw friends to check their common room if you want information on the diadem.”

“What do you mean?” Regulus asked.

“They have a rather expansive and unique library of their own up there,” she said. Regulus hadn’t known that, but in retrospect it made sense. He would have to talk to Luna, if anyone could get him in, it was her.

Charms was his first class of the day, he arrived before most of the other students, but when they all joined him, he noticed Harry followed Ron to sit next to him. Hermione threw Regulus a pitying look and sat in the empty seat where Harry usually sat.

“I guess Harry talked to you,” Regulus muttered quietly once she was sitting.

“He just said he was upset with you,” Hermione replied, “not what it was about.”

Regulus breathed a silent sigh of relief.

“I wouldn’t worry too much. He’s so angry all the time, I don’t think it’s your fault,” Hermione said.

“This time it is,” Regulus said quietly. “Though he is angry all the time now. I’m not sure how to help him,” he confessed.

“Maybe he needs to talk to someone,” Hermione said, lowering her whispered voice even further so that it was almost inaudible.

“What do you mean?” Regulus asked.

“You know, like a therapist. Wizards have therapists, right?” she asked curiously.

Regulus stared at her for a long moment. "I don't know," he said honestly. "What's a therapist?" She huffed a laugh, but they were interrupted by Flitwick before she could respond.

Flitwick spent the first half of the class giving them a long speech about the importance of their O.W.L.s and how it could influence their futures. There was a lot of talk about future careers. Regulus forgot he would have to go through all of the career advising all over again. Last time Slughorn had correctly guessed that Regulus wouldn't work, but would instead take over as Head of the Family.

He would have to meet with McGonagall this time around, and he had no idea what to tell her. He didn't think she would appreciate the same answer that he gave to Slughorn. He especially didn't think she would appreciate his real answer considering he was pretty sure he would die a second time fighting the Dark Lord and wouldn't ever have to worry about a future career. He would have to come up with something.

They were faced with the same speech from McGonagall in Transfiguration, though her's was somehow even more intense. He skipped Care of Magical Creatures altogether. Hagrid still wasn't back, and he didn't care if the new Professor gave him detention for missing class. He was also a little worried about trying to walk all the way to the edge of the Forbidden Forest and back. Herbology was last, and it was also filled with the same speech as the others. The year had just begun, and he was already exhausted by the amount of work he had in front of him.

He ate dinner immediately after class since he didn't know when he would have time again, he didn't exactly know what to expect from Umbridge's detention. It could drag on till midnight for all he knew.

He arrived at her office door five minutes before the hour, knocking quietly before entering without waiting for a reply. The room was egregious and frankly assaulting to the eye. Every single surface was covered in bright pink decor, there were tons of lacy covers and vases with dried flowers. More than that, there were a large amount of decorative plates with multicolored kittens decorating the front of them.

"Good evening, Mr. Black," Umbridge said in her sickly sweet tone, a wide, unnerving grin spread across her toad-like face. "Right on time. I see you are already benefiting from my influence and learning to control yourself."

Regulus did not reply. The way she spoke, her very aura, made his teeth hurt. He was pretty sure that if he opened his mouth, he would start flinging spells at her just to work off some of his anger.

"Let's get started, shall we?" she asked. Regulus continued to stare at her, taking a seat at the table across from her desk as she spoke. "You are in an... advantageous position, Mr. Black." He gave her a questioning look. He didn't think being a suspected murderer was very advantageous. "Though your father's place in wizarding society is unpleasant." That's one way of putting it, he thought. "As a son of the Noble and Most Ancient House of Black, you will still be highly sought after once you leave Hogwarts."

Regulus thought he may have thrown up a bit in his mouth when she mentioned the Noble and Most Ancient House of Black , but he tried to hold it together. He didn't understand how she could decide to play both sides of him. On one hand, she seemed very certain that he was a killer who should be thrown in Azkaban. On the other hand, she clearly held pureblood values and thought he had potential.

She just wanted him on her side, he realized, regardless of if he was truly a murderer. Fudge must have been the one that was afraid of him, he was certainly afraid of Sirius, so it made sense. Umbridge probably hated him because he was protecting Harry, whom Fudge hated.

“Don’t you agree?” she prompted.

“That I’ll be highly sought after?” Regulus asked.

“That you are in an advantageous position,” she said. Regulus imagined tearing her spine out with his teeth.

“I am,” he said. He didn’t mean it the way she meant it, but it didn’t matter. He wasn’t in an advantageous position for his future, but he had her attention, which meant it wasn’t on Harry.

“Excellent,” she said with an evil grin. “I’m glad we see eye to eye. You only need to make better choices, Mr. Black.” She was trying to infuse the statement with some hidden meaning, but Regulus wasn’t going to bother looking for it.

“Okay,” he said. He was ready to get this detention over with.

“Now, you are going to be doing some lines for me, Mr. Black.” He wished she would stop saying his name. He reached for his bag to grab a quill. “No, not with your quill. You’re going to be using a rather special one of mine. Here you go.”

Regulus felt an odd swamping of anxiety settle over him as she handed him a long, thin black quill. It had an unusually sharp point to it. Something was definitely wrong with it.

“I want you to write ‘I will make the right choices,’” she said. Regulus pulled a piece of parchment closer to him.

“How many times?” he asked.

Her face twitched. “As long as it takes for the message to sink in,” she said. “Off you go.”

Regulus only barely stopped himself from rolling his eyes. He placed the tip of the quill against the parchment and started writing: I will make the right choices .

He gasped in pain right away, dropping the quill as it clattered on the desk. It took a second for the words to start appearing, the sharp pain coming first, but he noticed that the words on the parchment had shown up in shiny red ink. A second later, the words began carving themselves into the skin on the back of his hand. He watched in horror as he was wounded by the quill.

He looked up to find Umbridge already watching him with a wide grin. “Yes?” she asked.

He didn’t reply, because the only thought he had in his head was you’re not going to get away with this . She wanted to do this to Harry. To Harry . If Regulus hadn’t intervened, Harry would be sitting right here carving words into his hand, permanently scarred by this woman. She probably wanted to, he guessed. She wanted to hurt Harry like she was hurting Regulus, and Regulus was going to kill her.

By the time he left Umbridge’s office, the castle was deserted, and it was well after midnight, just as he’d predicted. The quill had caused so much pain that it had exasperated his nerve damage. He was only halfway through detention when he started feeling sick with pain. He refused to show weakness in front of that woman though.

He left the classroom barely able to walk and only made it to a nearby corridor before he collapsed onto his hands and knees, immediately throwing up his dinner right onto the floor. He had to work not to collapse directly into it, that would have just been the cherry on top of his terrible night. He went to lie down next to it when he heard a voice.

“ Evanesco . What are you doing? You can’t sleep here,” the voice hissed. He looked up to see Draco looming over him, his eyes bright in the dimly lit corridor.

“I wasn’t planning to sleep here,” Regulus said unhappily.

“I told you not to engage with her! I warned you not to,” Draco whispered furiously. “What did she do to you?”

Regulus held out his hand, Draco gasped and covered his mouth like he might also be sick.

“She carved words into your hand?” he breathed.

“She used a blood quill,” Regulus said. “Had me do it to myself.”

Draco looked torn for a moment, before spinning around and sprinting down the hallway, tossing a, “Stay here,” over his shoulder. Regulus sat up slowly, leaning against the chilly stone wall of the corridor. He wondered where Draco had run off to. He hoped he wasn’t getting a professor, Regulus really did not want to talk to another adult about this right now.

He didn’t have to wait long before Draco was back. He was carrying something in his hands, and it took Regulus a moment to realize it was dittany and bandages.

“Oh,” Regulus said, surprised by the unusual show of care.

“I had some extra in my trunk,” Draco explained. “Why did you get detention with her? Were you trying to find out more information about her? Did she tell you anything?” He spoke quickly as he began applying the dittany to Regulus’s hand. His fingers were surprisingly gentle despite his clearly agitated state.

“Harry was about to say something to her that he shouldn’t, I was just drawing attention away,” Regulus explained. Draco froze for a second.

“Would she have done this to Harry?” he asked quietly.

“Almost certainly,” Regulus said, mostly because it was true. But also because he had heard how Draco was bragging about the Ministry removing bad teachers at Hogwarts. Whatever he felt inside, publicly he was supporting Umbridge, and he needed to know that Harry would pay for it. Draco’s face grew sharp, and Regulus blinked quickly. He felt like he was hallucinating for a moment because a second later it was back to normal. Regulus shook his head to clear it.

“What are you going to do?” Draco asked quietly as he wrapped up Regulus’s hand in a bandage.

“Nothing you need to worry about,” Regulus said with a sigh. He and Draco parted ways without speaking much else, but Regulus felt oddly touched by Draco checking on him. He especially appreciated the dittany. The quill might still scar, but at least it wouldn’t be stinging continuously for the rest of the week.

He was especially excited to go to sleep when he made it back to the dorm, but his plans were interrupted when he entered the common room to find Harry sitting in front of the fire. He jumped up the moment he saw Regulus.

“You’re back late,” Harry said, his voice a mix of worry and anger.

“Umbridge just let me out,” Regulus explained.

“I saw you in the hallway with Draco,” Harry said accusingly. “What were you two talking about?”

Regulus sighed tiredly and sat on the couch near where Harry was sitting a moment prior. He didn’t want to talk to Harry about his conversation with Cousin Draco.

“I’m ready to tell you about James,” he said quietly. Harry’s mouth snapped closed, Regulus hadn’t even realized that it was still open. He stared at Regulus for a long, silent moment, tension set across his shoulders, before he dropped back into his chair.

“Okay,” Harry said.

Regulus looked at his wrapped-up hand — thankfully Harry either hadn’t noticed or hadn’t asked about it yet — thinking of the words beneath them. I will make the right choices. What was the right choice here? He hadn’t told Harry about James before because he was afraid and still heartbroken. Fundamentally, nothing had changed since then. He was still running. He couldn’t keep lying to Harry, not to protect his own feelings.

“The summer before my fifth year, Sirius ran away from home,” Regulus said. Harry leaned back in his chair, looking very much like a young kid waiting for a good bedtime story. Regulus smiled slightly despite himself before remembering where this story began. “My parents discovered something about him, and it was the last straw in their already fraying relationship. They nearly killed him.”

He took a deep breath. He had never told anyone this, not the entire thing. Only James knew what he did, and he had sworn him to secrecy.

“What did they discover?” Harry asked.

“That’s something for him to share, I think,” Regulus said. “It doesn’t matter anyway. They would have found a reason to disown him regardless. They were looking for an excuse. The night he left, I found him nearly dead in my father’s study. I panicked and helped him escape to the Potter’s house. That was the first time I spoke to your father.”

“Does Sirius know you saved him?” Harry asked softly.

“No,” Regulus said. “I would have gotten into trouble had my parents found out at the time, and he and I weren’t speaking, so it hardly mattered.”

“Like you’re not speaking now?”

Regulus gave a quiet laugh. “Sort of,” Regulus said. “Yes, sort of. Anyway, when I went back to school, your father was very intent on providing updates on how Sirius was doing now that he wasn’t part of the Black family.”

“Why?”

“Because he thought he could bring us back together I think. At first, he was just mad ‘cause Sirius and I were still fighting every now and then, but then he started his campaign to prove that I loved my own brother.” He smiled at the memory. James always wanted to save him in the beginning, before he realized that Regulus wasn’t worth saving.

Harry was quiet for a moment while Regulus was lost in thought. “Is that it?”

Regulus blushed slightly. “No, he and I — well, we —” This was much harder to say out loud than he expected it to be.

“You what?” Harry prompted, a deeply curious look on his face.

“We were... together, for a time,” Regulus settled on. Harry’s mouth opened in shock, his eyes widening behind his slightly smudged glasses.

“My dad was gay?” he asked.

“No, not gay,” Regulus said, laughing helplessly. “He definitely liked women too. I mean, he ended up with your mother.”

“Oh, right?” Harry said, rubbing his neck in embarrassment. “How long were you two...?”

“About a year,” Regulus said. It felt like so little time when he said it like that, but it had changed the trajectory of his entire life. Even now it seemed to control him.

“What happened?”

“I took the Mark,” Regulus said bluntly. “It was going to end one way or another, but that was the final catalyst. He started dating Lily later that year, and they were married right out of Hogwarts.”

“Why didn’t you ever tell me?” Harry asked softly, his voice layered with hurt. Regulus’s chest clenched painfully.

“It didn’t work out between us, and though your father moved on fairly easily,” Regulus said, pausing so he could swallow the lump in his throat, “it was very painful for me, Harry.”

“Is that why you’re here? Because you knew my father?”

Regulus thought about it before answering. “Yes, in part. I knew you would be in danger, and I couldn’t let James’s son go unprotected. It’s different now. I’m not just here for James.”

Harry nodded like he understood that Regulus couldn’t have forced any more explanations about his feelings out of his mouth.

“Did you love him?”

Regulus nearly choked on his tongue. “Yes,” he said, the word costing him a great deal. Harry gave him a keen look.

“I’m sorry,” Harry replied. “And I’m sorry I yelled at you.”

Regulus laughed, grateful for the way the tension broke. “It’s okay. I’m sorry I lied to you about it,” he said.

“And Sirius never knew?” Harry asked, sounding bewildered.

“Pretty sure I would be killed a second time if he found out,” Regulus said. He meant the words as a joke, but Harry looked startled like he might be in real danger. “No, he never knew. It didn’t matter anyway. James and Lily were meant to be together. I wouldn’t have gotten in the way of that.”

He was surprised by how true the words were, even with the way the thought of James wrecked him from the inside out. No James and Lily meant no Harry, and a world without Harry wasn’t one Regulus cared to live in. He loved him like he was his own son; like he had raised him rather than the Dursleys doing it.

Harry nodded, though he was still giving Regulus a strange look. Harry turned to stare into the fire for a long few minutes, and Regulus slowly started to nod off. He was surprised by the way the truth had lifted off his chest like a heavy weight being removed. He felt lighter now like his lungs weren’t so constricted by the memory of James. The pain was still there, as he suspected it always would be, but the guilt was gone.

the metamorphosis.

“If you don’t stop what you’re doing, I’m going to —”

“Put us in detention?” Fred said with that horrible mocking tone that he and his brother had perfected.

“Make us write lines?” George cut in, a cocky smirk on his face.

The others in the common room were laughing now, watching the interaction like it was a weekly special on TV. Ron was looking down at his lap, clearly pretending nothing was happening around him. No one was going to stand up with her, no one else would say anything. Hermione drew herself up to her full height — still considerably shorter than Fred and George — and narrowed her eyes menacingly.

“No,” she said, her voice shaking with anger. She always hated the way anger affected her, making her sound like she was about to start crying. She knew it ruined any effect her anger might have. “But I will write to your mother.”

The effect of her words was immediate. George’s mouth gaped open for a second before he took a step back from her.

“You wouldn’t,” he breathed, sounding horrified.

“Oh, yes, I would,” she replied seriously. “I can’t stop you from eating the stupid things yourself, but you’re not giving them to first years.”

She stalked back to the chair by the fire that she had been sitting in a moment ago, her hair crackling with electricity. Ron had sunk so low in his seat that his nose was almost touching his knees. She stood over him, putting her hands on her hips.

“Thanks for your support, Ron,” she snapped.

“You handled it fine by yourself,” he muttered back, refusing to make eye contact with her.

It was just another moment of her friends not backing her up. Ron would just bicker with her. God, he was so frustrating. Harry always refused to get involved, he would sink into himself the moment they started fighting, looking off to the side and pretending like he wasn’t there. It used to make her feel bad for him, but now it was just annoying. Especially given the way Harry had begun snapping at them, trying to bite their heads off every time either of them opened their mouths.

Regulus would sometimes try to help, but he had so many things going on that he was rarely with them except in classes nowadays. Not to mention that he was friends with Lavender and Parvati, both of which drove Hermione up the wall. She would never understand why Regulus was friends with them.

She always thought that Regulus was an ally, but she had to remember who he really was. A pureblood, just like Lavender and Parvati, just like Ron. They couldn't really understand, they never did. Harry was a half-blood, but at least he was raised by muggles. He knew what it was like to come into the wizarding world with no knowledge.

However, she couldn't really be compared to him. He had ties to the wizarding world that she never would. He had a pureblood father with a long line of pureblooded family members. His mother was a witch, and even though she was muggleborn, she was still a part of the world before Harry entered it.

Hermione had no ties. If she disappeared from the wizarding world, there would be no trace of her. She never mentioned it to anyone but she was always felt unimportant to the wizard community. That's why it was so important that her friends supported her when she stood up for things. Like when Fred and George were breaking the rules.

The school year had barely started, and it was already turning out to be a terrible one. Umbridge's presence could be felt all over the school even though she hadn't done anything too horrible yet. Other than, of course, her lack of desire to teach the students anything practical. The fact that they would be unprepared for their O.W.L. at the end of the year was weighing heavily on Hermione.

She was hoping to spend the weekend after their first week with her friends getting ahead on the mountain of homework they were assigned, but of course, neither Harry nor Ron wanted to. Both of them were too focused on Quidditch practice. Regulus said he would, but then was nowhere to be found all weekend. Hermione spent most of the weekend alone in the library.

Ron received a letter on Sunday from his brother Percy telling him to stay away from both Harry and Regulus, which caused Harry to be in a terrible mood for the rest of the day. Hermione suspected it was because of Regulus's mention more than his own. There were also vague mentions about Sirius possibly hiding in London in the Daily Prophet that morning, and Regulus disappeared from the Great Hall so quickly that he looked like he was running from a fire.

"I wish Regulus and Sirius would just talk to each other," Harry complained that night. Regulus was missing again, but if Harry wasn't worried about where he was, then Hermione wasn't going to dwell on it.

"Why won't they talk to each other?" Ron asked distractedly.

He was looking through his dream journal for Divinations again. Hermione rolled her eyes. From the first moment that Ron happened to correctly guess one answer in that class, Trelawney, Lavender, Parvati, and Luna had fawned over Ron for his "divination skills." Hermione knew it wasn't real. Divination was a very inexact science, and Ron was just making things up to garner attention.

She thought that it must be some kind of pureblood thing to be obsessed with divination. Even in the muggle world, most people knew that fortune tellers were just skilled liars playing on peoples' emotions. She understood the search for the unknown, but it was obvious that using divinations to do it was just not reliable. At least arithmancy provided some structure, divination was just guessing.

"Because Regulus took me to Godric's Hollow to see my parents' graves. Sirius blames him for almost getting me expelled."

"Well, I mean, it is his fault though, isn't it?" Hermione asked, she tried to make her voice gentle. Harry had been acting unreasonably when he demanded to go see the graves, it was Regulus's fault for indulging him.

"He was just trying to help me," Harry responded, a dark coolness to his voice. Hermione sighed quietly. She knew he wouldn't see reason no matter how many times she tried to explain it.

"But you weren't expelled," Ron said, his eyebrows furrowing, "so why is he still so upset?"

"I don't know," Harry said, flopping back in his chair like a child throwing a fit. "But I'm sick of being the go-between. This morning Regulus gave me an entire list of things I needed to relay to Sirius. Most of them were just different ways of phrasing don't leave the bloody house."

"I'm sure Sirius took that well," Ron said sarcastically, turning back to his book. Harry rolled his eyes, though it wasn't aimed at Ron.

"Of course not," Harry replied. "I swear he's going insane alone in that house."

"Alone? Isn't Professor Lupin there?" Hermione asked.

"He's not your professor anymore," Ron said distractedly.

"No, he's off on Order business. At least, that's what I think. Sirius wouldn't say," Harry said with a deep frown.

She often wondered about the adults out there on missions for the Order. Honestly, she was especially worried about Prof— Remus. Based on everything she read about werewolves, he already seemed to be living a very dangerous life. Who knew what he was coming into contact with while out in the world? The wizarding world seemed to chew up so many people, anyone that didn't fit the perfect mold.

The next morning dawned with even worse news. The ministry had appointed Umbridge as Hogwarts's first-ever High Inquisitor, claiming that it was all for educational reform. At lunch, Fred and George mentioned her coming by to inspect their Charms class, and later that evening Ron mentioned the way Umbridge came into Divinations and demanded a prediction from Trelawney.

"I hope her prediction was true," Harry muttered unhappily.

“What did she predict?” Hermione asked, not even bothering to keep the venom out of her voice. They all knew Trelawney was a talentless hack.

“She said that Umbridge was in danger and to watch out for large creatures,” Ron said, his eyes suddenly lighting up. “I think it probably is true. I told you about my dreams, didn’t I?”

“What is it with your dreams?” Hermione said acidly.

Ron looked momentarily hurt, but he answered regardless. “I keep having dreams about Umbridge in the forest with a giant beast.” Hermione rolled her eyes. That was plenty vague, wasn’t it?

“Does it kill her?” Harry asked excitedly.

“It’s just a dream, Harry,” Hermione said.

“Sometimes it does,” Ron said with a half-shrug, fully ignoring what Hermione said. “Sometimes she kills it, though.”

“So then it’s possible that Trelawney was just lying,” Hermione said.

“She wasn’t lying,” Ron said sharply.

“Why are you defending that woman? She’s a terrible professor.”

“I suppose you’d rather Umbridge pick someone instead?” Ron snapped back. Hermione jumped to her feet.

“No, of course not! You’re just saying this because Trelawney is the only one who —”

“What’s going on?” Regulus asked as he came into the common room. He was limping again, walking with an awkward gait with his hands tucked into his cloak pockets.

“Hermione is upset because she isn’t good at Divination,” Luna said. Hermione had forgotten that she was in the common room with them. Hermione clacked her teeth together angrily.

“No, I’m not,” Hermione said furiously. She grabbed her belongings in a hurricane of movement and stomped up to the girl’s dormitory.

“Do you think O.W.L.s are making her crazy?” she heard Ron ask right before she was out of shot to hear him.

She clacked her teeth together again, throwing her stuff haphazardly on the bed and stomping into the bathroom to take a shower. No one ever listened to her. She was just trying to help them, why wouldn’t they just listen to her? Regulus was the only one who even tried, but he was barely around anymore. It didn’t help that he had been given another week of detention after hexing Harry in the middle of class. Hermione didn’t fully understand why he’d done that, but Harry just grumbled something about Regulus trying to watch out for him.

She was so annoyed. It felt like every time she opened her mouth, she was shut down. Why did she even bother? She ground her teeth together. It felt like she was always fighting an uphill battle and it was just so — so — she huffed — so lonely. She felt like no one understood how she felt. No one could see what she was going through, and they always refused to do so much as listen.

Her teeth hurt the next morning when she first woke up, and she wondered if she had been clenching them in her sleep, grinding them together all night long. It felt a bit like when she would lose a baby tooth and an adult tooth would grow in.

Umbridge inspected Transfiguration and Care of Magical Creatures that day. The confrontation between Umbridge and McGonagall put Hermione on edge in a way she couldn't fully articulate. It felt like there was a constant threat living just around the corner now that Umbridge was inspecting their professors.

Care of Magical Creatures was just as bad, though Hermione was grateful that Hagrid wasn't there. Harry was nearly given a detention during class when Umbridge asked about students being hurt during class.

"That was me," Malfoy said. "I was slashed by a hippogriff."

"A hippogriff?" Umbridge asked, scribbling quickly on her clipboard.

"Only because he was too stupid to listen to what Hagrid told him to do," Harry said angrily. Hermione ground her teeth together in frustration. Regulus was clearly worried about Harry's outbursts in front of Umbridge, and now in the one class that Regulus wasn't with them, Harry had to open his mouth.

Umbridge turned to him slowly, a menacing light in her eyes, but as she opened her mouth, Malfoy interrupted. "I'd be happy to tell you more about it if you want to meet after class," he said. Umbridge looked over at him just as Malfoy smiled.

Hermione blinked, then blinked again. His smile was so bright that it felt like it blinded her for a long moment. Umbridge herself seemed a bit dazzled by it. Hermione didn't think she'd ever seen Malfoy smile like that, he looked almost... charming. She looked over at her friends to see Ron staring at Malfoy with a dazed look of incredulity. Harry just looked annoyed, rolling his eyes so hard that it must have hurt. He seemed completely unaffected by Malfoy's smile.

Hermione spent the rest of the day after class in the library again, working on her homework. However, she kept feeling like Malfoy's blazing smile had somehow affected her vision. It seemed like things were blurrier than usual. She had to hold her book at the right angle to make sure she could read it. She would have to look into it. Surely a smile couldn't actually blind someone.

She went back to the common room after eating dinner late in the Great Hall, she was alone again, most of her friends having eaten earlier. She was wondering if Ron and Harry were once again at Quidditch practice when she saw Ron was in the common room.

“Where’s Harry?” she asked as she took a seat on the floor next to Ron, he was leaning against the couch staring into the fire.

He looked at her briefly before looking away and shrugging.

“What?” she prompted.

“He said he had to call —” he paused to look around the room to make sure they were alone, “to call Padfoot, but he forgot to grab the mirror.”

Hermione stared at him for a moment. “What do you mean?”

“He didn’t actually take the mirror with him when he closed his curtains,” Ron said. “I think he’s hiding something.”

Hermione rolled her eyes. “I’m sure he’s not hiding anything. He’s probably just tired.”

“I guess,” he said. They fell into a companionable silence, and she pulled out her book to read while Ron moved over to the chess table. It was nearly midnight by the time Regulus made it back to the common room.

He was messing with his hand. It looked like it was wrapped in a bandage, but he quickly shoved it in his pocket when he noticed them sitting there.

“Hey,” he said evenly. He looked drained. Hermione sat up taller.

“Are you okay?” she asked.

“Fine,” he replied with an elegant shrug. He eyed the stairs like he was thinking of walking past them to go to bed, but ultimately walked over and sat next to Hermione. They talked idly for a bit, mostly about Umbridge and classes.

“Why weren’t you in Care of Magical Creatures?” Ron asked. He was staring at the chessboard with an intense focus that he never applied to any other part of his life.

“I’ve decided to drop it for the time being,” Regulus said.

“You dropped it?” Hermione yelled. Regulus nodded with a small wince.

“I’m still planning to take the O.W.L. at the end of the year, but I’m going to study on my own.”

“I didn’t realize that was an option,” Ron said curiously.

Regulus shrugged again. “It’s not usually, but McGonagall made an exception for me,” he said. There was a light blush on his cheeks that made her not want to question him.

“Malfoy was awful in class today when Umbridge showed up,” Hermione said, changing the subject.

“Wonder what terrible things Malfoy told her afterward,” Ron muttered unhappily, an angry frown etched into his serious face.

“Yeah, I wonder that too,” Hermione confessed with a frown. “I wish we could do something, get rid of her or something.”

“Unless you plan on shoving her off the Astronomy Tower, there’s not much we can do,” Regulus said. Ron chuckled, but Hermione pursed her lips. She didn’t think it was a good time to be joking about such things.

“You know, I was thinking today,” she said, shooting a nervous look over at Regulus. He probably wouldn’t like what she wanted to say, especially given that it was likely to put Harry in danger, but they were in danger regardless and they had to do something. “I was thinking that maybe the time’s come when we should just do it ourselves.”

“What do you mean?” Regulus asked, giving her a curious look. It was the first look he’d given her that wasn’t at least partially distracted in weeks. She took a deep breath in through her nose, realizing suddenly that she could smell dittany and the faint scent of blood.

“Well, learn Defense Against the Dark Arts ourselves,” she said, before sniffing again. The smell was coming from Regulus. That was odd, she’d never been able to smell dittany on him before. Perhaps he’d never used it around her. She didn’t think her ability to smell had improved that much.

“You want us to do extra work? D’you —” Ron started to say.

“You want us to learn Defense ourselves outside of class?” Regulus interrupted. “Like a dueling club?”

“No, I was thinking that we need a teacher,” she said, fiddling with her sweater uncomfortably.

Regulus hummed thoughtfully. “Who did you have in mind? I don’t think Lupin is nearby right now, he’s the only one I know with experience teaching.”

“I was actually thinking you could do it,” Hermione said, before lowering her voice to a whisper. “Or Harry.”

“What was that?” Regulus asked. Hermione took a sturdy breath.

“Harry could teach us, after everything he learned last year,” she said.

Regulus was quiet for a long time. Even Ron didn’t reply. He stared contemplatively into the fire. Hermione’s nose twitched slightly as she breathed him in again. Yep, there was definitely blood. Had Regulus hurt himself? Was he bleeding? Was that what the dittany was for?

“Let me think on it,” he said. “You can always ask Harry though. He might be willing.” He stood up after he was finished speaking, and walked slowly up to the dorm after bidding them good night.

“I didn’t think he would be that receptive,” Ron said softly once Regulus was gone.

“He didn’t exactly say yes,” Hermione said. “Did you notice his smell?”

Ron froze for a second before looking up from his chess game. “His smell?” he said with a chuckle, tilting his head to the side.

“Yes,” she said, blushing furiously. “He smelled like dittany.” Ron laughed again.

“No, I didn’t smell anything,” he replied. “Anyway, I better go to bed.” She waved to him as he left, the thought of Regulus lingering in her head. She rubbed her face with both hands as she mulled it over. Maybe she was imagining it.

the boathouse.

Chapter Notes

It took Regulus nearly three weeks to translate the book Severus gave him from Greek to English. He thought about asking Kreacher to bring him more books from the muggle library where he found the language books last time, but ultimately he decided against it, opting instead to use the few translation books that were available to him in the Hogwarts library. He was surprised by the limited variety, but luckily there was enough there for him to get the job done.

It felt a bit like it had when he had to translate the Norse spell all those years ago, the main difference being that Greek magic was far more complicated than anything he had ever come in contact with. He felt like was missing a huge amount of background information while trying to translate, as if there was an entire basis for every magical word and choice that he didn't have access to.

In the end, he translated just enough to feel comfortable using the information. He understood why it wasn't in the Restricted Section anymore though. Similar to the Norse spell that had nearly killed him, it involved changing his magical core in a way that would scare off most wizards. It was dangerous stuff to mess with, he knew that very well, but there was a part of Regulus that just didn't care.

If asked, he would say that he just needed to heal, that he had to protect Harry, that he needed to be as powerful as possible to do what needed to be done, but in the quiet shadows of the late evenings stuck in the library, a voice in the back of his head would whisper, who cares? And that was really the crux of it all.

If this killed him, or damaged his magical core more than it already was damaged, then what did it matter? He didn't feel particularly useful before the damage was done, Harry had been put in danger plenty of times even when Regulus was in good shape. Why would it matter if something happened to him now? He wasn't doing much to help when it really came down to it.

There was also the terrible conclusion that without James, without any connection to the man he had once loved, who he currently loved, why did it matter if he continued on? For the first time in years, he thought about the prospect of surviving the war.

He knew it wasn't likely. The Dark Lord was gaining power quickly, and there seemed to be danger around every corner. There would be another war. Regulus was sure he wouldn't survive it. But now that he was alone —not just from spending most of his time isolated from the few living people he knew, but also from separation from whatever terrible ghost creature James was — the idea of what the future might hold for him rose out of the Black Lake like a terrible sea monster.

It felt like staring into the abyss, an endless spread of nothingness, loneliness, and purposelessness. He didn't really see a point in it most of the time, the rest of the time he looked at it with an aching terror that never quite seemed to leave him. He wasn't sure that he ever wanted to face it, that he even wanted to survive. So what did it matter if this illegal Greek magic destroyed him beyond repair?

He was probably depressed. That's what he thought during his more logical moments, but those moments came infrequently and grew further apart each time they visited. He wasn't speaking to anyone. Not really. He would talk to Harry during their preparations, but mostly he sent Harry away to read up on the theories he needed to know. He didn't really talk to anyone else at school. He and Sirius still weren't on speaking terms, and it wasn't like Severus had ever been much of a conversationalist. No, Regulus was alone, as he had always been.

He woke up early one Sunday morning just after sunrise. Before getting out of bed he cast his morning incantation, every sunrise and sunset it needed to be cast. He was glad that it was Sunday. There wouldn't be much to do that day, though he didn't want to hang around doing homework with the other teenagers. He never did, but he was especially apathetic about it this year.

He threw on one of his heavier cloaks and left the dorm before any of his dorm mates woke. He took the long way through the castle, exiting outside, and eventually making the long trek down to the boathouse.

He wasn't sure why the boathouse had become such an important place for him. He had never visited it during his first life, and he hadn't thought about it during the first few years of his second life. However, once Umbridge infiltrated the castle, Regulus felt like he needed a place where he could go to hide, especially one that had no previous emotional ties for him. The boathouse was almost always empty, the only person who frequented it was Hagrid, and he still wasn't back from whatever Order mission he had been sent on. Though it was an odd place, it was perfect for what he needed.

He liked being in the boathouse. The noise of the lake brushing up against the shore and the sides of the building created a lull inside him that always calmed his stress. He cast a warming charm once he was inside and climbed into one of the boats that were tied inside the boathouse, still floating in the water from the last time it was used. He laid back in it like a coffin and pulled out his kolossoi, an odd doll-like object that he made out of wax and cloth.

The spell itself involved using crystal rods to puncture the doll in different places to replicate the process of anchoring his magic and his soul to his physical body. Or at least, that was his understanding of it. He took a few deep breaths before shifting the crystal rods around, under his breath, he sang the Æphodí, a type of enchantment that could only be sung rather than spoken. He didn't fully understand the words, but he didn't need to.

Like all other times that he used this spell, the effect was immediate. He closed his eyes, cradling the kolossoi to his chest. There was a breeze that crossed over his face in a direction that would have been impossible for real wind given where he was in the boathouse. He breathed it in with a delighted sigh, evergreen trees and the scent of someone making cinnamon bread. It was a peculiar smell, but it was always the first thing he encountered when he cast this spell.

The first time he had done it his heart had been racing in his chest as he leaned back in his dorm room, the curtains charmed closed, but the moment that scent hit his nose, it was like being nestled in a soft blanket of safety. All his worries and anxieties drifted away with it. That happened now too, the depression and terror that seemed to haunt him nowadays left him as he sunk deep into the magic.

The next thing that came was pain, but not in the way he was used to. It wasn't a physical pain, but a metaphysical pain, a magical pain. It was like someone was taking his magical core and stretching it out like a muscle after a long Quidditch game. It stung, and he would hiss out his pain through his teeth, but it also felt so good that his eyes would roll back up in his head.

He didn't quite understand it. Sometimes he could feel hands doing the stretching, touching him and fixing him, though he never knew if this was real or if his brain just had to attach some sort of real-world experience to something that was so far beyond his worldly understanding.

It was a bit odd though. The hands themselves were not anything that he had encountered in the real world. He was barely ever touched, especially in a way that was so purposeful. As he searched his memories, the only people he could remember touching him like that were James and Barty.

It wasn't sexual exactly, but it also wasn't not sexual. He thought that maybe it was only nonsexual because his magical core didn't have the capability to experience sexual pleasure. Yet at the same time, he thought he only attached it to anything sexual as a comparison because he had never experienced that sort of pain and pleasure working hand in hand as he did while having sex with something.

The odd part was the way the hands felt. They felt smaller than his hands and much softer. There was a strength there, sure, but it wasn't like the strength that James held in his hands. It wasn't muscular strength. It was the kind of strength someone gained from kneading bread, from gardening, from making potions. It was different, it was purposeful.

He grunted, his body twitching and arching as he experienced the waves of pain and release that came with this spell each time. He was so all-consumed by it that he barely even thought about the danger until after the fact. The thing was, in this state of being, where he was cracked open by a binding spell, where he was tied to a doll and a few crystal rods, he was always right on the precipice of death.

He wasn't sure how he knew that exactly, but it was like if something went slightly wrong, if he was pushed even slightly in the wrong direction, he would tumble over the edge. He didn't think he would even mind all that much, a death like this would be far better than whatever death lay in wait for him out in the world. He would trip and fall, careening down, and he would disappear. That was a death he could accept.

After the pain and the release, came what he had begun to refer to as the earthquake. He softly began to sing again, another Æphodi, this one slightly different than the first. It made him a bit more aware of his body. The hands would grab him and yank him up, not truly, not physically, but in his mind, in his soul.

They would drag him up and then, for all intents and purposes, begin to push him around. Every time the hands touched his body, he felt like the kolossoi doll. Like he was no longer made of flesh, blood, and bone, but instead of wax and cloth. He felt as unreal as he could possibly feel. He didn't understand the purpose of this part of the ritual, but by the end of it he was too dizzy and disoriented to realize that he was coming back to the surface. He felt like he was being reborn and reshaped each time.

The final part was all color, the feelings gone, or tucked away behind a metal door. He would see, behind his eyes, violent greens and reds, shooting through the air and drifting past him like tree branches in the wind. Slowly they would vanish like he was being buried alive, and when it finally ended, when he opened his eyes, it was like someone had taken pity on him, had dug him out of his shallow grave, and he was awake once again. Whole and alive.

He stayed in the boat for a while after the ritual was finished, but eventually pulled out his journal where he kept all his notes. He tried to keep detailed accounts of what happened each time, though after several attempts it was starting to get a little repetitive. His body always hurt after it was done, though that wasn't anything new, but it was a different, unique kind of ache that seemed to originate in his bloodstream. It was like the magic in his veins was trying to escape, as if it was unhappy to be housed in such an abusive vessel.

Well, too bad, Regulus thought. If I have to stick around, then so do you.

He climbed out of the boat just a bit later, trying out a few spells and jotting down his improvements. It wasn't much, but there was a slight change as time went on. He didn't know if that was actually the ritual helping him, or if it was just the passage of time. He wasn't sure he would know until the very end.

Above the two boats that sat in the water, were two boats that hung from the ceiling above. Once he was finished with his ritual, his first order of business, so to speak, was to lower one of the other boats enough so that it hovered before him like a makeshift desk. Just the fact that he was able to maintain that sort of magic now made him hopeful for the future. He wouldn't be useless for long. Though the nerve damage pain persisted, at least he would be able to cast.

The boat was covered in a black rug that Regulus had stolen from inside the castle, he pulled it off, folding it over itself, to reveal the potion set he had beneath. It had taken a lot of practice to get everything done correctly, but he felt confident that he finally had the potion just right. There wasn't much left to add to it, only the two final ingredients. He recovered it with the rug and cast another charm to protect it from prying eyes, before heading back up to the castle.

He had been busy — the regular rituals, his homework for classes, the daily incantations, the prep he had to do with Harry — it had been draining him and one important thing had fallen by the wayside: his hunt for the Horcruxes. He needed to move something forward, he needed to do something, otherwise, he might truly lose his mind.

He found Luna quickly, using the map to spot her in one of the dungeon corridors. She did always have a tendency to wander, and he knew she was lonely during the weekend. He wished he could get her to spend more time with Harry and his friends, but she was hard to reach during the day, only drifting around to find them when it was late in the evening.

“Hey, Luna,” he said as he walked around the corner. She was staring at the ceiling, and it took Regulus a long second to realize that she was looking at a door that led out of the wall eight feet off the ground. “What’s that?”

“A secret, I think,” Luna said softly, dragging her eyes away. “What do you need, Regulus?”

“Who says I need something?” Regulus said, partially distracted by the mysterious door. He looked down at her after she didn’t reply, she was smiling blankly at him.

“You came to find me, that means you need something. How can I help?” She didn’t sound annoyed, but he felt bad anyway.

“Sorry,” he said. She shrugged one shoulder, but her smile didn’t diminish. “I wanted to ask you about the books kept in the Ravenclaw Common Room. Pince mentioned that Ravenclaw practically has its own library up there.”

“That’s true,” Luna said. “Though I don’t really like to read. What kind of book are you looking for?”

“Anything about the founders of Hogwarts, I’m researching some of their famous objects,” he said vaguely. She gave him a look that he thought meant she was searching him for something, but it was always so hard to read her.

“Would you like me to show you?” Luna asked finally.

“That would be great,” he said, relaxing slightly. It took nearly twenty minutes to make it all the way to the top of Ravenclaw Tower — Regulus thought his legs might collapse under him as they walked up all the stairs — but eventually, they made it to a large door with a bronze raven knocker on the front. The raven sprung to life once they were before it.

“What goes in dry and comes out wet, the longer it is in, the stronger it gets?” the raven croaked.

“A riddle?” Regulus asked, somehow it had never occurred to him that there could be common rooms without traditional passwords. Luna nodded, though she didn’t reply. She had a pensive look on her face.

Regulus mulled over the riddle, trying to remember what it all was. It goes in dry and comes out wet. A swimmer, maybe? But it gets stronger the longer it’s in. Maybe a pickle, he thought sardonically.

“Do you have to answer a riddle every single time?” Regulus asked.

“Yes,” Luna replied. “But it’s okay. This one is a Tom riddle.”

“Huh?” Regulus said dumbly.

She looked at him for a split second. “It’s Voldemort,” she said.

“Well reasoned,” the raven croaked, the door swinging open.

“What?” Regulus said loudly, but Luna was already gliding through the doorway. He jumped to follow her, not keen on being left outside to answer another riddle by himself, especially given that he didn’t understand the first one at all.

The inside of the Ravenclaw Common Room was extremely airy, nearly the opposite of the Gryffindor one which was cozy and warm. It was nice though, he could picture himself here, doing homework and relaxing after a long day of classes. It was nearly empty this time of day which was convenient, he didn’t feel like answering questions or dealing with too many prying eyes.

“Here is the library,” Luna said. He wandered over to where she was standing. In front of her was a large white statue of Rowena Ravenclaw, behind the statue, Regulus could make out the doors that must have led to the dorm rooms. To the left of the statue was a slim archway that was covered by a thick curtain. Luna pushed it aside to reveal a tight room filled to the brim with stacks and stacks of books.

Regulus moved to walk in, glancing at the statue one last time, only to stop when he realized she was wearing a diadem. It must have been the lost one, he had never seen another statue of her, but he was certain that there wouldn’t be one where she just so happened to be wearing a different diadem.

“Luna,” he said distractedly.

“Yes,” she asked, still standing next to him holding the curtain open.

“What do you know about the lost diadem?” he said, gesturing to the statue.

“Not much,” she said, tilting her head thoughtfully. “Beyond that Helena was the one to steal it.”

“Right,” he said, he already knew that after Lupin found out about it in his research. “Do you think there are books about that in here?” He looked at the piles of books feeling slightly intimidated by the way they were organized, or not organized.

Luna hummed. “You could always ask her,” she said.

“Ask her?”

“Yes.” She nodded. “The Grey Lady, she’s a ghost here. Didn’t you know that?”

“I did, but I — I just hadn’t thought about it I guess.” Of course, he knew that the Grey Lady was the ghost who represented the Ravenclaw house, but he had never thought to ask who that ghost actually was. He hadn't even realized that it was Helena, though in retrospect it made sense. He wondered how the Dark Lord found the diadem in the first place. Did his hunt start at Hogwarts?

"She is quite shy," Luna said with a nod, misinterpreting his silence. "It's difficult to get her to speak with you, but with some persistence, I find she is just as amendable."

"Where would I find her?" he asked.

"I'll show you," Luna said, a cheerful look on her face like she had just been waiting for someone to ask.

They left the Ravenclaw Common Room, Regulus immediately mourning the prospect of sitting down and resting for a while before tackling the long spiral staircase that they had just climbed, and made their way outside to the suspension bridge that connected Ravenclaw Tower to some of the classrooms. Regulus almost never walked out on the bridge. The cold wind cut through the tall walls of the castle, and he had to wrap his cloak tighter around himself to keep the warmth in.

"She likes to linger on this bridge during the day," Luna said before pointing to the far end. "I think it's best if you speak alone. Good luck, Regulus."

"Thanks, Luna," he said, shivering against the cold. Luna smiled blandly before turning to walk back into the castle.

He didn't see Helena at first, it didn't look like anyone was out here — not that anyone should have been on a bridge this frigid — but once he made it halfway across, he noticed her floating behind a piece of suspension. She was facing out toward the Black Lake, staring off into the distance.

"Hello, Grey Lady?" he called. She twisted away from him instantly like she was going to head straight through the castle wall. "Wait!"

"I don't go by that name!" she called over her shoulder.

"I'm sorry," he said quickly. "It's Helena, right?"

She paused but did not turn. "What do you want?"

"I just wanted to speak with you," Regulus said. "Luna, my friend, told me you might be able to help me."

"You are friends with Luna?" she asked, finally turning to look at him.

"Yes," he said, pausing only a moment before he decided to dive in headfirst. "I was friends with her mother once, Pandora. You might have known her."

Helena softened slightly. "Pandora," she breathed. "I did know her."

"I wanted to ask you something if that's alright," he said.

She looked at him suspiciously but finally gave a tight nod.

“I was wondering if you could tell me anything you know about the lost diadem.” A cold smile crossed her ghostly face. Regulus would have shivered upon seeing it if his body wasn’t practically vibrating against the icy wind.

“I’m afraid I cannot help you.” She spoke with a condemnation that Regulus couldn’t decipher.

“Wait!” he said desperately. “Please, it’s vital.”

“You are not the first student to covet the diadem —”

“I’m trying to destroy it,” he replied instantly. Helena froze, her eyes searching his face. “Did you —” he paused, hoping against hope that she wouldn’t react badly to his next words. “Did you tell another student where you hid it?”

She didn’t look angry, which surprised him. Instead, she looked ashamed. “He was so flattering. He seemed to understand me, to sympathize...”

“He’s very good at that,” Regulus said, though the version of the Dark Lord he knew was never that charismatic. He could imagine his teenage self being less threatening. “You weren’t the first person that the Da — Tom Riddle tricked.” He stopped speaking as his own words sunk in. “Oh, a Tom Riddle,” he whispered, thinking of Luna and her unusual answer to the Ravenclaw raven’s riddle.

Helena tilted her head slightly as he spoke to himself, but she did not reply. She looked sad, pitying almost which Regulus bristled at. She was the one who led the Dark Lord to the diadem, not him.

“Do you know what he did with it? After he found it, do you know where he hid it?”

“I only saw him here one other time after he left Hogwarts,” she said, speaking so softly that her voice was almost carried off with the wind.

“When was that?” he asked.

“A few years after he graduated. I believe he came back to speak to Dumbledore about something.”

“Speak to Dumbledore?” he muttered. “I see. Well, thank you, Helena.”

“Do you truly plan to destroy it?” she asked. He nodded. She seemed to relax, her face going slack with relief. He turned away from her, a feeling of discomfort in his chest. The damage the Dark Lord had done was so widespread, it festered in every part of the wizarding world, even the ghosts at Hogwarts were haunted by him.

However, Regulus was one step closer to killing him. He had one more piece of vital information, something Dumbledore had failed to mention to him. He needed to speak with the man as soon as possible.

Chapter End Notes

the actual answer to the riddle in this chapter is a teabag, however, i thought it was funny to have luna provide a slightly nonsensical answer. she says tom riddle because of him in the chamber of secrets (goes in dry, comes out wet, the longer he's inside, the stronger he gets).

the metamorphosis part II.

They were too swamped with schoolwork over the next two weeks to revisit the subject of learning Defense Against the Dark Arts on their own. Harry and Regulus were spending more time away, though Hermione wasn't sure whether they were doing something together or separately. Ron was clearly suspicious of what they were hiding though as he brought it up several times.

"I mean, both of them will be gone from the dorm until late at night! I swear they're up to something. Aren't you mad that they're not including us?" Ron repeated once again. They were in the library working on Potions waiting for Regulus and Harry to join them.

Hermione rolled her eyes. "No, Ron." She fiddled with the ends of her hair. She had been leaning too far over on her parchment and now had ink on her hair, causing the ends to stick together. "Why don't you use your seer skills to figure it out?" she said acidly.

Ron was silent. She turned to snap at him, to tell him that she was just kidding when Regulus and Harry finally joined them. Regulus looked frustrated, but he didn't seem like he wanted to talk about it, Harry seemed unbothered so she didn't bring it up. They worked together for a bit before Hermione decided to broach the topic that she'd been thinking about. It wasn't often that they were all together so she had to take advantage.

"I was wondering," she said softly, "whether you'd thought any more about Defense Against the Dark Arts."

Harry looked incredulous, but Regulus was the one to respond.

"How would we do it?" Regulus asked.

Hermione froze for a second, she hadn't admitted it to herself, but she had been expecting Regulus to reject her idea outright. She was mostly hoping that Harry would be the one to agree.

"Well, I was thinking we could just get a small group together — only people that we trust — and then you could run lessons," Hermione said. "I have some ideas. I thought we could start with what's tested on our O.W.L.s."

"Okay," Regulus said. "We'll have to be careful. Umbridge cannot find out."

"And you'll teach us?" Ron asked.

"No," Regulus said. Hermione startled in her seat. "Harry is going to teach you."

"What?" Harry said, far too loudly. Madam Pince hushed them loudly from the other side of the library. "What?" he repeated.

“Harry knows plenty. I’ll help, but Harry should be the one to teach you.” Regulus grinned for a second. Hermione blushed, even though Regulus wasn’t grinning at her specifically. She shook her head, embarrassed. She had already agreed to bury her misguided crush on Regulus Black; she would not allow herself to be pulled back in.

“Who would want to be taught by me? I’m crazy,” Harry said. Regulus rolled his eyes, but his smile didn’t dim.

“Being crazy and being a good teacher are not mutually exclusive,” Regulus responded.

“How did you come up with this idea at all?” Ron asked Hermione, sounding tired and bored like this wasn’t an amazing opportunity, but instead a terrible chore he was being asked to complete.

“Well,” Hermione said slowly, imploring Ron to listen to her, “I was speaking to Viktor, and he mentioned that Harry —”

“Viktor?” Ron said, his face souring instantly.

“Here we go,” she heard Harry mutter.

“Yes, Ron. Viktor. Is that a problem?” Hermione replied sharply.

“No,” Ron said, though he was clearly lying. “Just didn’t know you still talked to him, that’s all. He’s a bit old for you, isn’t he?”

Hermione looked at Regulus and Harry, hoping they would back her up, but alas Harry was already sinking into himself like he did whenever they fought, and Regulus just looked curious, his lips pursed like he was deep in thought about something.

“He’s just a friend,” Hermione replied when she realized that neither of the other two boys would help her. “I don’t understand why he bothers you so much. I’m allowed to have a pen pal, aren’t I?”

“I guess,” Ron said snidely.

“What did Viktor say exactly?” Regulus interrupted to ask.

“He said that Harry knew things that even he didn’t know, he said he would be a good person to learn from. I figured since Harry learned from you, then you would be the best person to ask.”

Regulus nodded, Harry beamed with a pride that she didn’t see on his face very often. She doubted it had to do with his own skill, he was never that self-boasting.

“Do you have an idea of who we’ll invite?” Regulus asked.

“Yes, I can bring it up to them. I was thinking we could meet during the next Hogsmeade trip. It’s this coming weekend,” Hermione responded, her voice businesslike. She wanted him to take this seriously, she needed this to work; she would not allow them to fail their O.W.L.s.

“During the next Hogsmeade trip?” Ron groaned. “But I wanted to go to Sprintwitches Sporting Needs. I need some good Keeper gloves.”

Hermione rolled her eyes at him again. “This is far more important than Quidditch, Ron.” Both Ron and Harry gasped in outrage, Regulus looked away, his lips twitching like he was trying very hard not to laugh.

“I’m sure you can visit Sprintwitches afterward,” Regulus said. “Where in Hogsmeade?”

“Er,” she said quietly. She had been hoping he wouldn’t ask, it wasn’t exactly the most normal place. “The Hog’s Head.”

Regulus really did laugh then. “Oh, I see. We have to go to a seedy bar to do this.”

Hermione bristled slightly. “Well, I just figured the other professors would be less likely to catch us there.”

“We’re not doing anything wrong, are we?” Harry asked.

“We won’t be breaking any rules during this meeting,” Hermione said evasively.

“Umbridge is probably worried about us building an army against her,” Regulus cut in to say. “So if she finds out that we are learning Defense on our own, then she is definitely going to crack down on the group.”

“Oh, alright,” Harry said, looking away from them with a pensive expression on his face. He looked like that a lot nowadays.

“So, it’ll be vitally important that no one tells anyone else.” Regulus steepled his fingers thoughtfully.

“I have an idea for that,” Hermione said, leaning forward so that she could whisper quietly. She was quite proud of this idea and had been working on it all summer. “There is this jinx that binds someone to their name on a piece of paper, so if they tell anyone, sneak will break out across their face in boils.”

“Godric,” Ron breathed.

“Wow,” Harry said at the same time.

Regulus looked shocked, but he schooled his expression quickly. Not quickly enough that she didn’t catch it, but still.

“That sounds a bit... intense,” Regulus said, speaking a bit like he was trying to quell an angry animal.

“You said yourself that Umbridge can’t know!” Hermione defended.

“Yes, but that seems a bit too retaliatory. Perhaps we should think of something that will keep them from telling her at all, rather than something that will punish them after the fact.”

“I guess,” Hermione grumbled, disappointed.

Regulus leaned back in his chair, furrowing his eyebrows for a moment. “Did you already figure out how to tie it to a piece of paper?” he asked.

“Yes,” Hermione said, though with less enthusiasm than before.

“Okay, that’s helpful. What if we did a modified tongue-tying jinx? That way anyone that signed it wouldn’t be able to speak about the group regardless of if they wanted to or not.”

Hermione felt herself light up. “Of course, yes, I think I could do that.”

“Perfect,” Regulus said with a gentle smile. She hopped slightly in her seat before she could contain her excitement. Her friends gave her odd looks, and she blushed furiously under their scrutiny. She didn’t know why she reacted that way.

She spent the rest of the evening designing the spell and the paper they would all sign. It was the only way to keep them all safe, and Regulus was right, unfortunately, that her plan would still allow them to be discovered. She couldn’t deny that she felt embarrassed about suggesting the other way. In retrospect, it seemed obvious. She wondered if something was wrong with her. She wanted so badly to punish whoever dared tell on them, it almost seemed more important than protecting their secret in the first place.

She was walking back to the common room when she noticed an odd taste in her mouth. She hadn’t realized at the time, too distracted by everything that was happening, but she had begun combing through the ends of her hair with her teeth as if trying to clean off the ink with her mouth. She spat out the taste, cringing in disgust.

There was definitely something wrong with her vision. That or she had stayed up far too late the night before. She didn’t know why, but every night she felt like she needed to stay awake longer and longer. It was destroying her sleep schedule, especially considering how badly she just wanted to sleep during the day. She was trying to hide it, but she thought that her dorm mates had noticed how ragged she was running herself.

Regardless, as she was walking into Hogsmeade that morning after dragging, truly dragging, herself out of bed, she was having trouble making out the signs she could usually read easily. She didn’t know what was going on. It seemed weird to her that she would develop eyesight issues so quickly, but it also felt far too slow for a normal magical reason. It was concerning, but she put it aside for the time being. She had a meeting to attend.

She walked into the Hog’s Head with her friends: Ron and Luna directly behind her talking about something or other, and Harry and Regulus a few paces behind them both walking silently with their hands tucked into their pockets. Regulus seemed unaffected, but Harry seemed like he was barely holding back his nervousness.

The meeting went as well as she could have hoped. Nearly twenty students showed up. It was a bit intimidating at first, she stumbled over her words as she tried to explain what they were there to do, then it all hit a snag when a few students, including Zacharias Smith, a Hufflepuff student, started pestering Harry about Voldemort, but Susan Bones, another Hufflepuff, got them back on track by asking Harry about his patronus.

After that, various members of the group seemed to devolve into lamenting about everything Harry had already done, much to Harry's chagrin, his cheeks blazing red. Regulus kept giving him that proud, fatherly look.

"Look. I don't want to sound like I'm trying to be modest or anything," Harry said modestly, "but I had a lot of help with all that stuff."

"That's the whole point, isn't it?" Regulus responded before anyone could intervene. "No one learns these things on their own, none of us will succeed alone. That's why it's important that we start this group. If we want to be well prepared," he glanced at Hermione quickly, "and to pass our O.W.L.s then we have to work together."

Hermione smiled brightly, a few other people nodding in agreement.

"Well, then, the next question is how often should we meet," Hermione said. It took a bit to settle everything, but they were still missing a very important detail. They had nowhere safe to meet. However, she still felt satisfied with the meeting. "I think everybody should write their name down so we know who was here."

Ernie and Zacharias looked uncomfortable about signing though and the tension that was already running through her body got even worse. She raised her eyebrows in challenge.

"We're prefects," Ernie said imploringly. "If this list is found..."

"It won't be," Regulus said, standing up for the first time since the meeting began. He had grown a lot taller over the last few months, she noticed. "I'm going to charm it so that no one else can read the names."

Ernie still looked uncomfortable, glancing at his friend uncertainly.

"Of course," Regulus continued haughtily, "you can always not sign and leave now. You won't be invited back though."

Ernie sighed, looking resigned, but agreed to sign. Hermione shot Regulus a grateful look, but he didn't see her. He had a pensive look on his face like he thought something was missing.

"That Zacharias bloke's a wart," Ron said after everyone had left.

"I don't like him either," she said, explaining that he had overheard her inviting Ernie and Hannah and that she couldn't leave him out after that. "But the more people the better. I don't think Michael Corner and his friends would have come if he wasn't going out with Ginny."

"He's WHAT?" Ron said.

She rolled her eyes, explaining to Ron how Ginny and Michael had met. Honestly, boys were so unobservant.

“I thought Ginny fancied Harry!” Ron yelled. Harry looked up curiously from where he had drifted off, a confused and caught look on his face. Regulus’s lips twitched.

“Ginny used to fancy Harry, but she gave up on him months ago,” Hermione said. Regulus really did laugh then, though none of them seemed to be able to figure out why he was laughing.

Hermione felt triumphant the rest of the day. She truly felt like she had accomplished something. Bizarrely, she kept hopping excitedly every time she thought about how well the meeting went, even with the snags they hit along the way.

It was probably this triumphant feeling that kept her from realizing what was going on in her mouth. It was later that night, and she was curled in her bed, one of her textbooks open on her lap — she was in the middle of a reread, of course, she had finished the book long before classes began — when she realized that she was once again grinding her teeth together without noticing.

She stopped and touched them gingerly with a few fingers, they hurt slightly like the grinding she was doing was permanently damaging them. At this rate, her dentist parents were going to make her sleep with a mouth guard. While touching some of her bottom teeth she noticed something truly odd.

Her teeth were just a bit too long. She was sure of it. She rushed to the bathroom, baring all her teeth in the mirror. Sure enough, random teeth were longer than others, looking jagged in her mouth. She let out a quiet noise of distress. What was happening to her? Was it because of the time Madam Pomfrey shrunk her teeth? Why were they growing like this?

It was Wednesday night by the time they were able to find a place to have their first official meeting, and Hermione was very carefully avoiding thinking about her teeth problem. She had rushed to Madam Pomfrey the morning after she discovered it, and though Pomfrey wasn’t sure what was causing the problem, she was quick to fix it.

Hermione was also trying not to think about her damaged eyesight. She brought that up to Pomfrey as well, but Pomfrey only suggested that she invest in a pair of glasses. That was definitely not what Hermione wanted to hear. She didn’t know what was happening, but now that she started to notice issues, she knew for a fact that they were all connected. They had to be.

She followed Harry, Ron, and Luna up to the seventh floor. Dobby had told Harry about this place, and in retrospect, Hermione should have thought of it herself. She had heard it mentioned before when she read about it in an old diary of a Ravenclaw student from the late 1800s that was published into a novel. She had just been too distracted to come up with the solution herself, and that fact bothered her far more than she would have liked.

“Where is Regulus? Is he not coming?” Hermione asked nervously.

“He said he would, I’m sure he’ll be here soon,” Harry said, though he was frowning deeply as he said it.

“What’s wrong? Did you tell him about, you know…” Ron said. Hermione gave him a sharp look.

“About what?” she said. She hated the feeling of not knowing something. Harry glared at Ron for a second.

“It’s nothing,” he said. “And no, I haven’t.” He sighed angrily. “I just wish — I’m so sick of — I wish he would just talk to Sirius. Both of them are driving me insane, and I feel like Regulus is avoiding me because he doesn’t want to talk about it.”

“That makes sense,” Luna said.

“How does that make sense?” Hermione asked frustratedly.

“Sirius and Regulus were used as weapons against each other, it makes sense that they would have a poor relationship now.”

“How do you even know that?” Hermione asked. Luna shrugged but didn’t answer.

“I don’t know how to fix it,” Harry grumbled.

“Give them a common goal,” Luna replied with a nod. “What do they both care about?”

Harry looked thoughtful as he began walking back and forth in front of the blank wall where the door to the Room of Requirement appeared a moment later.

The room itself was quite impressive and absolutely perfect for their needs. It was spacious and open with cushions that would be perfect for stunning practice, as Ron was quick to point out. The walls were lined with trinkets and books on Defense that Hermione had never seen before.

“Wow! Harry, this is wonderful, there’s everything we need here!” A second later there was a knock at the door.

Their peers arrived quickly after that, Ginny, Neville, Lavender, and Parvati among the first to show. Regulus was last, coming in only five minutes later. Hermione gasped when she realized that he wasn’t alone.

“What are they doing here?” Ron asked sharply. Behind Regulus were two Slytherins: Theodore Nott and Daphne Greengrass. They both looked supremely uncomfortable and were half hiding behind Regulus who looked completely unfazed by Ron’s question.

“They’re here to learn just like the rest of you,” Regulus said blandly.

“But what if they tell someone?” Fred asked accusingly. Regulus spared him only a passing glance.

“They won’t be able to,” Regulus said. “The paper you all signed — that they signed as well — keeps everyone from talking about this group. There is no danger. Let’s get started.”

She didn't notice it at first, too distracted by the Slytherins's entrance, but Regulus looked odd. Though he was holding his face in a way that looked emotionless and detached, there was a tension around his eyes that she didn't see very often. She wondered if his nerve damage was acting up, he looked a bit like he was in pain.

The meeting went perfectly. They decided on a name, Dumbledore's Army, as coined by Ginny. Regulus flinched slightly when he heard it, but he didn't argue. The other Slytherins were awkward and didn't speak to anyone but each other, but they also didn't disturb the meeting. After spending nearly two hours practicing Expelliarmus, they dismissed everyone, leaving just Hermione, Ron, Harry, and Regulus in the room.

"Are you okay?" Harry asked Regulus quietly. He hadn't participated in the practice sections, opting instead to pace around the room, checking everyone's technique and offering corrections when he could.

"I'm fine," Regulus said with a wave of his hand, but he was paler than usual. "Shall we head back?"

"Actually," Harry said, clenching his jaw like he was fortifying himself. "There is something I want to talk to you about. Ron already knows but —"

"Knows about what?" Regulus said. There was a tension running up his back like he was having trouble standing, and Hermione wished he would just sit down already.

"I've been experiencing feelings," Harry said slowly, uncertainly like he had no idea what he was talking about.

"Feelings?" Regulus replied, like Harry was the biggest idiot to ever live.

"Voldemort's feelings," Ron jumped to say, giving Harry an equally bewildered look. "He's been feeling what Voldemort is feeling."

"What?" Regulus asked, his teeth clenched tightly. Hermione listened attentively as Harry described the waves of emotions he would get that he knew were coming from Voldemort. It was similar to the terrible vision he'd had in Divination in fourth year, except now it was happening randomly when he was awake.

"How long has this been going on for?" Hermione asked, alarmed. Harry looked extremely uncomfortable.

"A few months," he mumbled.

"What was that?" Regulus said. He sounded furious, and Hermione was grateful that she wasn't on the receiving end of that voice.

"A few months," Harry said a little louder. He didn't look ashamed though, he looked angry. "Which you would know if you and Sirius were talking."

Regulus's mouth dropped open. "Excuse me? Sirius knows about this?"

“Yes.” Harry crossed his arms angrily.

“And what does Sirius have to say about it?” Regulus growled. Harry, strangely, softened at that.

“He said that you might understand what was happening better than he did. He said that you needed to be included.” Regulus’s eyebrows raised halfway up his forehead. “Can you please just talk to him? For me?”

Regulus took a long moment to reply.

“Fine,” he said through his teeth. “But this conversation isn’t over.”

Harry’s shoulders sagged. “I know,” he said, sounding relieved. They walked back to the common room together, Harry keeping an eye on the map as they went to make sure they didn’t run into anyone.

Hermione couldn’t shake the feeling of unease though. Voldemort was somehow sharing his emotions with Harry? How was that even possible? It disturbed her, even as she walked into the common room and plopped tiredly into a chair in front of the fire.

“Er, Hermione,” Ron said quietly. “What are you doing?”

“What?” she asked distractedly, looking up to see Ron, Harry, and Regulus watching her uneasily.

“Why are you doing that with your mouth?”

“Doing what?” she said. The moment she said the words, her teeth clacked back together, and she began grinding them. She would have to go back to Pomfrey tomorrow, she could already feel her teeth getting longer.

“That can’t be good for your teeth,” Harry said, cringing slightly.

“It’s fine,” Hermione said, though she didn’t bother unclenching her teeth to say it so the words came out muffled.

“Like she’s what?” Regulus asked.

“Bruxing, it’s a thing Scabbers — Pettigrew — whatever — used to do. Rats grind their teeth together like that. It’s called bruxing.”

“I’ve never heard of that,” Harry said.

“Well, you’ve never had a pet rat, have you?” Ron asked.

“Hermione,” Regulus said, a very odd look on his face. “Has anything else been going on? Anything weird?”

Hermione sunk into the seat, wishing they would all look away from her. She debated not telling them, but if anyone could help, she thought Regulus might be the one.

“My teeth keep growing,” she said, though once she started speaking she couldn’t seem to stop. “They keep getting longer. Pomfrey already had to fix them once, but it keeps getting worse.” She felt tears pool in her eyes. “And my vision is getting worse. And I can’t sleep at night, it’s like my body wants to be awake.”

“You’re becoming nocturnal?” Ron asked. Regulus pursed his lips for a second.

“You guys wait here, I’ll be right back,” he said before making his way up to the dorms.

“Think he realized something?” Harry asked.

“I’m sure he has,” Ron said, his voice suddenly softer. He was looking at Hermione now, the expression of disgust gone, replaced with one of sympathy. “Don’t worry, I’m sure Regulus can help.”

She relaxed slightly, though she didn't know if it was true, she appreciated Ron saying it. Regulus came back a handful of minutes later carrying a small vial of shimmery blue liquid.

“Drink this,” he said, coming to sit next to her.

“What is it?” Hermione asked.

“It’s the antidote,” Regulus said. He bit his bottom lip as he said it like he was holding something back.

“Antidote?” Hermione shouted before quickly swallowing the potion. “Someone poisoned me?”

Regulus placed a comforting hand on her shoulder. “In the future, I think you should avoid threatening to tell Molly what Fred and George are up to.”

“Fred and George did this?” Ron asked sharply.

Regulus nodded once. “Yes, I believe the exact words they used were if she wants to be a rat that badly.” Regulus cringed slightly, looking apologetic. However, there was also a slight smile there that he was clearly trying to hide.

“They were testing their stuff on first years!” she shouted.

“And we’re running a forbidden defense group called Dumbledore’s Army,” he said with great emphasis. “Sometimes you have to choose loyalty instead of deciding yourself who and who doesn’t deserve to be punished. Just be glad that Fred and George aren’t Slytherins. Now,” he stood up, “if you’ll excuse me, I have a brother to call.”

Hermione, Harry, and Ron watched him go, all of them with varying expressions of befuddlement.

“I can’t believe Fred and George did that to you,” Harry said quietly after a long silence.

“I can’t believe Regulus figured it out that quickly,” Ron added.

Hermione sighed, feeling defeated and embarrassed. “Is it that much worse than what I wanted to do to anyone who threatened to tell on us?” Rat us out, she corrected in her head. “At least what they did wasn’t permanent.”

“The boils would have been permanent?” Ron yelped, touching his face like he was about to be at the receiving end of that jinx.

Hermione nodded. She didn’t think she’d felt this terrible since first year when she felt isolated, friendless, and distinctly wrong. She threw her head back against the chair in defeat. It felt like every step she took was a misstep, yet every time she couldn’t spot it, like she was so caught up in her desire to be correct, that she couldn’t fathom herself being wrong.

the common goal.

There was something inside the Room of Requirement. Salazar's hairy fucking bollocks. All that stress, all that research, and there was a Horcrux right around the corner the entire time. In retrospect, it made perfect sense. A hidden room inside Hogwarts, one of the first places that had true meaning to the Dark Lord. He probably thought he was the only one to ever find such a place.

Regulus had been furious upon realizing that the Dark Lord had returned to Hogwarts once after graduating. It felt like vital information, so why hadn't Dumbledore told him earlier? It just felt so frustrating to be without any detail that could lead to the Dark Lord's destruction. He was out in the world, fully restored, doing Merlin knows what, and every minute that went by without Regulus figuring out how to kill him, was another minute that everyone he loved was in danger.

It took a full week to get in contact with Dumbledore, but eventually, he managed it. Actually, he had to send an owl to Lupin to ask him to contact the man since apparently Dumbledore wasn't taking messages from almost anyone else, Regulus included. He was just glad that Lupin was able to respond while he was out on missions for the Order. He was especially grateful that Lupin seemed committed to helping him without bringing up the topic that they almost discussed during the summer.

Regulus barged into Dumbledore's office ready to throw a full tantrum at the man like the fifteen-year-old he pretended to be, but the moment he laid eyes on Dumbledore, the anger seeped out of him like a deflating balloon.

He looked older than the last time he had seen him, stress pulling at him like he was a puppet powerless to the will of the world around him. Regulus could relate to that feeling and it made it more difficult to spit his anger out.

"You should have told me," Regulus said, mostly because he had come for a fight, and he wasn't just going to leave without at least making a point.

"I apologize," Dumbledore replied. "I have been compiling this information for a long time. It was difficult to know what is important." He showed Regulus the wide array of memories he had near his pensieve. "But you are right, it is imperative that you know everything if you are going to fight him."

Regulus gave him a suspicious look. "What were you waiting for exactly?"

"I was hoping I would have something more useful, I suppose," Dumbledore said. "Forgive me. I have grown used to hunting him on my own. There was a time — well, it's not important. I will tell you what I can."

“Have you found any others?”

“I have some theories, but nothing concrete yet.”

Regulus huffed. “Why were you so hard to reach?”

“Professor Umbridge, and Minister Fudge in turn, are very suspicious that I am training students.” Regulus nodded. He had figured that part out for himself. “Especially you and Harry. I was hoping that if I distanced myself from both of you, she would feel less inclined to target you.”

“I think that ship has sailed,” Regulus muttered. “She has it out for Harry especially. I think she thinks he’s an easy target.”

“I see.” Dumbledore frowned slightly, but he didn’t look surprised.

“I won’t allow her to succeed.” He paused, unwilling to reveal too much, but still wanting to make himself clear. “I won’t let her hurt Harry. I will stop her by any means necessary.”

“I do not doubt it, Mr. Black,” Dumbledore said. He looked entertained in a way that made Regulus wonder if the Sorting Hat hadn’t thought of putting the man in Slytherin rather than Gryffindor.

“I need to watch these memories,” Regulus said. He glanced at the various vials stacked behind the pensieve, there were so many of them, all with messy cursive writing on the side. Most of the labels began with a year, the earliest labeled with 1925. “When was he born?”

“December of 1926,” Dumbledore replied. “Some of these are memories of his family members before his birth.”

“His muggle family?”

“Yes, and his wizard family. Are you familiar with the Gaunts?”

Regulus searched through his memories of old families. When he was a child, he and Sirius were forced to memorize the names and family trees of pureblood families. He could still remember being quizzed on all of them at family events, his grandfather Arcturus pulling him and Sirius aside so he could test them. He would laugh when they got the answers right, but shoot a stinging hex at them when they got them wrong.

“They died out, didn’t they?” Regulus asked, finally remembering pieces of the family tree.

“Most of them did,” Dumbledore responded. “The last member of their family to attend Hogwarts was a boy named Ominis Gaunt in the 1880s. He died young, as many members of their family did. Neither Tom Riddle’s mother, Merope, nor his grandfather, Marvolo, attended the school.”

“Why not?” he asked.

“That I’m not sure of. I believe that Merope was as close to a squib as a witch can get while still having magic. It’s unlikely she would have been capable of attending the school. Morfin, Merope’s brother, does appear in the Book of Admittance, but he never accepted.”

“Do you know why?”

“I believe Marvolo wanted to keep his kids separate from our world. You should watch the memories for yourself.”

“Right, yes,” Regulus agreed.

“I believe this is the one you were asking about.” He grabbed one that was labeled ‘1957.’ “Feel free to return, though you must be careful that Umbridge does not spot you.”

Regulus nodded. He had come under Harry’s invisibility cloak this time, already used to sneaking around when he wasn’t going to classes or meals. He was still mulling over some of the memories he’d watched when he met up with his friends for their first official meeting of the Defense group.

He had reached out to Theo Nott a day or two before they figured out the location. At first, he wasn’t sure why he needed to do it, or why it had to be Theo, but after a while, he realized it was because of how isolated he had been in Slytherin in his first life. Sirius had good friends and such a strong supportive group of people around him, but all Regulus had was bad examples around every corner.

When they had the first meeting at the Hog’s Head, he realized how odd it was that students from Gryffindor, Ravenclaw, and Hufflepuff were there, but not a single Slytherin was in the room. It was the same thing that happened during the last war, all the Slytherins sequestered off by themselves in the dungeons to fester. Not that many of them didn’t deserve it, but still, he had the strong desire to be different, to change something.

He thought about inviting Draco first, he had become incredibly helpful in tracking Umbridge’s next plans for the castle — especially the newest form of prefects that she was planning to create made up of exclusively students from influential families, which she had mentioned in passing to Draco, anxious to get him on her side — but even with his help, Draco was too far entrenched to be able to join them comfortably. Not to mention that he was so obsessed with getting Harry’s attention that every single meeting would be immediately derailed.

Pansy, Crabbe, and Goyle were all out since he couldn’t invite Draco. He thought about Blaise, but he couldn’t seem to get the boy alone long enough to ask. Millicent was just as difficult to reach. So instead he settled on Theo, mostly because he was pretty sure some of his dormmates were already interested in getting to know the odd loner.

Theo was suspicious at first, as Regulus expected he would be, but it didn’t take much convincing. He was a bit surprised by that honestly given who his father was, another Death Eater just like Lucius Malfoy.

“Do you still talk to your dad?” Theo asked in the middle of Regulus’s prepared argument for why Theo should join.

“Sorry?”

“Sirius Black. Do you still talk to him even though he’s a murderer?”

Ah, Slytherins. He had missed this, the desire to demand sensitive information.

“Yes,” he answered, though he hadn’t talked to Sirius in over a month. He guessed that it still counted.

“It doesn’t bother you that he killed Harry’s parents?”

“He’s my father,” Regulus said, even though it would have bothered him very much. That wasn’t what Theo needed to hear.

Theo nodded once, looking very serious. “I’m bringing Daphne.”

“Fine, but you’ll both have to sign this.” He held out the document that he had charmed blank. Theo’s eyes narrowed.

“What does it do?”

“You know you’re the first person to ask that,” Regulus said with a fond smile. Theo didn’t react. “It keeps you from sharing our secret.”

“Tongue-tying jinx?”

“Yes.”

“Okay,” Theo said. He had such a dead voice, it must have been his negotiating voice. All Slytherins had one, but most of them just replicated their fathers. That’s why Draco always sounded so ridiculous.

He had expected the rest of his friends to freak out a bit more when Theo and Daphne entered the room with him, but they shocked him by accepting their presence fairly easily. Regulus was pleasantly surprised.

However, he had to admit that he was a bit distracted. The moment he was inside the Room of Requirement, he could hear the ringing. It had been a while since he had heard it, so he didn’t recognize it at first, but after a few uncomfortable seconds, he felt the drain begin. It felt like mold spreading across the inside of his lungs the longer he stood there. It was undeniable. There was a Horcrux in this room. He couldn’t see it, but he knew it was here.

He thought that was going to be the most stressful part of his night until Harry revealed that he was apparently sharing emotions with the Dark Lord himself. It was probably the worst news he could have heard, especially on top of everything else.

It reminded him of something, but he wasn't sure what. It made him think of being a child when he would do something wrong and forget about it, only to be kept up for nights after with the lingering sense of guilt and anxiety that had nowhere to go, no memory to attach to. That's how this new information felt. He could feel something tugging at him, begging him to remember why this was bad. Not just bad but doomsday, worst-thing-that-could-ever-happen bad, but he couldn't reach it.

He needed to talk to Sirius. Not just because Sirius already knew about this, but also because Harry had explicitly asked him to. That imploring look he got on his face when he asked for something was impossible to escape. He knew it and Harry probably knew it too, the little manipulator.

He was momentarily distracted by Hermione's fiasco. Honestly, Fred and George were getting very creative. He didn't tell her that it was partially his fault that she was on the receiving end of their over-the-top punishment. It had started a few weeks prior when Regulus happened upon them testing out some of their new inventions on a couple of first years in one of the more secluded corridors near the Gryffindor Common Room.

"Oh, hey, Reg," Fred said with a wide, unsettling grin. "We're not doing anything."

Regulus rolled his eyes. "Sure," he said. "That's what they all say."

George laughed. "Were you looking for us?"

"No, just heading to the library," Regulus responded. "Any progress?"

"Loads," Fred said. "You want to hear about them?" The first years left while he was speaking, all of them looking a little worse for wear, but with a few more coins in their pockets.

"All right."

Regulus dropped his bag on the ground and listened closely as Fred and George listed the many, many products they were trying out. He was honestly impressed by how many they had, though it was clear that several were still in their infancy. Most of them had one specific use: to get a person out of classes for the afternoon. It was a noble cause, though perhaps a bit short-sighted.

"Have you thought about doing something a bit more subtle?" Regulus asked.

Fred furrowed his eyebrows. "What do you mean?"

Like the very universe was on his side, Umbridge happened to walk past them at the end of the corridor, giving them a suspicious look before she tottered off. Regulus's eyes stayed glued to where she had disappeared.

"Something that could affect someone over time so that they didn't notice right away," he explained, dragging his eyes away to look at the twins again. "Imagine how crazy you would feel if one of these products released slowly."

They both looked thoughtful, neither replying right away. At the time, Regulus was hoping that they would understand that he meant to use whatever they created on Umbridge. If he could find a way to make her life a little worse then he would. He hadn't expected for Hermione to be their first target.

When Hermione opened up to them, listing off the bizarre occurrences in her life, it all clicked immediately in Regulus's head. He hadn't known that they were rat-related right away, but once they explained where their inspiration came from, it all made sense.

"Listen, I know Hermione can be intense —"

"That's a generous way of putting it," Lee said. He was lying back on his bed, his arms tucked behind his head as he watched Regulus talk to Fred and George who were sitting cross-legged on the floor in the center of the room.

"She means well, she can just be a bit misguided," Regulus said. Hermione had a way of making enemies, a trait that he understood uncomfortably well. Though he never threatened to get others in trouble during his first life — beyond Sirius perhaps when he was very little — he wasn't exactly the nicest kid around. Not to mention that he also had an unusually hard time making friends so he always felt for her.

Fred sighed. He was always the more reasonable of the two, and Regulus could see the way he softened. "Here, let me grab the antidote."

"Fred!" George gasped, placing his palm against his chest in fake offense.

"She did help create the D.A.," Fred said with a shrug. "I'm sure she's suffered long enough." He paused to look over his shoulder from where he was digging around in his trunk. "What symptoms did she experience?"

"Wouldn't you like to know," Regulus said, only partially joking. While he couldn't deny that he was impressed by their creation, especially considering how quickly they'd done it, he wasn't about to throw Hermione to the wolves.

Hermione looked so relieved when he gave her the antidote that he was sure the guilt would twist him up for weeks. Poor girl.

"Now, if you'll excuse me, I have a brother to call," he said as he left the common room.

The connection between the Dark Lord and Harry needed to be dealt with as soon as possible, and if he had to talk to Sirius to do it, then he needed to do it right away. There was also the fact that talking to him immediately would reduce Regulus's ability to talk himself out of it.

"Sirius," he said into the mirror after charming his bed curtains shut and silent. There was no reply right away. "Sirius. Sirius!"

"What? What's happening?" Sirius's face appeared in the mirror, his hair disheveled, and his beard too long. He looked scraggly and like he might have been drinking, or like he'd just woken up hungover. "Regulus? Is something wrong? Is it Harry?"

Regulus sighed. “What is wrong with you? I thought you were living in Grimmauld. Why do you look like you’re fresh out of Azkaban?” Sirius scowled.

“Did you call me just to insult my appearance? At least, I don’t look like a fifteen-year-old.”

“No, Sirius, no,” Regulus replied before the words sunk in. “And I can’t help looking fifteen, I didn’t reverse my age on purpose!”

“Sure, that’s what you keep telling us, but what else would cause it? Doubt coming back to life would put you at the perfect age to attend Hogwarts. I’ve surely never read about that happening, have you?”

“For the love of Merlin, it wasn’t my choice! Besides, are you telling me you would have done something different? You’re the one with the maturity of a teenager.”

“I’m plenty mature!” Sirius shouted.

“Right, that’s why you haven’t spoken to me in weeks. The silent treatment — exactly what a fifteen-year-old you would do.”

“Well, thirteen-year-old you deserved the silent treatment,” Sirius sneered. “Just like you deserve the silent treatment right now!” Sirius’s face disappeared.

Regulus dropped the mirror with a growl, his common sense only coming back to him the moment he wasn’t looking at Sirius’s unhealthy face. He took a few deep breaths. He counted to ten just to make sure he had a grip on himself.

“Sirius, please come back. I really do need to talk to you.”

Sirius appeared a few moments later, but he didn’t say anything.

“Are you not showering? You really look horrible.”

“You know what —” Sirius started offensively.

“No, I’m sorry!” Regulus couldn’t stop himself, could he? “You just look rough. I’m sorry. Are you eating?”

“What are you, my mother?” Sirius snapped immediately.

“Please. Mother never cared if you ate.” The words slipped out before he could stop them, before he could pause to think that they might be a bit cruel. Sirius, however, let out a startled laugh.

“I suppose that’s true,” Sirius said, surprised. He seemed to relax suddenly. “I’m eating. Just hard being here, is all.”

Regulus nodded. He understood. He didn’t love being in Grimmauld anymore either, and Sirius had it far worse than he did. He couldn’t imagine being alone with all those memories.

“I know,” he said. “I’m sorry.” Sirius shrugged. “I need your help.”

“What’s going on?” Sirius said quickly, his eyes bright with the prospect of having a task.

“Harry finally told me about the... emotions he’s getting from You-Know-Who.”

Sirius’s face twisted into horror for a second. “Yes, I told him to mention it to you. Do you know why that’s happening?”

Regulus shook his head. “No, but we need to find a way to stop it.”

“How? If we don’t even know what’s causing it —”

“Yeah, I know.” Regulus let out a defeated sigh. “I could bring it up to Dumbledore next time I see him. Do you think Lupin might have an idea?”

Sirius’s face soured. “I’m not going to ask him.” Regulus huffed.

“Don’t you think this is a little more important —”

“Please, don’t ask me to. You can write him if you want.”

Regulus was quiet for a moment, taking in the pain on his brother’s face. He sighed quietly.

“Okay, I’ll write him.”

Sirius nodded, his shoulders lowering. “Is that it?” He already looked distracted.

“There is something else.” Regulus swallowed, he really did need help with this, and there was no way he would let anyone currently in the castle assist. “I found another Horcrux.”

Sirius fumbled with the mirror for a second, and Regulus was vaguely worried that he might drop it, but he managed to get a grip on it at the last second.

“Where?”

“Hogwarts,” Regulus said. “Have you ever heard of the Room of Requirement?”

Sirius looked thoughtful for a second. “I don’t think so?” That was a surprise.

“It’s a secret room in the school that changes based on what someone needs. Dobby, the elf that used to belong to the Malfoys, told Harry about it. I think You-Know-Who must have found it during his time at Hogwarts and hid something there when he came back to interview for the Defense Against the Dark Arts a few years after he graduated.”

“I’m sorry.” Sirius shook his head, confused. “He tried to be a professor?”

Regulus chuckled. “Yeah, I don’t know if he was genuine in that though. Dumbledore thinks he put a curse on the position, that’s why no professor has lasted more than a year.” Sirius’s mouth dropped open.

“You’re kidding,” he said with a little laugh. Regulus shook his head, smiling.

“Nope. I saw the memory myself. Anyways,” he sobered, “I need help getting the Horcrux out. I can’t approach it on my own given what happened last time.” Sirius nodded, a frown on his lips now. “I was thinking you could come here during Christmas. Umbridge probably won’t stay, and I don’t want you to risk coming until she’s gone.”

“You’re not coming home for Christmas?” Sirius looked so crestfallen that Regulus almost laughed, though it wouldn’t have been a very nice laugh. His stomach warped as he remembered the many lonely Christmases during his first life when Sirius refused to come home and visit. He would have given anything at the time for Sirius to care this much.

“I will,” he replied. Harry wouldn’t be happy if he stayed in the castle so there was no way he could get away with that. “But I figure the two of us could come back.”

Sirius nodded. “Yes, let’s do it.” He smiled suddenly. “I can’t believe you found another one.” He looked triumphant, and Regulus felt all the hurt feelings, all the hard memories from his first life and the last few weeks dissipating.

All they needed was a common goal.

Chapter End Notes

regulus: if umbridge fucks with me, i'm gonna kill her dumbledore: i'm not a cop

the crow.

It was the second day of November, the day of Gryffindor's first Quidditch match of the year, the match against Slytherin, and Harry, along with Fred and George, had just been given a lifetime ban from Quidditch by Umbridge.

It was a mess of a day from the very start, Ron was extremely worried about his ability to play, his practices growing worse and worse as the days counted down to their first match. He would always start off strong, but the first time the Quaffle got past him, he would grow insecure and his playing would grow more unsteady.

The Slytherins were capitalizing on this heavily, mocking him whenever they had the chance and even creating chants and a particularly annoying song just to irritate him. “ Weasley is our King ,” they would say. Regulus had been sure they would lose the game, though, of course, Harry managed to catch the Snitch before the Slytherins could get too many goals past Ron.

Draco was beyond annoyed by this, jumping right into mocking both Harry and Ron the moment his feet hit the ground. Harry and George tackled him to the ground once Draco resigned himself to insulting Ron's parents. Regulus couldn't do much other than roll his eyes in exasperation, too far from them to stop the fight from ensuing.

“Banned? For life?” he asked Harry the moment he left McGonagall's office. Regulus had seen Umbridge waddle into the office only a handful of minutes after Harry, Fred, and George entered. Regulus, along with Hermione, were standing right outside waiting for them.

Harry nodded miserably. Angelina, the Gryffindor team captain, sounded just as distraught when they talked to her later that evening in the common room.

“Banned. No Seeker and no Beaters... what on earth are we going to do?” she said in a hollow voice. Her eyes seemed to glaze over for a moment. Regulus watched them interact, a feeling of dread inside him. Not that he really cared about the Gryffindor Quidditch team's chances at the Quidditch Cup, but more because this meant Harry would have more free time to ruminate, and Regulus had discovered long ago that too much free time was a very bad thing for Potters.

“Where is Ron?” Harry asked once Angelina went up to bed.

“I think he's avoiding us,” Hermione said worriedly. Just as she finished speaking, the portrait swung open and Ron came through, snow still melting in his hair. “Where have you been?”

“Walking,” Ron muttered. He immediately started apologizing for being bad at Quidditch, which was just depressing if you asked Regulus, and then announced that tomorrow he was going to resign from the team. Harry was able to convince him not to — mostly by explaining that if he did, Angelina would be without four players rather than three — but Ron didn't appear to feel much better.

"This is the worst I've ever felt in my life," Ron said miserably.

"Join the club," Harry replied.

"Well, I can think of one thing that might cheer you both up," Hermione said. She was standing by the window as she spoke, she'd been up and down all evening, pacing around the common room. Regulus looked at her questioningly.

"Oh yeah?" Harry asked distractedly.

"Yep. Hagrid's back," she said. Regulus went upstairs with Harry so that he could grab his invisibility cloak. He was just planning to tell him to be careful when his Lumos Ostentum spell went off.

It was a complicated piece of magic, something he designed himself after exhaustive research on weather-predicting spells. He knew that they needed a lightning storm to do what they needed to do, but he didn't want it to sneak up on them. He wanted to be prepared, hence Lumos Ostentum, a spell used specifically to predict lightning within a few hours of it occurring.

"Harry," he said as he followed him into the room. "Once you're done speaking to Hagrid, meet me by the Whomping Willow."

"Why?" Harry asked.

"It's tonight." Regulus grinned widely as he said it. He had just been worried about Harry and his free time, it was like magic herself was trying to help him out. Harry's eyes lit up.

"Seriously?" he said, the earlier grimness chased away by excitement.

"Seriously." Regulus watched him go.

He needed to prepare everything, that was the main reason he was staying behind, though he didn't want to admit that he wasn't as keen on visiting Hagrid as Harry, Ron, and Hermione were. He liked the man well enough, but Regulus always felt uncomfortable in his presence. When he was honest with himself, he could admit it was because he knew how awful he had been about Hagrid's presence during his first life.

Regulus didn't really know him then, he certainly never took Care of Magical Creatures, and he never even spoke to the man, but there were rumors, and Regulus still believed what his family wanted him to. He felt guilty about it now, not even sure when his opinions had changed, but he knew Hagrid was a kind man, and he felt bad for being so judgmental, even if it was just in his own head.

He cast a disillusionment charm on himself as he left the common room. He was glad that the dangerous Greek magic had healed him enough to cast such a spell and for it to hold. He could only hope that it would be strong enough for what he needed tonight. It wasn't curfew yet, but he still didn't want Umbridge to see him if he could help it. He was glad that Harry had left behind the map as it made it far easier to move through the castle while avoiding everyone else.

He made it to the boathouse half an hour later, he had to sit down once or twice to let his legs rest and wait for the pain to subside. He made quick work of packing up the vials, glad that he had managed to add the final two ingredients just a week earlier: the chrysalis of a Death's-head Hawk Moth and a silver teaspoon of dew from a place that neither sunlight nor human feet had touched for a full seven days.

The Mandrake leaves that Harry and Regulus had kept in their mouths for an entire month were already in there, as well as one of their hairs. It was an interesting mixture. He recovered the boat with his other potion, a complex pain potion used specifically to treat nerve damage. He was supposed to get a professional to brew it for him, but that would require regular visits to St. Mungo's and Regulus just couldn't be bothered.

He walked to Whomping Willow slowly, his feet dragging in the snow. He wasn't sure he'd ever seen lightning in the snow, but the spell he created didn't lie. He had tested it a few times in early September so he knew it worked. He cast a warming charm on himself and settled in to wait for Harry.

Here was the thing, Regulus knew this was insane. Sure, Sirius and James had become animagi when they were around this age, but Regulus was very much not them. He was not this reckless usually. Especially when it came to Harry's safety. But Harry had been restless over the summer, and Regulus kept having nightmares about Harry trapped in that muggle graveyard with the Dark Lord. He kept thinking, "Well, if he just had a way to run, if he had another way to hide, if he could get away without using a wand..."

It was exhausting honestly, but he thought of Sirius escaping from prison and hiding near Hogwarts for a year even as dementors swarmed the area. If Harry was in danger, having an animagus form was the perfect way for him to escape. Not to mention that he knew Harry needed something to focus on. So many times Regulus had watched Harry walk right into danger. He just wanted to give him something to focus on.

It had worked so far. Harry was clearly bothered by Umbridge and the other students, his irritation growing every day, but Regulus kept giving him new pieces of research about becoming an animagus that he had to study. Harry would absorb the information and then prattle on about it to Regulus whenever they were alone. It was enough of a distraction that Regulus could practically see the tension leaving him when he had something else to focus on.

They had started in secret shortly before school began — Regulus gave Harry the original textbook on the subject for his birthday — and had been working towards this night ever since. It was perfect that it would arrive the same night that Harry had suffered such a blow.

However, Regulus was also extremely worried about tonight, the excitement battling for dominance in a war against his anxiety. Becoming an animagus was extremely dangerous, especially for underage wizards who had no formal training in the process. The first transformation came with a whole host of dangers, including one specific one that kept Regulus up at night. It was possible that, if not done correctly, the spell could cause the wizard casting it to partially transform, leading to a half-human, half-animal mutation that had no known cure. To say he was worried about it would be an understatement given that he'd had about forty-five nightmares about waking up with a tail.

He was distracted by his thoughts when he heard footsteps approaching through the snow. He wasn't sure how long he'd been out there, not long he didn't think, but apparently long enough for Harry to show up. He watched the shimmer of the invisibility cloak as it was pulled up and raised an eyebrow when it wasn't just Harry, but Hermione and Ron as well.

"Harry?" Regulus asked uncertainly.

"So here's the thing —" Harry started to say, a supremely guilty look on his face.

"Let's talk inside," Hermione said sharply. "Wingardium Leviosa ." She lifted a thick branch off the ground and used it to touch the knot on the tree that would stop it from swinging around.

"Wait," Regulus said, but the three of them were already moving, shuffling into the secret passage under the tree. Regulus had no choice but to follow them. It didn't take long to get to the shack, though it felt long given the tense silence between the four of them.

"Ron, you'd better explain," Hermione said the moment the trap door was shut behind them. She turned slightly to light a fire in the fireplace. Regulus hadn't even realized that this building had a fireplace.

Ron, unlike Harry, did not look guilty, and unlike Hermione, he did not look annoyed. Instead, Ron looked invigorated.

"I knew you guys were up to something!" he shouted. Harry cringed slightly, but Regulus just furrowed his eyebrows and crossed his arms tightly.

"What do you mean?" Regulus asked blankly.

"I knew something was going on, and then Hermione suggested I use my abilities to figure out what you were hiding."

Hermione rolled her eyes instantly. "He didn't use his abilities, he just looked through your stuff."

"No, I specifically thought 'help me find what they're hiding...' Then I looked through your stuff and found this." Ron pulled out a book from his cloak, one of the thin diaries that Regulus had given to Harry. It was from the perspective of a South American animagus, a half-fictional account of her using her abilities to hunt down poachers.

"It's just a book," Regulus replied, unwilling to give in.

"Harry already confirmed it," Hermione said.

"Harry!" Regulus shouted. Harry cringed again.

“I’m sorry! I’m not a good liar,” he muttered. Regulus gave a put-upon sigh, rubbing his eyes tiredly.

“We want in,” Ron said. “There is no way I’m going to let you become animagus-es without me.”

“It’s animagi, Ron,” Hermione said, before squaring her shoulders. “But I agree. This is a very advanced piece of magic. I want to participate.”

“You can’t,” Regulus said. Both Hermione and Ron opened their mouths to argue, so he hurried on. “We’ve been preparing for this for weeks. You guys don’t have the supplies or anything.”

“Well, not tonight, but we can start working on it. Both of you can help us,” Hermione said. She was speaking sternly, in what Regulus had come to recognize as her prefect-voice, but even he could see the spark of excitement in her eyes.

“Fine,” he said. “But you cannot tell anyone. I am swearing you both to secrecy before you go to bed tonight.”

“They won’t tell anyone,” Harry said.

“Right, just like Peter Pettigrew wouldn’t tell anyone.”

“We’ll agree to an oath of secrecy,” Hermione said.

“Okay,” Regulus said, relaxing slightly. “We’re doing this tonight, so both of you should leave.”

“Why?” Ron asked.

“Because it can be dangerous to be around a freshly transformed animagus. If one of us gets upset or panics at all, the animal mind can gain ascendancy, and we can do something dangerous without realizing it.”

“What if we just stand up here?” Hermione asked, already walking up the stairs. “Then we can run and lock the door if something goes wrong.”

“It would be better if you just left,” Regulus said sternly. Hermione crossed her arms.

“I don’t think we should leave, what if something goes wrong and you two need help?”

“We’re going to do it one at a time,” Regulus answered. Ron looked between them before crossing his arms as well.

“We’re staying,” he said. Harry let out a muffled laugh.

“I am going to hex both of you,” Regulus said in a low voice.

“Come on, what’s the harm?” Harry asked, looking pouty in a way that made Regulus want to burst out laughing.

“You know you can lose your clothes if you don’t do this correctly. Do you really want Ron and Hermione to see you naked?” Regulus asked, making a last-ditch effort to persuade him.

“No, but if I know you at all, which I like to think that I do, you already hid clothes here for us to change into if that happens. They can just look away when I transform back.”

Regulus growled in frustration. “You are all making this so difficult for no reason,” Regulus said.

“Just give in, Reg,” Ron said.

“The storm has started,” Hermione said, looking between the slats of the boarded-up window behind them. Regulus sighed defeatedly.

“All right, Harry, you better go first,” he said. “You remember the spell?”

“Of course, I’ve only had to say it twice a day for weeks on end,” Harry muttered, though it was ruined by the smile on his face. Harry settled down on the floor, placing his wand against his heart. He removed his glasses and handed them to Regulus who pocketed them. He took off his cloak, as well as his shoes and socks, leaving on a pair of trousers and one of his cheaper shirts, exactly what Regulus told him to wear.

Regulus looked up at Ron and Hermione who were watching with rapt attention. He cast one quick protective spell over them, just in case.

“Amato Animo Animato Animagus,” Harry said, his eyes squeezed closed. He let out a gasp of pain, dropping his wand, bending forward slightly, holding the palms of his hands against his eyes. Regulus rushed forward and grabbed the wand — more than one of the books he’d read insisted that getting your wand out of the way was the best way to go. He was pretty sure half the animagi he’d read about had destroyed their wands on accident while in their animal forms.

“How do you feel?” Regulus asked as the seconds ticked by.

Harry didn’t reply, but Regulus heard a very soft, “Oh,” come out of his mouth, and then he was shifting. He shrunk first, his body growing smaller like it was being mashed into a tiny ball. His black hair spread across his face and down the rest of his body. His arms folded in before stretching out. It was bizarre to witness, and Regulus could tell that his brain was rejecting whatever he was seeing, but finally, Harry seemed to settle, and Regulus could finally take him in.

“He’s a raven!” Ron shouted.

“That’s not a raven, it’s a crow,” Hermione corrected, though she sounded just as elated.

“How do you even know that?” Ron asked.

“Everyone knows that,” Hermione snapped.

“Can you two be quiet, please?” Regulus said. Both of them snapped their mouths shut. He was watching crow-Harry as he looked around the room. “Harry, can you hear me?”

The crow tilted his head to the side, his beady eyes staring through Regulus before he let out a loud caw. Harry spread out his wings, flapping them repeatedly while jumping up and down in place. He cawed again. Then again. Regulus hoped that was an excited noise, and not one of distress, though it was hard to tell.

“Of course, you’re a bird,” Regulus said quietly, more to himself than anything.

Harry cawed twice and then started flapping his wings in earnest. He jumped forward a few steps before he was finally able to catch some air. Flying must have been difficult though, because he couldn’t manage to get more than a few feet off the ground. Regulus wondered if it was taxing for his new bird body.

“This is so cool,” Ron breathed. “Imagine what Harry could do with this form.”

“It’s perfect,” Regulus said. “If anyone tried to trap you, you could just fly away.” He hadn’t meant to say those words out loud, but now they were out and he felt embarrassment begin to fester inside him.

He looked up at Ron and Hermione again. Ron just looked exhilarated, but Hermione was looking at him softly like she understood perfectly well what he wanted for Harry, that he just wanted to give him every chance to survive.

“Okay, Harry,” he said, refocusing on the task at hand. “In order to turn back, you have to picture your human form. Can you do that?” He looked up one more time. “You two better go in the other room... just in case.”

Ron snickered, but Hermione grabbed his arm and pulled him down the hallway. Regulus listened to the sound of the door closing.

“Harry, can you hear me?” Harry cawed in reply and Regulus nodded, kneeling down to look him in the eye. It was so bizarre to speak to a crow like this, but it was undeniably Harry. The large lightning scar on his forehead came through on his animagus form, showing up as gray down the front of his face.

It took about twenty minutes for Harry to change back, Regulus talking him through it the entire time, trying to make sure that he didn’t get lost in his head or panic. He was glad that he sent Ron and Hermione away because Harry was completely naked when he transformed back, his clothes vanishing in the transformation.

Regulus summoned the set of clothing he’d hidden in the shack, turning his back so that Harry could redress privately.

“Okay, you guys can come out!” Harry shouted up the stairs once he was dressed. Regulus turned around to see Harry’s face lit up with so much emotion that he strangely felt like crying.

“Well?” Regulus asked, a smile tugging at his lips against his will.

“That was the most incredible thing I have ever experienced!” Harry yelled loudly. “I’m a bird! I can fly! I mean, I can’t really fly yet. It’s so tiring, I’m going to have to practice, but I can fly! Eventually!” Regulus laughed, as did Ron. “I could see it in my head right before I transformed, I could see the crow in my head. That was so cool!”

“Do you think your patronus changed?” Hermione asked. Ron looked flabbergasted. “What? I’ve read that they’re often the same.”

“I don’t know,” Harry said. “Mine has always been my dad’s animagus form.”

“Try it,” Ron suggested.

Harry focused for a moment, taking his wand from Regulus. “Expecto Patronum,” he said, blue light spilling out of his wand instantly. It was immediately clear that it had changed, his patronus was much smaller than it used to be. It flitted around the room swiftly before coming to rest on Harry’s shoulder. He looked happy to see it, but also a little torn.

“I’m sorry,” Regulus said. Harry looked at him curiously. “I know you liked having James’s patronus.” Harry frowned slightly, but his face cleared quickly.

“Yeah, I did,” he said. His patronus disappeared a moment later. “Okay, your turn.”

Regulus sighed, his heart rate suddenly galloping in his chest. He hadn’t been nervous before, not for himself, but now that Harry had successfully done it and it was time, he felt anxiety pool in his chest.

“Okay,” Regulus said, trying to swallow down his nervousness. “Once you take my wand, go upstairs with Ron and Hermione. Just in case.”

“It’s all right,” Harry said easily. “I know you won’t hurt me.”

“No, you don’t know that,” Regulus said, even as he softened. “Just please, please go upstairs.”

“Fine,” Harry said, with a nod.

Regulus toed off his shoes slowly, pulling off his socks and tucking them into his shoes neatly. He pulled off his cloak and threw it over the back of the dusty couch before sitting down on the ground. His hand shook slightly as he touched it to his chest, right above his heart. He had been saying this spell for weeks, every morning and night. He had even begun hearing a second heartbeat two weeks ago. He could do this, he was ready.

“Amato Animo Animato Animagus.”

Regulus had imagined being an animagus many times, when he was a child he would pretend to be different animals, playing with Sirius as they crawled around Sirius’s room. Since he’d learned that James and Sirius were animagi, he'd thought about what it would have been like to have turned with them, to run around the forest on the full moons while they were all at Hogwarts. Even recently he had imagined what it would feel like to change whenever he wanted to, to become something other than himself, to escape into another form.

In all his musings, he hadn't ever fully settled on an animal. There was a part of him — a much bigger part than he'd originally realized — that thought he might be a cat. He'd always liked cats and when he was a child, a cat was always his favorite animal to pretend to be. He would picture himself as a black cat with gray eyes. It would be the perfect counterpart to Sirius, a large black dog.

He wasn't a cat. Okay, he could accept that, though he didn't know what he would turn into beyond that. Maybe a snake, that would have been neat.

But this? No, he would have never guessed this. Not in a million years.

the vision.

Sirius was staring at the wall in a very dark room when he heard the voice of his great-great-grandfather.

He did that a lot these days, sat in the dark, and stared at the wall. There wasn't much else to do in Grimmauld Place other than spiral. He thought that he used to like spiraling. Of course, he didn't like it at the time, the act of spiraling could be terrible, but there was a certain comfort to it. There was safety in that chaos.

He didn't like spiraling so much anymore, probably because the things he was spiraling over were happening right in front of him instead of a year, two years, five years, ten years in the past. Mostly he spiraled about Remus and that, as it had always been, was the worst kind of spiraling imaginable. It was gut-wrenching like someone had taken a hot poker and jammed it so far down his throat that he was getting indigestion.

Remus wasn't around much anymore. He hadn't really been around for years, when Sirius really thought about it, but now he hadn't been around since the summer. He was on missions for the Order, just like last time, except now Sirius didn't know when he was coming back. Sometimes he would return to Grimmauld, but he suspected that he might be going elsewhere. He might be seeking someone else out, warming someone else's bed. His chest ached.

See? Spiraling wasn't so fun anymore. No more of the torturous "it's my fault, all my fault, James and Lily died because of me." At least in that madness, there was a center, a leading point. He could blame himself. With Remus now, it just felt like a betrayal, it felt like the man he loved looking him in the eyes and telling him that he wasn't good enough.

Not that he'd ever been good enough for Remus. Remus was far too good for everyone, but Sirius used to hope to earn that place next to him. Now he knew he couldn't, and Remus knew it too. Why else was he moving on with someone younger, someone better? He knew he deserved more than Sirius.

He stared harder at the blank wall as if staring harder was even something he could do. Well, he tried. The blank wall couldn't hurt him. It couldn't remind him of all the times he'd been hurt in this forsaken house. It couldn't tell him that he wasn't good enough, that he was an ulcer on the people he loved.

"SIRIUS!"

Oh, right, his great-great-grandfather was calling to him. Phineas, the old headmaster of Hogwarts. He had a painting somewhere in the house, one of the guest rooms. He wished Dumbledore had let him destroy it.

“It will allow me to communicate from my office at Hogwarts with you or anyone at Grimmauld Place,” Dumbledore had said.

“You couldn’t just send a patronus?” Sirius asked petulantly.

“Patronuses cannot get through the wards of this house.”

“SIRIUS, ARE YOU STILL ALIVE?”

That yelling was really interrupting his staring time. He sighed, dragging his eyes away from the blank wall. He didn’t stand though. Maybe Phineas would shut up, and he could get lost for a little while longer. Harry and Regulus would be home for Christmas in a few days. He had already begun decorating and even sent Molly out with a few Galleons to purchase gifts for them.

Molly and he hadn’t gotten along at first, things were tense for most of the summer, but she and Arthur moved back into their home once their kids left for school. Seeing her once a week when she came to drop off baked goods and get updates about the Order made their relationship much more harmonious.

“SIRIUS BLACK!”

“What is it?” Sirius said, finally standing and walking quickly to the guest room where Phineas’s portrait hung. He was red in the face, a common trait for Black family members.

“Arthur Weasley has been injured. His wife, children, and Harry Potter are coming to stay.”

“Right now?” Sirius yelled.

“I was trying to call you!”

“I was otherwise engaged,” Sirius muttered.

“What should I tell them?”

“What should you tell them?” Sirius shouted. “Tell them I’ll be delighted.” He spoke sarcastically, the exact kind of voice that would have gotten him punished by his father, but Phineas only nodded and walked out of frame. “Wait, what about Regulus?”

Phineas did not return. Kreacher appeared next to them.

“Phineas Black was calling for Master Sirius,” Kreacher said.

“Yes, thanks for that Kreacher,” Sirius replied, shoving past the elf so that he could change clothes. He couldn’t remember the last time he bathed. Regulus wouldn’t be happy if he saw him like this.

“Mundungus Fletcher is in the kitchen. He is trying to steal —”

“Just get rid of him. Don’t let him steal anything. Regulus won’t be happy!” Sirius called.

He barely made it halfway down the hallway when he felt them come through the wards.

“Back again, the blood traitor brats —”

“Go Kreacher!” Sirius shouted.

He hurried down to where they had arrived. They were all standing in a large group so Sirius couldn’t make out who all was with them. So many redheads in one place, it was hard to see past. Finally, they disentangled enough for him to make out Harry and Regulus standing next to each other.

“What’s going on?” he said. The youngest Weasley girl, Ginerva, had fallen to the ground as they landed so he reached a hand down to help her up.

“Ask Harry,” one of the twins said.

“Yeah, I want to hear this for myself,” the other twin added.

“No,” Regulus said instantly. “We’re going to go into the kitchen to make tea first.”

“This is our father we’re asking about!” one of the twins shouted.

“You hearing about it isn’t going to help him right this moment. Into the kitchen, now,” Regulus said sternly. He had a look on his face that even Sirius found a bit intimidating, though he would never admit that out loud. “Is Mrs. Weasley here?”

“Not yet,” Sirius responded when he realized Regulus was speaking to him. “There are butterbeers.” He offered it more for something to do than anything. He grabbed bottles for each of the Weasleys and one for Harry. All of them looked a bit shell-shocked, though the twins were glaring at Regulus.

“Now, Harry, what happened?” Regulus said, sitting down a few minutes later. Harry had been staring blankly at the table, something like guilt on his face.

“I had a — a kind of — vision...” he stumbled over his words like he didn’t want to say them. Sirius sat down next to him and put his arm around the back of Harry’s chair. Harry didn’t even acknowledge him. He must have been really shaken. He proceeded to explain the vision he’d had where he had to watch Arthur be attacked by a giant snake, Voldemort’s snake. Sirius knew he was on a mission for the Order, though he wasn’t sure exactly what he was doing. Dumbledore was holding everything close to the chest these days.

“We have to call Mum,” one of the twins said. Sirius thought it was Fred but he hadn’t slept in a few days so he couldn’t be sure.

“Dumbledore is probably letting Molly know now. The important thing was to get you away before Umbridge could interfere,” Sirius responded.

“We’ve got to go to St. Mungo’s,” Ginerva said urgently.

“No one is going anywhere,” Regulus said, his voice brokering no argument.

“How can you say that?” George growled.

“Because the only reason we know this is because Harry saw it in a vision,” Regulus said. Harry flinched slightly, Sirius lowered his arm so that he could squeeze Harry’s shoulder comfortingly. “If we show up there, then the wrong people might get word that we know something we shouldn’t. You cannot help by showing up there.”

Fred and George looked like they were going to start arguing again, but Regulus kept talking.

“I know it sucks! I know! But we can’t do anything yet. Wait at least until your mum arrives, then she’ll tell us what to do,” Regulus said. Sirius could hear the first strain of stress on his voice, but he didn’t think the Weasleys noticed. Harry looked like he was so far deep in his own head that he couldn’t hear anything being said.

They settled into silence. One of Harry’s hands was shaking just slightly, and Sirius wished he could pull him out of the room to comfort him, but he didn’t feel like he could move yet. After a handful of minutes, a burst of fire erupted midair, and a scroll of parchment fell heavily to the table with a loud thunk.

“Fawkes!” Sirius shouted when he noticed the single golden phoenix tail feather next to the scroll. Regulus grabbed it so fast that his hand was a blur. He wasn’t moving that quickly when he left in September, Sirius didn’t even realize he could feel relief over that.

“Dad is still alive. I am setting out for St. Mungo’s now. Stay where you are. I will send news as soon as I can. Mum,” Regulus read aloud.

“Still alive...” George said, or at least, he thought it was George. “But that makes it sound...”

No one moved for a long time. Regulus was standing near the end of the table, but eventually, he even settled into a chair to wait. Sirius sunk into his thoughts for a while, though they didn’t spiral like he expected them to. Even having someone near him was enough to chase away the bad thoughts for the time being. Harry wasn’t so lucky. His hand kept trembling when he tried to take sips from the butterbeer in front of him.

It was nearly five a.m. when Molly came barreling into the kitchen. Her hair was a mess and her face was pale. He couldn’t even imagine how she was feeling.

“He’s going to be all right,” she said, her voice wobbling. Sirius didn’t even hear what else she said, only leaned back in his chair slightly as his body relaxed. Harry seemed to collapse in on himself slightly.

“Let’s go to bed,” Sirius said quietly to him. Harry looked torn, but Regulus responded.

“Come on,” Regulus said, all but dragging Harry out of the kitchen to give the Weasleys space to be together. Sirius followed close behind them. Harry was shivering by the time they reached Sirius’s old bedroom, the one Harry had lived in over the summer. Regulus looked like he was half-carrying him by the time they entered the room.

“What’s happening?” Sirius asked. Regulus was on the warpath, and he could understand that Harry was upset, but he couldn’t comprehend whatever stress was itching under his skin.

Harry sat down on the bed immediately, staring down at his hands. “Tell me what you saw,” Regulus said. Harry glanced up for a split second before dropping his vision. “It’s okay, you know neither of us would judge you.”

Harry tucked his lips between his teeth, his face scrunching up in the way James's would when he was about to cry. Sirius sat on the bed next to him and put his arm around his shoulders.

“Harry, what’s wrong?” Sirius asked. Regulus was standing over them, tension running through his body like he might vibrate out of reality in a split second.

“I didn’t just see it happening,” Harry said, his voice losing its steadiness by the second. “I was the snake. I was attacking him. I almost killed Mr. Weasley.” Regulus’s teeth were clenched together tight enough to crack them down the middle.

“Did you tell this to Dumbledore?” Sirius asked.

Harry nodded. “He didn’t tell me what it meant. He doesn’t tell me anything anymore…”

“He’s worried that talking to you will draw Umbridge’s attention,” Regulus said instantly. “He’s not ignoring you on purpose.”

“Well, it’s not working, she’s still after me!” Harry snapped. Sirius didn’t think he’d ever witnessed Harry snap at Regulus. Regulus didn’t so much as blink.

“You’re not responsible for what happened to Mr. Weasley,” Regulus said instantly, his voice firm. “You are not the Dark Lord or his snake. You are the only reason he is alive right now. You did not do anything to the man.”

“How do you know that?” Harry said, he sounded angry, but there was anguish there too.

“Because I know you. And I was sleeping in the bed next to you while it happened. You did not do anything wrong.”

Harry looked like he might start crying again. “You need sleep,” Sirius said quietly. “Let’s get some food in you, and then you can come up here and get some sleep. I promise you’ll feel better after some rest.”

Regulus nodded in agreement. “Kreacher,” he called. Kreacher popped into existence. “Will you make breakfast for everyone?”

“The blood traitors are already making breakfast,” Kreacher said nastily. Sirius had to keep himself from sneering at the elf.

Regulus rubbed his eyes. “Okay, thank you, Kreacher.”

“Why are you so nice to him?” Sirius said, his irritation rising.

“Because he doesn’t know any better,” Regulus responded. “Harry, do you want to eat up here or do you want to go back downstairs?”

Harry was quiet for a long moment before responding, staring at his hands again. “Can I eat up here?”

“Of course,” Sirius responded. Regulus just nodded. “I’ll go grab you a plate, okay?”

“Thanks,” Harry mumbled. Sirius left the room a second later, but he wasn’t expecting Regulus to follow him.

“When was the last time you slept?” Regulus said as they walked back downstairs. Sirius groaned quietly.

“Please don’t start,” Sirius muttered.

Regulus ground his teeth together. He had dark circles under his eyes after the night of no sleep. “You smell terrible,” Regulus said. “Can you just go sit with Harry? I’ll bring you both food.”

“I don’t need —”

“Please, please, do not argue with me right now,” Regulus snapped.

“Okay, Reggie,” Sirius said quietly. He watched Regulus walk away and cast a quick cleaning charm on himself — he really did need to shower — before walking back to where Harry was sitting unmoving on his bed.

“I thought you were grabbing me food?” Harry said, a quiet smile on his face. Sirius was relieved to see it.

“Regulus put me in time-out,” Sirius said with a smirk. Harry chuckled.

“He does that,” he replied. Sirius sat back next to him again, knocking his shoulder with Harry’s.

“I’m sorry you had that vision, but you should feel good about yourself. Arthur could have been in serious danger had you not told anyone. I know that couldn’t have been easy,” Sirius said softly. He felt like Harry had been his only persistent point for the past few months. He didn’t know where he would be if he didn’t have this relationship, especially with the consistent mirror calls.

“It didn’t feel very good,” Harry responded quietly. “I’m afraid they’re going to blame me.”

“I understand,” Sirius said. “It’s easier to worry that you’re going to get blamed than recognize you did something good.” He’d had a long childhood of being blamed, Harry had a similar experience, as much as it hurt to admit that to himself, so he knew that Harry was the same to him in that way.

“Yeah,” Harry said before leaning heavily into Sirius’s side. Sirius held him with both arms now, sitting quietly as they waited for Regulus to return with plates of food for both of them. Kreacher appeared a second after Regulus entered the room to set down tea for each of them. “Thanks.”

“Thank you, Reggie,” Sirius said politely. Regulus just nodded, sitting down at the desk in the corner of the room right as Kreacher reappeared with another plate of food. He accepted it with a small, polite smile. The three of them ate in silence, and then Harry and Regulus retired to get some sleep.

Later Harry, along with all the Weasleys, left to go visit Arthur in the hospital with Moody and Tonks going with them. Tonks, as always, was very friendly with Sirius. He wished she would just be mean to him, it would be so much easier. She was extremely interested in Harry’s vision, but Harry bore it all with a smile as if he didn’t look like a dead man walking to the gallows.

“You’re not going with them?” Sirius asked Regulus once they were gone. Regulus shook his head.

“I’m not part of that family,” Regulus replied. “I don’t want to intrude.”

“Harry is really shaken up,” Sirius said quietly.

“Something is happening to him.” The floodgates seemed to have opened, and now that they were alone, Regulus didn’t seem able to close them. “I have no idea what it is though. I think it’s connected to him getting You-Know-Who’s emotions, but I don’t understand how. And why the snake? It doesn’t make sense.”

Sirius didn’t notice the slip-up earlier, but he noticed it now hearing Regulus called Voldemort You-Know-Who. He wondered if he still called him the Dark Lord in his head.

“I don’t know either. I think we should talk to Dumbledore.”

“I agree,” Regulus said, but his face grew pale as he said it.

“What?”

Regulus was quiet, fiddling with his wand, refusing to lift his head. “I’m afraid to find out the answer.”

Sirius nodded instantly. He understood that completely. It felt like every new piece of information was another stab through his skin. It felt like bad things kept happening.

“Were you alone here?” Regulus asked, shaking off his melancholy and worry like it was nothing more than a blanket he had draped over his shoulders to escape the cold.

“Yeah, I have been for a while,” Sirius said. “Molly comes about once a week, but she never stays long.”

“And Lupin?” Regulus asked though he looked a little regretful. Sirius worked not to flinch.

“It’s been a couple of weeks since we last spoke. He doesn’t come here that often. Busy with... whatever he’s busy with.”

“I don’t think you should stay here anymore,” Regulus said.

“What?” Sirius yelped. “This is my house, you know!”

“I’m not kicking you out,” Regulus said, rolling his eyes exasperatedly. “This house is killing you, Sirius. I think after Christmas you need to find somewhere else that’s not going to do this to you. I don’t like coming back to find you looking like this.”

“I don’t look that bad,” Sirius said, staring down at himself uncertainly.

“Maybe not to anyone else, but I don’t want to see it. You’re no good to anyone if you’re suffering like this.”

“Where would I go instead? The cave near Hogwarts?” He had meant to make the words sarcastic, but they came out sincere. It wasn’t the worst place he’d lived.

“Don’t be stupid,” Regulus said. “Maybe we could buy a new house somewhere. There are other Black properties already, though I don’t know how much you would like those. I’m not sure. I had hoped,” he spat the word like it had betrayed him, “that Lupin would be here to take care of you.”

“He’s on a mission for the Order,” Sirius said.

“I don’t care about the Order.” There was an unstable sincerity in his words, the kind that made Sirius want to run and hide under the bed, cowering as Padfoot. “I care that you survive.”

“Aww Reggie,” Sirius said, mostly because he was a dick, but also because this kind of sincerity was a bit too much for his sleep-deprived self to handle.

“Forget it!” Regulus shouted, retreating instantly. “Die. See if I care.” He stomped off into the house. Sirius felt regret fester inside him, though relief was there too.

He thought he understood Regulus though, at least, he understood his point of view. Sirius cared about the Order, only in so much that it allowed him to protect Harry. He wasn’t in it for some noble reason like he was in his late teens and early twenties. He wanted Harry to survive, he wanted Regulus to survive. He wanted them happy and safe. That was the thing with the Order though, so many of them were only in it because they had people to fight for. It wasn’t a cause, it wasn’t part of the government, it was just a group of people who loved someone in their life so much that they would literally fight the most dangerous wizard alive just to keep them alive.

It was daunting sometimes to think of how ragtag their group was, built together with so little. Sirius felt like that sometimes too. Like all he had left was the love he felt for Regulus, for Harry, for Remus. That was the only human bit of him that still existed. The rest of him was just empty rooms.

He couldn't leave Grimmauld, even though Regulus was right and it was probably killing him. He had to be close to the Order, for one. But he also couldn't leave a place so representative of who he was. Empty, dead rooms, held together with a terrible rotting frame. Without Grimmauld, Sirius would be too untethered. He would slip off the face of the Earth. There was already so little tying him here.

Chapter End Notes

sorry, no reveal yet on reggie's animagus form, though i will give you a hint: no one in my comments or on tumblr has successfully guessed what his animagus form will be yet.

also - to the person who guessed goldfish, i just want you to know that that made me laugh so much that i now want to write a one-shot crack fic that's divergent from this one where regulus is actually a goldfish animagus the gift.

It was Christmas Day, and Regulus was going to kill his brother.

Well, his brother and Remus Lupin. He was going to kill them both. Or maybe lock them in a room together and refuse to let them out until they stop acting like idiots. It was bad enough when it was just Lupin smiling with Tonks, and his brother shooting hurt and angry looks at the two of them. It wasn't that Regulus cared who Lupin was with, but did it have to be a family member? Couldn't it be literally anyone else in the world?

It got so much worse when Regulus made the mistake of inviting Charlie Weasley to Grimmauld Place for Christmas.

He wasn't supposed to be there originally, Ron had mentioned more than once that he would probably stay in Romania for the holiday as he usually did. It was difficult for him to travel with the job he did, and Regulus got the distinct impression that Charlie didn't really like spending time with his parents. Not that Regulus could blame him for that.

However, Regulus had listened to Ron and Ginny complain more than once about missing him. Even Fred and George agreed once when they didn't think anyone was listening to them. Percy wasn't speaking much to the rest of the family, too up Minister Fudge's arse to realize that he was hurting the people he loved.

Regulus could empathize with missing a brother who refused to come home. He didn't really care for Percy though, especially after he sent a letter to Ron telling him to stay away from Regulus and Harry. However, Regulus had no strong feelings about Charlie Weasley, one way or another. He hadn't even met the man, though he'd heard Harry talk about him a few times after they met during the Quidditch World Cup.

So Regulus, feeling for the Weasleys he went to school with, decided to send a letter to Charlie offering to pay for him to travel back home for Christmas. He didn't think he would reply, but only a few days later Charlie responded.

Hello Regulus,

I'm surprised to hear from you of all people. However, I think you're right, it probably is time for a visit. Don't worry about paying for me to visit, that has never been the issue. Don't tell the others though. I want it to be a surprise.

Charlie

Regulus was pleasantly surprised, though he dwelled on the line "that has never been the issue" for more than a few days. The other family members were just as surprised, and Regulus had to admit, it was apt timing given the attack on Mr. Weasley. Charlie arrived the day after their holiday was supposed to begin, the same day that Hermione suddenly showed up at their doorstep claiming that she'd bowed out of her family vacation so she could spend time with them.

It was all going well, even with the stress that Mr. Weasley's attack was having on all of them. He would survive, that was the important thing, but Regulus didn't think that Harry had recovered from witnessing the attack. He was still distant and jittery. He practically ran from any room that the Weasleys were in for two full days until Hermione showed up and helped him get his head on straight.

Regulus was almost looking forward to Christmas, even with Tonks and Lupin speaking quietly in the kitchen on Christmas morning. Regulus was the first one up and caught them having a serious conversation, Tonks looked strained, Lupin just looked bone tired.

"Good morning," Regulus greeted stiffly. Great, he thought, Sirius is going to be a joy today.

Sure enough, Sirius was in a terrible mood the moment he noticed Tonks, though Regulus had to admit Sirius was making a noble effort to hide it, but Regulus was worried he was going to have to spend the rest of the day coaxing Sirius out of his bad mood. That is until Charlie woke up shortly after noon and came down into the sitting room just as everyone was gathering around to open gifts.

They were planning to have a big celebration with all of them together, and then Regulus and Harry were going to open a few gifts together with Sirius later in the afternoon. It had been Harry's suggestion, wanting to surprise Sirius with their new animagus forms.

"Hey, Sirius, right? Sorry, I don't think we've been introduced yet," Regulus heard Charlie say. The two of them had been missing each other over the last few days, mostly because Charlie kept avoiding his mother, and Sirius kept avoiding everyone else.

"Oh, yes. Another Weasley, then," Sirius responded. He sounded rough, and Regulus knew he had only barely pulled himself away from glaring at Remus to remember to respond. Charlie, thankfully, just laughed.

"Yep, another one," he said. Regulus watched them interact for a moment, he was sitting in a chair on the other side of the room so he didn't think that either of them noticed him watching.

It took him a moment to realize what was happening, mostly because he was only watching Sirius try to hide whatever sad emotions he was feeling at the time. However, eventually, Charlie said something that made Sirius's face light up and suddenly they were talking in earnest. Both of them were leaning toward each other in excitement, and Charlie was reaching out a hand, almost unconsciously, and touching Sirius's upper arm.

Regulus's eyebrows raised. That was unexpected. He didn't know much about Charlie, but he would never have guessed he would be like this: overwhelmingly handsome, cheerful, charismatic, and very, very interested in Sirius. Regulus nearly laughed. He could still remember the way girls at school used to talk about Sirius, he would randomly overhear them gossiping about who he was and was not dating, who he might be interested in, though none of them could ever figure it out. Regulus knew people were interested in his brother, but it had been a very long time since he'd seen that interest in action.

He smiled as he watched them, even as he dragged his eyes away. He didn't need to watch his brother get seduced by a young, attractive dragon tamer on Christmas. He was happy for him though, maybe now he would be less miserable. That was until he looked to the other side of the room and found that Lupin had abandoned whatever conversation he was having with Mrs. Weasley and was now staring daggers at Sirius and Charlie.

Regulus didn't think he'd ever seen that look on Lupin's face. The only thing close was the night of their confrontation with Peter Pettigrew, but even then there was a softness to him. There was no softness now, just warring emotions. Sirius didn't notice, not for a second, too wrapped up in whatever Charlie was telling him about the dragons he cared for.

Regulus rolled his eyes back into his skull, so far that it physically hurt. Of course. Of fucking course. He had been watching Sirius devolve into a play of aching loneliness for months because Lupin insisted on moving on right in front of him, but the moment Sirius dared to talk to someone else, Lupin was suddenly enraged.

Regulus didn't care. He did not care about this. He shook his head hard and looked away from all of them. They had to work this out for themselves. Regulus was not going to get involved.

"Should we open some presents?" he asked Ron and Harry who were now sitting near him, both of them shoving biscuits in their mouths at a rate that was far too quick.

"Yes, please," Hermione answered, walking over a second later. Sirius and Charlie separated long enough for them to pass presents around, but Regulus noticed more than once Charlie leaning over to whisper something in Sirius's ear. Sirius would bark a laugh every time, and Regulus found himself wondering if whatever Charlie was saying was even that funny, or if Sirius was just susceptible to a handsome man giving him attention.

Regulus opened the few gifts he'd been given by Harry, Hermione, and the Weasleys. Mostly it was books, though Hermione's were all by muggle authors as per usual. He was beginning to build quite the collection with the constant gifts from Hermione, Lavender, and Parvati. He chuckled a bit when he noticed Hermione included a book filled with facts about his animagus form.

"Very funny," Regulus said with a half-smile at her.

"It could be useful!" she defended though she was smiling too.

"Here, open this one next. It's from me," Sirius said. Regulus hadn't noticed him walking up.

"I told you we're opening gifts together just the three of us," Regulus said quietly.

"This is a pre-gift," Sirius said with a wide smile, his eyes dancing with elation.

“Okay,” Regulus responded questioningly. It was a long nondescript box. “Oh, Merlin. Why did you do this?” he said the moment he opened it.

“Harry shared the good news with me!” Sirius shouted.

“Good news?” Charlie asked, leaning over Sirius’s shoulder to get a look at the stupidly expensive broom sitting across Regulus’s legs.

“It’s not good news,” Regulus corrected. “Umbridge gave Harry a lifetime ban from Quidditch. I’m just taking over the Seeker position until we figure out a way to get him reinstated.”

“Doubt that’ll happen while Umbridge is still at the school,” Harry said easily. Since discovering his animagus form, he’d been less bothered by his ban from Quidditch. If anything, he was extremely excited about Regulus joining the team, even if it was just temporary.

“Why were you given a lifetime ban?” Charlie asked. Lupin glared at him like he couldn’t believe he dared to ask a completely reasonable question.

“For fighting,” Harry muttered. “But it’s okay, Regulus is on the team now. Plus Ginny is joining as well as Beater.”

“Ginny! You didn’t tell me that!” Charlie shouted happily. Ginny blushed so hard that even the tips of her ears were red. “Congrats, Regulus. I played Seeker while at Hogwarts. I would be happy to give you some tips if you want.”

A laugh bubbled out of Sirius’s lips. “Thanks, Charlie,” Regulus said politely. “Sirius, you really didn’t need to buy a broom. I probably won’t be on the team that long.”

Sirius shrugged. “I wanted to.” Regulus gave him a small smile. The rest of the gift opening was uneventful, and eventually, they retired to the kitchen to eat Christmas dinner. Charlie sat right next to Sirius, and the two of them were wrapped up in another conversation as they ate, Lupin sitting a bit down the table next to Tonks, his eyes lingering on Sirius every couple of minutes. Tonks didn’t seem to notice as she chattered away happily to the man.

By the time Regulus climbed the stairs to Harry’s room so they could open gifts, he was comfortably full and very tired. Sirius was already sitting on the bed when Harry and Regulus walked in, and Harry walked right over to join him, smiling wildly and barely containing his excitement. Sirius looked just as thrilled, and Regulus wondered what he was up to. There was no way he could know about their animagus forms, right?”

Regulus closed the door quietly behind him and Harry looked up curiously. “Where is Remus? Isn’t he joining us?”

“Lupin?” Regulus asked. Sirius paled slightly, his excitement faltering.

“Yes, Regulus! He has to be included, you know, because...” Harry waved his hands around for a split second, looking like he couldn’t control himself.

“Fine. Hold on, I’ll go get him.” Regulus walked back down the stairs, hoping that Lupin would have already left and Regulus wouldn’t be forced to track him down. He was out of luck as he walked back into the sitting room to find Tonks and Lupin talking again.

“Hey, Regulus,” Tonks said. She had a look on her face that Regulus couldn’t interpret.

“Hello,” Regulus responded. “Lupin, we’re opening gifts in Harry’s room.”

“Oh, I thought —”

“Just the four of us,” Regulus cut him off to say. “Good evening,” he added as a goodbye to Tonks. She smiled at him, even though he was probably being terribly rude.

He turned his back on them immediately, heading back up the stairs and assuming that Remus was following. He heard Remus’s first footsteps on the stairs behind him the moment he reached the top, and he turned to see him heading up slowly, a confused look on his face. They hadn’t spoken, not really, and especially not about what Lupin may or may not know. Regulus didn’t really care about that right now though.

“I really would appreciate it if you would do that elsewhere,” Regulus said quietly.

“Do what?” Lupin asked tiredly.

“You know what?” Regulus hissed.

“I’m not doing anything. Tonks and I are only friends.”

“Oh, are you really?” Regulus responded with biting sarcasm. Lupin’s cheeks flushed bright red, a reaction that Regulus had not been anticipating.

“She does — did — have feelings for me,” Lupin said. “But there is nothing going on between us.” He sounded mortified, his voice so low that Regulus almost couldn’t hear it.

“Are you sure? It didn’t look that way to me.”

“Sirius is the one who —”

Regulus sighed sharply. He knew he shouldn’t have gotten involved, he said he wasn’t going to, why did he always do this nowadays?

“I don’t care about that, or who you spend your free time with, but Sirius isn’t well here on his own. He won’t leave, so he needs someone here to keep him steady. Otherwise, he might end up truly losing his mind and we will all suffer because of it.”

Lupin looked at him for a long moment. “I’ve been away —”

“On Order missions. I know, but can you please check up on him? Without Tonks coming along.”

Lupin flushed again. “There really isn’t anything going on.” He looked behind him like someone might be listening. “I’ve actually been —”

“I don’t care,” Regulus said, holding up a hand to stop him. “I just want Sirius safe and well.”

Remus nodded. Suddenly, a small smirk grew on his face. “You know, you’re a lot... sweeter than I remember you being.”

“Please, shut up,” Regulus said, blushing and turning on his heel to march into Harry’s room. Harry and Sirius were looking through a book of pictures when he opened the door. Sirius looked nervous when he saw Lupin enter the room.

“Great, okay, let’s do this,” Harry said, rambling slightly. Regulus smiled fondly.

“Yes, all right,” Regulus said.

“I’ll go first,” Sirius said, jumping up, a mask of excitement covering the unsettled look he wore a moment ago.

“Oh,” Regulus said, surprised.

“Yes,” Harry said at the same time, clearly he was in on whatever this was. Sirius walked to the wardrobe against the wall that Harry barely used. He flung it open and pulled out a large present and walked back over to set it down in front of Regulus.

Regulus looked at them curiously, but even Lupin was smiling. He settled down on the floor and slowly opened it. He gasped quietly. Inside was an ornate cage containing a black owl with bright gold eyes. Regulus sucked in a breath. He had never been allowed pets as a child, neither had Sirius. It wasn’t something he was even allowed to want during his first life. Something he had to learn to live without.

He looked up to see Sirius watching him with a look in his eyes like he knew exactly what Regulus was thinking.

“You got me an owl?” Regulus whispered, his voice embarrassingly wobbly.

Sirius grinned with all his teeth. “Yeah, figured you could use it.”

Regulus looked back down at the owl who was watching him curiously. He had to blink his eyes quickly as they filled with tears. He needed to get a grip. There was no reason to get this emotional over a present. Still, his brother had to remember how much Regulus loved animals when he was little, how he would whisper that he wanted an owl when he went to Hogwarts, speaking it like a forbidden secret.

“She’s a girl,” Harry said after a long moment of silence.

“You should name her,” Lupin added. He had a gentle smile on his face, it made him look younger.

Regulus looked at Sirius for a second, who just smiled, giving him one nod.

“I’ll call her Nyx,” he said quietly.

“That’s the perfect name,” Sirius said. The owl hooted once, looking satisfied.

“Okay, now it’s our turn,” Harry said. He was practically bouncing in his seat. Regulus set Nyx’s cage to the side, taking in Sirius’s and Lupin’s bewildered and curious faces.

“You go ahead,” Regulus said when he noticed Harry watching him.

“What’s happening?” Sirius asked, glancing between them. Regulus just shook his head and gestured toward Harry.

Harry sobered for a second, focusing intensely, and a moment later he was gone, replaced by the crow. Sirius and Lupin both gave a loud shout.

“What?” Lupin breathed, leaning back against the door like he was trying to get away. Sirius just jumped up.

“You — you’re — you —” Sirius stuttered.

Harry crowed and took flight, doing one loop around the room before landing on top of Sirius’s head. He had gotten much better at it in the last few weeks. Sirius’s eyes were opened so widely that they looked like they were going to pop out of his skull, but he was smiling again.

“You’re an animagus?” Sirius asked.

“Oh, Merlin,” Remus said. He looked like he was torn between laughing and getting sick.

Harry flew back to the ground and slowly transformed back, fully clothed this time thankfully.

“You’re an animagus!” Sirius shouted, this time it wasn’t a question. He hugged Harry immediately, who was laughing maniacally.

“Yes! We both are!” Harry shouted back.

“You both — you?” he turned to look incredulously at Regulus who smiled bashfully.

“Surprised?” Regulus said, mostly because what he actually wanted to say was, “Did you think I couldn’t do it?”

“What’s your form?” Lupin asked, his eyes bright with interest.

“Just show them!” Harry interrupted. Regulus sighed quickly.

“You better back up,” he said, moving Nyx’s cage to the other side of the room. Lupin, Harry, and Sirius leaned back against the wall, each of them with wild looks on their face. He focused for a moment, settling into his body, and feeling the moment his nerve pain subsided as he settled onto all fours. There was a moment of silence as they all took him in, Harry grinning happily.

“You’re a bear!” Sirius shouted, and a split second later he was gone, replaced by Padfoot who launched himself at Regulus with very little preamble. Regulus took a halfhearted swipe at him. He was bigger than Sirius, probably for the first time in his life, and Sirius tumbled to the side when Regulus’s giant paw hit him. He rolled over and quickly jumped to his feet though, his tongue lolling out to the side.

“No! No, we’re not play-fighting in here,” Lupin said sternly, though he sounded a bit like he was holding back a laugh.

Padfoot whined quickly before shifting back to Sirius. “But he’s a bear!”

“Sirius, there is not enough room for you to wrestle with a bear in here.”

Regulus focused again, thinking about his human form, and slowly transformed back. It was always a punishment returning to his body, the pain sharper the moment he took a breath.

“I can’t believe you’re a bear!” Sirius shouted.

“Yes, I was surprised too,” Regulus said with a halfhearted laugh.

“We don’t even have bears here,” Lupin said, chuckling.

“That’s what Hermione said,” Harry said. “She said he was a black bear and that they only live in North America.”

“Wow,” Sirius said. “You’re never going to be able to hide with that.”

“Hermione also said that,” Regulus replied.

“When did you both do this?” Lupin asked.

“We’ve been planning it since the summer, but we transformed for the first time in November,” Harry replied.

“You’ve kept this a secret since the summer?” Sirius asked incredulously.

“Yes,” Harry replied proudly.

“We have to come up with names for them!” Sirius shouted, looking imploringly at Lupin. Lupin grinned back, his face soft with an emotion that Regulus had to look away from.

“Of course,” he muttered in reply.

Chapter End Notes

well, i hope you aren't disappointed. i know there were a lot of guesses for magical animals, but personally, I think it's a little too "main character y/n syndrome" to make a mc the only magical creature animagus in the universe.

shout out to witchydyke who semi-guessed it by saying regulus might be "a giant fucking bear" (i say semi because black bears are actually pretty small compared to other bears) so anyway, why a crow and why a bear?

for harry, i am certainly not the first author to include harry becoming a crow animagus, but i feel like it's rare enough that i wanted to write it. there were a couple of reasons for this. crows symbolize death and rebirth and i felt like this was the perfect representation of harry's character as someone who canonically is tied to death and survives two killing curses. i also have always thought that harry's animagus would be some kind of flying creature considering how much he reveres flying.

the bear is a little more complicated. the symbolism for bears is all over the place, but the one standard i could find in a lot of definitions was that bears symbolize strength and learning to stand up rather than run when faced with an obstacle. i felt like this was a good representation of regulus's journey throughout the golden king as he learns to stand and fight.

also, bears typically subsist off of berries, foliage, fish, and small animals, but they will, on occasion, eat deer. it's very uncommon though. by the time a deer is a few months old they can usually outmaneuver a bear and by the time they are fully grown, they're usually faster. so for a bear, catching an adult deer is quite the prize.

the diadem part II.

Time seemed to move faster after Christmas Day.

Regulus and Sirius broke into Hogwarts the day before New Year's Eve. They had the map so they knew it was mostly empty, thankfully even Umbridge was missing. It wasn't too difficult, they took the floo to the Hog's Head Inn wearing heavy disguises, which meant no one paid them any mind as they walked out on the streets of Hogsmeade.

They broke into the Shrieking Shack and took the secret tunnel to get onto Hogwarts grounds. They hadn't told Dumbledore that they were doing this, though it would have no doubt been easier to accomplish this goal with his help. However, he wasn't easy to reach, and they didn't have time to waste.

Sirius transformed into Padfoot, and they used the invisibility cloak and the map to travel safely through the mostly empty castle, heading for the Room of Requirement. Regulus paced in front of it trying different thoughts to summon the door. Unfortunately, the door didn't seem to know about the object they were looking for. That or it simply didn't care.

I need somewhere to hide something where it will never be found, he tried. This was his fourth attempt. Sirius was sitting next to the empty wall, watching him with so much comical skepticism that Regulus could see it through Padfoot's face. It'll work, he wanted to tell him, it has to work.

Finally, the empty wall began to shift and a set of large double doors appeared. Sirius transformed the moment they were inside, looking around in awe as they both took in the absurd amount of objects that were hidden in the room. Piles and piles of junk and treasures unfolded before them in a sea of trash. It took them nearly eight hours to locate the diadem, though that was mostly because Sirius kept getting distracted by bizarre objects in the room and sidetracking them. It also didn't help that the longer they were in the room, the weaker Regulus got.

"Whose bust do you think this is?" Sirius said. Regulus gave a put-upon sigh.

"I don't know. Can we just..."

"Can we just what?" Sirius asked. Regulus didn't answer right away, staring at Ravenclaw's lost diadem that was sitting on the top of the bust. It wasn't even hidden. The Dark Lord had just left it out in the open for anyone to happen upon. His arrogance truly knew no bounds. Regulus wasn't sure why, but the diadem seemed to entice him. Without giving it a second thought, he reached out a hand and touched it. The moment his fingers brushed the cold metal, everything went black.

"Regulus, wake up!" Sirius shouted. Regulus tried to open his eyes, but it didn't seem like they were listening to him. Suddenly, a splash of cold water dropped right on his face. He gasped for air, shooting up.

“What was that for?” Regulus shouted. He was instantly distracted by their surroundings. They were still in the Room of Requirement, but the tall piles of lost treasures and junk looked like they had been violently swept back on all sides. “What happened?”

Sirius was looking at him, but his eyes were far away.

“Sirius, what happened?” He snapped his fingers in front of Sirius’s unfocused eyes.

“I saw James,” Sirius replied.

“You what?” His stomach swooped uncomfortably.

“Them?” Regulus breathed. Who else did he see?

“The hallucinations,” Sirius replied distractedly. “I thought I was getting better.”

“What happened to the diadem?” Regulus asked. He really didn’t want to talk about this.

“I destroyed it. James told me to destroy it with the fang, and I did.”

“Did it fight back?” Sirius answered by gesturing to the objects that had been flung back. Regulus nodded.

“Let’s get out of here.” They left Hogwarts just as they came, but the silence felt heavier now, both of them lost in thought. Once they were in the tunnel that led to the shack, Sirius transformed, and they tucked the invisibility cloak away. Regulus felt like he should say something, but he just didn’t know what.

“Race you!” Sirius shouted suddenly, leaping forward and transforming midair back into Padfoot.

“Hey, no fair!” Regulus replied. He paused to concentrate, and after a few long seconds, sunk into his animagus form. Regulus was pretty sure he could have caught up if they’d been anywhere other than a small tunnel, but alas, Sirius beat him. And if they wasted a good hour running around the shack in their animagus forms, well, no one else had to know.

They returned to Hogwarts in January with the news that Snape would be teaching Harry Occlumency, something Regulus could already feel going wrong before it even started. Only a few days into the spring term, their morning was interrupted by the Daily Prophet bringing some of the worst news yet.

“Bellatrix is out,” Regulus said to Sirius the moment his face appeared in the mirror. He looked grim and angry.

“I know,” he replied. The circles under his eyes looked especially dark today as if he was purposefully keeping himself awake for long stretches of time. “What do we do?”

“She might have a Horcrux.”

Sirius shook his head, but Regulus didn't think he was disagreeing with him. He was just frustrated, as was Regulus.

"She was crazy when they locked her up there," Sirius said. "Who knows how insane the dementors have made her."

"Do you think she'll be any less dangerous?" Sirius gave him a sardonic look as his answer. "Yeah, you're right."

They stared at each other for a moment, both lost in the shared memories they had of their cousin Bellatrix. Any Death Eater breaking out of Azkaban was a bad thing, but Bellatrix was by far the worst.

"I wonder where she'll be," Regulus said quietly, half to himself.

"The Lestranges broke out as well, but I doubt they'd go back to Lestrangle Manor. It's got to be swarming with Aurors right now."

"Do you think Narcissa would house her?"

"It's possible, they were still close at the end of the war. And with Lucius running back to being Voldemort's lapdog."

Regulus cringed slightly, though he couldn't disagree.

"Do you want me to look into it? I might still be able to get through their wards, I doubt they thought to change them since I went to Azkaban."

"No, Sirius," Regulus said exasperatedly. "I don't want you to leave the house at all."

"I thought you wanted me to move out of Grimmauld," Sirius replied. He looked like he was only half joking. Regulus huffed.

"Only if you're moving somewhere that's equally safe and hidden."

Sirius laughed a little as if Regulus's request was some kind of joke. "Right, of course. Okay, I won't check Malfoy Manor, but we should probably do something. If Bellatrix is out, it can only mean bad things."

"I know," Regulus said, frowning. "Have you heard from anyone else about this?"

"Only Remus," Sirius said. Regulus tried not to let the surprise he felt show on his face but he hadn't heard Sirius say Remus's name so calmly in weeks. "But he was only here for a little before he had to leave."

"Back on another mission?"

"I don't know," Sirius said slowly. He looked distracted again. "There's something — I think he's up to something."

“Up to something?” Regulus said alarmedly.

“I don’t know. It doesn’t matter,” Sirius said quickly.

“Should I be concerned?”

“No, it’s fine. Anyway, no one else has mentioned the breakout yet, but we’re supposed to have another meeting later this week. I need to ask Kingsley how it happened. I’m sure Moody will be pulled back in to search for them.”

There wasn’t much else to do except wait to hear more. Regulus couldn’t go hunting them down right now, not that he thought he could win a fight against Bellatrix. Rabastan maybe, Rodolphus definitely, but Bellatrix? He needed to start working harder in DA meetings.

The rituals he had been doing to repair his magical core had been working far better than expected. However, a week or two before the Christmas Holidays, he hit a wall. It seemed like he’d gotten to the place where he couldn’t improve it anymore without causing real damage to his body. The last time he did the ritual, he experienced so much nerve pain that he thought his body was on fire for a moment before it all calmed down. The only way forward now was time and good old-fashioned practice.

“Let me know what you hear at the meeting,” Regulus said. “I doubt I’ll hear anything unless it’s from you.”

“I will,” Sirius responded. “When is Harry’s first Occlumency lesson with Snivellus?”

“He met with him last night,” Regulus replied, ignoring the jab at Snape’s name. He wasn’t about to get between two grown men and their petty squabbles.

“How did it go?” Sirius asked, a dark look on his face.

“Fine.” Regulus had to work to keep his face neutral. It did not in fact go fine, but it would just make everyone miserable if Sirius learned about it and could do nothing to help. Sirius didn’t look like he believed him. “It would be better if you were the one teaching him.”

“You’re not bad at it either,” Sirius said, though his expression softened. “Why don’t you teach him?”

“I’m not sure I would be any good at that,” Regulus said honestly. “You were the one who could do it naturally. I always felt like I was fighting to maintain it.” He hated to admit the fact that he was worse than Sirius at any specific type of magic, but compliments were usually a good way to go when trying to distract him.

Sirius shrugged. “Maybe that’ll help. I never really had to learn, and neither did Snape if what Dumbledore said is true. It just came naturally to us. But you had to learn actual skills. That’s probably what Harry will have to do.”

“Yeah, maybe,” Regulus agreed uncertainly. “Doubt Dumbledore would swing for that though.”

“I’ll talk to him,” Sirius said solemnly.

They ended the call a few minutes later, though Regulus could tell that Sirius would have stayed longer if Regulus let him. He would have to make sure Harry called later tonight, he didn’t want Sirius to spend too much time feeling lonely. A few minutes after Regulus put the mirror down, Harry and Ron came back into the dorm room.

“How was Hagrid?” Regulus asked, tucking the mirror away in Harry’s trunk.

“Umbridge put him on probation,” Ron replied, an unhappy look marring his face.

“Already?” Regulus asked.

“Yep,” Harry answered. “I’m guessing she was just waiting for him to get back to do it. It’s probably her plan all along to get rid of him.”

“He’ll have to be extra careful,” Ron said.

“I’m not sure it’ll matter.” Both of them look at him with alarm. “Umbridge has a lot of sway here right now, if she wants Hagrid gone, then it’s only a matter of time.”

“How can you even say that?” Harry shouted. His anger was always just below the surface these days. Regulus tried not to let it bother him.

“It’s not forever. Umbridge is working in a cursed position. Something will happen, and then hopefully she’ll be gone.”

“Oh, right,” Harry said, but he didn’t look happy about it.

“I wonder if my dream will come true,” Ron said. “You know, the one about the giant beast in the forest.”

“I hope it does,” Regulus said. “There are all sorts of beasts in the forest. Maybe she’ll get attacked by a Quintaped.”

“Are there Quintapeds in the Forbidden Forest?” Hermione asked, having just walked into the dorm.

“Who knows?” Harry replied with a shrug, but he was smiling now, and Regulus counted that as a win. “We could always lure one there.”

“Yeah, let me just call up Charlie, I’m sure he’ll know where to find one,” Ron said sarcastically, letting out a giggle as he spoke. Hermione’s lips twitched like she was trying to hold in a laugh.

“Charlie would probably do it too,” Hermione agreed, all four of them collapsing into laughter.

The next day, as Harry was getting ready to head to his remedial Potions lesson, as Snape was forcing him to call it, Regulus got up to go with him. “What are you doing?”

“I need to talk to Snape,” Regulus said without elaborating. Harry followed him out of the common room with a question on his face. Two nights prior when Harry had had his first Occlumency lesson, he’d returned looking unsteady and irritated. Hermione was the first to ask how it went, and he mostly brushed off her concern, instead sharing a repeated dream he’d been having about the Department of Mysteries. Worrying, sure, but not as pressing as his meeting with Snape.

“Tell me how it really went,” Regulus had said later that night when they were alone, Ron snoring loudly in his bed.

Harry shrugged. “He just kept telling me to empty my mind and then would cast Legilimens on me.”

“What?” Regulus yelped. Ron’s snoring paused for a moment before continuing. “He’s already casting on you? It was your first lesson.”

“Yeah, I’m not very good at it,” Harry started to say.

“Of course not,” Regulus said. “You just started.” Harry shrugged again.

That conversation was the reason Regulus was marching to Snape’s office with Harry in tow. Harry’s ability to use Occlumency was vitally important, and he wasn’t going to let Snape mess it up just so he could play out the moves of an old grudge.

“Black, what are you doing here?” Snape drawled when he entered the office, though he tensed slightly when Harry entered as well, closing the door behind him.

“I’m here to observe,” Regulus said stiffly, crossing his arms and walking over to lean against the wall.

“Observe,” Snape repeated, irritation clear in his voice.

“Yes.” Harry looked between them uncertainly.

“Very well,” Snape said after a long few moments of tense silence. He didn’t look happy about this development, but for some reason, he didn’t fight it.

It was a long night. Snape was clearly on his best behavior, but Regulus was quick to jump in when he was even a little too harsh. For one, he didn’t think Snape should have been casting Legilimens at all yet. Harry didn’t know anything, and he had no natural talent for Occlumency. Snape’s teaching, if one could even call it that, wasn’t doing anything to help him.

Every time Regulus intervened, he could feel Snape growing more and more vexed. Regulus was pretty sure he was just going to start hexing him at some point, but Snape never did. Harry was exhausted and perhaps quietly entertained by the two of them, but he seemed to leave the meeting with at least a basic understanding of how to practice which was more than he came there with.

“I’m going to come back until I know you can be trusted. We both know that you can teach, there is no reason to make this harder than it needs to be.”

Snape looked like he was a second from exploding with rage, but Regulus didn’t let it affect him, simply walking out of the office and following Harry up to the dorm.

Occlumency meetings went better after that, especially after Snape had a moment to cool down, and Harry seemed to be improving a little with the first step of learning the skill. He was meditating most nights and seemed to get better each day at emptying his mind, but it wasn’t helping much with keeping the Dark Lord out.

“I’m not sure that regular Occlumency is going to work for him,” Snape admitted during the first week of February. They were alone, Regulus arriving a bit before Harry.

Regulus blew out a gust of air. “I was afraid of that. I didn’t think this kind of magic would come naturally to him.”

Snape seemed to weigh his next words carefully. “There are... other options.”

“What do you mean?”

“It’s not exactly Occlumency, not as you and I know it, but it’s similar. It’s at least a way to redirect someone if they enter his thoughts. I’m not sure that it would keep the Dark Lord out all the time though.”

Regulus sighed. “It’s worth a try. Maybe it’ll make his regular Occlumency skills better in the meantime.”

Snape nodded. He seemed to understand that Regulus was giving him permission to move forward, though Regulus wasn’t about to leave Harry alone yet. Snape had been behaving better, but Regulus still couldn’t be sure that he wouldn’t react badly if the two of them were left alone.

“Typical Occlumency works as a wall between your thoughts and the person trying to access them,” Snape explained to Harry after he arrived. He was paying very close attention. “They would be blocked entirely.”

“How is this different?” Harry asked. Snape looked annoyed at the interruption, but Regulus knew it was a good thing. Harry only interrupted like that if he was interested, and he needed to be interested in this in order to succeed.

“This method will work to disorient anyone who enters your thoughts so that they won’t find what they’re looking for.”

“Okay,” Harry said curiously.

“The idea is to lead them to other memories but to do it so quickly that they can’t focus enough to search for the ones they want.” Harry nodded. “This works best with,” Snape paused for a second, “embarrassing memories.”

Harry's eyebrows raised. "Embarrassing memories?"

"If the memories are filled with emotion, they will be more distracting. If the person entering your thoughts believes these are memories you are trying to hide, and you would certainly want to hide memories that embarrassed you, then it will be that much harder for them to get passed your defenses."

"Okay, I think I understand. How do I do it?"

"You need to visualize all of your memories so that you can bring them to the front of your thoughts, tucking the ones you want to hide deep in your head, layered behind the ones you plan to show."

It was slow going, teaching Harry this method, but they were making more progress with it than they were originally. Harry ultimately settled on what he began to refer to as the "cinema method." He explained to Sirius and Regulus about the cinema he was allowed to go to only once when he was a child, and how each room would show a different muggle film. He started organizing his thoughts, his embarrassing thoughts, at Snape's request, into different muggle film rooms so that if someone entered his head, they would be led to them and unable to find the ones he truly wanted to hide. Regulus wasn't sure that he fully understood, but Harry seemed to be motivated, so he let it lie.

Valentine's Day brought with it the first Hogsmeade visit of the new year. Regulus had originally planned to do a little shopping, nothing special, that day, but Hermione had other plans.

"I want Harry to meet me at the Three Broomsticks, I have an idea, but..."

"But?" Regulus asked. She had found him alone in the library, trying to finish a bit of schoolwork before his latest meeting with Snape and Harry.

"I'm not sure if it's a good idea. I was so sure about the charm to protect the DA, but it was the wrong choice. What if this one is too?" She looked at him pleadingly as she spoke.

"Well, why don't you tell me what your idea is and we can talk through it?" Regulus said patiently, setting aside the essay he was writing.

Hermione went on to admit that she had discovered Rita Skeeter's secret, apparently, she was an unregistered beetle animagus, and Hermione had kept her in a jar against her will for an extended period of time. She wouldn't clarify how long exactly which Regulus found wildly entertaining.

"Okay," Regulus said as evenly as he could manage. It was truly devious, but Regulus had to admit that he was impressed.

"No one believes Harry, and the Daily Prophet keeps publishing lies about him. I was thinking if he could just get his story out there, then maybe he could convince people."

"And Rita Skeeter is involved in your plan how?"

"Well, I was thinking that I could get her to write the article, people seem to trust her even if most of her reporting is nonsense."

"Where would we publish it? I doubt the Daily Prophet would take the story, even from Rita."

"Yeah," Hermione agreed, looking extremely uncomfortable and oddly embarrassed.

"What?"

"I was thinking... maybe we could publish it in the Quibbler."

Regulus's jaw dropped. "The magazine run by Luna's father? I thought you believed it was full of lies."

"It is full of lies," she insisted. He raised his eyebrows in question. "But we have to publish the truth somewhere, and Luna said that she and her father both believe Harry. It just makes sense."

"Did you talk to Luna about this?"

"Yes," Hermione said, sounding vaguely offended that Regulus would even ask. "She thinks it's a great idea."

"I'll admit I'm surprised that the two of you managed to agree on something," he said, working hard to keep the judgment out of his tone.

She bristled regardless. "Somethings are more important than petty disagreements."

"I agree," he said. "I think this is a good idea. It's risky, Umbridge is likely to come down hard on us, but I think it would be worth it. We should check with Harry first though, he's likely the one that will incur the wrath of that woman."

"I'm surprised you're agreeing," Hermione admitted. "You've worked so hard to keep him safe from her."

"Yes, but now that those Death Eaters have broken out of Azkaban, we're bound to have bigger enemies than Fudge and his lackey."

Hermione folded her lips under her teeth to hold in a laugh, though her eyes were worried. "Do you think they'll come after Harry?"

"Almost certainly," Regulus said. There was no use trying to hide the truth from them, especially from Hermione. She understood just as well as everyone the constant danger that was headed after them. "So, talk to Harry. If he agrees, then we should schedule a meeting."

"Okay," she said cheerfully. The anxiety was still there, but Hermione did best when she had an action plan, and this plan was as good as any. He wondered if he should warn Draco or Theo, their fathers would no doubt be included in the article. He decided he would, the day before the Hogsmeade trip.

“Draco,” he hissed just as Draco walked past his hiding space in a small alcove behind a large, hanging, ornate rug.

He looked around for a second before scampering behind the rug. “What’s going on?” There was a crease between his eyebrows.

Regulus desperately wanted to ask him about his parents, how involved they were and if Bellatrix was going to be making an appearance in their home, but he held his tongue. At worst, it would cause Draco to turn against him, Harry’s safety be damned. At best, it would just put him in more danger. If any of them discovered Draco’s intention to help Regulus, it wouldn’t end well for him. He doubted that Lucius would take well to his son’s betrayal. Bellatrix would be even worse.

“There’s something you should know,” Regulus said. “Harry is planning to talk to the press about what happened during the Triwizard Tournament.”

Draco’s eyebrows furrowed even further. “Okay,” he said slowly.

“Your father will likely be indicated.” Draco was silent for a long few minutes, his face racing between warring emotions. Regulus watched him in silence, letting him work through his feelings without interruption.

“What will happen to him?” Draco whispered.

“Nothing right now,” Regulus said. “If the Ministry wanted to move against him they would first have to admit that the Dark Lord was back, and they probably aren’t going to do that unless they’re forced to.”

Draco breathed out a sigh of relief. “There haven’t been any other updates about the special group of prefects,” Draco said after a moment. Regulus was surprised that he moved on so quickly, but he let him do it without objection.

“What is she waiting for?”

“I don’t think she can do it unless she’s Headmistress. At least, that’s what Blaise said.” Draco frowned, the idea that one of his friends could have figured something out before him was probably irritating.

“Let’s hope that doesn’t happen.”

“Dumbledore isn’t a good headmaster either,” Draco argued instantly.

“At least he doesn’t permanently scar his students for speaking out of turn,” Regulus snapped back. “I know you don’t like him, but Umbridge would be far, far worse.”

Draco ultimately agreed, and Regulus left the conversation feeling a little calmer. At least Draco would be prepared for the storm to come. He told Theo the next morning, right before they headed out to Hogsmeade, but he looked unresponsive and barely said a word beyond nodding.

Theo was a bit confusing to Regulus. He was quiet and had been since he started school, but he also seemed desperate for companionship. Regulus had invited him to the DA with hopes that he would make friends with Seamus and maybe Dean, however, Fred and George ended up being the ones to take him under their wing. Regulus didn't know what the three of them talked about, but it was clear that the twins were interested in whatever Theo had to say. He could only hope that he wouldn't be too shaken by his Death Eater father, but Regulus knew better than anyone how hard it could be to turn against your parents.

They passed Cho on the way to the Three Broomsticks. She looked tense but gave a small smile when she noticed Harry walking with the rest of them.

"She's going to meet Cedric," Luna said, some mysterious emotion in her voice that Regulus had trouble deciphering.

"Whatever awaits here isn't good," Ron said, shaking his head. Hermione rolled her eyes.

"You're just making things up," she said.

"Says you," Ron snipped.

The two of them continued to bicker as they made their way through the streets before finally making it to the Three Broomsticks, quickly finding a table tucked away in the back. Rita arrived just as their butterbeers did. She was just as delightful as the last time he saw her, which is to say that she was a complete terror and her very gaze made Regulus's skin crawl. Getting Rita to show even a modicum of respect was a bit like pulling teeth, but Regulus was sure by the end of the interview that they had done the best they could. All that was left to do was wait.

That and prepare for his first Quidditch match as the Gryffindor seeker which was looming on the horizon.

the patronus.

Regulus used to love Quidditch. During his first life, it was one of the few moments of true freedom that he experienced. Though he played on a team, and there was always his captain that he had to listen to, he still felt truly independent out on the Quidditch pitch. Perhaps it was the act of flying itself or the fact that the Seeker worked largely alone throughout the game. He wasn't sure. All he knew was that playing Quidditch was the perfect distraction from the things that weighed him down in his first life.

He wasn't positive that that feeling carried over into his second life. Though he found that flying was still enjoyable, it was now stained by the constant pain from his nerve damage. He could really only manage to stay on a broom for about half an hour at a time before he would have to rest. He was sure this would cause Angelina, the Gryffindor team captain, to kick him off the team, or at the very least yell at him, but she seemed to have endless patience for his struggling.

During the week leading up to the game, Regulus was growing increasingly nervous. He did his best to bury the feeling though, mostly because he didn't think Ron would survive if he had to carry someone else's pre-game anxiety along with his own. Still, his hands were shaky and his muscles would randomly clench in pain, these were among the least painful side effects of the nerve damage that riddled his body.

They had a DA meeting the night before, but half the room was distracted by something or other. Ron didn't come, opting instead to practice alone out on the pitch. They tried to talk him out of this, tried to encourage him to give his body time to rest, but he couldn't bear to stay still longer than a few minutes, and eventually, even Hermione was shoving him out the door, his nervousness rubbing off on her.

That wasn't the only distraction at the meeting though. Only fifteen minutes or so into the lesson, Cho miscast a spell that sent Michael Corner flying halfway across the room. She dropped her wand instantly and covered her mouth with both hands.

"Woah, okay. Let's try to be careful," Harry said. There was a chuckle in his voice, but he looked at Cho with a glint of respect. Regulus was pretty sure Cho didn't notice it though because the moment Harry spoke Cho burst out in loud sobs and sprinted from the room. Her friend glared at Harry who now looked completely bewildered, before she ran out of the room to chase Cho down. It took them a while to get back on track after that, it seemed like nearly everyone was more interested in breaking off into side conversations about why Cho was crying.

"Oh, that wasn't your fault, Harry," Luna said later that evening once everyone else was gone. She stayed back along with Hermione, Lavender, and Parvati to help Harry and Regulus clean up the room.

"Are you sure? I didn't mean to hurt her feelings or whatever," Harry said, frowning.

"Oh, no. Cho's been like that for weeks now. She and Cedric broke up."

“They did? I thought they were together on Valentine’s Day?” Hermione asked.

“Yeah, but apparently that’s when it happened,” Parvati said happily, the sparkle of fresh gossip in her eyes.

“I heard it was because Cho cheated on Cedric,” Lavender added salaciously.

“Are you making that up?” Hermione asked, furrowing her eyebrows.

“No, Padma told us,” Parvati said.

“A few people at Madam Puddifoot’s overheard them too. Cedric accused her of kissing someone else, and she didn’t even deny it.” Lavender gave a high-pitched laugh.

Luna watched them impassively, though she nodded slightly like this explained something for her.

“Who else did she kiss?” Harry asked.

“No idea, but I would kill to find out,” Lavender responded.

Regulus was still thinking about it while he dressed for the game the next day. He was loaded up with enough pain potion to knock out a hippogriff, but as long as he stayed conscious that was all that mattered. Well, that and catching the snitch, but he thought he had a good chance of doing it before the Hufflepuff Seeker who was new this year.

Ginny was mumbling to herself as they walked out toward the pitch, tossing the beater’s bat from one hand to another.

“Excited?” Regulus asked her. She grinned at him.

“Beyond excited,” she whispered back. She looked at their teammates for a moment, but none of them were paying much attention to their conversation. “A bit nervous,” she added with a half-frown.

“Did you ever play beater growing up?”

“Not really, Fred and George were always the ones to do it. I usually played chaser or seeker when we had family games. Charlie always beat me to the snitch though.”

Regulus chuckled. “Yeah, he seems like he was a pretty good player.”

“He got a few offers to join some professional teams, but he was more interested in moving to Romania. Mum was furious, said he was throwing away a lucrative career for one that could kill him in a month.”

“Ah, that explains why he doesn’t visit much.”

Ginny half shrugged. “Dad was always supportive, but I don’t think Mum ever really got over it.”

“Are either of them coming to this game?”

“No,” Ginny replied, shaking her head. “They only really came when Charlie was on the team, after he graduated, they stopped coming. Guess they figured that the rest of us weren’t likely to make a career out of it so there was no point.”

Regulus had to work to contain his shock at the words. That was the exact kind of thinking that his parents had, the idea that if it didn’t benefit you financially or give you some kind of power over others, then it was worthless.

“I don’t know,” Regulus responded as evenly as he could manage. “I think you’re pretty good.”

“Not Ron?” she whispered. Ron was several yards in front of them talking quietly to Angelina.

“Maybe Ron, though honestly, I think he would be miserable doing this for a job. He’s more a collaborative type than a competitive one.”

Ginny gave him an appraising look before nodding seriously. “I think you’re right.”

Regulus had watched Ginny practice loads of times by that point, but it was different during the game. She was beyond brutal with her bat. Fred and George were always solid beaters, but there was a playfulness to them as if they were just toying with the opposing team. Ginny was the opposite, she hit directly and fiercely, her teeth bared harshly at everyone.

It was a good thing though — even if Regulus was vaguely worried that she might kill a Hufflepuff while they were out there — because Ron was seriously struggling to block the chasers. Luckily for him, and for Regulus as well given the way the pain potion was already beginning to wear off, the snitch was an easy find today.

The Hufflepuff seeker wasn’t bad exactly, but he wasn’t anywhere near the skill level that Cedric had been. He seemed more interested in hovering around Regulus as he circled the pitch. When Regulus spotted the snitch gleaming in the sunlight on the opposite side of where he was, he slowly drifted over, waiting until the last possible second to dive and snatch it up, his ridiculously expensive broom outflying the poor Hufflepuff seeker behind him. Just in time too, as the Hufflepuff chasers had just scored their fourteenth goal, bringing the final total to 150-140 for Gryffindor.

The rest of February and all of March passed in a blur. Regulus’s time was packed full of DA meetings, Occlumency training, Quidditch practice, and a ridiculous amount of classwork as O.W.L.s approached. He was exhausted, to say the least.

Umbridge had begun making more changes inside Hogwarts, one of the biggest ones was when she fired Trelawney, attempting to expel her from the grounds the moment she was sacked. Dumbledore was able to keep her at the school, though not as a professor, and instantly replaced her with a professor that no doubt made Umbridge even angrier: the centaur Firenze.

Ron, Lavender, and Parvati were the only ones to comfort Trelawney as she was led back into the castle. Firenze, once he began teaching classes, took an instant interest in Ron. Regulus was curious about what they would talk about, Ron stayed after class nearly every day, but he had too much on his plate to worry about it yet. However, he had to admit that he enjoyed having Firenze, who Regulus felt was a much better professor, even if he was also a little disconnected from reality.

His exhaustion wasn't helped by the fact that the Occlumency training wasn't working the way it needed to. Harry was getting better at his "cinema" method, but he was still accessible while he was asleep. Regulus knew of at least one vision that he'd had, but he was pretty sure there was more. Harry seemed embarrassed when he mentioned it, so Regulus was sure he was keeping the rest to himself out of fear of judgment.

"I'm not sure what else to do," Regulus said to Sirius one night. Sirius sighed tiredly.

"What does Snape say?"

It was almost disappointing to hear Sirius say Snape's name, it just indicated how serious this all was. If Sirius could drop his feud to talk about it, then it was truly life and death. Not that Regulus didn't already know that, but it made it worse having his ridiculous brother confirm it.

"He's at a loss, other than going back to teaching standard Occlumency there isn't much he can do. I doubt that will be any time soon, it really doesn't come naturally to him."

Regulus felt helpless as he had so many times in his first and second life. His impotence knew no bounds apparently.

The Quibbler article had been released at the end of February and of course, Umbridge cracked down hard on it. That just meant that it was way more popular than it probably would have been otherwise. It worked well though, and more and more students seemed to believe Harry. Regulus was worried that she would give him a detention for it, but they managed to skate by without that happening. She did ban both of them from Hogsmeade, but that hardly mattered in the grand scheme of things.

Of course, now she was obsessively interested in what they were doing with the DA. According to Draco, she knew they were meeting in secret, but she couldn't figure out where, and she didn't know how to discover it. His final warning was the most peculiar one.

"I think she's planning to use Veritaserum to question everyone. I hope you're prepared for that."

Regulus hoped so too, though he didn't get to find out how his Tongue Tying Jinx worked against Veritaserum until a week or so later when Harry joined them in the DA meeting crying with laughter about his most recent meeting with Umbridge. Regulus had warned everyone not to drink anything Umbridge gave them, but Harry, being himself, had forgotten this advice.

“I drank the tea,” he said, still laughing. “I forgot that you told us not to until a second after I took a sip. I was about to run out of the room when she asked where we were meeting. I don’t think she was expecting me to say we were meeting inside Snape’s trousers.”

“What?” Fred shouted.

Regulus rolled his eyes, swallowing down his frustration that Harry had ingested the Veritaserum when he had worked so hard to keep him from doing so. “It’s the Tongue-Tying Jinx, it keeps you from sharing what you know.” He was relieved it actually worked.

“You made it say that we’re meeting in Snape’s trousers?” Ron asked, laughing as well.

“No, it’s unique to the person. That’s just what Harry’s mind thinks is the most ridiculous version of where we’re meeting.”

“Oh, so if we tried to tell anyone what we were doing, each of us would say something different, but equally insane?” Hermione asked, her eyes lighting up with intrigue at this new form of magic.

“Didn’t you read up on it when Regulus first suggested it?” Ron asked. He didn’t sound snide, but Hermione blushed like she had been insulted.

“I forgot,” she mumbled. A look of concentration crossed her face before she opened her mouth to say, “We’re all planning to fail our O.W.L.s.” She covered her mouth with one hand, her eyes wide with shock. “Wow, it really works.”

That seemed to unravel everyone in the room who wasn’t already laughing. Of course, the most ridiculous thing Hermione could imagine was that they were all meeting up so that they could fail their exams. They all seemed to break off into groups, everyone taking turns trying out the curse that Regulus had put on the sheet of paper where everyone signed their name.

It was a good thing they were all in such high spirits as today was the day they started learning how to cast Patronuses. Harry was a good teacher, had been since the first meeting, but he really soared when instructing everyone on this particular spell. It took Regulus a bit to realize it was because Lupin taught Harry personally how to do it. He already knew how to help everyone.

Regulus watched as everyone attempted the spell over and over again that evening, not participating himself given that he was sure he wouldn’t be able to do it, and he had no desire to publicly embarrass himself. Harry’s crow was soaring above the room as he walked around to help people.

Hermione’s otter and Ron’s Jack Russell terrier seemed to erupt from their wands at the same moment, both of them engaging the other instantly. Luna was also successful, a hare bouncing around her as she smiled happily. It was quite a display seeing so many animals in such a small space. Most of the DA members weren’t able to conjure a corporeal one, but a lot of them were at least able to successfully use the spell and that could save their lives if it came down to it.

“Why didn’t you try?” Harry asked him as they were walking back to the common room. They were the last ones to leave, using the map to make sure they weren’t caught after curfew.

Regulus shrugged. “I’ve never been able to cast one,” Regulus said. He saw no point in lying to Harry. “I doubt that’ll change now.”

“Why weren’t you able to cast one?”

Regulus weighed his options for responding. It felt like too much of a downer to tell Harry about his terrible, lonely childhood, the years he spent grieving his relationship with James, or the loss of his only brother. Harry must have seen what he wasn’t saying on his face.

“A lot of good things have happened since you last tried,” he said, not even bothering to ask when that might have been. There was no way for him to know when that was, but he must have correctly assumed that it hadn’t been for a while. “I know you don’t have — well, the thing with my dad...”

“We don’t have to talk about it,” Regulus interrupted. Harry flushed bright red.

“There has to be something else. You never know when you might need to cast it, especially if dementors are going to be randomly attacking us.” He gave him a pleading look, not taking his eyes off of him for even a second.

Regulus sighed. “I’ll try,” he said. “But not tonight. I doubt I’d have the energy.”

Harry nodded, seemingly satisfied. Regulus didn’t really know why he cared so much, it was Regulus’s job to keep Harry safe, not the other way around, but if it meant that much to him then Regulus would attempt it.

It wasn’t until the next day that he got the chance. He still wasn’t attending Care of Magical Creatures so he had a free period that wasn’t filled with some other task. He had met with Hagrid just a week before to discuss his preparations for his O.W.L., but it seemed like Regulus might be better prepared for it than Hagrid could make him. So with his free period, and his lack of pressing schoolwork, he decided to lounge in his dorm.

He wasn’t planning to try the spell then, but he kept thinking about the worried look in Harry’s eyes. There has to be something else, Harry had said. Regulus wondered if he was thinking of something specific, some memory that Harry was present for that he hoped Regulus could use to summon even a non-corporeal Patronus.

He didn’t know what he could be talking about, but he felt bad, like if he didn’t try then he would be letting him down. He sighed heavily, burying his face in his pillow for a few minutes to stave off the frustration. He flopped onto his back, staring up at the canopy above his bed, the red bright in the early afternoon sun.

What memory could he use? Any of the ones featuring James were out, even the few happy ones that he had. There was too much pain, regret, and anguish tied up with them. Not to mention that he would rather claw his own eyes out than think about them in any detail.

Really any memory from his first life wasn't helpful. There was so much sadness there, it was hard to parse out anything that would be happy enough for a Patronus. He slowly went through everything he could think of since he started his second life. There had to be something. Harry was sure and he couldn't let Harry down.

Finally, he settled on one. A recent one. Right after Sirius gave him Nyx, a healed wound from their shared childhood, when Regulus turned into a bear, and Sirius's first response was to transform as well so they could play. It was so childish, so silly, so unlike every interaction they had had since they were both very little. Harry's laughter in the background added another layer to it, a shine of joy and contentment.

"Expecto Patronum," he whispered. At first, nothing happened, but he let the memory fill him, let it spread from his chest out to the tips of his fingers, warming him completely. He took a breath. "Expecto Patronum," he repeated.

He opened his eyes just as the light jumped out of his wand. He was still lying flat on his back, so it hovered above him. At first, he thought it didn't have a shape, just a burst of mist floating above him, but after a second, it was like his eyes finally focused.

His mouth fell open, his eyes widening slightly. His chest clenched so painfully that he thought he might pass out for a second. The patronus vanished. He wasn't sure if he was the one to do it, or if his magic just gave out, the happy memory escaping him the moment he saw the patronus. He was so stupid. He expected a bear, he didn't expect —

He was pathetic. It didn't matter if Harry wanted him to try this spell, he wasn't going to tell anyone that he was able to do it. He could never risk anyone seeing. He turned onto his side and clenched his eyes closed, but even in the darkness he could still see it — the stag sprinting around above him.

the lie.

Chapter Notes

The worst day of Regulus's life started as most mornings did: with exhaustion and a day full of exams.

Well, just one exam. There was, thankfully, only History of Magic left after two weeks of O.W.L.s and the long grueling weeks spent preparing for them prior to that. Regulus was run ragged, and he was beyond thankful that he wouldn't have to think about stupid O.W.L.s again. Unless, of course, he somehow de-aged again and had to do this all over. He didn't think that was likely, and anyway, Harry would have aged out of school by that point. Harry's kids would be on their own.

The months leading up to O.W.L.s had been filled with nonstop anxieties and tasks. They had their final game against Ravenclaw, an easy win considering Cho was barely present, still shaken up from her breakup with Cedric. Regulus felt a little bad beating her. Not bad enough to let her win, of course, he was still sorted in Slytherin once upon a time.

They won the Quidditch Cup after that. Not that Regulus cared much about it. What he did care about was the fact that Remus showed up to the game with Sirius next to him transfigured to look like the same crup that Remus brought to the Triwizard Tournament tasks. It was risky with Umbridge in attendance, but she didn't do much beyond glare at the man. Regulus was just relieved to see them acting normally, though it didn't escape his attention the space between them. Even as a dog, Sirius seemed to be keeping Remus at arm's length.

They didn't get much of a chance to talk that day or the days after. The afternoon before O.W.L.s began, Sirius called Regulus on the mirror. He still looked awful, though his eyes were bright, and he didn't look drunk or hungover, which was about all Regulus could ask for these days.

"Dumbledore came by," Sirius said instantly before Regulus could ask about him and Remus.

"What?" Regulus asked, shocked.

Dumbledore had been unceremoniously ousted as the Headmaster of Hogwarts nearly a month and a half before. Regulus still didn't quite understand what happened. Fred and George decided they'd had enough of Umbridge and her terrorizing the school. They didn't care about their N.E.W.T.s and had more than enough money at that point to start their own business.

Regulus only heard about their plans after the fact, but it wasn't a secret that they were done dealing with Umbridge. Their pranks had been ramping up, even going so far as to use the technique they used on Hermione. Regulus still didn't know if Umbridge noticed the odd hoping she would do occasionally or the ribbits that came out of her throat now and then. Even watching that wasn't enough to get them to stay.

They made a grand exit in April, dropping a horrible swamp all over the school that still had lingering effects weeks later. Umbridge was driven mad by it, especially because none of the other professors would help remove it from the school, including Dumbledore. She was given permission from Fudge to search Fred and George's dorm room, stomping back down into the Gryffindor common room afterward looking triumphant with a letter from Dumbledore clutched in her fist. The letter supposedly proved that Dumbledore was the one who told Fred and George to do it.

Regulus was pretty sure the letter was faked, actually, he was sure the entire school thought it was fake, but for the time being, there wasn't anything they could do. Especially after Dumbledore accepted credit for it and made a quick getaway before he could be questioned any further. Regulus hadn't heard anything from Dumbledore since.

"He found another one," Sirius said, snapping Regulus back to the moment.

"Another —"

"Horcrux," Sirius said quickly.

Regulus gasped. "How? Where?"

"He said he would explain where over the summer, but the important part is that it's been destroyed. We used one of the fangs here. The strangest thing though, a part of it came off after the fact. The fang couldn't destroy it."

"What do you mean part of it came off?" Regulus asked worriedly.

Sirius waved him off. "Dumbledore is sure the Horcrux itself is gone, but we're going to hold onto it for the time being. When you get home for the summer we can use you to check it. If you get sick around it, then we'll know we have to try something else to fully destroy it."

Home. The word made Regulus pause for a second, it sounded so odd coming out of Sirius's mouth. Especially given that he was referring to their childhood home. He pushed past the feeling, now wasn't the time to get swallowed up with thoughts of his past life.

It was a solid idea though, using him to check the Horcrux. At least they had it in their possession. Regulus couldn't do much about it given the two weeks of exams he had before him, but it still was good to know. Dumbledore was definitely staying busy even in his unemployment, hunting Horcruxes.

It was a day full of bizarre news apparently because later that night Harry and Hermione pulled Regulus and Ron aside to tell them about the giant that Hagrid was keeping in the forest.

"What — why?" Regulus asked.

“Well, he thinks that Umbridge is going to fire him, and he wants someone else to know about Grawp. He’s Hagrid’s half-brother,” Hermione said earnestly.

“Its name is Grawp?” Ron asked bewilderedly.

“His, Ronald, not its.”

“No, no, not why did he tell you,” Regulus interrupted, shaking his head fiercely. “Why does he even have him in the forest?”

Neither of them could provide an answer that he thought was satisfactory, but for the time being he had to let the issue lie. Hagrid was probably right that his days were numbered now that Umbridge was in charge, but surely a giant in the Forbidden Forest could take care of itself. Himself. Whatever.

With Dumbledore gone, they decided to end their DA meetings. It was getting too risky, and Umbridge finally had free reign to create her Inquisitorial Squad full of pureblood students. They would be sniffed out eventually, and they had already learned a great deal in their time together so it wasn’t too much of a loss to stop them.

They spent their final meeting having a party together. Theo came with Daphne in tow and Regulus, for the first time in five years, witnessed Theo laugh. Ron, who usually avoided the Slytherins at all costs, said something to him that Regulus didn’t hear, and Theo smiled before letting out a loud chuckle that seemed to surprise even him.

Next thing they knew, O.W.L.s were upon them. Regulus, in all his arrogance and unending self-hatred, decided that the best course of action was to take every single O.W.L. that he could. In retrospect, he could have just taken the ones he went to classes for and left the others to a past version of himself, but he just couldn’t let it go. It started because Umbridge was there lording over McGonagall as she tried to give him career advice earlier in the year.

“Have you thought about your career options?” McGonagall asked stiffly. Umbridge shifted slightly like the mere mention of Regulus having a future made her unhappy. It definitely did.

“No,” he said honestly. “I’ll probably be expected to take over as Lord of the family eventually. Beyond that, I’m not sure I’ll pursue a career.” It was almost word for word the answer he gave to Slughorn last time, but it still worked. Of course, Sirius was Lord now, and they had no plans for Regulus to take over. Not to mention that Regulus was almost certain he wouldn’t survive the war against the Dark Lord. Not that he even wanted to. He wasn’t about to mention that to McGonagall though.

“Are you sure? You are a very gifted student. There are many fields you could pursue quite successfully if you put your mind to it.”

Umbridge cleared her throat with a condescending, “Hem-hem.” She must have been doing it all day because McGonagall snapped at her instantly.

“Yes, what do you need?” McGonagall said, turning dark eyes on the woman.

The two of them devolved into an argument about the lack of a future Regulus would have given the fact that he was a murderer — he'd forgotten about that for the most part, and he had to work to fight off a panic attack that threatened to overtake him when he thought about Barty, lost to madness and killed at the magical hands of James Potter. The conversation ended with Regulus demanding to take all twelve O.W.L.s just to prove that he could, and McGonagall, in her fit of rage, allowing it.

Nearly two weeks into O.W.L.s, Regulus was thoroughly regretting his decision. He had barely a month to prepare for exams that he hadn't taken a class for in many years, and though he remembered a lot, he was certainly not in a place where he could reasonably pass their O.W.L.s. He ended up spending almost every free moment studying, only Hermione was studying more than him, and he doubted that she was even sleeping anymore.

It was finally the last day though, he had successfully completed all of his O.W.L.s except for one: History of Magic. He had it in the late afternoon, which was good because Regulus was worn out and didn't feel like moving until at least lunchtime. Harry looked just as tired, not a surprise given that it was nearly four in the morning before everyone went to bed the night before.

They had their Astronomy O.W.L. last night, and Hagrid had been removed from the school during it, although apparently, Umbridge was planning to arrest him rather than fire him as she showed up at midnight on his door with five Aurors. He sprinted out the front gate with his dog, Fang, running behind him. McGonagall tried to intervene but was hit with a number of Stunning Spells which left her in the Hospital Wing. It was distressing to witness, and clearly, Harry was very affected by it if the dark circles under his eyes and the indignant look on his face were any indication.

They entered the Great Hall at two o'clock for the exam, and Regulus could already feel his focus slipping. He just wanted the exam to be over so that he could go back to the dorm and sleep for two days. He was so thankful that the year was almost finished. Soon he would be back at Grimmauld with Harry and Sirius, spending the summer making headway on the Horcrux hunt.

"Turn over your papers," one of the professors running the exam said. "You may begin..."

Regulus had always been a skilled test taker. Even in his first life, he could skate by in classes because he would always do well on the final exam. This one was no different, especially because he had already taken this exact O.W.L. years ago. The other ones had been updated, at least a little bit, but History of Magic was exactly the same. He rushed through the questions, especially thankful that this was just a written exam. His magical core was not completely recovered, and with the constant exams, he was beginning to wonder if it would ever be.

He was just nearing the end of the questions when screaming suddenly erupted in the Hall around him.

He looked over sharply to see Harry flinging himself to the ground, his nails scraping at the scar etched on his forehead. Regulus was up and out of his seat before he could think about it, making it to Harry's side before the professors could intervene.

“Harry. Harry, wake up,” Regulus hissed. Harry’s eyes shot open, and just for a split second, Regulus was sure he saw a flash of red. He shook his head hard, he had to be imagining it.

“Sirius,” Harry whispered.

“What’s going on?” one of the professors said.

“He needs to go to the Hospital Wing,” Regulus responded.

“I’ll take —”

“No, I’ve got it,” Regulus interrupted. “I’ve finished with my exam. You can collect it. Come on, Harry.” He grabbed Harry by the arm and all but dragged him out of the Great Hall. He had a sheen of sweat across his forehead. He looked like he might be sick in a moment.

“Voldemort’s got Sirius,” Harry said once they were in the relative privacy out of the Great Hall doors.

Regulus’s knees buckled, and he nearly fell to the floor, his world tilting on its axis as he tried to get a grip on what Harry had said.

“What?”

“I saw it. Just now. When I fell asleep in the exam,” Harry said, panting heavily.

“How? Where?” Regulus asked, the words coming out even though he wasn’t sure he was consciously speaking. Sirius. He had Sirius. How did he have Sirius?

“I dunno how,” Harry replied urgently. “But I know where. There’s a room in the Department of Mysteries full of shelves covered in these little glass balls, and they’re at the end of row ninety-seven. He’s trying to use Sirius to get whatever it is he wants from there. He’s torturing him. He says he’ll end up killing him.” Harry’s voice was shaking, his knees trembling beneath him.

“The Department of Mysteries,” Regulus repeated. Why would Sirius have left Grimmauld? That’s the only reason that he could have been taken. Unless... Unless they were betrayed somehow. But he just talked to him a few days ago. He had no plans...

“How are we going to get there?” Harry asked, leaning against the stone wall and sliding down to the floor, his knees finally giving out.

“Get there?” Regulus said.

“We have to get to the Department of Mysteries, so we can rescue Sirius!”

“There is no we,” Regulus snapped. “You’re going to stay here.”

Harry was back on his feet in a split second. “I care about Sirius too! I’m not just going to sit here while you —”

“Harry! Stop yelling. Just let me think for a moment!”

Harry’s face turned red like he was going to start screaming again, but he took a breath and clenched his teeth together. He was breathing heavily through his nose like a dragon about to spit fire.

“How did he get into the Ministry of Magic without anyone realizing?” Regulus pondered softly, trying to force his brain to work through the panic and adrenaline that was sweeping through his body.

“How do I know?” Harry yelled.

“It’s the middle of the day,” Regulus said sharply. “It’s not like the place would be empty. There is no way that he just arrived there.”

Harry’s face paled. “Do you think it’s an old memory?” he breathed. “Do you think Sirius is already dead?”

Regulus felt like he might pass out for a second before he managed to get a grip on himself. “Here is what we’re going to do. You’re going to go up to the dorm and get the mirror. See if you can get in contact with Sirius.”

Harry looked like he might start arguing, but Regulus went on speaking over whatever he might say.

“I’m going to talk to Snape. He might have heard something from the Order, and he might have another way to check if Sirius is safe. Meet me back here right after. Do not do anything else, got it?” Regulus said firmly. He was nearly yelling by the time he finished speaking, and Harry looked a little shocked by it before he shook himself and nodded in understanding.

Harry sprinted up the stairs while Regulus headed in the opposite direction, walking down toward the dungeons to Snape’s office. He could only hope he was in there. His legs were shaking terribly, and though he felt disconnected from his body, he could tell that his nerve pain was getting worse as the anxiety spread.

Not Sirius. He couldn’t have Sirius. There was no way. Regulus refused to accept it. Sirius coming face to face with the Dark Lord was one of the worst possible outcomes that Regulus could imagine. Second only to the Dark Lord torturing Harry to death. There was no way. It couldn’t be real. But the other visions that Harry had, weren’t they all real? No! He interrupted his own train of thought. It couldn’t be. He couldn’t have Sirius.

He rapped quickly on Snape’s office door and breathed a quiet sigh of relief when he heard a soft, “Enter,” from within. He opened the door, moving swiftly to shut it behind him.

“Harry’s had a vision,” Regulus said before Snape could speak. “Do you have a way to get in touch with anyone at Grimmauld Place?”

Snape gave him a bewildered look for a moment before he covered it, his face settling back into one of disinterest. “What kind of vision?”

“The kind that involved Sirius about to be tortured to death,” Regulus snapped. Snape raised his eyebrows.

“I can try sending a Patronus, that is typically how we share information.” He spoke like Regulus was an idiot, and Regulus had to grind his teeth together to keep himself from saying something awful.

Of course, Regulus thought a moment later once the anger passed. Why hadn’t he realized? He knew that the Order used Patronuses to communicate, but he had been so thoughtless. Snape pulled out his wand, softly saying the incantation. A doe jumped from his wand, leaping around the room once before coming to stand before him.

“Go to Sirius Black. Tell him I need to know where he is. His godson has had a vision of his imminent torture,” Snape said blandly, speaking as if he was placing an order at a restaurant.

Something tugged at Regulus’s memory. Did you know that she had a similar Patronus to me? Mine’s a stag, her’s was a doe. My mother said that meant we were soulmates. James’s voice carried through his thoughts as if he was speaking directly into his ear.

“Really? A doe?” Regulus asked unhappily once Snape’s Patronus disappeared through the wall.

Snape merely raised one eyebrow in question. Regulus wanted to snarl at him, he wanted to say something unforgivably cruel. Instead, his words came out sad and mournful.

“Because of Lily?” he asked. A look of pain flashed across Snape’s face so quickly that Regulus nearly missed it. It was quickly replaced with one of disdain and frustration.

“It’s not what you think,” Snape said.

“You weren’t in love with her?” Regulus said, his voice only slightly sarcastic as he crossed his arms.

Snape guffawed. Regulus didn’t think he’d ever heard the man make a noise like that before. “I wasn’t in love with her,” Snape said snidely.

“Your Patronuses just happen to match?” Regulus asked.

“Didn’t they teach you anything about them in Defense Against the Dark Arts?”

“No,” Regulus said simply. He knew that Snape was just being annoying with this question. Most of the professors they had when they were both at Hogwarts were incompetent at best, and Umbridge was completely incapable of providing instruction. “But I know they can match when people are in love.”

“That’s not love, it’s obsession,” Snape replied.

“So you were obsessed with Lily Potter? What a shock,” Regulus replied.

Snape rolled his eyes. “Try to pay attention. Patronuses can match if one person becomes obsessed with another, to the point where their identity is lost in the midst of their worship of someone else, but they can match for other reasons. Take Potter’s. Do you think his Patronus is a stag just because he was obsessed with his father?”

Regulus paused for a second. He had forgotten that nearly the entire population of Hogwarts had seen Harry’s Patronus during the last Quidditch game of their third year. Snape didn’t know that it had changed, though Regulus doubted that almost anyone knew that outside of himself and the members of the DA.

“No, that would be ridiculous,” Regulus conceded.

“Exactly. He has his father’s Patronus because of the loss he endured. If I had to guess, I would think that he would grow out of that eventually. It probably will not be a stag his entire life. As he gets older, it will more than likely change.”

Regulus pondered that for a minute. He didn’t know much about Patronuses given that he hadn’t been able to cast one during his first life, but it made sense.

“So yours wasn’t always a doe?” Regulus asked.

Snape shook his head, looking away to stare at something Regulus couldn’t see. “No, it changed after Lily died.”

Regulus hummed. “So you weren’t in love with her?” It was probably a low blow, but the more time he spent as a Gryffindor, the less self-control he seemed to have.

“No,” Snape said simply. “We grew up together. She was like a sister to me.” Right after he spoke, the doe came back through the wall, walking in a small circle and stopping to stare right at Snape.

“What does that mean?” Regulus asked after a beat of silence.

“It wasn’t able to reach him,” Snape said.

“Why not?” Regulus said anxiously.

Snape shrugged. “He could be dead.” His eyes glittered dangerously, and Regulus was a second away from whipping out his wand. “Or Grimmauld could be unreachable by Patronus. It does have decades of wards on it. It’s possible. I never got around to asking Dumbledore, and I’ve never needed to send one there before.”

Regulus weighed his options. Sirius could already be dead. He shot that thought out of his head as fast as he could, not able to bear thinking about it. The wards at Grimmauld were complicated and dense, it was possible that Patronuses couldn’t get through.

“Do you have another way to contact them? The floo maybe?”

“Umbridge has restricted all floo access in the castle except for the one in her office,” Snape said, his voice sounding slightly bored. “I can send an owl.”

Regulus restrained himself from growling like an animal, turning and leaving the office. “Do that then!” he shouted. He would have to figure it out on his own.

He stalked back to the Great Hall where Harry was already pacing. “Were you able to contact him?” Harry shouted. Students were just beginning to leave the Hall, the exam period was finally over, and a few of them gave him odd looks as they passed.

“No,” Regulus said, shaking his head. “Were you?”

Harry’s face was full of terror, and it was all the answer Regulus needed. “He didn’t answer the mirror. We have to go. We have to go now!”

“What’s going on?” Hermione said, walking up to them, a worried look on her face. Ron was close behind, looking vaguely ill though Regulus wasn’t sure why. He wouldn’t make eye contact with any of them.

Harry stumbled over his words as he explained what he saw. Hermione presented the same question that Regulus had: how had the Dark Lord managed to get into the Ministry without anyone noticing? At least Ron was able to come up with another viable idea.

“If Umbridge has the only working floo, then we could break into her office and use it to contact the Order headquarters. Maybe Sirius just didn’t hear you calling for him,” Ron said.

Harry didn’t look happy about it, but Regulus agreed. They had to make sure that this wasn’t a trick before they went barreling into a trap set by the Dark Lord himself. Not to mention that Regulus still needed to figure out a way to keep Harry at Hogwarts so that he could go on his own.

The plan they came up with was simple. They needed a way to draw Umbridge’s attention away. Ron volunteered immediately. “See if Theo will help you,” Regulus said.

“Theo?” Ron asked incredulously.

“He was close with Fred and George, they might have left him something that can help cause a diversion.” Regulus wasn’t sure what made him say it — if it was the memories of Theo blowing up a new cauldron once a month since first year or the way Fred and George seemed to pull him away from DA lessons — but he ended up being right. Theo had a trunk full of terrible objects that he had helped Fred and George design.

They wrangled in Neville, Luna, and Ginny to help watch the door and the corridor around Umbridge’s classroom. Lavender and Parvati could tell they were up to something and insisted on being included. Regulus, too stressed about Sirius’s safety, wasn’t about to refuse them, so he sent them off with Ron and Theo to cause a diversion. He had to admit it, these kids worked quickly. Within half an hour, Umbridge was running off toward another part of the castle, and Harry, Regulus, and Hermione were inside her terribly decorated office.

“Watch the door,” Regulus said as he walked over to the fireplace, gathering a handful of Umbridge’s floo powder and tossing it into the fireplace. He stuck his head in the fire, the Grimmauld sitting room coming into view instantly. “Sirius. Sirius!”

There was no answer, nothing but eerie silence haunting the room. He swallowed down the bile that threatened to come up his throat. It was at that moment that he realized how stupid he was being. The simplest answer was right in front of him the entire time, why didn't he think of it?

"Kreacher!" he called. Kreacher appeared before him with a loud pop, standing in the center of the sitting room with a look of subdued surprise on his face.

"Yes, Master Regulus?" Kreacher asked. There was something odd happening with his voice that Regulus couldn't quite understand.

"Kreacher, where is Sirius?"

Kreacher paused for a second. "The dirty blood traitor is not here, Master Regulus."

"Not — not there? Where is he?"

Kreacher didn't answer, instead giving Regulus a silent look that Regulus didn't comprehend. He had made it a point to avoid commanding Kreacher whenever he could avoid it. Even in his first life when he knew nothing about all the terrible things Hermione rambled on about, he knew that forcing a house elf to do your bidding was demeaning. He never liked to do it, he always tried to treat Kreacher with respect. However, he'd never actually had Kreacher not answer him before. Something was wrong, and Regulus felt like he had no choice.

"Kreacher, tell me the truth," he commanded. "Where is Sirius?"

Kreacher paused for another second before speaking. "The blood traitor is on the roof."

"Of Grimmauld?"

"Yes," Kreacher answered unhappily.

"Why didn't he answer the mirror?"

"The blood traitor did not hear the calls coming from the mirror."

"What? Why didn't you tell him then?"

Kreacher just stared at him and something clicked in Regulus's head. Kreacher had done this on purpose. He had made sure that Sirius didn't hear the mirror on purpose. But why? He didn't get a chance to ask, because a second after he had this realization, a hand clenched in the back of his shirt and ripped him out of the fireplace. He turned to see the ugly, smug face of Dolores Umbridge staring down at him.

“Take his wand!” Umbridge barked. He heard shuffling in the room and felt someone slip his wand out of his cloak pocket. Umbridge grabbed Regulus by the hair, yanking on his strands hard to pull him to his feet. He let out a grunt of pain but swallowed the shout that threatened to follow. He didn't want her to know the pain she was causing him.

“I want to know why you are in my office,” she hissed, shaking her fist that was clutching his hair, he felt like she was ripping his hair out of his scalp and wondered distantly if he would end up with a bald spot because of her rough treatment.

“Let me go,” Regulus responded, scowling angrily.

“You had your head in my fire. With whom have you been communicating?” she said, tightening her hand even further.

Regulus remained silent, clenching his teeth together. No answer would be satisfactory to this woman, he could already tell. She threw him away from her, and he slammed into the desk. She was stronger than she looked, he thought. His hip hit the corner of the desk in the worst possible way causing his leg to buckle, and he fell to the ground harshly.

“Stop it!” Harry bellowed. Regulus looked over to see him being restrained by Draco who was easily overpowering him. He was taller than Harry, having grown significantly over the past year. Hermione was pressed up against the wall by Millicent Bulstrode.

There was a loud noise from right outside before the door swung open. Suddenly the room was very full. Ron, Ginny, Luna, Neville, Lavender, and Parvati were all forced inside by Crabbe, Goyle, and two older Slytherins, as well as Theo and Daphne. The latter two both looked equally panicked. Regulus had told them to go ahead and join Umbridge's squad so they could avoid suspicion from their housemates, and clearly, they were worried about the position they were now in.

“So, Black,” Umbridge said. “You stationed lookouts around my office, and you sent this buffoon to tell me —”

“I have no idea what you're talking about,” Regulus drawled, ignoring the way Ron huffed in offense at the word she used to describe him.

Umbridge's face turned a horrible shade of pink. "Who were you speaking to?" she growled.

"Wouldn't you like to know?" he sneered. Her face tightened frighteningly.

"Very well," she said in that sickly sweet voice she always used when she was about to physically hurt him. "Very well, Mr. Black. I offered you the chance to tell me freely. You refused. I have no alternative. Warrington, fetch Professor Snape."

Cassius Warrington was one of the seventh-year Slytherins in the room. Regulus barely knew anything about him, yet he threw a triumphant smirk at Regulus before leaving. Umbridge grabbed Regulus by the front of the shirt, dragging him to his feet and pushing him into the chair across from her desk. It was better than being on the floor, was all he thought.

After that, the silence in the room was thick. No one said a thing, all of them standing in a tense battle of wills. Umbridge was going to do something to him, he was sure of that, but at least Sirius was safe. Sirius was at home, distracted, but alive and not in the hands of the Dark Lord.

"You wanted to see me, Headmistress?" Snape said in that dull, empty voice he had perfected over the years.

She was requesting a bottle of Veritaserum, but Regulus wasn't listening. Snape was giving him a look that he was sure no one else in the room could interpret. He was asking for an update, even with the blasé way he acted earlier. Regulus gave the smallest shake of his head, hoping Snape would understand.

"A month?" Umbridge was yelling when Regulus tuned back into the conversation. "I have just found Black using my fire to communicate with a person or persons unknown!"

"Really? Well, it doesn't surprise me. Black has never shown much inclination to follow school rules."

Umbridge continued to argue with him, even putting him on probation when he refused to summon a bottle of Veritaserum out of thin air. Regulus would have felt a bit embarrassed for her if the situation wasn't so dire. He was probably about to be expelled, along with all the other teenagers that he'd roped into helping him.

"Very well," she said, her voice unsteady now, the sickly sweet tone gone now that Snape had left the room without helping her. "Very well... I am left with no alternative... This is an issue of Ministry security." She seemed to be talking to herself, her wand out and pointing right at Regulus who was staring her down as boldly as he could manage.

She shifted her weight from foot to foot, almost nervous with the way she was moving. It reminded Regulus a bit of how Peter Pettigrew moved during their one confrontation in the Shrieking Shack. She beat her wand against her hand and started breathing heavily. Regulus felt goosebumps spread across his skin.

"You are forcing me, Black... I do not want to, but sometimes circumstances justify the use... I am sure the Minister will understand that I had no choice..."

Regulus wanted to ask what she was rambling on about, but he was too nervous to speak. He was pretty sure his shaky voice would ruin the unaffected air he was trying to present. He didn't like the way she seemed to be ramping up for something.

"The Cruciatus Curse ought to loosen your tongue," she whispered.

"NO!" Harry shouted.

"No!" Hermione shrieked at the same time. "Professor Umbridge, it's illegal!"

Umbridge wasn't listening though, her face was spreading into something hungry. This wasn't the first time she would be casting dark magic. He was sure of it. He could practically smell it on her at that moment. She raised her wand even further, holding it like a knife pointed right between his eyes. His muscles tensed.

"The Minister wouldn't want you to break the law, Professor Umbridge!" Hermione cried. Harry was fighting roughly against Draco who looked openly worried by that point. He was holding Harry tightly though, keeping him from intervening.

"What Cornelius doesn't know won't hurt him," Umbridge replied. "He never knew I ordered dementors after Potter last summer, but he was delighted to be given the chance to expel him all the same..."

"You what?" Regulus snarled, lunging forward.

"Somebody had to act," Umbridge responded, pressing her wand into his forehead. She started rambling instantly about how she was the only one who had the gall to act when the rest of them were just complaining about Harry and his lies. Regulus didn't need to hear anymore.

She took a deep breath and Regulus prepared for the pain that he had become so familiar with. "Cruc —"

"NO!" Hermione shouted. "Regulus, we have to tell her."

Umbridge turned toward her so swiftly that her neck made an awful popping noise. Regulus looked at her incredulously. Tell her what? He tried to ask with just his eyes.

"Little Miss Question-All is going to give us some answers! Come on then, girl, come on!"

The others tried to interrupt her and even Regulus was trying to get her to stop talking. She couldn't tell Umbridge about Sirius, he wouldn't let him be put in even more danger. If Umbridge found out then she couldn't be allowed to leave this room again. Not with that knowledge. Regulus wasn't going to feel good about killing the woman in front of a crowd this big.

"We were trying to speak to Dumbledore," Hermione said, the words tumbling out. She was looking at Regulus as she said it, and he felt his body relax slightly. Of course, she wouldn't tell Umbridge about Sirius.

“Dumbledore? You know where Dumbledore is, then?”

“No, but —”

The two of them went back and forth, but Regulus was more focused on what Hermione was trying to do. It felt obvious to him that she was trying to trick Umbridge, but he just didn't understand how.

“We wanted to tell him that it's r-ready!” Hermione said, real tears in her eyes like she was betraying someone.

“What's ready, girl?” Umbridge replied, her entire body tensed like she was going to pounce at any second.

“The... the weapon.” Perhaps it was because he had spent so much time with Hermione, but he felt like he could hear the fake gravity with which she spoke. It was like she was performing on a stage rather than confessing a crime to a dangerous and unhinged Ministry employee.

That's what made it click for him. Fudge thought that Dumbledore was building an army. The DA, in a lot of ways, could have been the actualization of that exact worry for Fudge and Umbridge. If they had been discovered, it could have been proof of what they thought Dumbledore was trying to do. But that wasn't the only thing Umbridge suspected.

He thought about the night before when they were supposed to be taking their Astronomy O.W.L. Why would Umbridge want Hagrid in Auror custody rather than just off of Hogwarts grounds? Because she thought he was involved in Dumbledore's plan to build an army. He was though, wasn't he? Not intentionally, but he'd brought back a giant with him when he went to parlay with them. The weapon, as Hermione so graciously put it.

“I'll take you to it,” Regulus said. Umbridge gave him a searching look for a second then grinned.

“All right, let's make it just you and me... and we'll take Potter too, shall we?”

“No,” Regulus said.

“Professor. I think some of the squad should come with you to look after —”

“I am a fully qualified Ministry official,” Umbridge responded, turning to glance at Draco. She cut off abruptly as she looked back at Regulus again. She watched him warily for a moment. He understood why. He wasn't like the other students, or even like Harry, a simple liar if Fudge was to be believed. Regulus was an accused murderer. A Death Eater had died in his presence. “Very well, Malfoy. You and I will go with Black to see the weapon.”

“No,” Harry said. He tried to say something else but was interrupted by the Stunning Spell Umbridge flung at him. Regulus consciously didn't flinch, but a slither of anger zipped up his spine. He swallowed it down. He had to hold it together, at least for now.

The others were left in the care of the other Inquisitorial Squad members. Hermione and Ron watched him unsteadily, but he trusted that they wouldn't be harmed with Umbridge out of the room. He would revive Harry when they got back and tell him that Sirius was safe.

Regulus led the way in front of the two of them. They passed through the entrance hall where the loud sounds of students having dinner in the Great Hall echoed. He felt so disconnected from them, so otherworldly. Already his thoughts were drifting away from his life as a Hogwarts student.

"It's hidden in Hagrid's hut, is it?" Umbridge asked excitedly once they made it outside, but Regulus only smirked, looking over his shoulder to shake his head at her. "Then where is it?"

"In the Forbidden Forest. Where else?" Regulus said. Not stopping for a second to hear her response, stomping directly into the forest. He didn't know where Grawp was exactly, not that it mattered. He wasn't taking Umbridge there.

"Is it very far in?" Umbridge asked.

"It would have to be to be hidden from you," Draco responded, his voice shaking slightly. Regulus knew he was afraid of the forest, had been since first year, but he was clearly trying very hard to hold it in.

Regulus walked swiftly, ignoring the way pain shot down his back and legs, listening as Umbridge stumbled behind him, taking a few jogging steps now and then to try and keep up with his long strides. He must have walked for a full twenty minutes before he paused, slowing to a stroll and then stopping completely.

"Well?" Umbridge demanded as he slowly turned to look at her. Draco was behind her, watching Regulus with an expression of curiosity. Regulus stared her down. She was pointing her wand at him. Her wand posed a danger, but he was sure he could be faster. He would have to be faster.

There were sounds distantly in the forest of other creatures and threats, but he couldn't make them out clearly. They were muffled by the thick trees and the way his thoughts began to swirl like an unending storm. He tilted his head slightly, thinking about the scar etched into the back of his hand. I will make the right choices. What words would have been carved into Harry's hand had she gotten her claws into him?

He thought about the dementors. Did she know he could cast a Patronus? Or was she prepared to kill him? Did she want him soulless before the school year even began? The thought made rage overtake the last few logical thoughts he had stuck in his head. They faded away into a place he couldn't access.

"Where is it?" Umbridge screeched. Draco jumped at the noise, but Regulus didn't even react.

He stared down the woman who had worked so hard to hurt Harry, one of the only people in the world that Regulus would kill or die for. He had decided long ago that he would not let her get away with it, though he had originally been planning to let the Defense Against the Dark Arts position curse take care of her.

Now he realized that this time the curse would play out through him. He thought of Ron's repeated dream. I keep having dreams about Umbridge in the forest with a giant beast. Does it kill her? Sometimes it does. Sometimes she kills it. Only one of them, either he or Umbridge, was leaving the forest alive, and he had no plans to die that day.

She already thought he was a murderer. He may as well prove her right.

"You tricked me, didn't you?" Umbridge hissed.

"I did," Regulus responded simply. A second later he was sinking into his animagus form. She hit him with a spell, but it did very little on the bear's body that overtook his own.

He was only a few short strides away, and before Umbridge could mouth another spell, a large paw was swiping at her. His nails scratched along her arm, half removing her hand from the end. She let out a truly terrorized scream, a noise that did nothing but spur him on. It was music to his ears, a delicate noise that healed something inside him.

She barely had a moment to turn to run before he was on her. He pushed her to the ground with one large paw between her shoulders, his nails digging through her pink robes and into her flesh. The smell of blood filled his nostrils.

He was vaguely aware of Draco near them. Regulus expected him to run, but instead, Draco backed up into a tree and slid heavily to the ground, watching with wide, terror-filled eyes.

Regulus dug his teeth into her neck, and with no preamble, crunched the delicate bones beneath his powerful jaw. Her screaming broke off abruptly, leaving only a hollow silence behind. A sick sense of satisfaction blanketed his sharp and painful feelings.

Blood spilled from the gashes in her skin, the smell thick in his nostrils. He nosed at it gently, his thoughts locked so deeply within him that he felt nothing but hunger roll in his stomach. He hadn't eaten much lunch that day.

"Regulus!" Draco hissed. Regulus looked over at him. He was still next to the tree, but he looked weird. His eyes seemed to glow in the shadows like torches were shining out of them, and his face had taken on an unnaturally sharp quality. In addition to that, he was giving off the most particular smell. He couldn't understand it, but it was almost sickly sweet like poison mixed into jam.

Regulus shook his head hard. He had to work to feel himself again. He paced in a circle, moving away from the body to clear his nostrils, and when he finally felt clear-headed, he transformed back into himself.

"You killed her," Draco whispered, his voice sounding odd and metallic. Regulus nodded.

"Yes," Regulus said flatly. Draco stared up at him from his place on the forest floor. He still looked off, inhuman, but his features were settling as the minutes passed.

He glanced back at Umbridge's corpse. He couldn't let anyone come looking for her, but he needed to get back to Harry and the others. Without speaking, he used magic to dig into the ground, brushing her mauled body into the hole and covering it with dirt, before he turned back to Draco.

"I'm not going to hurt you," he said to Draco, trying to speak gently.

"You killed her," Draco repeated. Regulus realized that he couldn't leave Draco like this. He would never be the same, he would walk out of the woods a changed man, and Regulus would be caught within an hour. He raised his wand, and Draco hissed loudly. The hairs raised on the back of Regulus's neck, but he tried not to let it affect him too much, focusing more on the spell he needed to cast.

"Obliviate," he whispered, carefully removing his memories of Umbridge's death, replacing them subtly with the fearful thoughts of what the creatures of the forest might do to him. He also removed any memories of his animagus form. That wasn't a secret he wanted to get out.

Now if anyone asked, he would think that Umbridge left them in the forest to go looking for the weapon Regulus mentioned, leaving them right inside the trees. They'd barely taken two steps into the forest before she was gone. It was a dangerous place. Anything could have happened to her here.

"Come on," he said, holding out a hand to help Draco up. Draco took it in a daze. He didn't drop it when they stood, instead holding it tightly as Regulus led them out of the forest. It reminded Regulus of a small child still terrified of what was hidden in the dark. He didn't remember what he needed to be afraid of, unaware that Regulus was the real danger here.

It wasn't until they were halfway up to the castle that Draco dropped his hand. Regulus looked at him out of the corner of his eye and could see the faint look of embarrassment on his face.

"I can't believe you tricked her like that," Draco said faintly. "Do you think she'll find her way back out?"

"I have no idea," Regulus responded. "I'm sure she will though. She's an adult, she can take care of herself."

Draco nodded in acceptance. "What were you doing in her office anyway?"

"Trying to talk to Sirius. I needed to check in with him and could only do it through the floo."

"You should have told me," Draco said petulantly. "I could have helped you."

"Why would you help me talk to Sirius?" Regulus asked. Draco shrugged but didn't answer. The look of embarrassment was back on his face.

They walked in silence the rest of the way to Umbridge's office, but when they approached they saw Theo talking softly to Lavender and Parvati.

“You’re back,” Theo said blandly.

“What’s happening? Why are you out here?” Regulus asked.

“What is he doing with you?” Lavender asked snidely, glaring at Draco.

“He helped me trick Umbridge,” Regulus said. Draco gasped, sounding vaguely offended, but didn’t argue. “Where are the others?”

“They left,” Parvati said.

Regulus froze. “They what?”

“We managed to trick the others into eating some of the Puking Pastilles that the twins left behind,” Theo said. “Then Hermione revived Harry and the rest of them left through the floo.”

“Where did they go?” Draco asked, his voice taking on that odd metallic quality again. Lavender and Parvati shared a look, but Theo just gave Draco an appraising look.

“Harry said they had to get to the Ministry. He wanted us to tell you, we were about to go looking for you,” Lavender said faintly.

Regulus’s heart pounded in his chest, the sound echoing loudly in his ears. The Ministry, he thought distantly. Harry didn’t know, he didn’t have time to tell Harry that Sirius was safe. He went to the Ministry. He took the others. Ron, Hermione, Neville, Luna, Ginny. All of them had just walked into a Death Eater trap. Right into the Dark Lord’s hands.

Chapter End Notes

back in july, i made a post on my tumblr saying that two characters who didn't die in canon would be murdered in cold blood in this fic. anyway, here was one of them :)

“Go get Snape now,” Regulus said to Draco, but Theo, Lavender, and Parvati were listening closely like they were about to jump into action.

“Snape?” Theo asked.

“Tell him that Harry and the others have gone to the Department of Mysteries. Tell him to get the Order and meet me there.”

“What’s happening? Why did they go to the Ministry?” Draco interrupted to ask.

“It’s complicated, but Harry just walked into a trap set by Death Eaters. They are all in danger.” Regulus spoke quickly, his heart racing in his chest.

“What are you going to do?” Draco asked.

“I’m going to follow them,” he said, rushing past into Umbridge’s office. It was deadly silent, even the fire having gone out after the others traveled to the Ministry. He couldn’t believe this. Harry had gone through without talking to him. He had put all of his friends in danger because he couldn’t wait for Regulus to get back.

He was so mad that he started pulling at the ends of his hair with one hand, grabbing floo powder with the other to toss into the fireplace. He jumped in, shouting, “The Ministry,” before disappearing from the office.

The swirling travel of the floo was a perfect representation of how he felt at that moment. He had just killed a woman. Not even provoked, she was just pointing a wand at him, and he mauled her to death. He snapped her neck without a second thought. Worse than that, he almost let his animal instincts take over. He was disgusted with himself. Ashamed. But not guilty, he realized. He knew Umbridge had to go. He wouldn’t feel bad about that.

He arrived at the empty entrance hall of the Ministry. It was late enough in the day now that most employees would already be home. How long had he been in the forest? It couldn’t have been more than an hour. He hadn’t even thought to check.

He thought about calling Kreacher, telling him what was going on, but decided against it. For one, he didn’t want Sirius in harm’s way, and there was no way that he wouldn’t come along if Kreacher was informed. He could only hope that Snape and the other Order members could convince him to stay back. It wouldn’t do to have a wanted criminal storm the Ministry.

More than that though, he couldn’t get the feeling of betrayal out of his bloodstream when thinking about Kreacher. Why had he lied to him? He’d never done that before. Kreacher had been his most trusted friend at the end of his first life and the beginning of his second. Why would he do this to him?

He thought about the push for house elf freedom that Hermione was always talking about. Was that why? Had he been mistreating Kreacher this entire time? Careless to his own actions and the way they affect others? The guilt that was missing from Umbridge's murder now reared its ugly head thinking about Kreacher being hurt for something he had done.

Although, Kreacher had always hated Sirius. It was possible that this wasn't aimed at Regulus at all, but surely he knew that Sirius was important. After Sirius left home, Regulus cried every night for the rest of the summer. He had sent Sirius away, sparing him from the end of their mother's wand, but Sirius had abandoned him long before that and that night was just the final nail in the coffin. Now he had Sirius back against all odds, it wasn't perfect, and there was distance there that felt insurmountable, but surely Kreacher knew how much Regulus cared about Sirius. Didn't he?

He was halfway to the main atrium when the floo flared up behind him. He turned just in time to see Draco stumble out.

"What do you think you're doing?" Regulus asked, turning fully to look at him. Draco brushed the ash off his clothes.

"I'm coming with you," Draco said.

"No, you're not," Regulus responded. "You're supposed to be getting Snape!"

"Theo is going to get him, don't worry."

"Draco, you can't be here. Didn't you hear what I said? This isn't just the Ministry. Harry was lured here by the Dark Lord himself. It's going to be crawling with Death Eaters."

"I know," Draco said.

"Clearly, you don't," Regulus said frustratedly. "Your father is likely here, Draco. Do you not understand that?"

Draco swallowed harshly, his face growing pale. "I'm not leaving you here. I'm coming to help you."

Regulus growled in frustration. "Why are you doing this? Don't you think I have enough to deal with given all the other teenagers here I need to rescue?"

"Exactly! I can help you do that," Draco argued impatiently, and wasn't that funny, that Draco should be the one feeling impatient by this conversation.

"And when everyone sees you helping me? When Harry sees it?"

"I'll stay out of sight," Draco offered. Regulus had never hit a child, but he was heavily considering throwing a punch right at that moment.

“Draco, if the Death Eaters discover you helping Harry Potter, it will not end well for you. Or your parents.”

Draco gave him a panicked look but then shook his head. “We’re wasting time.” He walked past him quickly, nearly sprinting toward the lifts, and Regulus had no choice but to follow.

No security person was waiting to check their wands. An ominous sign that confirmed what Regulus already knew. This was a trap, and he was walking right into it. A lift arrived immediately, all of them out of use now that the Ministry was empty. “Where are we going?”

“The Department of Mysteries,” Regulus whispered as they entered. He wasn’t sure why, but he felt like he had to stay quiet now as if they were being listened to by someone they couldn’t see. He pressed the button for level nine. He’d never been to the Department of Mysteries himself, but he knew where it was.

“Why are they in the Department of Mysteries?” Draco whispered.

“I don’t know,” Regulus said. “Just stay close to me.”

The lift arrived at the floor with a pleasant female voice announcing, “Department of Mysteries.” It took Regulus a second to start moving, his muscles cramping up with fear. The Dark Lord could be here already. He could already have Harry. Regulus didn’t know if he was ready to face him again, but he had no choice.

They walked the long corridor that led to the Department of Mysteries door. It felt too easy walking right in. There should have been someone there to stop them, even if it was an enemy, someone should have been there. They walked through the door and ended up in a large circular room with about a dozen doors. The walls, floor, and ceiling were all pitch black, the only light a few lanterns between the doors.

The door slammed behind them as they took in the room. There were two doors with large red X’s etched in them.

“Do you think they went through them?” Draco whispered.

“I don’t know,” Regulus said honestly. “Maybe they decided those doors weren’t any good. No one knows what’s inside the Department of Mysteries. There could be any number of dangers behind those doors.”

“What do we do then?”

“Just let me think for a second.” The two doors were next to each other, so there was always the option that they tried the next one in the row, and that had been the correct door, that could be why they didn’t mark it. That narrowed it down to two possible options, one door on either side.

Before he could get too turned around, he shifted and used a spell to etch the letter E in the door they came through, in case they needed to make a quick getaway. The moment the spell was out of his wand, another random door slid open slowly. He looked at Draco who was already watching him, his eyebrows raised in trepidation.

He walked through the doorway slowly, but inside it was just a moderately sized office. It was another circular room with a singular desk in the center. There was next to nothing else in the office though, only a handful of books on the desk. There were no decorations on the walls and no other furniture beyond a very old and worn chair behind the desk.

Draco walked slowly to the desk, picking up one of the books carefully before dropping it with a loud clatter. He was staring at it like it burned him.

“Don’t touch anything,” Regulus said. “They’re not in here, I think we should try another door.”

“What do you think this does?” Draco replied.

“Draco, don’t!” Regulus yelled, but Draco was already touching whatever he had found on the desk. “What did I just say?!” Instantly the walls began to shift. Regulus raised his wand, but no attack came. Instead, the doors faded and then disappeared entirely. They were now surrounded by what looked like the depths of the Forbidden Forest.

“What is this place?” Draco breathed.

“I don’t know, but I don’t think we should be in here.”

Suddenly, something moved between the dense, dark trees. Regulus shot off a spell without thinking, but it hit an invisible wall and dissipated instantly. They weren’t really in the forest, it was some kind of illusion, almost like it was a large window. Although, Regulus was pretty sure that if he walked forward, he could pass right through it and stumble into the indoor forest.

“My father has a desk just like this,” Draco mumbled. Regulus looked over at him just in time to watch him touch yet another part of the desk.

“Stop doing that!” Regulus yelled. He realized a second after Draco pulled his hand away that Orion also had a desk similar to it. He remembered when he was very little he used to sneak into his father’s study when he wasn’t home, just for the pure childish instinct to explore.

Once he and Sirius snuck in when Sirius told him about a Chimera skull that their father supposedly kept on the top ledge of his bookshelf.

“No, he doesn’t. You’re making that up,” Regulus said snidely.

“Wanna bet?” Sirius responded, crossing his arms confidently.

Regulus eyed him carefully. “Prove it.”

“Come on then,” Sirius said triumphantly. Once they were in the empty office, Sirius pointed to something at the highest point in the room. Regulus couldn’t tell what it was from his place on the ground. “Still don’t believe me?”

“It just looks like a statue,” Regulus said uncertainly. Sirius huffed and started climbing up the bookshelf like it was a ladder. “Sirius,” Regulus hissed. “Get down!”

“I’ve almost got it,” Sirius responded.

“Sirius!” Regulus said again. Their father was supposed to be at the Ministry all day, but he must have forgotten something because a second later he opened his study door. Regulus looked over with a gasp.

“What do you think you’re doing?” Orion bellowed. Sirius jolted in surprise and lost his grip on the bookshelf, falling heavily to the desk below. He had something in his hand when he fell, a glass figurine, and it slipped out of his grip, making a large notch in the wood of the desk, before it fell to the floor and shattered.

He and Sirius were both punished for that mishap and then lectured for hours about the importance of Orion’s desk. It had been in the family for decades and would outstay both of them. It was the kind of object made exclusively for the Noble and Most Ancient House of Black. The woodworker only created a handful, all of them gifted to members of the Black family. It just looked like a desk to young Regulus, but now as he thought back to it, it was rather unique.

It was made of a deep dark wood that seemed to swallow light. The legs were carved to look like human bones intertwined with the tentacles of a squid. It used to freak him out when he was a kid. Looking at the identical one in the Department office felt uncanny and unreal. No one knew who worked in the Department of Mysteries. You could be talking to Unspeakable and never realize it. So a member of his family might have ended up here, but it seemed odd to him.

“Woah,” Draco said, pulling Regulus from his memories. As he watched, the thick wooden desk shifted, and after a second, began to split down the middle.

“What did you do?” Regulus whispered frantically.

“On my father’s desk, there’s a way to reveal a secret compartment by turning a few of the knobs. I was just curious.” The split desk ends began to move apart.

“How does Lucius have one of the desks?” Regulus asked, watching the desk uneasily.

“It was a wedding gift,” Draco said.

Once the two sides of the desk stopped moving, the floor beneath them vanished and a small circular staircase appeared on the floor leading to the level below. Dull lights lit the way, but it was impossible to see where the staircase ended from their viewpoint in the office.

“What do you suppose is down there?” Draco asked.

“I don’t think we should find out,” Regulus responded.

“You’re not curious? Why did the door open when you used magic? I don’t think it’s a coincidence.”

“And if it’s a trap?”

“Isn’t it all a trap?” Draco said faintly. Regulus was going to argue with him or maybe drag him out of the room, but Draco was quick, quicker than Regulus no doubt, and before he could respond, Draco was heading swiftly down the stairs into the unknown. Regulus had no choice but to follow him.

It took less than a minute to reach the bottom, the floor below must have been shielded with a spell to keep it from being visible, but it wasn’t actually that deep. It looked like another office, nearly identical to the one above them except this one had a standard desk. It was also filled to the brim with books and jars full of odd liquids and animal body parts.

“What are they studying down here?” Regulus asked, speaking more to himself than anything.

Draco answered him anyway. “Magical creatures.” Regulus gave him a questioning look, but Draco had his back to him and did not elaborate.

There was one door in the room in the exact place the door was in the original office. However, when Regulus walked toward it, it vanished into thin air. In its place was a wide archway that led into a dimly lit corridor. He poked his head in, confused by what he was seeing. The corridor went on for farther than he could see in the shadows, but every few feet on either side of the hallway there were large alcoves carved into the walls. He was trying to figure out why they looked strange to him when a loud banging drew his attention.

In the alcove closest to him was an old man dressed in a gray shirt and trousers. He was banging against nothing, but every time his palms reached a certain point they would flatten against something. It was another one of the sudo-windows like in the office above, Regulus realized. But what was this man doing here? He couldn’t see into the other alcoves from where he stood, as they were carved too deeply into the walls, but he wondered if there were other people in each of them.

In the alcove with the man that Regulus could see there was a pile of blankets on the floor, and in the darkest corner, there was a toilet low to the ground. It was a prison cell, Regulus realized. Why did the Department of Mysteries have its own prison?

“Regulus, come look at this!” Draco shouted. The old man tried to yell something at him, but Regulus couldn’t make out what he was saying. It didn’t matter though. Regulus couldn’t help him. Not right now anyway.

He gave him what he hoped was an apologetic look and turned back to see Draco gesturing toward something on the wall. It looked like a piece of art, but as he looked closer, he realized it was a bird’s eye view of a building.

“Look!” Draco said impatiently, pointing to something moving swiftly down the piece of artwork. Regulus gasped.

“Harry,” he said. He realized then what it was. It was a model of the Department of Mysteries. He couldn’t see the room they were in, but he could see the empty office above them. Surrounding it was a semicircle of pitch darkness, what was no doubt the forest they had seen earlier. There were long corridors shooting off from the circular room that they first entered through. At the very top, there was a huge room with long isles, many of them actively crashing into each other as they watched. On the far left was a black chamber with rock seating all facing an empty arch.

As he watched, a tiny Harry, Hermione, and Neville ran down a hallway away from the room full of crashing objects toward the circular room as a group of masked figures chased them. A few masked figures littered the parallel hallways. On the other side, he could see Ron, Ginny, and Luna in another room with what looked like small replicas of planets. They were also being chased by two more masked figures, all of them being led to the circular entry room.

“Come on!” Regulus shouted. They both barreled up the staircase, Regulus’s legs aching beneath him. The walls of the office above had reset while they were gone, blocking the indoor forest from view. He rushed through the door, but the others weren’t there. One of the doors with the red X on it was open and three Death Eaters were in the process of running through it. They must have been chasing the others.

Two of the Death Eaters made it through, but the last one turned just in time to see them. Draco and Regulus both let out shouts of surprise. It wasn’t just any Death Eater. Beneath the dark hood that hid his bright blonde hair was Draco’s father looking dumbfounded.

The look of horriification on Lucius Malfoy’s face faded quickly into a rage as he pointed his wand at them. The door behind him slammed shut, leaving the three of them alone.

“Draco, what are you doing here?” he hissed angrily. Draco was a statue next to him, frozen in place now that he was face to face with his Death Eater father.

It didn’t escape Regulus’s notice that Harry and the others were now being chased into a room with an entire hoard of Death Eaters. Regulus didn’t have time to listen to Draco and Lucius have it out. He had to get to Harry and get the rest of them out of here.

“Stupefy.” Regulus hoped to take him by surprise, but Lucius wouldn’t be easily beaten. He threw back three non-verbal spells in quick succession. Draco was shouting in surprise, suddenly throwing up a shield between them. Regulus turned and impulsively ran through one of the unmarked doors, the one right next to the exit.

He should have looked at the model of the Department a little closer when he had the chance. He could tell from a quick glance that all the rooms were connected, but he couldn’t remember how exactly. The room he entered was oddly decorated with deep red and pink wallpaper. It reminded him a bit of Umbridge’s office, but much darker. There was a desk on one wall, though it was too tall to sit at.

On the other side was a nook bed built right into the wall. The bedding looked almost Victorian, for what reason, he had no idea. He sprinted through an archway next to it and into a room that looked like the prefect’s bathroom at Hogwarts. It was a moderately long room with a huge bathtub in the center built into the floor. In the tub was a pink potion that had thick tufts of steam lifting off of it.

“Incarcerous,” he heard Lucius yell behind him, and he ducked to the side instinctively, running around the large tub to make it to a door that sat on the far side of the room.

He was breathing heavily as he ran, inhaling an intoxicatingly seductive scent. He wasn’t sure how to explain it, almost like freshly cut wood mixed with the sharp smell of a campfire. There was something else beneath it, a musk that brought something embarrassingly pleasant to his thoughts. He sprinted through the door and out of the room before it could drown him.

The next room was brightly lit, but almost completely empty. Despite the large area with its high ceilings, the only thing inside was a black cloud contained in a huge jar. As he moved past it, the cloud seemed to react to his juxtaposition and began violently jerking around like it was trying to stab him.

A spell went whizzing past his head, and he tried to move even further away from it, but a second later another hit him squarely in the shoulder. He wasn’t sure what it was, but he felt blood soak his cloak, and he cried out in pain. He was almost to the next door, but he had no choice but to turn and fight.

Draco hadn’t made it into the room yet — if he was even still following them — so nothing was stopping him from attacking Lucius full-on. He began throwing out every spell he could think of, stopping to block or dodge the non-verbal curses Lucius was returning with. Not once did Lucius try to kill him though, which Regulus found interesting. He guessed the act of murder was just a tad too far for Lucius. He had always been a bit soft, at least that’s what his mother used to say.

Unfortunately, the two of them were equally matched, and unless Regulus was prepared to take this fight to a more lethal level or turn into a bear and maul a second person to death today, he wasn’t sure that he was going to win given the way his magical core was already weakened. Just as he felt his magic faltering, Draco ran through the door behind Lucius.

“Stop!” Draco yelled. It was just enough to distract Lucius, and Regulus was able to hit him with a spell to knock him out cold. He fell heavily to the ground, and Draco quickly knelt next to him. “What did you do?” he demanded.

“He’s just knocked out. We have to get to the others,” Regulus said, already turning away. Draco didn’t move. “Draco.”

“I can’t just leave him here,” Draco said. “If the Order is coming then they might hurt him.”

Regulus paused for a moment. “Then leave and take him with you.” He said the words angrily, practically spat them out, and Draco flinched slightly. He didn’t have any time to evaluate the choice Draco was making, deciding at the last second to escape from the Ministry with his father rather than continuing to help Regulus.

Lucius would now know without a shadow of a doubt that Draco had been helping Regulus and in turn Harry and the Order. What would his father do to him when he had time to comprehend that betrayal? What would the Dark Lord think when he found out? He didn't have time to think about it. Once Harry and the others were safe, he would bring it up to Dumbledore. They would have to do something to help Draco.

The next door led him through a slim hallway, but he recognized the room at the very end of it. There was a large bowl full of human brains swimming in some unknown liquid. He gagged slightly and looked around the room to see an unconscious Ron, Hermione, Ginny, and Luna. Only Harry and Neville were missing.

“Enervate,” he cast at Hermione who was closest to him. She woke with a groan.

“Regulus?”

“You need to get the others and get out. Where is Harry?”

She looked at him confusedly for a moment. “I don't know,” she said. “Regulus, it was a trap. Sirius wasn't here at all.” Her eyes filled with tears.

He knelt next to her, placing a gentle hand against her cheek. “It's okay. I'm going to get the rest of them out. Can you deal with those three?” He gestured to Ron, Ginny, and Luna.

“Yeah, yes,” she said, already climbing to her feet. He helped her stand, waiting just a moment to make sure she was steady before he sprinted through one of the many doors on the other side of the room. The moment he was through the door, he recognized the black chamber with the empty arch. The room wasn't empty though, all around him there was fighting.

He was at the top of the room, facing the arch in the center. To his left were the unconscious or dead bodies of two masked Death Eaters. Moody was also knocked out on the ground only a few feet from the arch. What drew his eyes first though was Tonks and Bellatrix locked in a fierce and deadly duel.

Right in front of the arch was Sirius — of course, Sirius. He couldn't just stay home, could he? Regulus's stomach twisted. Sirius was fighting Dolohov, one of the Death Eaters who had recently escaped Azkaban. To the right of the arch, Avery — one of Snape's old friends — and MacNair were lying still against the rocks.

He also spotted Kingsley in the process of knocking out a Death Eater and entering a duel with another one. Lupin was there fighting Theo's father, his mask cracked in half to reveal his face. And finally, closest to the door that led to the circular entrance room were Harry and Neville running at a full sprint, looking terrified.

Regulus barely had a second to look at them before he heard Tonks shout in distress. She was knocked back roughly against the rocks. Without thinking about it, Regulus threw a spell to draw Bellatrix's attention. He had never dueled Bellatrix, even when they were on the same side. He was always terrified of her, and that hadn't changed even after all the years apart.

She turned to him with a look of insanity that he couldn't even hope to comprehend. Her eyes glinted with madness so deep that Regulus could get lost in it. Fighting her wasn't like fighting Lucius. Even before Azkaban, she had been unreasonably skilled at magic. It seemed to flow out of her with every flick of her fingers.

It barely took two seconds for her to disarm him, following it up with a spell that glowed bright red, hitting him in the arm. He fell to his knees as pain seared up from where the spell had connected with his body. He was sure she was about to hit him with something else, but her attention was drawn away by Sirius who had successfully won his fight with Dolohov.

Regulus was climbing to his feet a moment later when Dumbledore entered the room through the door Harry and Neville were heading towards, his face stormy with anger. The other fights seemed to fall to silence as everyone took in his arrival, as if the Death Eaters already knew all was lost now that he was here. The only two left dueling were Sirius and Bellatrix, caught in a fight that had been building for years and years.

Sirius ducked one of Bellatrix's curses, the same red light that had hit Regulus a second earlier. Regulus started moving toward them.

"Come on, you can do better than that!" he yelled at her. Stupid. He was so stupid. Why did he have to taunt the woman? Her second curse hit him square in the chest and Regulus, wandless and helpless, was sprinting before he could give it a second thought.

Sirius was falling, the laughter dying on his face as it was covered in shock and pain. He was falling. That was all Regulus could think as he approached him. He didn't know what the arch was, but he knew, down into his very bones, that if Sirius fell through it he wouldn't be coming back.

His heel crossed into the arch just as Regulus reached him. He meant to pull him, but he was approaching from the side. It was a weird angle and there was no time. He turned slightly and used all his body weight to knock Sirius sideways. Their shoulders knocked together as Sirius's trajectory changed, his heel pulling out of the arch as he fell to the side.

It was a weird angle, he thought again vaguely. That's all it was. He couldn't pull him. He had used all his strength to move this way, and he couldn't stop it now. His shoulder hit the side of the arch roughly and, as if in slow motion, he slipped backward. A wash of cold overtook him as he fell.

The last thing he saw was Harry's horrified face screaming his name.

the acquittal.

Thirteen days. That's how long it took to exonerate Sirius. Thirteen days. That was all.

Remus had spent months cozying up to Dora trying to work on Sirius's case. He knew there was more there, that the original Aurors and powers that be didn't investigate, especially given the fact that he didn't have a trial, yet it was nearly impossible to get anyone to look into it. Even in the Order, where people had been assured many times that Sirius was innocent, and had even interacted with him since he escaped Azkaban, they weren't interested in pursuing his freedom.

Even Sirius didn't seem to care, the way he sunk into depression in Grimmauld, a demoralized attitude taking over every thought in his head, he seemed beyond caring about his own potential freedom from the Ministry and the dementor's kiss sentence that awaited him if he was caught by the wrong people. He called it a Sisyphean task, the prospect of pursuing freedom, speaking in that dismissive, haughty way that reminded Remus of a much younger, yet equally damaged, version of Sirius.

So Remus was on his own trying to prove Sirius's innocence, and he had very few allies among the other Order members. Most of the Aurors in the Order weren't keen on risking their careers or reputations on something that didn't feel pressing. A few were even a little fearful of it when Remus brought it up to them, though he wasn't sure if it was a prejudice against werewolves since he was the one who was asking or a general dislike of the Black family tree that brought that specific emotion about.

Hence his involvement with Dora. She was very young, very friendly, and perhaps, yes, a tad easily manipulated. Not that Remus was trying to do anything untoward with her, but he wasn't exactly being a very nice man either. He knew, distantly, that Dora saw him as more than just another friendly face at the Order meetings, but he hadn't considered being involved with someone romantically in a long time, and if Dora's harmless crush on him would help gain Sirius his freedom, then so be it.

Of course, this had a terrible effect on Sirius himself. Remus spent many sleepless nights going back and forth on whether he should just cave and tell Sirius what he was doing, but in the end, he couldn't bring himself to do it. He enjoyed his friendship with Dora and found comfort in her company, both facts that he didn't think Sirius would like to hear about. More than that, he didn't want to tell Sirius anything until he had some kind of concrete news, a new trial or even a reopened case, something. None of those things came to pass though.

After Regulus fell through the veil, a look of nightmarish surprise on his face, Sirius hit the ground with a deadening thump. Remus had no idea if he was dead or alive, the spell Bellatrix hit him with knocked him out cold, but it didn't matter at that moment. Harry, having just witnessed Regulus die, was in the process of trying to follow him to the grave.

Remus grabbed him around the chest, dragging him away from the archway.

"REGULUS!" Harry screamed, fighting against Remus's arms. "REGULUS!"

“There’s nothing you can do, Harry —”

“Get him, save him, he’s only just gone through!”

“We can still reach him —”

Listening to Harry call out for Regulus was one of the worst sounds Remus had ever heard. The anguish and disbelief made Remus feel dizzy with his own grief. He didn’t know Regulus well, and Regulus’s loyalty always lay clearly with Sirius and Harry, but now he felt sick with regret that he never got to know the boy Harry so obviously loved. He had risked a lot to keep Harry safe and regardless of whether that was tied to James was irrelevant, especially now that he was gone.

Harry ran off chasing Bellatrix a moment later, and Dumbledore followed him, but Remus rushed back to Sirius, still lying unconscious on the ground next to the whispering veil, the voices like a siren call.

“Sirius,” he hissed, but Sirius was cold and still. He had a pulse, though it was weak, but he wouldn’t wake. Remus cast every healing spell he could think of and was in the middle of tearing open his shirt to see the place where Bellatrix’s spell hit him when an Auror he didn’t know stormed into the room.

Remus was arrested, as was Sirius, though he was still unconscious, and Remus had to witness as they took his body away, whatever possible future he and Sirius had slipped through his fingers. He curled up into a ball once inside the holding cell deep in the bowels of the Ministry, expecting to spend weeks or even months there before possibly being moved to Azkaban, but he was let go within a matter of days.

“Fudge finally saw Voldemort in the flesh,” Dumbledore said grimly. “I was able to vouch for your release.”

“Where is Sirius?” Remus said, the words spilling from his mouth like they had been waiting on his tongue.

“They still have him,” Dumbledore said. “Kingsley is working on getting a healer in, but they won’t allow him to be taken to St. Mungo’s given his status.”

“His status?” Remus asked, though he already knew the answer.

“Right now, they are operating under the assumption that he was here with the other Death Eaters.”

“How many of them were arrested?”

“Eleven, I believe,” Dumbledore replied. “Bellatrix escaped with Voldemort. Harry mentioned that Lucius was here as well, but he wasn’t seen by any of us nor was he arrested.” The lift doors opened into the Ministry atrium, and he followed Dumbledore into the mostly empty area.

“How is Harry?” Remus asked gravely.

“He is struggling,” Dumbledore responded with unusual honesty. “He cared very much for Regulus, and I believe he feels that it is his fault that Regulus is dead.” Remus frowned, he could imagine how Harry would be dealing with this news, especially given that he was tricked into coming to the Ministry based on the belief that Sirius was in danger.

“Where is he now?” Remus asked. Dumbledore paused as they approached the floo exits.

“He is back at Hogwarts, but given that Sirius is unable to take him, he will be returning to his muggle family for the summer.”

“His muggle — No!” Remus shouted. “They're terrible, Dumbledore. I already told you I wouldn't allow him to go back.”

“And I respected that at the time knowing he would be protected, but given that both Regulus and Sirius are no longer able to take care of him, he must return to them.”

“What about me?” Remus said, hating the way his voice faltered.

“There is something else,” Dumbledore interrupted. “Harry seems to have a kind of connection to Voldemort as is clear given the false vision of Sirius that Voldemort placed in his head. Allowing him to live at the Order headquarters when his thoughts are this unprotected would not be wise. He will be safe from Voldemort with his muggle family.”

Remus seethed with rage after that discussion, hating Dumbledore with every bone in his body even if he understood why he did what he did. He wanted to go straight to the Dursley's home and kidnap Harry all over again, but where would he take him? Grimmauld Place was warded to the nines, but there was no way he could get away with keeping Harry there now.

He wanted to travel to Hogwarts to visit Harry, to make sure he knew he wasn't alone, but Dumbledore stopped him.

“Dolores Umbridge has gone missing in the Forbidden Forest. Draco Malfoy is the only person alive who saw her enter the forest, and the Hogwarts grounds are being heavily searched by Aurors,” he warned. “I do not think it would be wise for you to visit given Ms. Umbridge's history with anti-lycanthropy laws.”

He didn't disagree, since he had been publicly outed as a werewolf by Snape two years prior, he had to be extra careful about where he showed his face. He was still unregistered, and when he was arrested he expected that they would use that fact against him, but the Ministry was thrown by Voldemort's appearance and were clearly struggling to manage everything if they were letting Remus walk free based on the voice of one man. Though to be fair, that man had just been vindicated after a year-long smear campaign, so he must have had some goodwill.

“We have to get Sirius out,” Remus said. “He can't stay there. The dementor's —”

“I agree with you, but until he is awake, they will not be able to get the truth from him.”

Remus was sent back to Grimmauld to wait. He sent a quick letter to Harry asking how he was, though he did not get a response, and then he buried himself in the work of getting Sirius out of the Ministry's hands. He would break into Azkaban if he had to. The night after he was freed, he sat for several long hours at the empty kitchen table. Grimmauld was all but abandoned for the time being as everyone recovered from their last battle and it felt like sitting in a tomb. Molly had taken to placing flowers around the house to add some cheer to the dreary and decaying decor, but now those flowers were slowly dying. Just looking at them made him feel sick with impotence and isolation.

After that night, he pestered everyone he could think of, he buried himself beneath every piece of research he had compiled in the last few months, and he barely slept in the long days that followed. In the end, it was the day Fudge stepped down as Minister of Magic — his denial of Voldemort's return was his ultimate downfall, not to mention Umbridge threatening to use Unforgivables on students — was the thing that did it. Scrimgeour, his predecessor, wasn't a nice man, or one particularly fond of werewolves, but he was willing to listen to Dumbledore, so when Dumbledore demanded that Sirius's case be looked at again, he agreed.

Remus didn't get to see Sirius for even a second while it all went on, but he heard secondhand about them administering Veritaserum and looking at all the evidence that had been disregarded the first time around. There wasn't a trial, only an internal investigation, and then Sirius was freed.

"It'll hit the Prophet tomorrow," Kingsley told him. "But they're releasing him in half an hour." Remus was already at the Ministry, he had taken to loitering around when he wasn't actively pursuing someone to speak with. He went right to the Department of Magical Law Enforcement after Kingsley was finished speaking and waited for two Aurors to walk Sirius out toward the lifts.

"Sirius," he breathed. He was dressed in the outfit he arrived at the Ministry in, but it didn't look particularly rumpled or dirty.

"Remus," Sirius responded, a bright smile on his face, his eyes lit up with surprise and excitement. Remus hugged him immediately, letting out a sigh of relief that had been trapped in his chest for days, maybe much longer, certainly since he almost watched Sirius fall through the veil.

They left without speaking, Sirius was not keen on remaining in the Aurors' department any longer and Remus was ready to leave the Ministry and never return. They traveled through the floo to Grimmauld, the house silent and empty. Though some Order members had frequented the headquarters in the previous two weeks, it had dwindled as summer took hold.

"Are you hungry?" Remus asked gently. "Tired?"

"A bit hungry," Sirius said with a shrug. "Where is everyone?"

"I imagine they're at home," Remus said, giving Sirius an odd look. Sirius stared back with one of equal confusion.

“Where is Harry?” Sirius asked.

“Hasn’t anyone come to talk to you?” Remus asked, the relaxed look on Sirius’s face now seen as a terrible omen.

Sirius shook his head. “No,” he said. “There was a healer, but she refused to speak. Think she was a bit afraid of me actually.”

“Sirius,” Remus said, reaching out to touch his shoulder, he knew this wouldn’t be good news. “Harry is with the Dursleys.”

“What? Why?” Sirius asked, his face flooding with surprise and anger.

Remus tried to explain what Dumbledore told him, but Sirius just looked more confused by the minute. “Well, you’re the only one that has any legal claim over Harry. I would never have been able to take him in on my own, but now that you’re out and free, properly this time, I think we can go get him.”

“Yes, let’s do that now,” Sirius said determinedly. “Where is Reggie? I’m surprised he hasn’t thrown a fit about this.”

Remus froze, ice flooding his veins as his blood drained from his face. “Reggie?”

Sirius gave him another odd look. “Yeah? Obviously, he’s not here.”

“You don’t know...” Remus said faintly.

“I don’t know what?” Sirius asked. “Remus, what do I not know?”

“What’s the last thing you remember?”

Sirius gave him an incredulous look, but he answered all the same. “I was dueling with Bellatrix, and she hit me with something. Next thing I knew I was inside a cell at the Ministry and a healer was checking my vitals. That was all, then a few days later they came to interview me with Veritaserum. Remus, tell me what’s going on.” He sounded angry now.

“When you were hit with that spell, you fell backward and almost slipped through the veil,” Remus explained. “It was all happening so quickly, and then Regulus he...”

“What, Remus? What did Reggie —”

“He knocked you out of the way,” Remus whispered. “He didn’t have his wand, I don’t think, so he just hit you from the side and then he — he fell through instead.”

“He fell through...” Sirius said confusedly, his eyebrows furrowed.

“He fell through the veil. He’s dead.”

“No,” Sirius said.

“I don’t think he meant to —”

“No, Remus, no, he can’t be dead.”

“Sirius.”

“NO! Remus, no, he’s not. This isn’t funny. He’s not dead.” His voice was growing frantic, his face flooded with anger and disbelief.

“Sirius, please,” Remus said gently, he took a step toward him, but Sirius shoved him away.

“Don’t lie to me. He’s here. He has to be here. I’m free now, I’m fine. He can’t be dead!” he screamed the last words, his voice cracking harshly. “No, no, no, no,” Sirius ranted, turning away and pulling at his hair brutally. “No, this isn’t real. It’s not real.”

Remus didn’t know how to help him. The last time Regulus died, Remus was out of town when Sirius got the news. By the time he got back, Sirius had cycled out of his disbelief and into rage and hatred. He had been destabilized by the news, though Remus wouldn’t realize that for a long time. This was different, Sirius was a different man now, but Regulus’s death was different too. He had died protecting Sirius, had died for him, and right on the precipice of Sirius’s freedom.

“Who else knows? Who else —”

“Harry was there, he watched it happen, as did a few other Order members,” Remus said softly. Sirius was still turned away from him, his back hunched and his hands still buried in his hair.

“Harry watched Reggie die?” Sirius asked distantly. Remus nodded before remembering that Sirius couldn’t see him.

“Yes,” Remus said.

“Oh,” Sirius said, his voice sounding devoid of emotion suddenly. “I think I need to —”

He didn’t finish his sentence, there was a popping noise and a split second later he was gone. Remus reached forward on instinct, his fingers gripping the empty air where Sirius was standing. He had apparated out of Grimmauld, and Remus had no way of knowing where he went. He sunk down into one of the wide-backed chairs, cradling his head in his hands.

Why didn’t anyone bother to tell him? The public believed that Regulus was his son, even most of the Order members believed that lie, so why didn’t anyone tell him? Not one of the Aurors thought it might be important information.

There was something else that was bothering him, he realized. He had been so caught up with Sirius’s case that he hadn’t had time to process it earlier but now it was really starting to bug him. He went into the kitchen and began digging through the pile of old copies of The Daily Prophet that were rotting in the corner of the room. Every single copy from the past two weeks was there.

He dumped them on the table and slowly and meticulously began thumbing through them. Just as he thought, not once did any of them mention Regulus's death. But why not? Surely people knew. Not just because of how many people actively witnessed his death, but because he never returned to school.

He wrote a quick letter to Dumbledore to ask, climbing up to the attic where all the owls were waiting for him. Nyx, Regulus's owl, wasn't there. Remus looked around for her, but she wasn't present. He added a quick addendum to his letter to Dumbledore asking if Nyx was still at Hogwarts for some reason, then sent it off. He was heading back downstairs when he heard someone come through the floo.

"Remus?" Dora yelled.

"Up here, hold on," Remus responded, lumbering down the stairs to find her waiting for him right next to the fireplace. She smiled kindly.

"Hey, I heard the news about Sirius! Is he here?" Dora had never seemed to grasp the fact that Sirius wasn't particularly fond of her, though he had to admit that Sirius worked very hard to keep that fact from her, so perhaps it wasn't her fault.

"Er, he's not taking visitors," Remus responded. "Listen, Dora, I think it would be best if no one visited Grimmauld for a bit."

"Oh," Dora said, looking piteously disappointed. "But what about the Order meetings?"

"I've asked Dumbledore to have them somewhere else," Remus said. Dumbledore hadn't agreed yet, but if he and Sirius wouldn't sacrifice Harry to the Dursleys just so the Order could use Sirius's home. "Sirius needs some time and... space."

"I see," Dora said, frowning. "I know Regulus's death must be weighing on him. Will there be a funeral?"

That brought Remus up short. It seemed so wrong that no one had thought to plan one yet. Didn't anyone care? It all just felt so unfair, so much like it felt during the first war when every single one of them was disposable and loss was just part of life, something to be thrown away and discarded.

"Yes, there will be," Remus said definitively. There wouldn't be a body to bury, but he would make sure Regulus was given a ceremony. He had people who cared about him this time around, unlike last time when his funeral was only attended by family members who Sirius was certain didn't know the first thing about him.

Dora nodded and gave him a kind look. "You'll let me know if you need anything, won't you?"

"Of course," Remus said. He tried not to make it seem like he was shooing her out the door, but he wasn't sure that he succeeded given the way her face fell right before she disappeared into the floo. He didn't want to be cruel, but he didn't have the energy to think about her feelings today. For now, he needed to find Sirius.

It had been nearly an hour since Sirius disappeared, and he couldn't stop thinking of the night James and Lily died, when Sirius went hunting for Peter leading to his unlawful imprisonment. Where would he go now that Regulus had died? He didn't think it would be anywhere good. He worried that Sirius might have done something colossally stupid.

It took him an hour to realize where Sirius might have gone, having spent that time listing off every possible place that might have entered Sirius's addled mind. He apparated immediately, disappearing from Grimmauld and appearing in the middle of Godric's Hollow. He walked quickly down the street and into the cemetery near where James and Lily used to live.

The relief he felt upon seeing Padfoot lying on one of the graves was only matched by the anger and annoyance that flooded his thoughts. The anger won this time.

"Sirius!" he shouted. Padfoot lifted his chin, his ears tucked against his head, but his teeth bared. "You cannot disappear like that. I had no idea what might have happened to you!"

Padfoot growled slightly.

"Don't growl at me!" Remus said sharply. "You don't get to do this. You are not the only one hurt by this news. Harry needs you, don't you get that? This cannot be like last time. I cannot lose—" He cut himself off, already feeling himself losing control of his words.

Padfoot gave him a measured look before transforming back into Sirius who looked guilty and shell-shocked. He didn't speak or stand, only stayed sitting on the ground and staring up at Remus. Remus sighed heavily and plopped down next to him.

"I need you to tell me what you want to do," Remus said, settling on the words as a plea for instruction. "Please, don't ice me out. Just tell me what you want to do." Last time, Sirius was too buried in grief to articulate what he needed. Remus couldn't live through that again.

Sirius watched him for a moment before opening his mouth. "I want to kill Bellatrix," he said. There was a quiet defiance on his face. It was clear that he thought Remus would change the subject or dismiss what he was saying. Remus, for his part, would have done anything to keep Sirius firmly on earth with him.

"Okay," he replied. Sirius's eyebrows shot up as his mouth opened in surprise. "But we need to pick up Harry first."

the funeral.

cw: heavy grief and angst, mentions of child neglect and abuse, mentions of starvation as a punishment, general food issues relating to guilt

(please let me know if i've forgotten any warning in this chapter, i tried to include anything)

Harry was lying on the floor again. He couldn't remember the last time he got up, maybe that morning when Aunt Petunia let him out so that he could use the bathroom before locking him back in his room. The sun had set hours ago, but they hadn't brought him dinner yet. Not that Harry would eat it. He'd barely eaten in days, and some of the food that had been slipped through the doggy door was beginning to rot in the corner. Aunt Petunia would probably punish him for that if she found it.

His glasses were sitting on his bed, but he didn't need them as he stared blankly across the room. He was lying on his side, his shoulder bent in a way that he knew would cause pain when he stood up. His cheek rested against the wood beneath him, scraping his dry skin after the long hours spent there.

He heard a light scratching noise at the window and shifted his eyes over to look at it. It was too dark to see, and without his glasses, he could barely make out more than slight movement. It was probably another owl carrying a letter from one of the friends he didn't deserve. The friends he had put in danger because he was too stupid to wait for Re—he broke off, forcibly slipping back into a place in his mind where the memories couldn't visit him.

He heard creaking on the stairs. That would be Aunt Petunia now, probably coming to let him use the bathroom before locking him up for the night. He should probably shower given the way the summer heat was making him sweat during the day, he was sure he smelled terrible, but he didn't know that he cared enough to do so.

He remembered when he was a child and Aunt Petunia would scrub his skin raw if he went too long without bathing. She was never happy about having to take care of him, always treating it like someone was holding a gun to her head. He didn't really blame her though. He didn't want to take care of himself either, how could he expect her to do it?

"Why are there locks on the outside of his door?" he heard someone ask in a low voice. Who was that? He was trying to place it, but his thoughts were sluggish from dehydration. He heard Aunt Petunia responding, she must have been a little farther down the stairs as he could only faintly hear her. She sounded angry. That didn't bode well for him.

The locks were being removed from his door, and he thought about lifting his head to see Aunt Petunia walk in, but decided against it, sighing heavily and sinking further away from his present state. The door opened slowly like the person opening it was uncertain of what they would find on the other side. It was dark in his room, he barely turned the lights on anymore, so he supposed they weren't wrong to be wary.

"Harry?" he heard someone say. He was in the process of lifting his head when they spoke again, yelling this time. "Harry!"

Suddenly he wasn't alone. He should have realized who it was when he heard them outside. Remus was kneeling over him in a flash, his worried and gaunt face a few inches from his own.

"Remus?" Harry asked, his voice scratchy. He felt like he was dreaming.

"Harry, are you okay?" Remus asked frantically.

"What did you do to him?" Sirius roared from somewhere else in the room.

"I'm fine," Harry mumbled, answering Remus's question.

"I didn't do anything to him!" Aunt Petunia cried, shouting in surprise before she ran down the stairs.

"Come on," Remus said. "Let's get you out of here." Remus helped pull him to his feet, and when he swayed dizzily, he put an arm around his shoulders to keep him standing. Remus reached over and turned on his lamp, and Harry squinted when the harsh light flooded his unprepared eyes. "Here." Remus handed him his glasses.

"Thanks," Harry said quietly.

"Where is your trunk?" Remus asked.

"It's locked downstairs," Harry said.

"I'll get it," Sirius said gruffly, exiting the room before Harry could get a good look at him.

"Oh," Remus said quietly. Harry looked at him curiously, then followed his eyeline to the rotting food in the corner of the room. He felt awash with embarrassment.

"Sorry, I need to clean that," Harry said worriedly.

"No need," Remus replied evenly, pulling out his wand and vanishing the mess.

"I don't think you're supposed to do magic here." Harry had gotten into trouble when Dobby did magic, he hoped he wouldn't end up expelled because Remus was using an actual wand.

"Don't worry about that," Remus replied. "Help me gather your stuff." Harry started pulling out his clothes and the few items he kept hidden under the floorboards, mostly the nicer pieces of clothing that Remus had been gifted and a few books. Sirius came back upstairs a moment later with his trunk in tow and together they piled Harry's belongings into it.

"Is that everything?" Sirius asked. He wasn't looking at Harry, his focus shooting around the room like he was looking for threats.

"Just Hedwig's cage," Harry responded.

"Oh, there's Nyx," Remus said faintly. Harry turned to see Nyx, the owl Sirius purchased for—pecking at the window. "I wondered where she ended up." He opened the window and instructed her to meet them at Grimmauld, letting Hedwig out as well to fly on her own. He shrunk her cage and shoved it in his pocket while Sirius did the same to the trunk.

"Okay, ready?" Sirius asked.

"Ready for what?" Harry asked, perhaps a bit dumbly. It would probably be obvious to anyone else, but he needed someone to spell it out for him. Where were they going to take him? He wondered distantly if they were going to hurt him because of what he had done.

"We're going home," Remus said firmly. He followed Sirius down the stairs, Remus staying close to him the entire time. Harry didn't even spare Aunt Petunia or her house a passing glance as he followed them out into the street and vanished into thin air.

They arrived at Grimmauld Place a moment later and the numbness Harry had been settled into began to wash away, revealing the clawing panic underneath. He sucked in a breath as Remus reached around to squeeze his shoulder.

"Are you hungry?" Sirius asked as they walked in the front door. Harry shook his head when Sirius turned to look at him. Their eyes met for the first time since Sirius arrived at the Department of Mysteries with the rest of the Order. Harry looked away quickly, staring down at his feet. "Okay, well, if you want to get settled in. I need to fire call Dumbledore."

"All right," Harry mumbled quietly, but Sirius was already gone, walking into the kitchen. Harry had the sudden urge to cry, and he scrunched up his face to keep from doing so where someone could see him.

"Just let us know if you change your mind," Remus said softly, bending down slightly so that they were eye to eye. "And Harry," he paused, cringing slightly, "maybe a shower would do you some good?"

Harry flushed bright red but nodded. He escaped quickly up the stairs and went right into the room he'd lived in the previous summer. The pictures of half-naked muggle women were blacked out but still hung on the walls, and he always felt a sting of mortification when he remembered they were there. He shed his clothes, dropping them haphazardly, and climbed into the shower in the ensuite bathroom, thankful for the privacy.

He hated being at the Dursleys' house, but it was almost worse being in Grimmauld. The feeling of who was missing was so stark and painful. He leaned his head heavily against the shower wall, hoping that the water would just drown him before he had to get out. It felt so wrong to be here, accepting any sort of hospitality when he knew he didn't deserve it.

Regulus — the name alone caused a wave of nausea to fill him — had been the one to push Sirius and Remus to take him in the first time, and now Harry was selfishly allowing them to take him again even though he was the reason Regulus was dead. It had been his fault and there would never be another moment in his life where he didn't know that. If he had just waited, if he had just listened to Regulus...

He ended up sitting down in the shower and staying under the water until his fingers were prune. When he walked back into the bedroom, he noticed that the clothes he'd left on the floor were gone and his trunk was now sitting at the foot of the bed. He hadn't meant for them to pick up after him.

That night he dreamt of his cupboard under the stairs. He had burned breakfast that morning, getting distracted by the cartoon Dudley was watching in the other room. He never got to sit down and watch them, but if he strained his hearing, then he could just barely make out what was happening. Aunt Petunia smacked him on the wrist when she found the bacon burning on the stove and shoved him into the cupboard without food.

For Harry, there were always two main punishments when he did something wrong: cleaning and lack of meals. He had regular chores like cooking or weeding the garden, but cleaning was usually left to punishments. He had never actually seen Aunt Petunia clean though, his punishments often overlapping so that he did the bulk, if not all, of the cleaning in the house.

He vastly preferred cleaning to what he was enduring now, sitting in the dark cupboard with his stomach rumbling angrily. He curled up in the corner of the small space, pulling his legs away from where he knew a spider's web sat on the opposite wall. He didn't want to end up with another spider bite, the last one had taken weeks to heal properly.

He woke to Remus knocking softly on the door. "We're making breakfast if you want to come down," Remus said kindly. Harry lifted his head sleepily but nodded. His stomach felt hollow, but there was something comforting about that. He didn't bother dressing before clambering down the stairs.

"Morning. Did you sleep okay?" Sirius said when he entered the room. He was already sitting at the kitchen table, a copy of The Daily Prophet open in front of him.

"Yes, I slept fine," Harry answered as politely as he could manage, staring down at the table. Sirius was silent, not adding anything. Harry didn't understand how he could even bear to be in the same room.

"I don't know if you heard," Remus said, his voice light and friendly, though it sounded a bit forced, "but Sirius has been exonerated."

"Really?" Harry said, his head snapping up to look at Remus. Remus nodded, a small smile on his lips. "When?"

“Yesterday,” Sirius said. He slid the Prophet over so that Harry could see it. The front page was covered in a picture of Sirius when he was much younger before he was sent to Azkaban, the article announcing his freedom.

“Wow,” Harry breathed. He wanted to feel happy about this, but all he could think was that Regulus would have been ecstatic and now he would never get to witness it.

“There is something else,” Sirius said solemnly. Harry looked up nervously to find him staring straight ahead, his eyebrows furrowed. “There hasn’t been any published news about Reg—” he cut off with a cough.

“We’ve decided to have a funeral for him,” Remus jumped in to say. “It will just be other Order members since it’s too dangerous to invite anyone else, but we wanted to... honor him.”

“Oh,” Harry said. “When?”

“Two days from now,” Remus answered. Harry nodded, his stomach clenching painfully.

“May I be excused?” he whispered.

“What?” Sirius asked distractedly.

“Yes,” Remus said at the same time. His gentle tone was starting to grate on him. He stood up from the table quickly, the chair scratching against the floor loudly as he pushed away, and he fled the room leaving his breakfast untouched and uneaten.

He went right back up to his room, closing the door behind him, and impulsively walked into the wardrobe on the other side of the room. It wasn’t until he was locked in the dark, tiny space that he felt like he could breathe again. Weren’t Sirius and Remus going to punish him? What were they waiting for?

He tried to breathe normally, but he could feel his breaths getting shorter as the moments passed and soon enough he was fully hyperventilating. It was pitch black in the cupboard so he had no idea if his eyes were opened or closed. He thought he might have passed out for a bit, but he would never be sure.

They were going to punish him. He had done something wrong. He deserved whatever they did to him, but he hated the waiting, he hated not knowing. He couldn’t even think of the funeral. Would he even be allowed to go? He couldn’t remember what words Remus had spoken that morning, they were fuzzy like a distant memory rather than something that happened a few hours ago.

By the time he dragged himself out of the wardrobe, the sun was setting. He still felt panicked, his nails bitten down to the quick, but at least he was breathing. He found a plate of food under a warming charm waiting for him outside his bedroom door, but beyond that the house was quiet. He vanished the food without eating it, thankful that he was able to use magic again now that he was in a wizard’s residence. He didn’t deserve food, and the emptiness inside him was a comfort.

He paced his room for a moment, wishing he could sink back into numbness, but unwilling to get back into the cupboard. He was beginning to feel claustrophobic, not just in the small dark space, but even in his bedroom. It felt like the walls were closing in on him. He thought about leaving to go find Remus or Sirius, but he didn't think he could face them.

His breaths were beginning to quicken again as he looked around the room frantically. He couldn't stop thinking of the way he burned breakfast for the Dursleys, the way Aunt Petunia shut him up in the cupboard under the stairs. Those were terrible punishments because he couldn't do anything but sit and wait for it to be over.

He much preferred the ones tied to tasks because then he knew when they would end. If he was told to clean the kitchen floors by hand, then he knew he just had to make sure the floors were spotless and he would be free. It didn't matter that the punishments were constant and overlapping, he had a goal to work toward and that was enough.

That seemed to be the only thing in his head as he filled the sink with warm water and used a flannel to scrub the counters. He didn't know where their cleaning supplies were, but he didn't want to look for them right that moment. Once the counters were cleaned, he moved on to the shower, and after that, to the floors. By the time the bathroom was spotless, it was deep into the night, well after midnight and his body ached from cleaning so roughly. He collapsed into bed and slept for as long as he could.

Remus woke him the next day to tell him about breakfast and gently asked if he wanted to eat in his room or downstairs with them.

"In my room, please," Harry mumbled tiredly. Remus only nodded and brought a hot plate of food, setting it next to his bed before quietly exiting the room. He let the food sit there as he drifted back to sleep, but he was woken by a nightmare not long after and resigned himself to being awake.

He vanished the food again, ignoring the way his stomach ached with hunger, and went out in search of cleaning supplies. He wondered where Kreacher was, he would certainly know where to find everything, but the house elf was nowhere to be found. He heard Remus and Sirius arguing behind the closed library doors, but he couldn't make out what either of them was saying, and he skirted around the room before they could catch him eavesdropping.

The arguing lingered in his mind though, and he couldn't help wondering if it was about him. They hadn't brought up the way he killed Regulus, but he knew it was only a matter of time. What would they do when they finally talked about it? Would they lock him up for the rest of the summer? Would they make him do chores? Would they send him back?

That thought caused an unpleasant shiver to race down his spine. He didn't want to be sent back to the Dursleys' but would he deserve it? He felt vaguely ill at the thought and reinitiated his search for cleaning supplies. He found a very old bucket in a cupboard in the kitchen and an unlabeled potion that upon further inspection he believed was used for cleaning floors.

He went back to his room and spent the rest of the day cleaning, scrubbing every inch of the room until it looked brand new. He stopped briefly when Remus brought him dinner. He lingered in the hallway trying to initiate a conversation with Harry, but Harry wasn't much interested in talking. He hated the patient way that Remus was using to speak to him like he was just biding his time before the other shoe dropped.

"We're going to have his funeral tomorrow so you'll need to be up and dressed by nine, okay?" Remus said.

Why won't you just punish me? Harry wanted to yell. Instead, he said, "Okay."

He dressed numbly the next morning and walked downstairs where Remus gave him a few pieces of buttered toast. He ate one of them slowly, nibbling on it little by little. He didn't feel much like eating, given what was happening that day, but Remus was watching him worriedly so he was doing his best to finish something. Sirius was nowhere to be found.

"Where is the funeral taking place?"

"At the Black mausoleum in a wizarding cemetery in London," Remus said. "It seemed only proper —"

"Proper my arse," Sirius muttered, stumbling into the room. He looked disheveled, his eyes sunken into his face. Remus gave him a dark look but didn't bother replying to that.

"Are you ready to go?" Remus asked both of them. Harry nodded silently, and Sirius grunted in reply.

They apparated to the cemetery. It looked like a normal cemetery from outside the gates, but the moment they crossed the threshold, Harry could make out the most peculiar gravestones. He hadn't expected them to be any different than muggle gravestones given the standard way his parents' looked, but these were infused with magic. One, in particular, had a statue of a dragon on top that was circling like a dog before it settled down to take a nap. Another looked plain but every couple of seconds, tiny magical fireworks would appear above it.

"Hate this place," Sirius mumbled to himself. He was stomping ahead of them, Harry trailing behind as he was distracted by each grave.

They walked into an ornate and massive mausoleum at the very center of the cemetery. It was even bigger on the inside, the walls lined with names of dead members of the Black family. There was a small crowd of people waiting for them. Mr. and Mrs. Weasley were the first ones to spot them, Mrs. Weasley coming right over and hugging Harry so tightly that he couldn't breathe. Bill, Fred, George, Ron, and Ginny were all there, as were Tonks, Hagrid, Fleur, and Cedric Diggory.

The last two were the biggest surprise to Harry, but he wouldn't get a chance to speak to any of them until after the ceremony. Harry had never been to a funeral, but he had seen a few of them on TV. He thought there were supposed to be eulogies or something. Perhaps wizards didn't do that. Instead, there was some kind of magical ritual led by Sirius and Mr. Weasley, but none of it was something Harry could understand. Their wands connected with a glittery silver string, as they muttered words he didn't know out loud. A few seconds into the ritual, the doors to the mausoleum opened and Bellatrix Lestrange walked in.

Harry was on his feet immediately, panic and rage surging through him. He drew his wand, only stopping when Remus grabbed his arm. Bellatrix gave him a startled look before her eyes slid over to Sirius and she smiled softly. It changed her face completely and he realized instantly that it wasn't her. That soft look couldn't ever appear on Bellatrix's murderous face.

"Andy," Sirius said, dropping the spell he was casting so he could walk over and hug her. Harry sat down, flushing with embarrassment. The two of them looked very similar, and given that the woman looked almost identical to Bellatrix, he would guess that Sirius and Andy were cousins.

"That's my mum," Tonks whispered to him suddenly. "I don't think you've met before. Her name is Andromeda."

"Oh," Harry replied awkwardly. "She looks a bit like..." he drifted off, unsure if Tonks would be offended by the comparison. She huffed a laugh.

"Definitely," she agreed. "They couldn't be more different though. I promise." She gave him a kind smile and he relaxed slightly. He forgot how much he liked Tonks given everything else going on.

Andromeda took over for Mr. Weasley and she and Sirius started up the odd rituals again. Harry looked around the room as they carried on. Mr. Weasley had his arm around Mrs. Weasley now and though she looked mournful, she wasn't crying. That surprised Harry and irritated him a bit. He knew it was irrational, but it felt like an insult. Tonks was sitting next to him, with Remus on his other side, both of them stared forward looking unaffected, but not in a callous way, more like they had buried their emotions too deeply to be seen.

Fred and George both looked serious and unhappy, more angry than sad. Bill was next to them with Fleur tucked under his arm. That was new, Harry thought. He wondered when they met. Ginny was crying quietly, tears streaming continuously down her face. She wasn't bothering to wipe them off. He felt terrible seeing her cry and vaguely wished he could comfort her, but he didn't have anything to offer. Not to any of them.

Ron wasn't crying, and he didn't look sad, instead, he had a dazed look on his face. It reminded Harry of the face he would get when Trelawney would ask what he saw in a crystal ball. Beyond that, there was something else in his eyes that Harry couldn't quite place. It almost looked like the expression he got when he was about to demolish someone during a chess game, a sort of cunning strategic look that Harry had learned to have a healthy fear of.

Hagrid and Cedric were in the very back. Hagrid was openly and loudly crying, really the only one in the room who was making noise, and Cedric was rubbing his back placatingly. Harry didn't understand why he was there at all. He glanced back at Andromeda and Sirius, both of them looked so grim that it made him feel sick just watching them. It felt like his heart rate was beginning to race in his chest, and he dug his nails into the palms of his hands to keep from losing it.

After a long few minutes, Andromeda and Sirius finally finished whatever they were doing and Harry watched in real-time as Regulus's name appeared on the wall of deceased family members. It was only a few places below where his name was written on the wall last time. It was odd to see the visual representation of the two lives Regulus had led. Both were cut short, both times at the fault of someone else.

Suddenly, the room felt far too tiny. Harry jumped to his feet, intending to slip from the room quietly and without drawing attention, but everyone looked at him, and in a panic, he sprinted out of the mausoleum, clambering out of the room loudly. He didn't know where he was going, but he didn't stop until he was surrounded by gravestones that he didn't recognize. He curled up behind one not bothering to check the name and tucked his head between his knees, trying desperately to slow his breathing.

He shouldn't be here, he thought. He killed Regulus. Regulus was dead because of him. He didn't deserve to sit with all these people and mourn his death. He shouldn't be here. It was his fault. His fault. His fault. His fault. His fault. His fault. His fault. His fault. His —

“Harry?” He lifted his head to see Cedric come around a corner. “Harry, are you all right?” Cedric knelt next to him, putting a strong hand on the back of his neck. Harry nodded. He didn't feel like he could speak. Cedric gave him an understanding look and sat down next to him.

He wanted to duck his head back between his knees, but he felt odd doing that next to Cedric. Cedric didn't speak for a long few minutes, and Harry was just beginning to feel uncomfortable in the silence when he opened his mouth.

“I'm really sorry about Regulus,” Cedric said.

Harry nodded, but didn't respond. He wasn't sure what he could say that would be an appropriate response.

“I can't even imagine how you're feeling losing a friend like that. When I was in first year, another Hogwarts student was killed. I think she was in sixth year if I remember correctly. It felt like the entire school mourned her death.”

Is this supposed to make me feel better? Harry thought but didn't say.

“I'm just saying,” Cedric added, almost as if he could hear Harry's thoughts, “that you're not alone. I barely knew him, but it was clear that a lot of people cared about Regulus. You don't have to carry this on your own.”

“Yeah, except no one else at school is responsible for Regulus's death,” Harry snapped, immediately feeling guilty. He knew that Cedric was just trying to help.

“Is that what you think?”

“It's what I know,” Harry said despondently.

Cedric was quiet for a moment, a thoughtful expression on his face. “I only interacted with Regulus a few times, but I always got the impression that he didn't like me very much.”

Harry choked on his tongue, clearing his throat roughly. “He —”

Cedric waved him off. "It's fine. I'm not offended. But I always thought it was interesting because he was so protective of you. He acted like he was your parent."

"Yeah," Harry muttered, unsure of what Cedric was getting at.

Cedric smiled at him. "I don't think a person who cared about you that much would be very happy seeing you suffer like this."

"You don't —"

"I know," Cedric said quickly. "Like I said, I didn't know him well, but I could see that he wanted you to be happy. I doubt he would want you punishing yourself forever."

Harry stared at him bewilderedly. He didn't know how to respond to that and his untethered thoughts swirled in his head. Cedric just watched him back, a knowing smile on his lips. Harry blinked at him and Cedric, as if in slow motion, leaned forward and placed a gentle kiss against Harry's cheek. Harry gasped slightly, staring at Cedric as he pulled away.

"Come on," Cedric said, standing fluidly and holding out his hand for Harry. "Everyone is waiting for you." Harry took his hand as Cedric pulled him up, but dropped it immediately. He was sure his face was bright red. The place on his cheek where Cedric kissed him was buzzing slightly.

As they approached the mausoleum, Harry was surprised to see Dumbledore waiting for them. He didn't realize it originally, but in retrospect, it was odd that he wasn't there for the funeral. Dumbledore gave him a brief look before turning back to say something quietly to Sirius.

Sirius was red in the face and immediately started snarling words at the old headmaster. Dumbledore didn't even react, though Remus walked over and placed a hand on Sirius's shoulder. Sirius shook him off roughly and took another step toward Dumbledore. He pointed his finger right in Dumbledore's face and hissed something so lowly that Harry couldn't make it out.

"We will need to find a new headquarters for the Order," Dumbledore said evenly, seeming completely unaffected by Sirius's rage.

"Fine," Sirius growled.

"Harry, there you are," Mrs. Weasley said suddenly. "We're heading back to Grimmauld. Do you mind side-alonging with me?"

"No, that's fine," Harry agreed quietly, embarrassed now by the way he'd run out of the funeral.

"I'll see you later, Harry," Cedric said. "Try to remember what I said." Harry gave him a small smile and a moment later disappeared with Mrs. Weasley.

"Remus and Sirius needed to run an errand," Mrs. Weasley said. "I hope you don't mind me staying here for a bit."

“That’s okay,” Harry said just as Ron and Ginny arrived with Mr. Weasley.

Mr. and Mrs. Weasley immediately went into the kitchen, speaking in quiet, worried tones, and Harry was left alone with Ginny and Ron. Ginny had stopped crying, but Ron still looked a little dazed and disconnected.

“Oh, Harry,” Ginny said, walking forward and hugging him firmly. He hugged her back instantly.

“Why were you the only two there?” he asked once Ginny pulled away, unaware that he was going to ask the question before it was out of his mouth.

“Dad said that Regulus’s death wasn’t in the papers and they didn’t want to announce it too publicly otherwise Death Eaters might show up to the funeral. They said it was too dangerous for too many people to come,” Ron explained.

“Oh,” Harry said. “I was surprised Hermione wasn’t there.”

Ron cringed slightly. “Yeah, she’s been trying to reach you. All of us have, but you haven’t been responding.”

“Er, sorry, I haven’t really...” He wasn’t sure how to explain it. The truth was that he hadn’t wanted to talk to anyone, but that felt a bit too cruel to say out loud.

“I know,” Ron said. “But you’re not the only one that cared about him, you know? And it’s not like Hermione can explain his death to her family. She’s only got us.”

Harry felt a new and unique wave of guilt crash into him, an added bonus to the guilt he was already drowning in. He swallowed harshly. “I’ll write her,” he said.

Ron nodded. They all fell silent, the three of them standing in the foyer as they all avoided each other’s eyes. Harry slowly glanced at Ginny, but she looked like she might cry again, and Harry didn’t think he would handle that well. He looked at Ron next to find that odd strategist look in his eyes again.

“I’m going upstairs,” Harry said suddenly. He didn’t want to spend any more time around people today. He would write Hermione, just not today.

“Yeah,” Ginny said, instantly turning to follow her parents into the kitchen. Ron nodded as well and started heading toward the library.

Harry clambered up the stairs quickly and locked his door the moment he was inside. He felt like he blinked and opened his eyes to find himself back in the wardrobe. He couldn’t help it, his breath was speeding up rapidly, and the panic attack from earlier that had been interrupted was back with a vengeance to finish the job.

His fault. His fault. His fault.

the traps.

“You must understand, Sirius. The Dursleys offer Harry something you cannot provide. The blood protection he has there will keep him safe from Voldemort,” Dumbledore said evenly.

“He’s safest with me,” Sirius snarled. “I’m not going to take him back there so that he can be neglected by those awful people. They had him locked in a room. He was barely taken care of. I won’t allow it.”

“I implore you to see reason,” Dumbledore tried again. The rest of Sirius’s patience snapped, and he took a menacing step toward the old man. Remus placed a hand on his shoulder as if to calm him, but Sirius shook it off.

“Petunia and Vernon Dursley are only alive because I can’t risk being sent back to Azkaban, but hear me when I say this,” he snarled, “I will kill both of them and that awful kid of theirs before I allow Harry to be sent back there.”

Dumbledore’s eyebrows rose, but otherwise, he did not react to this threat. He gave a solemn nod and frowned tightly. “We will need to find a new headquarters for the Order,” he said.

“Fine,” Sirius said, turning away from him just as Molly popped out of existence with Harry in tow. He had originally wanted to speak to Harry after the funeral service, but now he felt a bit relieved that Harry wasn’t there to watch him lose his mind. He would speak to him when he and Remus returned home. For now, Molly and her children could keep him company.

“Are you ready?” Remus whispered to him.

Sirius nodded. “Let me just say goodbye to everyone.”

He was a bit surprised by how levelheaded he felt today given the way his thoughts tended to destabilize. Somewhere deep in his mind, he knew it was because he had a task to focus on. The moment that task was completed, he knew the knowledge that Regulus was gone would seep into his bones, bleeding into every crevice in his mind, and would destroy him.

“Sirius,” Andromeda said as he walked toward her. He wasn’t expecting to see her. He hadn’t spoken to her since he got out of Azkaban, too caught up with everything else, and honestly, too embarrassed by the man he was now to spend time in the presence of the cousin who never once let her decorum slip even as she ran from the family. She hugged him tightly as he approached her, and for a moment he felt like he was fifteen, abandoned by his family and unloved by his parents and brother, and he wanted to start crying.

He swallowed harshly. “Thank you so much for coming,” he mumbled. “Did Tonks tell you about it?”

“Tonks,” Andromeda muttered dismissively. She wasn’t fond of the name, that much was obvious. “Yes, she told me. I can’t believe I never knew that you had a son.”

Sirius blinked in confusion and surprise. “Oh, you don’t know,” he said.

“What don’t I know?” she asked. He shook his head.

“I’ll explain, but just not today,” he said. “Today... I can’t.”

“Okay,” she said gently, rubbing his upper arm comfortingly. “Come by for tea anytime. Ted and I would love to see you. And of course, Remus is always welcome.” There was a sparkle in her eye as she said Remus’s name that made Sirius’s stomach clench painfully. Was that look associated with him, or with Tonks?

“Of course, thank you,” he said. He made quick work of bidding everyone else goodbye. He was a tad confused by Hagrid, Cedric, and Fleur’s attendance but didn’t care enough to ask why they were there, and he thanked them for attending all the same. Remus was waiting for him, looking handsome and patient as he stood with his hands behind his back.

“All right?” he asked. Sirius nodded. He wanted to crawl into his arms and fall asleep, but there was a sting there that he couldn’t let go of. Even looking at Remus caused him pain and now wasn’t the time to deal with it.

They had spent the last two days talking about their plan to kill Bellatrix. Sirius had to admit that he was surprised when Remus so readily agreed to it. He had spat the words in anger, his deepest desire worn right on his sleeve, but Remus had only looked grim. Even now he wasn’t trying to talk Sirius out of it. Instead, he was trying to help him, though Sirius didn’t fully know why. He never thought Remus was one for murder, but he guessed he didn’t know this Remus all that well.

“I’m not sure how we’re going to find her,” Remus said to him yesterday morning. “She doesn’t exactly go out, and even if she is somewhere, she’s bound to be surrounded by Death Eaters, if not Voldemort himself.”

“That’s true,” Sirius said. “She would have been with the Lestrangle brothers before they were arrested. They would have been easier to find.”

“And easier to kill,” Remus muttered. Sirius raised his eyebrows at him, but Remus just continued to look at the table in consternation. “Why don’t we start at Lestrangle Manor? It’s possible that they visit there now that it isn’t under constant watch by the Aurors.”

“You don’t think it is?” Sirius asked.

Remus shrugged. “Why would it be? They’re in Azkaban right now, and other than Bellatrix, no one else is likely to frequent their house.”

That was where they were headed right after Regulus’s funeral. Remus kept harping on about honoring him with a funeral and how it would be good closure, but it all just felt like a vapid act, one that Regulus probably would have hated. Hunting down Bellatrix felt much closer to honoring him.

Sirius had only been to Lestrangle Manor one time. He was in his first year at Hogwarts when Bellatrix married Rodolphus. It was a huge deal in their family, the first of the next generation was getting married. The partnership was planned by Cygnus, and Bellatrix only found out about it two months before she was set to be married. Andromeda told him that Bellatrix was furious, destroying half of Cygnus's office before he had to place her under the Imperius Curse to get her to stop. At the time, Sirius nodded like this was a normal response. He hadn't quite learned how horrible his childhood was, not until second year.

He and his brother were dressed in extremely expensive dress robes and made to attend the wedding that took place on the Lestrangle Manor grounds. It was a large ceremony with many other pureblood families in attendance, though Bellatrix spent the entire time looking annoyed like she was a moment away from biting Rodolphus's throat out.

Sirius remembered the way the grounds were decorated lavishly, meant to impress all of their peers, with the dark manor on the hill towering over the grounds menacingly. Now, it looked very different. The grounds were dead, even though it was the middle of summer. He wondered if it was just a lack of care or if dark magic played a part in the decay of the land. The manor itself was clearly in a state of disrepair, even from the outside. Half the windows looked like they had been blown out by a storm, and the front door was off its hinges and leaning against the doorframe.

"There are no wards," Remus said thoughtfully as they walked up toward the manor.

"The Aurors might have taken them down when they ransacked the house," Sirius responded. Even though there weren't wards to keep him out, he felt unsettled as they approached the front door. It felt almost like they were being watched.

"We should check for traps," Remus whispered. Sirius understood the impulse to be quiet, it felt like if they were too loud something lying in wait in the house would hear them coming and attack.

"Yeah, good idea," Sirius said. He cast a quick revelio charm and immediately multiple objects lit up through the walls. "The entire house is booby-trapped. Why aren't any of them disarmed? I thought the Aurors were here."

"Maybe they set them after the Aurors searched the places. Do you think the traps are meant to kill us or to summon someone to our location?"

"I don't know," Sirius said. "It could be a mix of both, but there might not be a way to tell."

"So what do we do?" Remus asked, staring worriedly at the shining objects as the lights began to slowly fade.

"I think we're going to need a curse breaker if we want to search the house properly," Sirius responded with a frown. "Let's see if we can't get a better look at them first though."

"Okay," Remus agreed to Sirius's surprise. He knew that this agreeable attitude from Remus would eventually run its course, but he was mostly surprised that it hadn't already. He wasn't going to question it yet though, not until Bellatrix had taken her last breath.

They removed the front door as they walked in, vanishing it all together just to be safe, and entered the foyer slowly and carefully.

“Revelio,” Remus cast with a small flick of his wand. The room looked nearly empty to the naked eye, the only furniture and objects left were either broken or old and dingy. However, the moment Remus cast the spell, Sirius realized that nearly every object there lit up with magic.

“Did they place a curse on every object in the house?” Sirius said, only half serious.

“When did they even get the time?” Remus responded. Though many old pureblood families had long histories of curses created by their ancestors and had access to curses that muggleborns and half-bloods couldn’t even imagine, it still wasn’t easy to curse an object. It wasn’t the same as casting a spell, there was an intricacy to it. Plus, it was very draining on the body. It required a massive amount of focus and magical power to place a curse on an object. Creating this many curses over just a few months seemed like it would be nearly impossible.

“Homenum Revelio Maxima,” Sirius said. Nothing appeared. Unless someone had a very advanced invisibility cloak, the manor was empty.

“I doubt anyone is coming back here for visits,” Remus muttered. “I’m not sure what we can even find here.”

“No, me neither,” Sirius said. “Do you think anyone checks in on the property?”

“Doubtful,” Remus responded.

Sirius frowned. “I think we should set up a ward to alert us if anyone does come back.” Remus nodded in agreement. “But I don’t think it’s worth our time to search this minefield.”

“Minefield,” Remus said with a chuckle. “Where did you learn about mines?”

Sirius smiled. “Arthur Weasley,” Sirius said. “We started talking about the way muggles fight their wars, and he came over one night to tell me all about mines. He’s very... excitable when it comes to muggles.”

Remus laughed loudly. “Yes, that’s one way of putting it. Did you talk to him about your enchanted vehicles? From the way Harry describes it, his flying car isn’t that different from your motorbike.”

Sirius smiled despite himself. The motorbike brought sharp and painful memories to the surface, but beneath them was that naive excitement and fondness that he used to feel. “Yes, we talked about them. Did you know that he writes all the laws for the Misuse of Muggle Artifacts Office? He made enough loopholes so that he wouldn’t get in trouble for enchanting all those muggle items he finds, as long as he does it in a very specific way.”

“Huh, that I didn’t know,” Remus replied.

“Never let those Weasleys fool you, they’re just as corrupt as the rest of us,” Sirius said with a grin. Remus laughed.

“I’ll keep an eye out for them,” he said with false seriousness.

Sirius chuckled but sobered a moment later. “What do we do now? Bellatrix obviously isn’t here.”

“What about Malfoy Manor?” Remus asked. “Lucius wasn’t arrested with the others, though Harry said he was there. Maybe they all went back there. It would have the wards to keep unwanted visitors out.”

“Yes, but unfortunately we would be included in that unwanted visitors category.”

“What about Kreacher?” Remus said after a beat of silence. “House-elves might be able to travel in and out. He could at least find out if Bellatrix is there.”

“Of course,” Sirius said. He hadn’t thought about Kreacher at all since he was freed, though now he realized that the house elf had been noticeably absent from Grimmauld. It wasn’t uncommon for Kreacher to disappear for days at a time. Sirius turned and walked back out onto the grounds before calling him. “Kreacher.”

The ancient house elf popped into existence immediately. He looked different than the last time Sirius had seen him. His ears looked like they’d been burned with fiendfire, they were black and crispy. His hands bore multiple wounds like he had been punishing himself. Sirius thought about asking why Kreacher felt the need to do that, but Walburga had entrenched their house elves with so much bizarre training that he could have done that for failing to clean the attic for all Sirius knew. Besides, he wasn’t that interested in Kreacher’s inner life.

“Can you get in and out of Malfoy Manor?” he asked. Kreacher gave him a resentful look and did not answer. “Tell me the truth.”

“Yes, Kreacher can get into Malfoy Manor.”

“Go there and see if Bellatrix Lestrange is living there, then come right back and tell me.” He tried to be as clear as possible, Kreacher would probably try to weasel out of the instructions if he could figure out a way.

Kreacher bowed deeply and popped away with a snap. “I wonder how long it’ll take him,” Remus said thoughtfully.

Sirius shrugged. “He’ll probably take as long as he can,” Sirius said honestly.

“Should we head home then?”

“No, I’m going to wait here,” Sirius said. The thought of returning to Grimmauld so soon made his chest feel tight. He took a seat down on the dead lawn, leaning against the half-destroyed stone wall that surrounded the grounds. Remus was looking at him with a deep frown, but he didn’t argue. Eventually, he sighed and sat down as well.

“I know you don’t want to,” Remus said gently, Sirius tensed up immediately, “but I think we should talk about Harry.”

Sirius relaxed slightly. That was better than talking about Regulus at least, or about them, not that Remus would bring that up anytime soon. Or ever.

“I want to adopt him,” Sirius said, confessing the words that had been living inside him longer than he realized. It seemed too far out of reach before, but now that he was free, actually free, well, it could be an option.

Remus sucked in a breath, and Sirius braced himself for the discourse, but when Remus spoke it was with a reverence that Sirius hadn’t heard in a long time. “I think that’s a great idea,” he said.

Sirius felt the sudden urge to cry, the words like a soft blanket, more caring than what he was used to. He swallowed down the feeling. “Do you think he would want that?” Sirius said, annoyed by how insecure he sounded.

“Yes,” Remus said. “I think he would want that.”

“I was thinking I would ask him tomorrow,” Sirius said, “but he hasn’t seemed like he wanted to speak much yet.”

Remus nodded. “I think he’s really struggling,” Remus said softly. “I don’t think he’s been eating much. He looked thinner than the last time I saw him.”

Sirius leaned his head back against the stone wall again, blowing out a heavy breath. “I didn’t notice that, but now that you mention it... What do we do? I don’t — I have no idea how to help him.” He felt embarrassed admitting it, but it was the truth.

“You should talk to him about Regulus,” Remus said. Sirius flinched slightly. “I know you don’t want to, but Harry has never lost anyone like this before. He was too young to remember his parents dying.”

“Oh, but I’m well acquainted to loss?” Sirius said a bit sharply. The pain never got any easier. And Regulus... He’d already lost Regulus and had been given a stupid second chance only to lose him again. It felt like a punishment. Not to mention that Regulus died protecting him. He felt guilty the first time around, he’d abandoned his brother, and it led to his death. He didn’t abandon him this time, and yet he still caused his death. It was like he couldn’t stop causing bad things to happen to everyone around him. That final conversation he had with his father made another painful appearance in his thoughts.

“You know how to survive it,” Remus said. “Harry cared about Regulus. I think he saw him almost as a parent. I think it would make him feel better to know that you loved him too.”

Sirius shut his eyes, hoping to block out all the feelings that were dancing around him. He was afraid he would open his eyes to another hallucination, James giving him those sad eyes, Lily reminding him what a failure he was, or his father pointing out all his flaws. Would he see Regulus now? Would he be just another dead person sticking around just to torment him?

He didn't respond to Remus, but Remus thankfully didn't push it. He couldn't talk about this now, not yet. They settled in to wait, watching as the sun dipped low in the sky and slowly began to slide beyond the horizon. It was late and they'd been waiting for hours, though Sirius felt calm and patient. It was better than waiting at Grimmauld.

When Kreacher popped back into existence, the noise caused Sirius and Remus to startle.

"Kreacher has seen Mistress Bellatrix. She is among the Malfoys."

"Who else is in the house?" Sirius said, quickly adding, "Tell me the truth."

"Mistress Bellatrix's sister, Mistress Bellatrix's sister's husband, Young Master Draco, and the Dark Lord," Kreacher responded slowly.

"Quite the party," Remus said wryly. Sirius smirked slightly.

"The Dark — Voldemort lives there?" Sirius asked. Kreacher nodded. He sat for a moment, trying to figure out what might be the best course of action. "Kreacher, go and watch them, but stay hidden. Do not allow Bellatrix or any of the others to find out that you are there. The moment Bellatrix is there without the presence of Voldemort, come and find me. Do you understand?"

"Kreacher understands," Kreacher croaked.

"Go."

Kreacher disappeared and Sirius looked over at Remus. "It's a good plan," Remus said. "I doubt Narcissa or Lucius would pose much of a threat."

Sirius nodded in agreement. "Let's go home," Sirius said, standing up and stretching his aching body. He had been sitting still for too long.

They arrived back at Grimmauld shortly after sunset and entered in through the front door. The house was quiet, but there was a delightful smell wafting out of the kitchen. Molly had no doubt cooked a full meal for them while they were gone. "Harry?" Sirius called out, but no one answered back.

"Must be upstairs," Remus said.

They walked in a bit, passing by the door of the library. Sirius was about to keep walking when he spotted Ron sitting on the floor. He was sitting on his knees, a book open on the floor in front of him. He had his hands perched on either side of the open book, his head tilted down over it so his red hair was blocking the view of his face. It struck Sirius as odd. The way he was sitting seemed very uncomfortable, yet he was sitting so still that he looked like he'd been hit with a Body-Bind. Sirius was sure that he had never seen Ron read a book so intently.

"Ron?" Remus said softly from his place next to Sirius. Ron didn't react. They shared a confused look before Remus entered the room, walking slowly over to Ron and placing a hand on his shoulder. "Ron?" he said again.

Ron's head snapped up and Sirius got his first look at his eyes. They were stark white, but only for a second, gone so quickly that Sirius thought he imagined it. It was unnerving though, the blank face he wore staring up at Remus. After a long second, his face relaxed and he just looked confused.

"Where are the others?" Remus asked gently.

"Erm, I don't know," Ron said, shaking his head. "Think Mum's in the kitchen."

"Okay," Remus responded. "Are you all right?"

"Yes," Ron said quickly, shooting up to his feet, and leaving the book open on the floor.

"You're welcome to borrow anything you find in here," Sirius said.

"Thanks," Ron said, looking supremely uncomfortable. Remus and Sirius exchanged another look before leaving Ron in the library and heading for the kitchen. They found Molly and Arthur sitting at the kitchen table, talking in quiet voices.

"Oh, you're back," Molly said. "How are you doing, Sirius?"

"I'm fine," Sirius said stiffly. He appreciated her checking in, and especially her watching Harry while they were out, but he didn't think he was in a place to accept her attention at the moment. "Where is Harry?"

"He's upstairs," Arthur said. "He said he wasn't hungry. Ginny's already gone home."

"We made some food for you," Molly said, gesturing toward the truly insane number of dishes filled with food set under warming charms.

"Thank you, Molly," Remus said kindly.

"We'll just get out of your hair then," Arthur said, standing. "Please let us know if you need anything."

"Of course," Remus said diplomatically. "Thanks again for watching Harry."

They left quietly through the floo, Ron following after them with a book in hand. Sirius wondered which one it was that had interested him so much. The moment they were alone, Sirius began to feel unsettled again. He would be inclined to believe it was just the effect Grimmauld had on him, but there was something else.

"I think we should check on Harry," Sirius said quietly. "Maybe we can convince him to eat something."

Remus nodded solemnly and together they climbed the stairs to Harry's room. However, he wasn't inside, the door was propped open and the bedroom and bathroom were empty. Remus gave him a vaguely worried look.

"You don't think he would have left, do you?" Remus said.

“ Homenum Revelio ,” Sirius said instantly. He breathed a sigh of relief when he saw the outline of Harry down in the basement. At least he was still there. They hurried down the stairs. The basement, at one point, had been used as a wine cellar and a potions lab, but it had been empty for a long while. There wasn’t any reason for him to be down there.

“Harry?” Remus called when they reached the bottom of the stairs. There was barely any light, the cellar nearly pitch black with shadows. “Lumos.” Once the room was lit up, they spotted Harry in the center of the cellar. He was on his hands and knees, scrubbing the dirty cellar floor with a small flannel, an old bucket sitting next to him.

“Harry, what are you doing?” Sirius said alarmed. Harry looked up at him, his eyes watery with fear as he flinched at the sound of Sirius’s voice. Sirius took two steps toward him, and Harry sat back like he had been pushed.

“Please, don’t send me back!” he shouted before crumbling under a wave of wretched sobs.

“Send you back?” Sirius asked, rushing forward. He stopped about a foot away, unsure if he should touch him or not.

“I don’t want to go back to the Dursleys. I know I don’t deserve to be here! I know that. But I can clean and cook, and I’ll do anything you want, just please let me stay here!” He was working himself up into a state of terror.

“Oh, no. No, Harry, no,” Sirius rambled, giving into the desire to wrap his arms around the boy. He pulled him tightly against his chest, Harry’s body shaking with sobs. “We would never do that. We would never send you back to those people. This is your home.”

“I’m sorry,” Harry choked out, his voice muffled against Sirius’s shoulder. “I didn’t mean to. I didn’t want anyone to die. It’s all my fault.”

Sirius shushed him gently, giving Remus a helpless look. He was overwhelmed, Harry’s grief and panic almost too much to bear alongside his own. Remus kneeled next to them and put a firm hand on Harry’s back.

“It wasn’t your fault, Harry,” Remus said. “It was an accident. You were just trying to protect Sirius, that’s not a fault. Protecting the people we care about is what sets us apart from the people who would set out to hurt us. Regulus would never hold you responsible for this.”

Harry didn’t respond, Sirius honestly didn’t think Harry could speak anymore as he devolved into wordless cries. The emotions he must have been drowning in for weeks were finally spilling out. Sirius was just glad that he could be there with them. He was especially glad that Remus was there too, he was like a steady rock that kept them both from flying off the handle.

It took a few minutes for Harry to calm down, and when he finally did, he was leaning heavily into Sirius like he was moments away from falling asleep. Sirius didn’t want him to go to bed without them talking though.

“Did you truly believe that we would give you up that easily?”

Harry nodded but didn't respond. Sirius grabbed his shoulders and pushed him back slightly so that he could look at his face. It was blotchy and wet from tears, his eyes bright green behind his slightly off-kilter glasses.

"I love you, Harry," Sirius said. "I've loved you since before you were born — since the day Lily told me she was pregnant."

"Not since the day James told you?" Remus said. Sirius noticed the smile on his lips, his eyes fond.

Sirius smiled back, then looked at Harry again. "Lily told me first," he confessed with a whisper. "She swore me to secrecy because James wanted to wait a little bit, but she always liked me best."

Harry broke out into the first real smile that Sirius had seen on his face since before Regulus died. "Really?"

Sirius nodded. "She told me 'cause she knew I would love you, and she was right. Harry, there is something... we wanted to..." He looked at Remus again. He hadn't been prepared to tell him yet, but it was starting to slip out without him meaning to. Remus smiled encouragingly and Sirius took a deep breath.

"I want to adopt you, Harry."

Harry's eyebrows furrowed. "You want to adopt me?" Harry said, sounding dazed.

"If that's something you want," Sirius said quickly. "You belong here with me, okay? That'll be true even if you don't want me to adopt you."

Harry's eyebrows raised, and he looked a bit like he might start crying. "I want you to adopt me," he said quietly.

Something loosened in Sirius's chest, and he hugged Harry again, his eyes filled with tears when he looked at Remus. Remus was crying too. Sirius reached out to grab him by the front of his shirt and pulled him in. Remus followed suit and wrapped his arms around both of them.

So much was unknown. Maybe he and Remus would never again be what they once were, but they were all together. They had Harry and they would keep him safe, would make sure he felt loved. None of them would be left alone again.

the seer.

The first time Ron felt the effects of precognition was when he was five years old. He didn't know the word for it then, he wouldn't know the word for it for many years, not until Hermione told him it. However, with the benefit of hindsight, he knew that's what happened.

Fred and George, the troublemakers that they were, had called five-year-old Ron and beacons him upstairs to their room. He was sitting in the den eating a leftover sandwich that his mum had made for Ginny. She never finished her food, and Ron never could get enough. He would usually ask for seconds, often left hungry at the end of a meal, but his mum would usually just scold him.

"Ron, come up here. We want to show you something," Fred said, leaning over the stairs to shout.

Ron stuffed the rest of the sandwich in his mouth, chewing quickly as he climbed to his feet. He had just put his first foot on the stairs when he heard it. It wasn't a voice exactly, but it was like a thought that belonged to someone else. Make sure your dad is with you.

"What?" he said out loud.

"I said come up here," Fred shouted. He was back inside the twins' bedroom, but the door was open so Ron could hear his muffled voice.

"Okay," Ron said. He took another step. Get Dad. "Why?"

"What do you mean why? Just come up here," George said, his voice impatient. He didn't understand it then, though he knew the voice wasn't coming from his brothers. He turned his head and could just barely make out his dad standing outside the front door, talking to his mum. He stumbled over to him, opening the door a crack.

"Dad," he said softly.

"Just a second, Ron," Arthur said over his shoulder. "Should we call someone out to deal with them? I don't want the gnomes to destroy the garden."

"I'm going up to Fred and George's room, okay?" Ron said. "Will you come?"

"Sure, I'll be up in a second," Arthur said distractedly. Ron nodded, feeling settled, and approached the stairs again. He climbed them a bit slowly, waiting for the warning to return, but it remained silent.

"Finally," George groaned when Ron entered their room.

"What is it?" Ron asked curiously, not quite accustomed to the suspicion he needed to survive living with Fred and George.

“Hold out your hand,” Fred said. “We just found this super wicked piece of magic.”

Ron thought about it for a second then nodded. “Okay,” he said, holding out his hand. George grabbed it like he was going to shake it, but didn’t let him go. Fred turned around and grabbed their mum’s wand off the bed. The twins were always stealing her wand when she was distracted by Ginny.

“Ready?” Fred said. Ron nodded though he didn’t know what he was supposed to be ready for. George nodded quite seriously, looking very much like a grown adult rather than a seven-year-old. The tip of the wand began to glow slightly as if it were on fire. “Okay, you have to say yes to everything, all right? Otherwise, the spell won’t work.”

Ron nodded in understanding, straightening his shoulders determinedly.

“Do you, Ron, swear to always —”

He didn’t get to finish his sentence because a moment later their father burst into the room and started shouting. Ron didn’t understand what happened until later when his father sat him down and explained what an Unbreakable Vow was. Ron was very upset when he found out what Fred and George were trying to do, crying into his father’s shoulder for a good half hour before he calmed down.

There were other instances like that one, but as he got older, the words became less clear, often replaced with a distant feeling that would float by like a small rock in a rushing stream, the blink and he’d miss it kind of feeling. It was easier to ignore and often easy to overlook as he approached his eleventh birthday. He didn’t have a full vision until his first night at Hogwarts, but again he wouldn’t recognize it for what it was until he was older.

He was exhausted after the sorting ceremony, happy that he was put with the rest of his family. He was a little worried at first that he might be sorted somewhere else, there was always a little doubt in his mind that he should be in Gryffindor, but he knew he would disappoint his parents if he was sorted into Sly—another house. So after he was sorted in Gryffindor, he happily ate plate after plate of food, feeling full for the first time in his life, and by the time he climbed into his bed, he could barely keep his eyes open.

He fell into a dark, dreamless sleep, resting peacefully for most of the night, until suddenly he was pulled into the worst nightmare he’d ever had. He was inside a yawning cave, so dark that he could barely see his fingers in front of him until a light gleamed from deep in the cave. He was squinting at it one moment and the next he was right under it. He was on an island in the center of a pitch-dark lake.

He wasn’t alone on the island. There was a very old house elf who was crying silently, his knobby hands trembling as he grasped something between them. There was also a man dressed all in black. He was lying on the ground, shaking fiercely, and slowly crawling toward the water. Ron tried to ask what was going on or where he was, but he couldn’t speak. He would open his mouth and no sound would come out.

He watched frozen as the poor, shivering man climbed into the water, dead arms shooting out to grab onto the man’s wrists. He shouted in distress at first, but the final sounds he made as he was dragged underwater were sobs of despair. Ron woke with a cry, covered in sweat and his heart racing in his chest. He panted heavily as he tried to calm down, but the dream lingered behind his eyelids.

The next day he chalked it up to being in a new place and eating too much, but he couldn't stop the shiver that went down his spine when he remembered that last helpless sob he heard. By the time Halloween came around, he had all but forgotten it, but the sob stayed in the back of his mind, untouched and unthought of until he started Divinations in third year.

"You have a heart in the center, that's love," Ron said, looking back and forth between his book and cup with a curious look on his face. "The heart is under some kind of bridge or," Ron paused, "like an archway. That's... a new beginning or an ending. So you're going to find love or end love?" He said the final words trailing off into uncertainty.

It was the first time he'd done anything in Divination class, and Regulus easily brushed it off, but almost instantly it was tied to the sob of despair he'd heard during the nightmare in first year. He tried to shake it off, to forget it, but it stayed like an unwanted stench. However, his desire not to think about it was interrupted by Trelawney's desire to push him in class.

Ultimately, Trelawney's will won out. Ron had never received so much positive attention in his life, and now Luna was encouraging him, even if she was a bit odd while she did it, and Trelawney was trying to help him. Sure, Hermione thought he was making it up, but he didn't care. Even if he was making it up, it didn't matter, because this was something that was just his, and no one could take that away from him.

He threw himself into learning Divinations, into getting better, and soon he was looking at the dream over and over again, staring down the archway he saw in Regulus's teacup like it would give him all the answers. He began to see clearer the more he practiced, but there was always something right outside his reach.

It wasn't until the beginning of fourth year that he was first able to connect the dream to Regulus in a real way. In retrospect, he should have seen it earlier. Regulus was a completely different person than who he was pretending to be, and Ron interacted with him every day. He was so focused on the teacup that he missed the obvious message right beside him.

He wasn't mad when he first figured it out, that Regulus was much older than he claimed to be, that he might have died once, but he was mad when he realized that both Harry and Hermione knew. Neither of them bothered to tell him and that stung worse than anything else. Even Luna knew. He asked her about it, and she just replied, "Yes, of course. He's here for Harry."

"What do you mean?" Ron asked incredulously.

"You'll have to ask him. I don't think James would appreciate me telling Regulus's secrets."

"James?" Ron said questioningly. "Harry's father?"

Luna nodded seriously, and Ron stared at her confused for a long few moments. When she did not elaborate, he decided to drop it. She was always saying odd things, and he didn't feel much like looking into that particular detail that day.

He kept trying to see clearly the message he'd encountered in Regulus's teacup that first day, even during the days when he was speaking to Regulus or Harry after their fight following the night when Harry's name came out of the Goblet of Fire, but the answer always felt out of reach. It was as if it was right in the corner of his eye, directly out of sight, but hovering close enough to catch a glimpse of it if he was only fast enough. He could never manage it.

That all changed when Trelawney was fired. He knew that Hermione, and probably the others as well, thought that she was a terrible professor. Hermione was always calling her incompetent, but she worked hard to help Ron develop his gifts so He couldn't fault her for not being perfect in classes.

Some days it seemed like Trelawney was the only one who believed him. Hermione thought he was lying, Harry and Regulus didn't seem to care, and Luna supported him but sometimes that felt like it hurt him more than helped him. Parvati and Lavender believed him as well, but he found them dreadfully boring and didn't like to spend too much time with them – he really didn't understand how Regulus was friends with them. He only tried to bring up his gifts once to his mother, but she dismissed him so quickly that he never brought it up to his family again.

He felt alone every time he tried to improve or learn, and Trelawney was the only person who tried to help him. So when she was fired by Umbridge, Ron just about gave up on Divinations altogether.

"You have a gift, dear Ron," Trelawney said to him. "I think you will find your answers, but our time looking for them together is over." Ron went right up to the dorm and closed himself in his bed curtains so that no one would know how upset he felt.

He thought it was all over, but then he met Firenze. Firenze was one of the oddest individuals Ron had ever met. He was a centaur, but he was different from the ones in the Forbidden Forest who reacted harshly to wizards and were always threatening to drag them away deep into the forest if they dared to enter – at least, according to legend. Firenze wasn't like that, but there was still mistrust there that Ron could hear in every word. He agreed to teach wizards, but he would never truly like them. The first time Ron spoke to him one-on-one, he even detected a lilt of pity in his voice.

"I've been trying to see something specific," Ron said, quickly explaining the archway he'd seen a few years ago. "I think there's more, but I've never been able to see it all."

Firenze pondered him for a long moment before turning away from Ron completely. He was staring out the large window that looked out onto the grounds of Hogwarts. The silence stretched on for so long that Ron wondered if he would ever reply. He was just beginning to contemplate leaving the office with his tail between his legs when Firenze spoke.

"There are some things that are better left unknown. Not all knowledge is a gift, Ronald Weasley."

"Oh," Ron said disappointedly. "So I can't see it?"

“That is not what I said,” Firenze said. He didn’t sound annoyed, but Ron still felt like he’d just been scolded. “But you should know, that once you have seen it, you may wish that you hadn’t.”

Ron didn't really understand that at the time. He just wanted to see it, he hated that it was hidden from him, so he responded, “I understand.”

Firenze gave him a blank look but ultimately nodded. “The most important thing to know about Divinations is that you cannot only use one type of practice if you want a complete view. This is a lesson my fellow centaurs have failed to learn, even after hundreds of years of studying the movements of the stars and planets. You saw your first clue using Tessomancy, but that does not mean the answer can be found there. Seeing comes from you, but you must use all tools at your disposal.”

“O—okay,” Ron stuttered. “What does that mean?”

“Think of it like magic,” Firenze said. “You cannot understand magic if all you learn is one subject. You will always be missing something. You must learn it all if you plan to succeed.”

“So, you’re saying that I need to learn another form of divination, but I’ve been learning other ones for months,” Ron said. He didn’t mean to sound so frustrated, but Firenze furrowed his eyebrows sharply. “Sorry,” he muttered.

“You have been learning, but you have not been looking. You may see without meaning to, but you will never see .”

Ron didn’t think he had ever felt stupider and that was really saying something considering he spent most of his time with Hermione and Regulus. Still, Firenze was actually a good professor, and together they started working through many of the different practices, some that he had learned with Trelawney, but many that he did not.

By Christmas, he had spent more time looking at Tarot cards, staring into mirrors, inspecting smoke patterns, cracking eggs, and observing fish, rats, mice, and stones than he had ever wanted to. He was exhausted, his mind fried beyond repair, and yet he felt like he was getting nowhere. Still, the archway he saw in Regulus’s tea leaves remained tauntingly out of reach.

He found other things — he discovered Regulus and Harry’s secret about them becoming animagi, which was just a simple ask-and-find method. His words, not anyone else’s. He didn’t understand it well enough to put it into words, and he hadn’t brought it up to Firenze, but sometimes if he just focused on the answer he needed, he would simply find it. He tried it a few times while thinking about the archway, but so far he hadn’t had any luck.

“This is useless,” Ron complained.

“You are welcome to give up,” Firenze said. He didn’t say it in a mean way, but that almost made it worse. He said it like it was a simple fact that affected no one but Ron.

“I don’t want to give up,” Ron mumbled petulantly.

Firenze sighed. "You are a Seer."

Ron gasped. It was the first time Firenze had actually said that word, had truly called him that.

"You will find some success with all practices, but there will be one that speaks to you above all else. Now, shall we move on to fire omens?" Firenze said. Ron nodded then flinched when Firenze lit a huge fire in the middle of the classroom.

Somehow it ended up being one of the last practices that gave him the answer he needed, and he didn't even discover it on purpose. He was once again feeling frustrated by his lack of progress, made worse because of the way tensions were rising. He knew that something was coming, but he couldn't tell what it was.

He was looking through his trunk for one of his books, thinking about that stupid teacup. It had been well over a year since he'd seen it, and yet it still bugged him. He kept shoving books out of the way, one after another, so lost in thought that he forgot what he was looking for.

"Just show me the answer!" he growled, impulsively grabbing Defensive Magical Theory, the textbook Umbridge had assigned, and throwing it against the window. It slammed against the glass and fell to the ground, opening to a random page. He glared at it for a moment before stomping over to pick it up.

It was open to a random page in chapter two: Common Defensive Theories and their Derivation. His eyes instantly landed on a paragraph about what derivation meant and how it could be used to understand what a defensive spell did without actually casting the spell. It was all nonsense, at least when it came to Defense Against the Dark Arts, but the more he read the paragraph, the more he realized this was the answer he was looking for.

It wasn't in divination at all, it was in the derivation of the archway itself. Where did the archway come from? He should have been looking for that the entire time. He rushed to the library, brushing past Hermione who was just leaving, her hair sticking up on all sides after she'd spent the afternoon tugging on it in frustration.

"Where are you going?" she said curiously.

"I have to find the archway," Ron said.

"Oh, that again," Hermione said, rolling her eyes and turning away. Ron tried not to let it hurt him, pushing his feelings to the side. The library was nearly empty that time of night, with only a few students here and there. If Hermione was already leaving, then it definitely was late.

He closed his eyes. "What is the archway?" he whispered. He opened his eyes without seeing, breathing deeply and allowing his body to just move. He walked into the restricted section without pausing, climbing down the stairs the moment he was inside, as he headed toward the very back of the section.

When he felt like he could see again, he was staring at a black book bound in old leather. There was no title and when he opened it, he discovered that it was written completely in Latin. He sighed frustratedly. There was no way he would be able to read this. He wasn't smart. And it wasn't like he could ask for Hermione's help without facing her judgment. There was no way he was approaching Regulus with this, not after all this time of hunting for answers in secret.

He sat down next to the bookshelf, grateful that there wasn't anyone patrolling the restricted section. He began to flip through the book halfheartedly, looking at the occasional pictures, until he flipped to one about halfway through. There it was. The archway. It was hand-drawn on the side of the page, but it was a perfect replica of what he'd seen in the tea leaves.

One second he was in the library, and the next he was in front of the archway. The real one. He looked around, but he couldn't see anything else. It was just shadows. He turned back to the arch, watching it curiously. After a few moments, someone came into view, and for the second time in his life, Ron watched Regulus Black get dragged to his death. He fell through the archway while clawing hands shot out, digging into his skin, and ripping him backward. Even if he had tried to stop, they wouldn't have let him. He heard Harry scream his name, his voice perfectly clear even though Ron couldn't see him.

Ron gasped loudly. He was back in the library, the book discarded on the ground in front of him.

"Oh, no," he whispered. "Oh, no!" he shouted.

"Who is down there?" he heard Pince yell. He scrambled to grab the book and sprinted out of the restricted section. Pince was yelling at him as he went, but he just kept running, not stopping until he made it to Firenze's office.

"Regulus is going to die!" he squeaked out the moment he was inside, a stitch in his side from running. Firenze looked at him blankly and nodded. "What? No, don't nod. He's going to die!"

"Yes, he is."

The noise that came out of Ron was the mix between a gasp and a gag. "Wh—What? You knew?" he said.

"I told you that there are some things better left unknown," Firenze said.

"No! This isn't better left unknown or whatever rubbish you're talking about. I know he's going to die, I can stop it."

Firenze frowned. "This is something else humans struggle to understand."

"What is?" Ron demanded.

"Some things cannot be changed. You must allow them to happen."

Ron shook his head. "Why?" he said.

“Come, let me show you something,” Firenze said. Ron wanted to throw a fit and leave the room, he felt so betrayed by Firenze. He couldn’t believe that he knew Regulus was going to die again, and he hadn’t said anything. He couldn’t fight his curiosity though. He walked over to Firenze’s desk – if one could even call it that. He couldn’t exactly sit behind a desk given his horse-like body, but he still had a large table that was covered in books, papers, and random devices used for divination.

He pointed to the large crystal ball in the center of the table. “Look for Regulus’s future,” Firenze instructed. Ron glared at him for a second before turning to the crystal ball. He let his eyes unfocus, slipping into the deep breathing he had been taught. He could read crystal balls in his sleep. Except now he couldn’t. There wasn’t anything.

“I don’t see anything because he’s going to die,” Ron said, his voice a mixture of glumness and anger.

Firenze hummed shortly. “Now look for your own,” he said.

Ron sighed but followed the instructions. Once again he saw nothing, there was no future, it was just dark. “What?” he breathed.

“Regulus’s death is a pivotal point, as it was last time. It must happen, but what happens afterward is left up to you.”

“What does that mean?”

“I can’t tell you that,” Firenze said. “The important thing is that Regulus must die, as he had to die before. His death is the only road to the future, you will not be able to see it until Regulus is dead.”

Those words weighed on Ron’s mind heavily as he went into each of his O.W.L.s. He tried not to look at Regulus too often, it felt like he couldn’t breathe every single time he did. It was worse when he saw Harry though. Would Harry ever forgive him if Regulus truly died and Harry found out that Ron knew ahead of time?

In the end, he couldn’t have stopped it even if he wanted to. He was instantly expunged from the fight where Regulus died, with Ron knocked out on the Department of Mystery floor. From what he heard after the fact if Regulus hadn’t died, then Sirius would have died in his place. None of that removed the guilt he felt though, especially when he arrived at Regulus’s funeral and saw how twitchy and skinny Harry looked.

They talked briefly, but Ron was too swallowed up in his feelings to be of any use to Harry. He tried lightly to encourage him to write Hermione back. He felt bad that she wasn’t invited to the funeral though he understood that it was for her own safety. Still, she had sent him no less than ten letters since they’d gone home for the summer.

The moment he was breathing in the musty air of Grimmauld Place after the funeral, he let himself sink into that hazy part of his brain that knew things he didn’t, and he let it guide him. What did he do now? Regulus was dead and Ron was in the unknown.

“Ron?” he heard someone say. It echoed like he was back in the cave where Regulus died the first time. “Ron?” This time he heard it. It was Remus speaking to him. He looked up before he could see, but his eyes slowly came into focus as he stared up at the man. He was on his knees in the library, not the best way to be found, and Remus was looking worriedly down at him. “Where are the others?”

“Erm, I don’t know,” he replied, uncertainly. “Think Mum’s in the kitchen.”

“Okay. Are you all right?” Remus said.

“Yes,” he said, suddenly worried that they would question him on what he was doing. How would they react if they knew the truth?

“You’re welcome to borrow anything you find in here,” Sirius said. Ron hadn’t noticed him at first.

“Thanks,” he replied awkwardly.

He went home that night with the book he’d found in the library, when he thought of finding it he could only remember dragging it out from underneath the bookshelf. It had been discarded there by someone. He took it up to his room before looking at it.

“A Soul’s Match by Alvina Ackerly,” he read quietly. Was this the answer he was looking for?

Hermione cried herself to sleep every night of June after Regulus died. She kept replaying their last interaction, Regulus waking her after Death Eaters knocked her out and telling her to help the others. He put his hand on her cheek and calmed her panic in a single sentence. He had done that so many times for her since she met him in first year, and now he was gone, slipped through the veil.

Harry was a shell of himself during the final days of term. Ron seemed just as shocked and empty, Hermione didn't think he'd ever gone so many days without speaking. Ginny kept leaving to go out to the Quidditch Pitch, staying out there until well after curfew. Luna disappeared altogether, and Hermione had to find her using the map after she snuck it out of Harry's trunk. It took some searching, but she finally spotted her name down at the boathouse.

She wasn't sure what pushed her to seek Luna out, it wasn't like the two of them were close. They were barely even friends, but for some reason, she felt the need to find her and see if she was okay. Perhaps it was because it was the kind of thing Regulus would do. The thought made her sad. It always felt awkward between her and Luna, but now that Regulus was gone, it felt like Hermione needed every lifeline that she could grasp.

"Luna?" she called out when she finally made it down there. Luna was sitting near the water, her knees curled up against her chest. She looked over her shoulder when Hermione called her name.

"Oh, hello," she said softly, turning back around to gaze out over the lake.

"What are you doing down here?" Hermione asked. She walked up to her side, doing her best to pretend she didn't feel uncomfortable, and sat down, tossing her legs over the side of the boathouse so her feet hung right above the water.

"Regulus spent a great deal of time down here this year," Luna replied. "Did you know that?"

Hermione shook her head. "No, he never mentioned it."

"I don't think he would appreciate someone discovering all his potion equipment. I came down to clean it up," Luna said, her voice so quiet that it was nearly lost in the wind. Her eyes were dry, but red-rimmed like she'd been crying.

“Sometimes it felt like we never really knew him at all,” Hermione said without meaning to.

“He kept a lot of secrets,” Luna said. “But I don’t think he did it to hurt us. I think he just wanted us all to be safe.”

Hermione nodded, though she wasn’t sure if Luna noticed. She didn’t reply. It didn’t feel like there was anything left to say. Her eyes teared up again, her throat tight with sadness and regret. She wished they had never gone to the Ministry.

“Did the Aurors talk to you?” Hermione asked after a while when her emotions had settled again and she felt she could speak.

“Yes,” Luna replied. “I told them that Umbridge wanted to use the Cruciatus Curse on Regulus. They didn’t believe me.”

“They said that?” Hermione asked, startled.

“No, but I can always tell.” Luna gave her a quick look out of the corner of her eye before gazing back out at the Black Lake as if nothing happened. Hermione felt a swell of guilt, though she often didn’t believe in the ridiculous theories or creatures that Luna would discuss, she probably could have been nicer about it. Regulus would have wanted her to be nicer. She sighed quietly.

“I overheard them talking. They think that the centaurs might have done something to her,” Hermione said.

Luna hummed quietly. “That is a shame. The centaurs are already treated so poorly by wizardkind.”

“You don’t believe they were involved?” Hermione asked. All they knew was that Umbridge left Draco and Regulus at the edge of the forest and had walked in alone. She hadn’t been seen since.

“Isn’t it obvious?” Luna said. Hermione gave her a questioning look. “Umbridge told Regulus that she was the one who sent dementors after Harry.”

“Right,” Hermione said slowly, she had mentioned that to the Aurors in her own interview, but they only nodded like they already knew, “but what does that have to do with the Forbidden Forest?”

“Umbridge put Harry in danger.” Luna didn’t say anything else, and Hermione’s first instinct was to question her, to ask what she could possibly mean, but slowly, Luna’s meaning sunk in. Umbridge had confessed to sending dangerous creatures after Harry Potter because she didn’t like him. If he wasn’t already proficient at casting the Patronus Charm, he could have died or ended up soulless.

“Do you think Regulus killed her?” Hermione whispered, she worried that if she spoke the words any louder someone might overhear even though they were completely alone.

“Yes,” Luna said simply. Hermione gasped quietly. She felt like she should dismiss it as a possibility outright, but as the seconds passed, it started to make more sense. She wondered if Draco knew. Would he tell anyone? Why had he lied to begin with? Although it wasn’t like the Aurors could do anything to Regulus now, even if Umbridge was indeed dead somewhere in the Forbidden Forest.

The train ride back to London was deadly silent. Harry was headed back to the Dursleys since Sirius had been arrested with the other Death Eaters at the Ministry that night and just being around him felt like all the air was being sucked out of the room. He looked terrible and she knew it would only get worse now that he was going back to his muggle family.

Her parents picked her up from King’s Cross, greeting her cheerfully until they took in her appearance.

“What happened, honey?” her mother asked gently. Hermione just shook her head. There was no way to explain that would put her parents at ease, and she didn’t want to risk them pulling her out of school when they found out one of her fellow students had died.

She wrote to Harry and Ron the moment she was home, sending out letters to Ginny, Luna, and Neville as well when she realized they had barely spoken near the end of the year. No one responded to her except for Luna. Hermione was a bit surprised, but was pleased to find that she’d written a four-page letter filled with her favorite memories of Regulus. The letter was nearly illegible by the time Hermione finished reading it, her tears destroying the carefully written letters on the page. She responded with her own letter a few days later.

Ron sent her a quick note a few weeks into summer to tell her about the funeral. Hermione wasn’t allowed to attend, Dumbledore said it was too dangerous. She wrote to Luna about that too, complaining about being left out and explaining how lonely she felt. Sometimes it felt like she wouldn’t have had friends at all if it wasn’t because of Regulus. Luna assured her that wasn’t true when she wrote back, but Hermione couldn’t shake the feeling.

Her parents were worried about her as she spent most days closed up in her room, but she refused to talk to them. Maybe one day she would explain, but she couldn’t bear to talk about it yet. She thought the rest of the summer would end up the same way, lonely and isolated except for the few letters from Luna, an unlikely friend in a time of grief, but two days into July, Harry finally wrote back.

Hermione,

I’m sorry I haven’t responded. Don’t take it personally, I haven’t responded to anyone. Sirius has been freed, I don’t know if you already saw, but they released him. He says he wants to adopt me. Can you believe it?

Anyway, we had Regulus’s funeral. I’m sorry you couldn’t be there, but you didn’t miss much. Fleur was there though. Did you know that she and Bill are dating now? How weird is that? I’ve been living at Grimmauld for a while now, but it’s hard being here without Regulus. You should come and visit if you get the chance.

Harry

Hermione had not been keeping up with the news about Sirius, but she was relieved to hear that he was freed. It was a shame that Regulus wasn't here to see it. She wrote Harry back quickly, sending the letter off with Nyx, Regulus's owl.

On the morning of the fifth, Regulus's birthday, Luna showed up at her front door with her father, Xenophilous, in tow.

"Dad is going to take me to see Harry," she said. "I thought you might want to come."

Hermione gasped, tears springing to her eyes, and hugged Luna before she could second guess it. She pulled back a beat later feeling embarrassed, but Luna just smiled kindly. She quickly went to tell her parents that she was going to visit Harry, and though they had some questions, mostly for Xenophilous who just seemed confused, they let her leave with next to no fuss. They were more than used to sending her off to the wizarding world by now.

Though she was glad to finally be with her friends at Grimmauld, the day was mournful. They arrived during breakfast. Harry looked thinner than the last time she saw him. He got up to greet her with his plate still mostly full, and though he made like he was going to leave it, Sirius gently nudged him back toward the table and encouraged him to eat the rest. It felt like a private moment so she left them to it, opting instead to head toward the living room where she found Arthur, Molly, and Ginny.

"Where is Ron?" she asked after greeting them.

"He went to the library," Ginny replied before following her parents into the kitchen. Sure enough, Hermione found Ron in the library browsing the books. It was the place she thought most unlikely to find him, but there he was, and when she asked about what he was doing, he brushed her off. She knew he was lying about something, but given what day it was, she decided not to push it. He would tell her eventually.

Remus took her home that night, apparating her straight to her front doorstep.

"Feel free to come over anytime," he said. "I know Harry appreciates you visiting."

"Thank you, Remus," Hermione said. She spent the next few days alone, despite the invitation. Grimmauld felt so wrong without Regulus's presence. She missed him dreadfully, and it felt like the entire house was empty without him there.

On the morning of the thirteenth, Hermione received her O.W.L. results in the mail. She instantly sent an owl to Harry asking if she could come over — it was only polite — and was pleasantly surprised when Remus showed up to take her there.

"Did you both get your results?" she said when she entered the kitchen. Harry and Ron were already sitting around the table with empty plates, the last remnants of whatever they'd had for breakfast. Harry nodded.

"Yep," Ron said grimly, holding up his unopened letter. Hermione wondered if he was nervous to see his scores before her eyes drifted to another set of results in the center of the table. On the front of the envelope was Regulus's name.

“They still sent them?” Hermione asked.

“They sent them to me,” Sirius said. He looked vaguely sick like he might keel over. “I don’t know why. I guess they thought I’d want to see how well he did.” He coughed suddenly and looked away from the three of them.

No one spoke for a long few moments, the silence tense with unasked questions and unspeakable grief. Hermione couldn’t drag her eyes away from the results, curiosity tugging at her. She knew that Regulus had taken all twelve O.W.L.s, though why he felt the need to she didn’t know, but there was something so grotesque about that representation of the future he would never get to have sitting on the table in front of her.

“I’ll leave you guys to it,” Sirius stiffly and fled the room. Hermione only glanced at him for a second as he left, her eyes drifting back to the O.W.L. results.

“Do you think we should open it?” Ron asked.

“Yeah,” Harry said. “I... I want to know how he did.” He looked like he was a moment away from crying, a feeling Hermione shared.

“Do you want to do it?” Hermione asked. Harry shook his head.

“No, you do it,” he replied quietly.

“Okay,” she said. “Let’s open ours first.”

Ron and Harry nodded and together the three of them opened their O.W.L. results. Hermione felt a surge of disappointment. She had taken ten O.W.L.s and had expected to do well in every single one. She spent months, if not years, preparing for them, and it still wasn’t good enough.

“Damn it,” she whispered.

“What? Did you get one E?” Ron said jokingly.

“Yes,” she said with grave disappointment. “In Defense Against the Dark Arts.”

“Oh, I got an O in that class,” Harry replied.

“Well, you don’t need to rub it in,” Hermione snapped. Harry and Ron laughed and though she thought she usually would be insulted and irritated by their dismissal, she was so relieved to see a smile on Harry’s face, that she found herself mimicking it. “Whatever,” she mumbled.

Their laughter died as they both seemed to remember Regulus’s results. Hermione took a deep breath and grabbed the envelope, tearing it open quickly. It was better to just get it over with.

Hermione read them all aloud slowly, her eyes widening each time Regulus received another passing grade. “Wow, he got all twelve,” Hermione said.

“Yeah, he got more than you, Hermione,” Ron said with a watery grin.

Hermione rolled her eyes. “Yes, well, he is a lot older than I am,” Hermione said. Ron and Harry burst out laughing, and slowly Hermione found herself joining them.

A few days after that, Hermione decided to move into Grimmauld Place for the rest of the summer. She couldn't stand being home with her parents any longer since she didn't feel comfortable talking about Regulus's death. Her parents were a bit upset by it, she knew they missed her during the school year, but she just felt too isolated with them. She loved her parents, but she didn't feel like she belonged at home with them anymore.

Though Grimmauld still held its own loneliness, Hermione found it comforting. She would spend most of the day alone, Sirius, Remus, and Harry not very interested in talking, she knew that her grief was understood. She didn't have to explain who Regulus was or what his death meant to her, because everyone in the house understood it too. Probably better than she did.

She sent a quick owl off to Luna to tell her, and Luna replied right away saying that she thought it was a good idea. "I think you being around will help everyone feel better," Luna wrote. Hermione teared up a bit reading it, adding the letter to all the other ones she'd received from Luna that summer.

Ron was a frequent visitor at Grimmauld as well, however, he started acting increasingly odd as the hot days of July passed. While Harry was usually shut up in his room, or more likely, in Regulus's room, Ron would disappear for hours altogether. About a week from the end of July, Hermione decided that she needed to find out what he was doing.

They ate breakfast together that morning, Hermione pretending not to notice that Sirius was nudging Harry to eat more as each day progressed, and then they each retired to different rooms of the house just as Ron came through the floo from his house.

"Morning," he said before stuffing a half-eaten muffin into his mouth. Hermione nodded at him, and pretending to go into the library, she shut the door so that it was left open only a sliver and listened carefully as Ron climbed the stairs. She tiptoed out to follow him. Remus was in the living room and gave her a passing glance but thankfully didn't question what she was doing.

Sirius was down in the basement, though she wasn't sure what he was doing down there. Harry was in Regulus's room again. He had the door closed though so she snuck past without an issue. Ron was on the floor above, she could hear his footsteps as he snuck around. She crept up quickly, trying to move as silently as possible. It took her a moment to figure out what room he was in at first, as all the doors were closed, but then she heard a tiny creak behind one of them.

She burst into the room without thinking, slamming the door open. "What are you doing?" she hissed.

Ron jumped in surprise and spun around so quickly that he almost fell over. He was digging around in the bedside table of what she now realized was Sirius's bedroom. He had his hand tucked behind his back as he stared at her like a deer in headlights.

"Nothing," he said quickly. "Did you follow me up here?"

“Yes,” she said. He shushed her frantically, and she rolled her eyes, shutting the door softly so they wouldn’t be overheard. “Are you stealing from Sirius?”

“No!” Ron said.

“Then what’s in your hand?”

“It’s nothing,” he said, looking away from her.

“Just tell me,” she pleaded.

Ron gave her a calculating look. “Okay, but you can’t tell anyone. Not Sirius or Harry.”

She narrowed her eyes, considering him, but ultimately agreed with a quiet, “Fine.”

He pulled his hand around and opened his fingers to reveal a small stone sitting in the middle of his palm. It was black and angular, but it had a sheen to it that made it look peculiar.

“What is that?” she asked, taking a step forward.

“I don’t know, but…”

“But?” she said, looking away from the stone to find him watching her with a deep frown on his lips.

“I think,” he whispered, “that I can use this to bring Regulus back.”

“What?!” she yelled. He jumped forward and covered her mouth with his hand.

“Stop, I don’t want them to hear us,” Ron said. “I don’t want Harry or Sirius to find out in case it doesn’t work.”

“What are you talking about?” she hissed, grabbing his wrist to remove his hand from her face.

“I had a vision —”

“Oh, honestly,” she huffed, dropping his wrist and turning away.

“You know what, forget it,” he said. He brushed past her and stomped out of the room before she could stop him. She tried to follow him downstairs, but by the time she reached the living room, he had traveled through the floo.

“Is something going on?” Remus asked, raising his eyebrows questioningly. Hermione debated telling him what she had seen but opted against it. She didn’t know what Ron was doing, but it felt wrong to tell on him.

“It’s nothing,” Hermione said quickly and walked back to the library, falling heavily into one of the old chairs. She found Ron’s obsession with divination so frustrating. It was all nonsense, and it just felt like Ron was only interested in it because Trelawney told her that she wasn't good at it. It felt like he was trying to annoy her with it.

However, as the hours ticked by and Ron didn't return, Hermione began to feel bad. If she could find some hope of Regulus returning, wouldn't she invest her time in it? Wouldn't she do anything to bring him back?

The next day, right after breakfast, Hermione went to the Weasleys' home and found Ron reading in his bedroom.

"Come to yell at me?" he said snidely. She crossed her arms defensively but didn't bite back. She came into his room fully, shutting the door behind her, and sat down on the bed beside him. Her stomach flipped uncomfortably. She'd never felt embarrassed to be alone with him before, but she couldn't deny the slight nervousness she felt sitting on his bed now. She pushed away the feeling though. There were more important things.

"Tell me about your idea."

Ron must have been waiting for the opportunity because it took very little prodding for him to explain the bizarre soulmate book he'd found in Grimmauld. It looked like something she would find in Lavender's trunk, how it ended up under a bookshelf in the Black family library, she had no idea. It also seemed like a pile of balderdash, but she bit her tongue and didn't say so out loud. He showed her a chapter that had to do with soulmates, mentioning people being called to the veil after their so-called soulmate died, often walking into it, straight to their death.

"You think Regulus was called by his soulmate?" Hermione asked, uncertainly. She tried to keep the judgment out of her voice, but by the way, Ron frowned, she didn't think she succeeded.

"No," Ron said. "He fell in trying to save Sirius, but this book mentions the veil like it's a place that holds the dead."

"Like a doorway," Hermione said softly.

Ron nodded. "Exactly," he said. "I found a spell that can open magically sealed doorways in the Black library, it uses a bunch of runes that I've never seen before, but I think it might work."

"Wow," Hermione said, grabbing the other book out of his hand. It was a very old handwritten grimoire that was full of runes and rituals that had mostly likely been forgotten or never known by most wizard society. "This is amazing."

Ron chuckled softly. "I should have known that would be what you cared about," he said, the fondness in his voice softening any insult she might have felt.

"This is really complicated," she said, looking over the ritual.

"I know, but it's mostly just drawing the runes, so I think I could manage it."

“And the stone?”

Ron paused, looking down at his hands as he picked at his nails. There was dirt under most of them, probably from working out in the gardens. His hands had grown so much recently, she realized. They looked bigger than the last time she looked at them. Or had she ever really looked at them? Krum also had large hands, something she found distracting as they danced together at Yule Ball. Ron’s were different though, there was delicateness to them, a softness that couldn’t be found in Krum.

“It called to me,” he whispered, his voice jolting her out of her momentary distraction. Honestly, what was wrong with her? Obsessing over Ron’s hands when they were having such a serious conversation.

“It called to you?” she asked gently.

He nodded. “Like when I discovered that Harry and Regulus were becoming animagi. I knew something was hidden, and I found it.”

It was the divination thing again, but she chose not to point that out. To her, this all sounded so ridiculous, but then again, he did manage to find the animagi stuff. Maybe, just maybe, there was something to it. Probably not. But maybe. She’d forgotten about their animagi preparations. They hadn’t worked on that in months, too bogged down by O.W.L.s and Regulus’s death.

“How do you think the stone is going to help?”

“I don’t know. I don’t even really know what it is,” Ron admitted. “I don’t like holding it though. It makes me feel weird.”

Hermione hummed curiously. “Can I take a look at it?”

“Sure,” Ron said. He got up to grab a box from underneath his bed, pulling out a piece of bright orange fabric and placing it into her hand. She unwrapped it and found the stone bundled inside. It didn’t make her feel weird, it didn’t make her feel anything at all, but she still decided not to touch it. It was obviously a magical object, just based on its appearance, but what it was, she didn’t know.

“Why did Sirius have this?”

“I don’t know,” Ron answered, sitting back down next to her. Their knees knocked together briefly and Hermione tensed instinctively. “But it was in a box with an old ring that had been cracked in half.

“Don’t you think he might notice that it’s missing?” Hermione said.

“Maybe,” Ron said. “But I’m hoping to bring back Regulus first so that he won’t be too mad.”

Hermione couldn’t help but laugh. It was such a Ron response to a problem. She shook her head slightly. “When are you going to do this ritual? I mean, you’ll have to go back to the Department of Mysteries again. You might not even be able to get in.”

“I don’t know. Soon, I hope.”

Soon came quicker than Hermione expected. It was the thirty-first of July, Harry’s birthday, and Hermione was sitting at the kitchen table while Remus carried in a huge birthday cake with sixteen candles poked into it.

“Why sixteen candles?” Sirius asked.

“‘Cause he’s turning sixteen,” Remus said.

“Oh, right,” Sirius muttered. “Must be a muggle thing.” Remus gave him an odd look before placing the cake in front of Harry. It was a small gathering, but it was still nice to be able to celebrate Harry’s birthday with him.

After the cake was cut, Harry began opening presents. About halfway through the pile, Kreacher popped into existence at the other end of the room.

“Master,” he greeted. Sirius’s body froze like he’d been hit with a spell, then he turned to look at Remus with a wild look in his eyes. Remus nodded to the hallway and the two of them walked out of the room with Kreacher in tow.

“What do you suppose that was about?” Fred said with a smirk.

“No, boys, leave them alone,” Molly said. The group devolved into playful arguing for a moment before Remus reentered the room looking worried.

“Molly, Arthur, would you mind staying here for a bit? Sirius and I need to run a quick errand.”

Molly nodded, looking vaguely concerned.

“Harry,” Remus said gently. “We’ll be back soon. I’m sorry to interrupt your birthday.”

“It’s fine,” Harry mumbled, looking embarrassed at being singled out. Remus squeezed his shoulder and left. Harry put his presents to the side, announcing that he was going to wait to open the rest until Remus and Sirius got back.

They settled into various conversations and Hermione was in the middle of talking to Ginny about her upcoming classes when Ron elbowed her. She gave him a questioning look and he quickly darted his eyes to the door. She nodded in understanding and watched him slip out of the room. She went back to talking to Ginny for a few more minutes so that no one would get suspicious, and when Ginny was drawn into a conversation with Luna, Hermione stood up quickly and left the room.

She found Ron in the living room waiting by the floo. “You want to do this now?” she asked incredulously.

“Yes,” he said quickly. “I have to do it now.”

Hermione’s heart began to race but she nodded. “Okay, okay, let me just get something and we’ll go.” She left him in the living room as she ran up to her bedroom to grab her wand and the objects needed for the ritual. It wasn’t much, just a few potion ingredients that she found in the basement of Grimmauld and a set of magical chalk that was used to write runes on the ground. She sprinted back downstairs and together she and Ron flooded to the Ministry.

It was late in the day thankfully since Harry’s birthday was on a Tuesday and the Ministry could have easily been filled with employees. There was a guard posted in the atrium, and Hermione felt momentarily nervous, before Ron walked up confidently and handed over his wand.

“I’m here to visit my father, Arthur Weasley, in the Misuse of Muggle Artifacts Office,” Ron said. The guard nodded, checking Ron’s wand and then giving Ron a visitor’s badge. He did the same with Hermione, giving her a small grin before sending them off.

“That was easy,” Hermione mumbled as they walked up to the lifts.

“Let’s hope the rest of it goes as easily,” Ron replied quietly just as a lift opened.

“What do you guys think you’re doing?” Harry hissed at them suddenly. Hermione jumped in shock and Ron turned around looking white-faced. Harry was behind them, seething angrily.

“My dad sent me to get something from his office,” Ron lied quickly. “We were coming right back.” He spun back around and scampered into the waiting lift. Hermione squeaked and followed him. Harry looked completely unconvinced and jumped into the lift as well just as the doors were closing.

“I know you’re lying,” Harry said angrily. “You’ve been sneaking around all summer. What do you think you’re doing here?”

Hermione looked between them anxiously. Ron hadn’t pressed a button yet when Harry entered, so though the doors were closed, the lift hadn’t moved. Hermione took a steadying breath. “We’re here to try and revive Regulus,” Hermione said, speaking as confidently as she could manage. She leaned over and, without breaking eye contact, pressed the button for level nine.

Harry’s mouth dropped open, but the angry look in his eyes only grew. “What the hell are you two talking about?”

Ron straightened his shoulders. “I found a way to open the veil,” he said. “I think,” he added. “And Hermione is here to help me.”

“No!” Harry shouted. “Are you two crazy? Have you two lost your minds? Don’t you remember what happened last time we went to the Department of Mysteries?”

“Yes,” Hermione said. “That’s exactly why we’re here.”

“I won’t let you do this,” Harry snarled.

“You can’t stop us,” Ron said sharply. Harry glared at him, but the anger quickly faltered into desperation.

“Please, don’t do this,” Harry said. “Last time we were here — Regulus died because I couldn’t wait... because I made a rash decision. Please, I don’t think you’ve thought this through.”

“Harry,” Hermione said sadly.

“You don’t have to come with us,” Ron said firmly.

“Ron,” Hermione chastised.

“I’m going in there with or without your help,” Ron said. The doors opened to the empty corridor that led to the Department of Mysteries, and Harry paled even further. Hermione took a step toward him and squeezed his hand tightly.

“You don’t have to come with us,” Hermione said. Harry squeezed her hand back but stayed looking at the corridor. She wondered how many times he’d had nightmares about this place, how it must have haunted him.

“No, I’m going with you,” Harry whispered.

Ron led the way into the circular room. She couldn’t believe that it was still unlocked, it felt wrong that it should be so easy for them to walk in. Wasn’t there any security in this place? None of the doors bore the markings that they’d placed on them last time so they had to try a few of them before finally opening the one that led to the room with the veil.

“It’s called the death chamber,” Ron said. “There are rumors that the entire Ministry was built around this one spot.”

“Where did you learn that?” Hermione asked, following him down toward the veil.

“In a book I stole from the restricted section,” he replied. “It’s one of the only parts of the Department of Mysteries that the public knows about. Probably because it’s so old.”

Hermione nodded. They had arrived right in front of the veil, and she felt her palms grow sweaty. She hadn’t watched Regulus die, but knowing this was where it happened affected her all the same. She turned to look at Harry to find that he had only walked halfway to the veil from the door. He was staring at it with wide, terror-filled eyes.

“Are you okay?” she asked, walking back to stand next to him.

“Can you hear the whispering?” he said.

“No, I don’t hear anything,” Hermione responded, concerned.

“It’s a common effect,” Ron said. Hermione looked at him with surprise. She had never been in a position where one of her friends knew more about a topic than she did, especially not Ron. “What?” he asked.

“Nothing,” she said, shaking her head slightly. “You can wait back here if you want,” she said to Harry.

“No, I’m okay,” he said and slowly walked up to the veil.

“Okay, let’s get started,” Ron said, rubbing his hands together.

Hermione only brought two pairs of chalk, so she and Ron began drawing a replica of the runes he’d found, making a wide circle around the archway. Harry watched them and periodically grabbed the potion ingredients from Hermione’s bag to place them where she and Ron directed. She’d never used potion ingredients in this way, without mixing them or adapting them. It felt like they were almost just for show. She also didn’t recognize more than half of the runes she’d drawn. She was anxious to look them up later, especially if this worked. Please let this work.

“Now what?” Harry asked once they finished. Ron was silent, looking at the runes worriedly. “Well?” A terrible realization dawned on Harry’s face. “You don’t know, do you?”

“This was all I found,” Ron said quietly. Hermione looked back at the book he’d brought, but he was right, all it said was how to draw the runes. What happened next?

Harry turned away from them, grabbing onto the ends of his hair in frustration. When he turned back around, he had tears in his eyes. “Why did you both insist on doing this?” he asked, desperation punching through with every word. Ron flinched.

“I had to try something,” Ron said pleadingly, his voice breaking slightly.

“Ron,” she said quietly. “What about the stone?” He reached into his pocket and tossed it at her haphazardly. He looked like he’d already given up though, like the stone didn’t matter at all. She held it in her hand, dropping the piece of cloth that it was wrapped in, realizing only now that it was a ripped piece of a Chudley Cannons shirt, and finally touching the stone for the first time.

She wished she had researched more, had looked into what the stone did, or had just given in and asked Sirius what it was. Maybe they could leave and come back. She looked up at Ron and Harry, but Ron had walked over to one of the large stones and sat down, his head buried in his hands. Harry was sitting as well, though on the floor in front of the veil, staring up at it unhappily.

The room was heavy with misery and hopelessness. It felt like they were losing Regulus all over again. She hadn’t even realized how much she hoped this would work, even though she didn’t believe it at first. She just wanted to think that Regulus could come back to them, that somehow Ron would be right. But he was gone. Regulus was dead.

She looked at the stone again, rolling it in her palm thoughtfully. Would Sirius and Remus be mad at them for leaving the house? Probably. They would probably make Hermione go back to her parents when they found out she was involved. She sighed quietly. Her chest felt hollow.

“ Give it to me ,” she heard a woman whisper, her voice like silk. She looked up at the veil, startled, but of course, there was nothing there but an empty arch. Give it to her? Give what to her? She looked at the runes again, unactivated and unused, then back at the stone. Give her the stone?

This is crazy. The thought came before she even consciously understood what she was going to do. Yes, she thought, it was crazy. But Ron said the stone was important. He said that he was led to it. What if it was true? She looked over at him. His shoulders were shaking softly like he was crying. This was just as important to him as it was to her.

For some reason, it reminded her of the first time she learned that she was a witch when so many of her childhood experiences finally made sense. Magic explained it all. She’d realized for the first time that with magic, anything could be possible. When did she grow to be so cynical about it then? Why had she dismissed so many things with magic since?

She looked at the stone one final time. Anything was possible, she argued. Later, when her friends asked what in Merlin’s name she was thinking, she would shrug and say there was a reason the hat put her in Gryffindor, but in the moment, the only thing she was thinking about was the possibility .

She bawled her fist around the stone, and without a second thought, threw the stone straight through the veil.

“What was that?” Harry yelled in shock, jumping to his feet.

The effect was instant. The veil, which was invisible to the naked eye, appeared like a sheer white sheet, flowing in the wind. As she watched, red began to spread across it like someone was bleeding, dripping blood onto the floor as they slowly died. The runes activated at once, beginning to glow slightly as the potion ingredients vanished into thin air.

“What did you do?” Ron asked frantically. Harry had taken a few steps back to stand next to her.

“I —” A loud cracking noise interrupted her. All three of them looked up at the same time to see the black ceiling of the death chamber begin to fracture.

“We have to get out of here!” Harry shouted. Hermione looked at the veil one last time, watching as the red enveloped the white and slowly began to turn an inky black like oil dripped on the concrete beneath a car.

“Come on,” Ron said in her ear, grabbing her wrist to pull her out of the room. Right before she turned to run, the very top of the archway broke clean in half.

They tried to run as quickly as they could, but broken pieces of stone had begun falling from the ceiling, and right before she reached the door, one hit her directly on the back of her head and everything went dark.

i know it's another cliffhanger, but i couldn't resist.

thank you to everyone who has read this fic this year. i can't believe it's gotten this much attention, and i'm so happy that people are enjoying the story i've been obsessing over.

“Mistress Bellatrix is at Malfoy Manor without the Dark Lord,” Kreacher croaked once they left the kitchen, the door silenced behind them with a quick spell.

“Oh,” Remus breathed.

“Who else is there?” Sirius asked, adrenaline already beginning to flood through his veins.

“Sirius, this isn’t the right time for this,” Remus said quietly. Sirius shot him a glare.

“Then stay here,” Sirius responded sharply.

Remus flinched slightly. “What about Harry’s birthday party?”

“Harry will understand,” Sirius said grimly. “I won’t be long.”

Remus sighed heavily. “I’m not letting you go on your own. Just give me a moment,” he said. He walked back into the kitchen, and Sirius took the moment to inspect Kreacher. He looked a bit better than the last time Sirius had seen him. He wasn’t as covered in wounds, and he looked like he was back to his disdainful self, the weepiness gone for now.

Kreacher was quick to explain to him who else was in Malfoy Manor. Narcissa, Lucius, and Draco, that was it. There must have been something going on with the Death Eaters if Voldemort had left. Why Lucius and Bellatrix stayed behind Sirius couldn’t fathom. Were there other Death Eaters that he was conferring with? Surely not all of them had been arrested at the Department of Mysteries.

“Go and grab Harry’s invisibility cloak,” Sirius whispered to Kreacher who disappeared without replying. He came back a second later and handed over the invisibility cloak. It was silky in Sirius’s hands, the feel of it familiar in the same way a knife might be after one had been stabbed by it. He had so many good memories attached to it, so many nights sneaking around Hogwarts with James, both of them giddy with the prospect of breaking the rules and exploring places that no one else got to see.

“Okay, I’m ready,” Remus said when he came back, pulling Sirius from his lamenting. He had a determined look on his face that would have made Sirius pant and beg on his knees under different circumstances. He would have to store the memory of it away for later.

“Kreacher. Apparate us into an empty room.”

“Yes, Master,” Kreacher responded, reaching out two wrinkly hands. Remus and Sirius looked at each other as he apparated them away. They were headed right into danger with barely a moment’s notice. It felt like a usual occurrence for Sirius, similar to how he felt during the first war, but the fact that Remus was next to him this time brought a feeling of solace and comfort.

They arrived in an empty bedroom. It looked like the Slytherin common room threw up all over it. The walls and the curtains were green, and the bed looked black, but upon closer inspection, it was also green, even the chairs were green. Honestly, it was an eyesore. Even Regulus in his childhood, when he used to worship Slytherin house, would have been repulsed by it.

The room itself was immaculate. The bed was made so neatly that it looked like it had never been slept in. Not a spec of dirt or dust could be seen with the naked eye. It barely looked lived in. The only thing out of the ordinary was the fact that all three of the windows that looked out over the Malfoy Manor grounds were cracked like someone had thrown a fit and crashed up against them trying to escape. None of them were fully broken, whoever had done it hadn’t made it out, but all of them were damaged.

“Whose room is this?” Sirius whispered.

“Master Draco’s,” Kreacher responded.

“You brought us to Draco’s room?” Sirius hissed. An entire manor full of presumably empty rooms, and Kreacher brought them to one of the few that was inhabited.

“Master did not specify. Only told Kreacher to bring him to an empty room and Kreacher did.”

Sirius rolled his eyes in frustration and was about to bite back when Remus interrupted. “We should hurry in case Voldemort comes back.”

“Right,” Sirius said, nodding. “Kreacher, leave us. When we call for you, come and apparate us out. Even if Remus is the one to call, answer him. Do you understand?”

“Kreacher understands,” Kreacher said with a bow.

“And if Voldemort returns to the property, come and find us immediately.”

“Yes, Master,” he said before disappearing.

“Where should we check first?” Remus asked.

“I’m not sure,” Sirius said, pulling out the invisibility cloak. “We both won’t fit under this, so I think you should use it. I’ll use a disillusionment charm.”

“No,” Remus said sharply. “You use it.”

“Remus —”

“No, Sirius,” Remus said. “You need it more than I do.”

“What does that mean?”

Remus released a sharp sigh. “If something happens to me, then Harry will still have a home, but if you die then he’ll just end up back with the Dursleys.”

“What?” Sirius said harshly.

“We don’t have time to argue about it now,” Remus said, already brushing him off. “Put on the cloak and let’s get this done.” He cast a quick disillusionment charm on himself and started heading toward the door. Sirius bristled unhappily, but put the cloak on as Remus requested.

Sirius had never been to Malfoy Manor. He wasn’t invited to Narcissa and Lucius’s wedding, already estranged from the family by that point. Not that he would have had any interest in attending had he been given the chance. The manor was massive, the corridors alone were wider than the ones at Hogwarts. The Malfoy family was stupidly wealthy, not wealthier than the Black family, but it was close.

Sirius would never understand why his family insisted on having their ancestral home in the middle of a city, built into a tight, dark space. There were other Black properties that resembled Malfoy Manor, but the Black family was often more interested in acquiring a lot of medium-sized properties rather than one giant one. Malfoy Manor was closer to a castle than anything.

He found himself thinking of Draco as they wandered the silent halls. He didn’t know much about Narcissa’s kid other than the fact that Harry and his friends hated him. It didn’t surprise him that Draco would act like a prat given who his father was, but he found himself feeling a bit sorry for the kid. It had to be lonely growing up in a big empty manor, with no siblings and barely any family to contend with. He probably barely interacted with other kids his age before attending Hogwarts.

It made him think of Regulus when he was little before Hogwarts destroyed their relationship. He was so soft and so quiet, skirting around his parents like he could avoid being hurt if he was invisible. He would hide in any room he could find when he was scared, and if he ever got in trouble, he would withdraw into himself so far that it was impossible to find him on the surface.

Sirius had tried so hard to protect him when they were children, taking punishments so that Regulus wouldn’t have to and watching out for him when they would interact with extended family members. That all changed when they went to Hogwarts when their relationship began to fracture and deteriorate. At the time, he thought Regulus was just as horrible as his family, but now he knew that Regulus was just trying to survive. He chose a route that Sirius wouldn’t have been able to manage, but he didn’t do it to hurt Sirius.

If only things had been different, if only he'd had the time to make it up to him, to show that Hogwarts houses didn't matter, that their parents' opinions didn't matter. Sirius still loved Regulus, even when he became a Death Eater, even when they hadn't spoken in years. Sirius was too damaged when they reconnected to understand the feelings he felt for his little brother, the desire to be close again, to be friends. He wished he had protected him back when they were teenagers. He wished he could have protected him again in adulthood.

He didn't realize that he was crying until an invisible Remus reached out and grabbed his shoulder through the cloak. He wondered if Remus could see him through it, or sense him somehow with his werewolf senses.

"Okay?" Remus whispered.

"Yeah," Sirius responded, just as quietly, wiping his face and shaking off the thoughts.

"I think I hear something up ahead," Remus said. Sirius could just make out the creak of the floorboard as Remus walked forward. Remus whispered a spell and suddenly both of their feet were silent.

"You cannot allow him to do this," Narcissa's voice cut through the silence as they approached a door that was cracked open.

"What would you have me do instead?" Lucius responded, stiff and morose. "Tell him no?" He said it sarcastically.

"We could have left," Narcissa hissed bitterly. "We should have already gone."

"It's too late for that. I failed to get the prophecy for him, and he has demanded this in return. We are lucky that it isn't worse."

"How could it be worse than this?"

"It would have happened either way. It is only a bit early."

"I never wanted this for him, Lucius. I thought this was over."

Lucius sighed. "He has no other choice."

"He's only a boy," Narcissa responded after a long moment of silence.

"He is nearly a man."

Narcissa made a sharp sound between her teeth. "I will never forgive you for this."

Remus and Sirius barely had time to step out of the way as Narcissa came barreling out through the door and stomped down the hallway, her heels clicking against the floor so loudly that they echoed. Lucius watched her go, sitting heavily into a chair behind a large, ornate desk. He rubbed his eyes tiredly. Sirius didn't think that he'd ever seen Lucius look so awful. He had facial hair growing in patches and dark circles under his eyes that made it look like he'd recently lost a fistfight.

Remus touched him lightly through the cloak again and together they began moving down the hallway in the opposite direction of where Narcissa had gone. He wondered what they had been talking about, what was happening to Draco, but they didn't have time to worry about it now.

It felt like they walked down various nearly identical corridors for an hour before they found someone else. Unfortunately, it wasn't Bellatrix, but Draco that they happened upon. He was inside a small library. It had to be one of their extra ones, Sirius doubted that the Malfoy library was this tiny. He was curled up next to a large window, his white blonde hair nearly reflective in the setting sun. It took Sirius a moment to notice that he was crying, silent tears running down his face.

He looked remarkably like Narcissa, though there were elements of his father there, it was Narcissa's face that looked through him. Every couple of seconds he would hiccup or gasp like he was coming down from sobbing. Sirius took a step toward him without meaning to, and Draco's head snapped around like he could hear him. There was no way he could, their feet were still silenced.

"Who's there?" Draco said, his voice faltering slightly, decorated with fear. As he stared at him, Draco's face seemed to change. Only slightly, but enough that he could see it. It was like he was transforming little by little, his face growing sharp and his eyes getting brighter.

Sirius took a very slow step back out of the room, and without looking for Remus, began heading away. Draco luckily didn't follow them, and he didn't call out. How had he managed to notice him? It seemed impossible.

They walked for another few minutes before making it to another bedroom, this one was messy and disorganized, the door to the room wide open.

"Remember what Regulus said, about Bellatrix having one of the Horcruxes?" Sirius asked.

"You think she'd keep it here?"

Sirius shrugged, even though Remus couldn't see him. "Worth a try," he responded, stepping into the bedroom.

"Is this her room?" Remus asked.

"I think so. She was always the messiest one of us," Sirius responded. Remus snorted softly. He was no doubt thinking about how messy Sirius was as a teenager. Or more accurately how neat he was. It seemed like everyone expected Sirius to be the messy one given his personality and public persona, but he was especially persnickety about his belongings. He was the most organized of all of them.

Bellatrix's room was a wreck. It looked like someone had dueled inside it and then left without picking up a single thing. He didn't understand how she could own this amount of trash given that she'd only been out of Azkaban for a few months.

"I think Bellatrix was a raccoon in another life," Remus whispered. Sirius snickered.

They searched through what they could find, but there wasn't so much as a dark object in the room. It looked like it was mostly scraps of other things, loose Galleons, and loads of clothing. Sirius found it peculiar though he wasn't sure why.

"I haven't —" Remus began to say, cutting himself off with a piercing scream. Sirius whipped around to look at him and found Remus writhing in pain. He gasped and made to move toward him when something caught his eye. As if she was bleeding through the wall, Bellatrix came into view.

"What do we have here?" she said in a sing-song voice. "A wolf come to steal from me?"

Sirius pointed his wand at her just as she released Remus from the spell she had him under. He was shivering, but his eyes looked clear as he gazed at the crazed woman.

"Where is my cousin, wolf?" she asked.

She didn't know Sirius was in the room. No doubt because of the invisibility cloak he still had on. Sirius bit his tongue to keep from answering her, from jumping in and drawing her attention away from Remus.

"I came here alone," Remus said through gritted teeth.

Bellatrix laughed joyfully. "You aren't the only ones with a little elf spy," Bellatrix said with a wide grin, her teeth sharp and glinting. "Tell me where he is."

"I don't know what you're talking about," Remus replied, pushing himself up so that he wasn't lying flat on the ground. "Sirius isn't here."

"Don't lie," Bellatrix commanded. She didn't sound angry, she sounded like she was having fun. The sound grated on Sirius's nerves. He wanted to hit her with a spell but he had seen firsthand how fast she was with her wand. He wouldn't put Remus in danger by failing to kill her a second time. "I heard it was his son that I killed," she said. "Surely he's here to put an end to me."

"You don't know anything," Remus said with a small smirk. So Bellatrix didn't know who Reggie really was. That was a surprise.

"For now," she said, lifting her wand again. Sirius expected her to cast Legilimens to get information from Remus, but he should have known that she didn't have the patience. "Crucio ." The word was said with a laugh. Remus screamed again, his body bending against the pain.

Sirius barely had time to watch it happen. He didn't even bother to cast a spell, tucking his wand into his sleeve as he jumped forward, transforming in midair. He would like to say that he thought of Regulus, and the way he had fallen into the veil, but Reggie didn't even cross his mind. All he could hear was Remus's pained screams. Remus had more than enough pain for one person. How dare Bellatrix try to add to it.

Padfoot's teeth dug into Bellatrix's side with a sickening squelch. He sunk them in and ripped his head away with a furious shake. Bellatrix didn't scream, she only released a grunt of surprise, well-versed in pain, and turned her wand on him.

"Avada —" The second word never made it past her lips as he dropped the blood, skin, and organs from his maw and bit onto her jaw, wrenching it from her face. Her eyes lit with surprise and anger, but never pain, not even in her dying moments.

He pried her throat from her neck as the final gurgling sounds left her body, already going back to hurt her again when he felt a hand at the gruff of his neck. He growled in warning.

"Padfoot, that's enough," Remus said gently. "Kreacher. Take us home."

Sirius didn't even have time to transform back before he was side-alonged back to Grimmauld Place and apparated right into his bedroom. He growled again, this time in frustration and anger, perhaps a bit in something else that he couldn't understand. The hand on his neck began to scratch him lightly, reaching up to pet behind his ears before gliding down his back.

"Transform back, please," Remus said softly, his voice like a seductive purr to Padfoot's ears. Sirius shivered and slid back into his human form, not bothering to stand on two feet. Remus was kneeling next to him, and the moment he was human, Remus's lips were against his. There was still blood on his face and in his mouth, but there was Remus's tongue in the mix, sliding against his.

Sirius groaned into his mouth, lost to the sensation, to the very depravity of it all. He was sure he would lose himself completely, but they were distracted when something appeared in the room right next to them. They pulled away just far enough to see a black flame erupt in the air, a scroll appearing with it and dropping to the floor.

"What —"

"It's like Fawkes, but I've never seen a black flame like that," Remus said curiously. He reached forward to grab the scroll, already pulling away from Sirius who groaned at the loss. His head still felt floaty and detached. Remus's face paled. "I think you need to see this."

Sirius sat up fully and took the scroll from Remus's scarred fingers.

Lord Sirius Orion Black III,

At 6:40 pm this evening, we detained your ward, Harry James Potter , along with two of his accomplices , Ronald Bilius Weasley and Hermione Jean Granger , due to their unauthorized entry into the Department of Mysteries. Your immediate presence is required to handle this issue and the resulting property damage.

Unspeakable Kevalin

"It's Harry," Sirius said, although Remus had already read the letter.

“Scourgify,” Remus cast quickly, cleaning the blood from both of their faces, before rushing to the door, no doubt to look for Molly or Arthur.

“Wait,” Sirius whispered.

“Why?” Remus asked though he stopped walking.

“Let’s just go. I don’t want to waste time talking to them.”

Remus looked torn, glancing between Sirius and the door before he finally nodded.

“Let’s go.”

They flooded to the Ministry quickly without alerting anyone in the house. Molly and Arthur might have already received a letter given Ron’s involvement, but if not then they would soon. It had only been half an hour since Ron, Hermione, and Harry had been arrested in the Department of Mysteries, but it felt much later than that. The Ministry atrium was abandoned so they rushed to the lifts.

Sirius had never met an Unspeakable, though he’d heard loads of rumors about them. They were very secretive, that much he knew, but he didn’t expect them to be so secretive that they would wear full-body disguises. One Unspeakable was waiting for them at the door to the Department of Mysteries, wearing a full body robe that seemed to swallow color; their face was undetectable under their hood. The very fabric almost hurt Sirius’s eyes.

“Follow me,” the Unspeakable said.

“Are you Unspeakable Kevalin?” Sirius asked, following them through the door, into the round room, and through to a line of offices.

“No, Lord Black,” the Unspeakable replied. They did not speak again before opening the door to a tiny office. It was so skinny that the desk took up most of the room. There was a tiny chair behind it and an even smaller one in front of it. In one of the chairs, sat Hermione, Ron kneeling in front of her and whispering quietly. She was rubbing the back of her head, her eyes squinted painfully.

Harry was sitting on the desk staring miserably at his feet when they walked in, but he jumped to his feet when he noticed them.

“Sirius —”

“Harry, what were you thinking?” Sirius said. His voice was harsher than he intended, the worry he’d felt finally bubbling to the surface. Harry flinched before a guilty expression crossed his face.

“It wasn’t his idea,” Ron said suddenly, standing up and walking around the desk. “It was my idea, Harry tried to stop me.”

“Why?” Remus asked. The Unspeakable closed the door behind them as he finally entered the room, and Sirius heard the lock click into place.

“That can’t be good,” Sirius mumbled. “Are you all okay?”

Remus was apparently still waiting for an answer on why they were here in the first place, but Sirius felt like his question was a bit more pressing.

“We’re fine,” Harry mumbled. “Hermione was hurt by a piece of falling stone, but other than that, we’re okay.”

“Mind if I have a look?” Remus asked Hermione, who nodded once, her shoulders tensing when the movement caused her pain.

“Why are you here?” Sirius asked, reaching unconsciously for Harry who walked into the circle of his arms and let himself be hugged.

Ron looked away, staring down at his feet.

“Well?” Sirius prompted when he didn’t respond.

“We —” Ron began to say but was interrupted by the door opening. It was a different Unspeakable. Sirius could only tell because of their height, they looked much taller than the other one, though it was still hard to look at them for too long.

“Unspeakable Kevalin?” Sirius asked.

“I am,” the Unspeakable responded. Their voice was unfathomable, impossible to tell the pitch or tone.

“What is going on?” Remus asked, tucking his wand away after casting a healing spell on Hermione. She looked much better, color already returning to her face.

Unspeakable Kevalin was quiet for a long moment. Sirius thought they might be looking around the room at each of them but it was impossible to tell.

“What were you trying to do in the Death Chamber?” Unspeakable Kevalin said.

Ron cleared his throat slightly. “We were trying to pull someone out of the veil.”

Sirius huffed. Why would they do something so stupid? The veil was a death trap, there was no way to save anyone from it.

“Who were you attempting to pull from the veil?” Unspeakable Kevalin asked.

Sirius rolled his eyes. Surely Unspeakable Kevalin knew the answer to that. Who else other than the boy they all knew who had recently died in the Death Chamber?

“Regulus Black,” Hermione said quietly, mournfully.

“Why are they still being held?” Sirius interjected. “When can we leave?”

“The room has been demolished, the veil destroyed.”

“Destroyed?” Remus asked, gaping at the Unspeakable.

“Merlin,” Sirius said, rubbing his face. “What did you do to it exactly?” He turned to look at Harry when he asked it. Harry was still standing under Sirius’s arm that was stretched across his shoulders.

“Erm...” Harry said uncertainly.

“So that’s what you meant by property damage,” Sirius muttered. “Are you expecting me to pay for it?” He doubted that there was a numerical value that could be placed on the veil, but perhaps the Unspeakables were going to try, especially given that the Black family was indirectly responsible.

Unspeakable Kevalin did not respond for a long few seconds before turning and leaving the room, the door audibly locking behind them once again.

“Surely they can’t just keep us here,” Hermione said nervously.

“The Unspeakables don’t answer to anyone,” Sirius said. “The fact that they called me at all is a shock. They could probably keep us here indefinitely.

“But someone would come looking for us, wouldn’t they?” Hermione asked.

“I cannot believe you three came here,” Sirius responded. “Truly, this was one of the dumbest things you could have possibly done.”

“Sirius,” Remus said gently. Sirius turned to glare at him but ultimately relented. He was just as worried as Hermione sounded, and though he was mad at them, it probably wasn’t helpful to prattle on about it now.

They didn’t have to wait long as only a few minutes later, the door was unlocked once again. Two Unspeakables came into the room and due to their bizarre cloaks, Sirius nearly missed the person stumbling between them. His hands were tied together behind his back and there was a thick, black blindfold over his eyes.

“Regulus,” Harry breathed.

“You’re free to go,” one of the Unspeakables said, then without lifting a wand, the ties on his hands and blindfold were both removed. Regulus blinked blearily at them, having only a second to get his bearings before Harry rushed forward and hugged him fiercely.

Regulus’s arms came up automatically, his face hidden by Harry’s unruly hair. He mumbled something that Sirius couldn’t hear, still frozen a few feet away, to which Harry responded, “It’s Harry.”

“Harry?” Regulus said, pushing Harry back just enough to look at his face.

“I’m so sorry,” Harry said instantly.

“Oh, Harry, it’s okay,” Regulus said, pulling Harry back in. He still looked a little dazed, but his eyes met Sirius’s over Harry’s shoulder, and they seemed to clear slightly.

“Regulus,” Sirius said, his body finally shaking free. He stumbled forward and hugged them both, breathing in the smell of his younger brother. Alive. He was alive.

sirius and regulus 🐾 mauling people to death welcome back, my love. you know i couldn't end the year without him.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Regulus didn't remember dying the first time around. He remembered the inferi and their clawing hands, sure, but the actual act of dying, of being dead, he had no memory of that. It was simply darkness until he returned, choking on water and dragging his body up onto the rocks of the cave.

He remembered dying the second time. He remembered being dead. He fell through the veil, watching Harry's face twist in horror — a truly terrible thing to witness — and then he was nothing. He simply no longer existed. In the silence that was beyond the veil, he thought about what it might be like to die a normal way. No emotion was tied to it, only disconnected thoughts as if he were a muggle scientist researching the effect a potion might have on an inanimate object. Did muggle scientists use potions? He couldn't remember.

He wondered if real death was like this, normal death so to speak. Would he still be floating away in nothingness? Or would he move beyond? He thought distantly that he should be concerned about his lack of onward movement, but there was no panic, no desire to move or escape. He simply was.

Time ceased to exist beyond the veil, just like light and emotion. He would never be able to explain how he felt existing in limbo, waiting and waiting and waiting.

At one point, he realized he wasn't alone. Or not completely. It wasn't so much that he could hear them or see them, but he thought he could feel them. It was as if they were reaching through a heavily filled wardrobe, pressing up against him through the layers and layers of clothing. He could feel their panic where his own was missing. They didn't like where he was trapped, their desperation to pull him through was overwhelming, but they could do nothing. Both of them were helpless.

Eventually, he felt the person touch him as if to grab his hand through the veil. It seemed they had given up trying to get to him, knowing that he was beyond their help, just as they were beyond his reach. He was sure they were holding hands, although he couldn't feel it. He wondered if they could feel it; if his body felt like anything beyond empty, dead space. They seemed content to do it either way.

Time passed, or it didn't, regardless, one moment there was nothing, and the next there was a drifting scent of evergreen trees and cinnamon bread baking in the oven. He'd smelled it before, but he couldn't place the memory. He was a bit preoccupied with the fact that he could smell anything at all. He wasn't breathing, he had nothing to breathe with, yet he could smell.

He was ripped from nothing into existence like being shoved through a window, glass digging into his skin as he plunged into the darkness beneath him. He hit the floor with a loud grunt, barely getting his bearings before he heard a small oof next to him. He tried to speak, to ask what was going on, but his throat was dry and all that released was an unpleasant croaking sound.

Before he could open his eyes, a blindfold magically wrapped around his head. He hadn't heard someone cast a spell, they must have done it wordlessly. He tried to speak again, but his voice was just as damaged. He coughed twice, the feeling tearing up his throat. He could hear people speaking now, whispering to each other. Another spell was cast on him, the magic brushing against his skin like the edge of a knife, and his arms were wrenched behind his back and tied together.

Hands grabbed him under his arms and pulled him to his feet. He could feel now that there was a layer of clothing between his skin and the arms holding him which he was thankful for. He was disoriented but aware enough to hope to hold onto some of his dignity. He felt his body be dragged up some stairs and across the floor. He heard the sound of a door opening in front of him and then closing behind him.

He was shoved into a chair, colliding against it with the back of his knees, and with a quick spell, he was immobilized. He couldn't even move his mouth to ask what was going on or what was happening to him. All he could do was breathe in through his nose steadily in hopes of calming himself down as alarm began to overtake him.

It was the breathing that really made it click for him. He was breathing! How was he alive? He didn't realize that it was possible for someone to come back through the veil, but then again, he should have stayed dead at the bottom of the cave over a decade prior, and he somehow came back from that too.

It was all so unexplainable, so incomprehensible, and now he was frozen to a chair, blinded and bound by someone. Was he in danger? Did they plan to kill him again? He had no way of knowing. All he could do was focus on his breathing, sucking in air through his nose like it was the only thing that could save him.

He tried not to let his mind wander too much, tried not to think about the body that had just been jerked back into the world of the living, but he couldn't escape the small twinges of pain forever, they were slowly coming through, forcing their way to the forefront of his mind.

He wasn't sure how much time passed like that, but when he felt like he was right on the brink of another silent panic attack, the body-bind holding him was removed. He gasped for air, panting in distress, and was pulled once again to his feet. He was pretty sure that they were just dragging him last time, but now he could feel his feet beneath him and tried to walk in the direction they pulled him.

His arms were beginning to hurt, the rope around his wrists digging uncomfortably into his skin. He wondered if it was Death Eaters. If that's why they'd incapacitated him the moment he was awake. Were they taking him to the Dark Lord? He heard a door open and a second later the blindfold and rope around his wrist were removed. He could hear someone speaking, but it was as if they were trying to speak underwater, the words muffled and unintelligible.

He blinked harshly, the bright light in the room blinding him slightly as his eyes fought to adjust. He didn't have time to run, fight, or even think before a body slammed into his, arms tucking around him and holding him so tightly that it hurt. His arms came up automatically, wrapping around the person without instruction.

They felt warm against him and all he could think about was the bundle of curly hair that his face was currently buried in.

“James,” he said without thinking, although before the person responded he knew he was wrong. For one, James had never been shorter than him.

“It’s Harry,” Harry responded. Of course, Regulus thought.

He pushed him back so that he could get a good look at him. The last time he’d seen his face, Harry looked horrified and distressed. He didn’t look much better now, tears streaming down his cheeks, his eyes anguished.

“I’m so sorry,” Harry sobbed. Regulus didn’t know how long he’d been gone, but it must have been some time because he could see the changes in Harry, the way his eyes were sunken into his face and his cheeks were a tad too hollow. He felt like he could see every terrible sleepless night and every skipped meal just from one glance.

“Oh, Harry, it’s okay,” Regulus said, dangerously close to crying himself. He’d never been a sympathetic crier, except perhaps when he was a child and hadn’t learned how to bury his emotions like a proper member of the Black family, but seeing Harry cry like this was awful. He pulled him back in, feeling Harry’s chest shake with sobs.

He looked up over his shoulder, just now realizing that they weren’t alone in the room, and made eye contact with his brother. Sirius looked bewildered, his hair wild and knotted like he hadn’t been taking care of it. His face was clean but there was a splatter of blood on the edge of his shirt and a few drops down the center like he’d been feasting on a bloody steak.

“Regulus,” Sirius said, speaking the word like it was salvation. He took a large step forward and threw his arms around both Regulus and Harry.

It wasn’t long before they left what Regulus quickly realized was still the Department of Mysteries. He hugged Ron and Hermione as well, both of them weepy and relieved to see him. He even hugged Remus which was awkward and not something he aimed to repeat even if he died and was revived a third time.

They arrived at Grimmauld Place without speaking much. Regulus wondered how long he’d been gone, but before he could ask he got his answer when he walked into the kitchen and discovered the birthday party for Harry that they’d apparently abandoned.

Molly and Arthur were there, running around in a tizzy. Molly didn’t even take a breath before she began screaming at Ron. Neither she nor Arthur seemed to notice that Regulus was in the room with them. Or anyone else for that matter. Ron for his part just looked seriously back at her as if he’d expected the screaming and would make the decision to incur her wrath all over again if given the opportunity.

“What were you thinking?” Arthur asked sternly.

“He was trying to bring Regulus back,” Harry interjected.

“What?” Molly asked. They both finally seemed to snap out of whatever spell made them angry with Ron when they noticed who was standing just a few paces away.

After that, it was more hugging, all of which Regulus endured without complaint. Luna, Ginny, and the twins had apparently been at the party as well but had been sent home when Molly and Arthur realized Ron, Hermione, and Harry were all missing.

“How did you bring Regulus back?” Remus asked quietly once things settled down a bit. Ron looked a bit embarrassed when everyone in the room turned to him. Regulus was interested in that himself.

“Well, I found a book that talked about the veil and that led me to a runic spell that Hermione helped me use,” Ron said awkwardly.

“What kind of runic spell?” Sirius asked.

Ron shrugged uncomfortably. “I don’t know, I found it in your library here.”

“Ron,” Hermione whispered. He gave her a questioning look, and she raised her eyebrows pointedly. He shook his head confusedly and she darted her eyes away from him toward Sirius then back again. Ron shook his head intently this time, but Hermione just gave him another look that Regulus didn’t understand. Ron sighed in defeat.

“And I used a stone that I stole from your bedroom,” he mumbled quickly, glancing at Sirius once before looking down at his feet in shame.

“My bedroom?” Sirius asked incredulously.

“Wait, what stone?” Remus asked.

“It was in a box with a destroyed ring,” Ron said, his voice so quiet that Regulus had to strain himself just to hear him.

Sirius’s mouth dropped open. “You used a Hor—”

“Sirius,” Remus hissed. Sirius snapped his mouth shut. Regulus looked between them in confusion before the word finally made sense. Horcrux. Ron must have found the Horcrux that Dumbledore gave to Sirius and used it to bring Regulus back to life. Oh Merlin, that couldn’t be good. He didn’t think the Dark Lord’s soul would be a good contender for necromancy.

“Was it valuable?” Molly asked worriedly. “Ronald, I cannot believe you stole from Sirius —”

“Not more valuable than my brother is to me,” Sirius said quickly. “Really, Molly, it’s okay. Ron, don’t worry, though next time please just tell me rather than scaring us all like that.”

"I wasn't sure that it would work," Ron said, his cheeks growing red. "I didn't want to tell anyone in case I was wrong."

Harry gave Ron a soft smile and patted him on the back. Even Molly seemed mulled by that explanation. They didn't stay long after that. Regulus was dead on his feet, and it was clear that everyone else wasn't doing much better.

"I'll talk to you tomorrow," Harry assured Ron as he followed his parents through the floo. Hermione, Regulus discovered, had been living at Grimmauld for a few weeks now, but she retired to bed almost immediately after the Weasleys left.

"I'm so happy you're back, Regulus," she said softly as she hugged him one last time before bed. She looked like she might start crying, but quickly turned away from Regulus before he could comfort her and ran up the stairs.

"Are you hungry? Thirsty?" Sirius asked once it was just the four of them.

"No, I'm fine," Regulus said, shaking his head slightly. "Why do you have blood on your shirt?"

"What?" Harry asked sharply while Sirius looked down at himself in surprise.

"Oh, I thought I cleaned off all of that," Remus said, frowning. Sirius looked up, a flash of guilt and something dangerously close to madness crossing over his eyes.

"Is it yours?" Regulus asked.

Sirius shook his head. "It's..." He looked up at Remus uncertainly. Remus bit his lip thoughtfully.

"Well?" Harry asked. He looked worried, stress lines obvious on his young face, his eyes darting between them.

"It's Bellatrix's blood," Remus said finally. Sirius looked like he was seconds away from throwing his hands over Remus's mouth to stop him from speaking, but it was too late and the words were out.

"Bellatrix?" Harry asked, shocked.

"Is she dead?" Regulus asked grimly. Harry probably shouldn't have been here for this conversation, but there wasn't anything he could do about that now.

Sirius looked bizarrely embarrassed for a second before nodding. "Yes, she's dead," he said.

"That's what you left to do?" Harry asked.

"Yes," Sirius answered, looking so deeply uncomfortable like he wanted to melt into the ground.

Regulus closed his eyes. They were still standing in the living room near the floo, and though his body still felt oddly disconnected from his mind, he was beginning to feel the light trickle of exhaustion through his bones.

“You left Harry’s birthday party so you could kill our cousin?” Regulus asked tiredly.

“Erm, yes,” Sirius responded.

“I’m not mad,” Harry said, though he was still frowning. “Why didn’t you tell me?”

“We didn’t know if we would find her,” Remus responded. “Kreacher told us she was alone, but there was no way to be sure. We didn’t want to worry you.”

Regulus’s eyes snapped open. “Kreacher told you?” he asked. All three of them look at him in confusion.

“Yes, why?” Sirius said. Regulus gritted his teeth together but shook his head.

“I think I need to lie down,” Regulus said. “Can we finish this conversation tomorrow?”

“Oh, right, of course,” Sirius said. “Are you sure you’re not hungry? I mean, it’s been a while since you ate so if you want —”

“No, it’s fine really. I’m just very, very tired,” Regulus said, punctuating his sentence with a yawn he didn’t have to fake.

He could tell that they wanted to follow him, and he didn’t blame them, but he just needed a moment to himself. And sleep. He really needed to sleep. He found his bedroom was exactly how he left it except for the bed, the pillows were slightly askew and the blankets were rumpled like someone had been sleeping in his bed. He decided not to question it, he was pretty sure that if Harry or Sirius died he might do the same thing.

He closed the door tightly behind him and went to grab his wand before remembering he didn’t have it. Where was it when he died? He tried to remember. He didn’t think he had it when he went through the veil. Hopefully, there was still someone who could get it for him.

“Kreacher,” he called. Kreacher arrived with a pop.

“Master Regulus,” Kreacher cried in awe and shock.

“Stop.” Regulus held up his hand, already seeing tears form in Kreacher’s. “Where is my wand?” Kreacher opened his mouth to respond, but Regulus interrupted. “Bring it to me,” he commanded. He hated to make Kreacher do things, but he was too angry to wait, too hateful.

Kreacher disappeared and reappeared a moment later, Regulus’s wand in his hands. “Master Regulus’s wand,” he croaked. Regulus took it and watched as Kreacher flinched away. He stared down at the wand, enjoying the feeling of magic as it reacquainted itself with his fingers.

“Kreacher... Why did you do it?” he asked quietly.

Kreacher immediately started crying, blubbering loudly.

“Kreacher, stop,” Regulus commanded. Kreacher stopped making noise instantly.

“Kreacher is sorry, Master Regulus,” he said after a moment. “Kreacher did not expect for Regulus to die.”

Regulus clenched his teeth together again, closing his eyes against the rage that rushed through him. “So you thought only Sirius would die. Or Harry,” he growled.

“No, Master Regulus,” Kreacher said, sounding horrified.

“Enough,” Regulus said sharply before Kreacher could continue. “I can't even bear to look at you.” He turned his back on the elf, his oldest friend. Kreacher was loyal to him when no one else was and now... What had become of them?

He heard Kreacher hiccup as he held back tears.

“I need you to tell me what you want. Do you want to be freed? Because I will free you, no questions asked,” Regulus said.

“No, Master Regulus,” Kreacher gasped in horror. Regulus couldn't help but think about everything Hermione had taught him, about the way elves had been forced into these positions, forced to tie themselves to wizards. He was a part of that, whether he wanted to admit it or not. Kreacher didn't want to be freed because of the shame it would bring him, but that didn't make it right.

Regulus sighed. “Kreacher, I need you to leave.”

“No, Master Regulus!”

“I cannot decide this tonight, but I don't want to see you. Do you understand? You're not to come back unless I call you,” Regulus said, still not turning around. Kreacher was silent for a long moment before responding.

“Yes, Master Regulus,” he said dejectedly, then he was gone. Regulus breathed out, his chest tight with the memories of his death and the moments that had led up to it.

He was finally alone though after so much excitement and the first thing he realized was that his body hurt. It was the same pain as before. He'd died and came back, his body changing completely as it traveled into and out of the veil, yet the nerve damage was still there. He tried and failed not to feel frustrated by that fact. He walked into the bathroom and looked in the mirror.

It was his first time seeing himself, and he was shocked by what he found. He was surprised that no one else had mentioned it, but he was older. Not by much, but definitely a few years. He must have been the age he was when he died the first time. Eighteen rather than fifteen as he was when he died the second time.

He rubbed his face tiredly and slowly began to pull off the clothes he'd died in. He was anxious to shower and change so that he could sleep. He didn't want to be awake any longer, but he could already feel the dread of what he would find under his shirt. It was like he knew before he could even see it. He vaguely hoped that the nerve pain was an indicator of what he didn't come back with, but his physical age didn't bode well.

He avoided looking at his left arm at first, focusing instead on the wounds that now littered his chest. He was lucky there weren't any on his face or neck, but not lucky enough not to have them. He supposed he was glad that they weren't open and bleeding, but it was still disappointing. Where his skin was once unblemished, there were several long clawing scars across his chest from where the inferi had dragged him to his death. He touched one lightly, but there was no pain. He squeezed his eyes shut. It was just a bit of vanity, he thought to himself. It could be worse.

He took a deep breath and finally looked where he knew he would find another mark. His left arm which had been unmarked in his second life now bore the brand that had ruined his life the first time. He decidedly did not cry upon seeing it, but it was a close thing. He'd had a chance without it and ruined it.

What else had he lost during his second death? His breaths were coming dangerously fast now and the pain in his back and legs was growing worse. He closed his eyes again and focused on the magic he had used to alter his body, hoping that he hadn't lost it all.

A moment later, he was no longer himself, but a bear. Immediately his mind calmed, simplified by the animal's emotions and thoughts. His pain was gone, as it always was when he was in his animagus form. He shook his head around, pleased by the change, and for a moment considered sleeping as a bear rather than a person.

Ultimately the desire to shower won out, and he changed back, carefully avoiding looking at his left arm, shame trickling in his stomach. He was in the shower for a long time, letting the water wash away any thoughts or worries that might plague him, and when he climbed out, he worked to direct his thoughts to more pleasant things.

So the Dark Mark had returned, but he still had Sirius and Harry. As long as they didn't see it, he wouldn't lose them like he lost James. He thought about Harry's sobbed apology, remembering the pained look on his face even as relief took over. He thought about Ron who had found some hidden knowledge about the veil that no one had been able to discover in hundreds of years. He thought about Hermione and the small smile she wore when Ron explained what he'd done. He'd missed more than just a few months obviously.

He was about to climb into bed when he picked up his wand, thinking about the bear that he still had access to. He couldn't help but think about the rest of his magic, would it be inaccessible or affected by his second death?

He wasn't sure why he chose that spell, perhaps it was just the fact that Harry, Ron, and Hermione were in his thoughts that he wanted to try. "Expecto Patronum," he cast. Immediately, the warmth spread from his chest and through his fingertips. The Dark Mark hadn't stolen this from him, he thought with relief. He went to brush the patronus away, not keen on seeing James's stag galloping around, but the movement caught his eye before he could send it away.

It wasn't a stag at all, he realized. No, the stag was gone. It was a bear.

Chapter End Notes

my personal headcanon is that sirius was trapped in the veil when he died in canon, but once harry used the stone to see him right before he was killed by voldemort, sirius was freed and able to move on.

the mark.

Regulus wasn't sure what he expected his first full day back to life would be like, but he hadn't expected the icy silence that he received from Harry. He slept hard, unmoving, and without dreams, and woke in the late morning to find Sirius in his animagus form curled up at the foot of his bed.

"What if I'd been sleeping naked?" Regulus mumbled, grateful that he'd decided to sleep in a long-sleeved shirt. He would have to grow accustomed to doing that now that the Mark was back.

Padfoot gave him a withering look and gagged loudly.

"Eugh," Regulus said in disgust. "If you're going to make that sound, do it elsewhere please?"

Sirius left him to get dressed and ready for the day but met him at the breakfast table, a full plate of food already set out. The moment the smell hit his nose, Regulus was ravenous with hunger, digging into the food with vigor. He only looked up after shoveling several large bites into his mouth.

"What?" he said after swallowing. Sirius was openly staring at him, unblinking.

Sirius coughed and blinked hard. "Sorry," he muttered. "I just can't believe that you're here."

Regulus flushed with discomfort, though he wasn't totally sure why. "Tell me what I missed." He still felt unsteady, not totally real or alive, and he wasn't ready to look at his thoughts critically. He needed to do something, some forward motion to work toward, and the only way to do that was to get caught up.

"Right," Sirius said with a nod, finally starting on his own food. It took him nearly an hour to tell Regulus everything, mostly because Sirius kept getting distracted and staring off into the distance, that disturbing haunted look in his eyes.

"I can't believe you were actually arrested, and they let you go," Regulus said, his eyebrows halfway up his forehead.

"I know," Sirius agreed. "I thought I was done for, what with all the other Death Eaters arrested at the same time, but I guess with Fudge stepping down, Dumbledore was able to pull a few strings."

"You think Dumbledore was responsible for getting you out?" Regulus asked.

"At least partially."

Regulus hummed quietly.

“What?” Sirius asked.

“Well... it just makes me wonder,” Regulus said slowly, “why didn’t he try to free you last time? I mean, if he had the power to get you out now, why not before?”

Sirius’s eyebrows furrowed. “I suppose Crouch Senior didn’t help,” Sirius replied after a beat. “Around that time, he was throwing everyone in Azkaban with barely any trial, including his son.”

Regulus carefully didn’t flinch, but it was a close thing.

“Plus, I guess Remus wanted to take Harry home with him, but they wouldn’t let him without me since I’m his godfather.”

“Remus was working with Dumbledore to get you free?” Regulus asked, pleasantly surprised.

Sirius nodded.

“And he wasn’t last time?”

Regulus hadn’t thought about it before, but surely there was someone who believed Sirius was innocent when he was sentenced without a trial. Though he personally didn’t believe it when he came back, Sirius had been in prison for years at that point, more than a decade, he supposed there wasn’t much of a reason for him to question it at the time. He wasn’t even sure that he felt bad about it now. What else was he supposed to believe? It wasn’t like Sirius’s guilt was that far off from the truth. James really was betrayed by one of his closest friends.

He wondered why Remus never questioned it though. Weren’t they living together at the time? He wracked his brain but couldn’t remember if James had told him that or not. Sirius’s face darkened menacingly, the lines in his skin seeming to grow deeper as if they were carved into him with a knife.

“Let’s talk about something else,” he grumbled.

“Sure,” Regulus said quickly, if only to erase that look of madness.

Sirius told him about the Dursleys and the locked door that Harry was kept behind. The details made rage nearly swallow him, but there was something in Sirius’s eyes that kept his feet firmly on the ground. It was a sort of avoidance, a look he’d seen often in their childhood when Sirius would do something against the rules and try to lie to get out of it. He was never a very good liar as a kid, at least not when something was his fault.

“What aren’t you telling me?” Regulus asked firmly.

Sirius pursed his lips slightly, looking away.

“Sirius.”

“Listen,” Sirius said, “don’t be too hard on Harry, okay? Once I tell you I mean.”

Regulus gave him a quizzical look. “Why would I be hard on Harry?”

Sirius sighed and told him about all the food he found rotting in Harry’s bedroom at the Dursleys’ house, about the way he seemed to avoid every meal once they finally got him home, and finally, how it took a few days for Sirius and Remus to properly notice.

“Sirius,” he said disappointingly.

“That’s not all,” Sirius said like a confession. He told him about the episode Harry had right after Regulus’s funeral, while Sirius and Remus were out playing vigilante. It wasn’t easy to hear about, Regulus grinding his teeth together to keep from snapping, but he held in the emotions. Things weren’t perfect with him gone, but clearly they’d figured things out since then, and there was no use punishing his brother for things he couldn’t help.

“Why did you say I shouldn’t be too hard on Harry?” Regulus asked once he got his emotions back under control.

“I’ve got him eating again. I just didn’t want you to pile on, or maybe even mention it at all. I think it would set him back if you brought it up.”

Regulus sighed, but ultimately agreed not to talk about it directly, at least for the time being. If he noticed it getting worse then he wouldn’t hold back. He was impressed that his brother seemed so aware of Harry’s eating habits and the way they intertwined with his mental state. He wondered if he understood because of his own problems with food since escaping Azkaban.

He let Sirius divert the conversation then, back to Regulus’s bizarre funeral where Andromeda, their disowned cousin, showed up.

“How did she even know about it?”

“Tonks,” Sirius said, the expression on his face going a bit tight as he said her name. Regulus nodded for him to go on. It sounded like they had a proper wizarding funeral. Regulus was surprised that Sirius had bothered. “I figured it would have been important to you,” Sirius said, rubbing the back of his neck uncomfortably. “I don’t give a shit about all that muck, but...”

“Thank you,” Regulus said seriously. “I appreciate it. Though I suppose we should probably remove my name from the grave. Just in case, I mean.”

“I’m not sure how to,” Sirius replied. “But we can try.” He explained who else was in attendance, it wasn’t many people. Dumbledore was worried that the funeral might attract Death Eaters if it was made public. He was probably right, Regulus realized. Most of the people on the list made sense to him, even Fleur. He doubted she was there because of him though, but he remembered the look she’d given Bill during the Triwizard Tournament. Only one name stood out to him among the list.

“Why was Cedric Diggory at my funeral?” Regulus asked stiffly.

“Dunno,” Sirius said lazily, lifting one shoulder in a shrug. “When Harry ran off, Cedric was the one to go and get him.”

“Harry ran off?”

“He was pretty upset,” Sirius conceded. “I could have found him with magic — I mean I knew he was still in the cemetery — but Cedric said he wanted to talk to him so we let him go.”

Regulus felt a prickling at the back of his neck. “Cedric wanted to talk to Harry? Alone? And you let him?”

Sirius gave him a weird look. “Yes? Should I not have?”

“No,” Regulus said quickly, glaring down at the half-empty plate in front of him. “No, it’s fine.”

Sirius stared at him for a long moment, waiting for Regulus to explain.

“It’s nothing,” he said when Sirius didn’t move on. “How long were they gone?” he couldn’t help asking.

Sirius looked incredulous. “I don’t know, a few minutes maybe. What are you getting at?”

“I’m not getting at anything,” Regulus said, practically snapping.

Sirius looked even more incredulous. “Excuse me?”

“It’s nothing,” he repeated.

“What? Do you think he was over there sneaking him cigarettes or something?” Sirius said sarcastically.

“He’s much older than Harry,” Regulus responded, urging Sirius to understand.

“He’s only a few years older,” Sirius said, though now he sounded confused.

“That’s still too old, Sirius.”

Sirius stared at him dubiously, before understanding seemed to dawn on him. His face twisted into some horrible amalgamation of disgust and humor. “You think they were shagging?” he joked.

Regulus recoiled like Sirius had spit in his face. “If Cedric and Harry were shagging at my funeral when you were supposed to be watching him, then I am going to cut off all your fingers,” Regulus said in a low voice.

Sirius guffawed loudly. “They weren’t actually shagging! Get a grip on yourself. What do you have against Cedric anyway? Harry seems to like him.”

“Sirius, I swear to —”

“Relax,” Sirius said, still laughing. “You have serious issues, did you know that?”

Regulus glared at him darkly, but it just made Sirius’s grin widen. It took a bit to get their conversation back on track after that, with Sirius finally out from under his dark cloud, and Regulus suffering under the knowledge that he couldn’t even die for two months without Cedric moving in on Harry.

Eventually, Sirius managed to calm down and continued telling him about the summer. They talked about Regulus’s recent birthday.

“How old do you suppose you are now?” Sirius asked.

Regulus shrugged. “I don’t know,” Regulus said. “Twenty-something.”

Sirius looked like he was trying to mentally do the math, but appeared to give up before he arrived at an answer and moved on.

Sirius told him about Hermione and how she had started living at Grimmauld a few weeks prior. Sirius thought she was good for Harry, that much was obvious, and Regulus couldn’t help the warmth he felt knowing that Harry hadn’t been alone, that he’d had his friends beside him.

“Oh, we got your O.W.L. results back as well,” Sirius said, standing up to go searching for them. Regulus waved him off.

“I don’t care about that,” Regulus said.

“Not at all?” Sirius asked, slowly sitting back down.

“I think it’s irrelevant now. I mean, it’s not like I can go back to Hogwarts.”

Sirius paused. “Why not?”

“Well, I’m assuming most of them think I’m dead.”

“That’s an easy fix,” Sirius mumbled. Regulus rolled his eyes.

“Look at me,” Regulus said, gesturing to himself. Sirius looked at him quizzically, quirking up an eyebrow. “I’m too old to be a student. I’m not fifteen anymore. Or sixteen. Whatever I’m supposed to be.”

“Oh,” Sirius said quietly, and finally seemed to take him in. He looked Regulus up and down, his face growing wearier by the moment. “I hadn’t — I didn’t notice, but you’re right. You’re older. Why are you older?”

Regulus sighed. "I don't know," he said quietly. "But I don't think I'll be able to pretend to be sixteen again."

"There are ways," Sirius replied, still looking distracted, that distant look back in his eyes, "glamours and other things."

Regulus and Sirius sat together in the dense silence for a long while before Regulus remembered that they were talking about something.

"Was there anything else that you needed to update me on?" he asked.

Sirius looked like he'd just woken up, his eyes jumping around like he couldn't remember where he was for a moment. "Oh, right... I'm going to adopt Harry. Officially, I mean."

Regulus was overwhelmed with emotions so intensely that he couldn't tell one from the other, he was incapable of reacting so he just stared blankly at Sirius like an idiot.

"If you think it's a good idea," Sirius said quickly, then seemed to think better of it. "I mean, I'm going to do it either way. I think it's a good idea, and I already told Harry. Remus seemed to think —" He cut himself off, a dozen different emotions crowding in on the limited real estate of his face. Regulus wanted to ask what he meant to say, but he wasn't sure that bringing up Remus was a good idea. They seemed to be on good terms the night before, but there was no telling with those two how things would shake out day-to-day.

"Then you killed Bellatrix?" Regulus prompted.

Sirius looked relieved for the change of subject and immediately dove into explaining his intricate plan — his words, not Regulus's. He didn't describe how she died, only that she was dead and that he didn't use magic, which Regulus found worrying. What did he do to her exactly? He knew better than to ask.

He didn't know how to feel about Bellatrix dying. He was always afraid of her when he was a child, she was much older than him and always seemed intimidating, so larger than life even before the cruelty set in. He agreed that she needed to die, there was no other option after she tried to kill Sirius, but it felt strange to discuss it so remorselessly.

"Do you think we could get into her vault now that she's gone?" Regulus asked, waiting for the guilt or perhaps sadness to set in, but it never came.

"I hadn't thought about it, but I doubt it. I think her vault will just go to her husband. If he died too, and his brother, then I might be able to lay claim to it. I'd have to check with the goblins though."

Regulus slumped in his chair. Rodolphus, like many other Death Eaters that had been at the Department of Mysteries, was currently locked up in Azkaban.

"What are you thinking?"

"I'm thinking that it's going to be exceptionally difficult to kill Rodolphus and Rabastan given their current home," Regulus said unhappily.

Sirius's eyes widened slightly, but he was quick to hide his surprise. "What's made you so keen on murder?" Sirius asked, obviously only half joking.

Regulus froze. He hadn't yet thought about the murder he committed before dying. He didn't regret it, that he knew without having to evaluate it, but he hadn't thought about it in detail. He wasn't sure that he wanted to. The knowledge of what he was capable of, to kill without contrition, and in such a brutal way. He didn't think he would ever share what he had done with another person. He didn't want anyone to know, not about the murder, nor the feelings of hunger he'd experienced in the split moment afterward.

"Tell me again about the conversation you heard between Lucius and Narcissa," Regulus asked.

Sirius shook his head slightly but did tell him, recounting the conversation quickly. "What do you think it means?"

Regulus couldn't respond right away, running over the conversation in his head until it was like a dull buzzing in the back of his mind.

"Regulus," Sirius said, waving his hand in front of Regulus's eyes. "What is it?"

"I need to talk to Dumbledore," he said quietly.

"About Draco?" Sirius asked. Regulus nodded. "Okay, we'll contact him."

"I am not surprised often, in my old age, but I have to admit, I was not expecting to see you again," Dumbledore said when he arrived at Grimmauld an hour later.

Harry still hadn't made an appearance though it was late afternoon. Hermione was in the library reading, and though she made sure to greet Regulus, she seemed to understand that he needed time to deal with things. Remus, however, was nowhere to be found. Regulus wondered if Sirius had gone to speak with him. He asked to talk to Dumbledore alone, which Sirius unwillingly agreed to.

"Yes," Regulus agreed, though Dumbledore hadn't exactly asked a question. "Now, what I called you here about." Dumbledore's lips twitched just slightly, his eyes sparkling. "What do you know about the Malfoys?"

Dumbledore frowned. "I know that Lucius has returned to Voldemort's side. Harry and the others said they encountered him at the Department of Mysteries, though he was gone before the Aurors arrived."

"Yes, Draco left with him," Regulus said. "He came with me to help Harry."

Dumbledore raised his eyebrows. "Draco was there to assist Harry?"

"I know it sounds strange, given everything, but he's not a bad kid. He's just..."

“I understand,” Dumbledore said solemnly. “He is not the first to be pulled in by his family, and I doubt he will be the last.”

“The Dark Lord plans to Mark him if he hasn’t already.”

“How do you know this?”

“That’s irrelevant,” Regulus said. “I just know and we need to help him.”

“I see. How do you suggest we do that?” Dumbledore asked in a measured voice.

“I don’t know!” Regulus snapped, urgency making him anxious. “We need to pull him out, bring him here or something. We can protect him.” He wondered if he should have just asked Kreacher to do it. However, the thought of speaking to the elf made him feel mildly ill.

“You believe you could convince him to stay?” Dumbledore asked carefully.

Regulus thought about the way Draco’s eyes seemed to linger on Harry, the way he put himself in danger just to make sure he was safe. He could be an awful little brat, but he genuinely cared about Harry. That much was clear. “Yes, I could convince him to stay.”

“Even without his parents. They will be punished if he leaves and abandons the Death Eaters.”

That gave Regulus pause, not just because it was true — Narcissa and Lucius may very well be killed if Draco escaped — but because the way Dumbledore phrased it made it seem like he’d already gone over this as if he was reenacting a conversation he’d already had.

“You already know all of this, don’t you?” Regulus asked, shooting Dumbledore a suspicious glare.

“You are not the only one with sources within the Death Eaters,” Dumbledore replied evasively.

“Snape,” Regulus realized. Dumbledore didn’t nod, but it was clear that’s who he was talking about. “What if Narcissa and Lucius left with Draco?”

“You called, Headmaster,” Snape said suddenly, arriving in the kitchen at exactly the right moment, as if he’d been listening at the door.

“Ah, Professor Snape. Apt timing as always,” Dumbledore said cheerfully. Snape wasn’t listening though. He was staring at Regulus in mild surprise — practically a look of horrified shock on anyone else. “Quite a surprise, I know.”

It didn’t take long to get Snape up to speed, but the look of mild surprise never left his face. Finally, once he was caught up, he said, “Narcissa would never agree to come here. She doesn’t trust us.”

“But she wants Draco to be safe, surely she has to know that’s what we can offer,” Regulus responded.

“Perhaps she might have felt that way prior to Bellatrix’s death, but now...” Snape shrugged condescendingly. Regulus gave him a suspicious look, trying to figure out if he knew how Bellatrix had died, if he knew who had killed her. If Snape knew, then did Dumbledore? Regulus wasn’t willing to bring it up regardless.

“Draco will have to come to us on his own,” Dumbledore said.

“That’s not good enough,” Regulus responded. “He’s just a kid, and he’s got to be scared. If the Dark Lord marks him, then he might feel like he has no other options.”

“We could still offer him shelter if he asked for it,” Dumbledore added, though Regulus could tell his heart wasn’t in it. Though he clearly felt bad for Draco, it wasn’t enough to go to lengths to save him. The thought made him angry but yelling at Dumbledore wouldn’t help anyone.

“It doesn’t matter what’s possible if he doesn’t know,” Regulus said evenly. “With the Mark —”

“The Mark is irrelevant,” Dumbledore responded.

“It’s not,” Regulus interrupted. “It won’t feel like that to him.” He turned to look at Snape. “Is there a way to convince the Dark Lord not to mark him?”

“I cannot change the Dark Lord’s mind,” Snape said.

“What is he asking of Draco?” Regulus asked. Snape’s eyes flicked over to Dumbledore, so quickly that Regulus thought he might have imagined it.

“I don’t know,” Snape lied.

“It’s something that requires him to go back to Hogwarts, right?” Regulus guessed. Snape shrugged, but that was answer enough. “Maybe... maybe if he believes Draco can do a better job without a detectable Mark, then he will let him go another year without it.”

“Would that have worked when he marked you?” Snape asked. Regulus flinched.

“No,” Regulus said. “My family wasn’t in good standing after Sirius ran away.”

“And you believe the Malfoys are?”

“I know they’re not, but I was never given a task. If Draco is trying to accomplish something, then the Mark can only hurt him. Please, you have to try.”

Snape gave him a long blank look, and Regulus could only hope that behind his empty eyes, he was considering it.

“It might be possible, but it might not,” Snape said.

“When does he plan to mark him?”

“Soon,” Snape said quickly.

There wasn’t much else to say, and Snape left before Dumbledore, so Regulus did not get a chance to speak with him alone. He doubted he would at all until school was back in session given Snape’s undercover status. Dumbledore clearly wanted to ask Regulus something, probably related to how he managed to come back to life, but he left without doing so.

He wanted to do more for Draco, but he didn’t know what he could do.

If he had Kreacher kidnap Draco, then there was always the possibility that Draco would run and tell the Dark Lord, then they would all be dead. Or he would stay and choose people he barely knew over his parents who would die for his betrayal.

He could get Kreacher to bring him temporarily, or take Regulus there — if their wards even still allowed Kreacher to go in and out, which Regulus seriously doubted — so that they could speak but that would just put Draco at risk. The Dark Lord was a skilled Legilimens, and Regulus doubted that Draco had the Occlumency skills to keep him out.

It felt like watching himself take the Mark all over again, he was helpless to stop it and could do nothing except go through the motions waiting for the Sword of Damocles to fall on his neck. He was wallowing about it in the empty kitchen when Sirius found him.

“Did you figure things out with Dumbledore? Are you going back to school?” Sirius asked as he walked past where Regulus was sitting and headed over toward the stove.

“Huh?” Regulus asked. “No, that wasn’t what I was talking to him about. Why did you think that? I said that I was talking to him about Draco.”

Sirius shrugged, flicking the stove on. “I figured he would have a solution to the whole being-too-old problem. Not to mention the everyone-thinks-you’re-dead problem. He could probably help out with that.”

Regulus rolled his eyes. “I had more important things to discuss with him than whether I would be in attendance for sixth year,” he said dismissively. “There is no use going back anyway, I can do more good here.”

“You’re not going back to Hogwarts?” Harry asked, sounding devastated. Regulus hadn’t noticed him opening the kitchen door, but he was standing there now.

“Harry,” Regulus said, grinning instantly, though it faltered when Harry’s eyes welled with tears. “What’s wrong?”

“Is it because of me?” Harry said miserably.

“Is what because of you?” Regulus asked frantically, standing up so that he could walk toward Harry, but Harry took a step back.

“Because of what I did. Because it’s my fault you died. Is that why you’re not going back to school?” Harry asked. Sirius had frozen in place by the stove, and Regulus could feel him watching the exchange.

“Harry, no —”

But Harry was already gone, barreling up the stairs, back to his bedroom. Regulus watched him go, feeling helpless.

“What was that about?” Regulus asked, his chest tight with worry.

Sirius cringed slightly. “It’s been a really hard summer.”

“Harry,” Regulus called, knocking softly on his bedroom door.

Sirius hadn’t been kidding about how hard Harry had taken his death, not that he thought he was, but it was just unexpected to see Harry’s grief so clearly splayed out in front of him. Regulus didn’t quite understand how Harry’s guilt had convinced him to take Regulus not returning to Hogwarts as a personal failing on Harry’s part, but obviously, that’s what had happened. It made Regulus feel sick when he thought about it.

“I’m going to go talk to him,” Regulus had said to Sirius when Harry left the room.

“Go easy on him,” Sirius responded, turning away to look at the stove again.

“Why do you assume I’m going to be hard on him? I’m never hard on him.”

Sirius shrugged. “I don’t know. He’s sensitive.”

“I know him better than you do,” Regulus mumbled, so quiet that he was sure Sirius couldn’t hear him.

“Harry,” Regulus repeated when Harry didn’t respond. He knocked again, harder this time. “Can I come in?”

There was a long pause, and then Harry’s muffled voice came through the closed door. “Yeah.”

Regulus opened the door slowly, unsure of what he would find, but Harry was just sitting on the side of the bed, his sock-covered feet hanging off and kicking slightly. His eyes were rimmed red, but he wasn’t actively crying.

“Hey,” Harry said softly.

“Can we talk?” Regulus asked. He felt like he was standing on the edge of a cliff, unsure of how to proceed.

“Yeah,” Harry said, though he shrugged like it didn’t matter to him either way. “I’m sorry about earlier. It’s fine if you don’t want to go back to Hogwarts.” He looked down at his feet, kicking them twice before freezing.

Regulus frowned and came to sit next to Harry on the bed. He sighed. “It’s not because of you,” Regulus said. “I’m not upset with you, Harry. Not even a little bit.”

Harry’s body tensed, and his breathing cut off like he couldn’t trust himself with oxygen. He didn’t look at Regulus. His eyes didn’t sway from where they were glued to his feet. His glasses were smudged like he hadn't been taking care of them, and it was difficult to make out his expression behind them. Regulus waited impatiently for Harry to speak again.

"How can you not be?" Harry whispered, quiet as the summer wind blowing lightly against the windows. "It's my fault."

"It's Bellatrix's fault," Regulus countered. He exhaled sharply when Harry didn't respond. "You made a mistake when you left Hogwarts without waiting for me to get back, but I don't blame you for doing what you did. I love Sirius too, though I'd appreciate it if you didn't tell him that, and if I truly thought he was in danger then I would have done anything to keep him alive."

Harry's breath hitched, but he didn't make another sound. His lips didn't so much as twitch at Regulus's pathetic joke.

"You have to remember that you didn't go there based on nothing. The Dark Lord and his followers have been working against you. A group of grown men and women were trying specifically to trick you."

"But you figured it out," Harry said, his voice rough and scratchy, "didn't you? You knew that Sirius wasn't actually in danger, that we could have just waited or sent Aurors or something."

"Yes, but I had more information than you did. There was no way you could have known what I did." Regulus knocked their shoulders together, hoping that Harry would look up at him, but his eyes stayed resolutely glued to his feet.

"Then why aren't you going back to school? If you're not mad at me." Harry added the caveat like he didn't believe it. Regulus wondered if Harry was just waiting for the other shoe to drop, if he was waiting for him to finally show his anger.

"I'm too old," Regulus explained. Harry did look up then, a confused look on his face.

"Weren't you always too old to be at school with me?"

Regulus let out a shocked laugh. "Yes, I suppose you're right about that," Regulus said. "But before I at least looked the part. I've aged though. I don't look sixteen anymore."

Harry gave him a once-over. He nodded like he was accepting Regulus's reason, his cheek twitching slightly. Regulus forced himself not to slump in defeat. Harry wasn't asking him to go back, not explicitly, but he could see that no matter how many times he said it, Harry would still believe that he was at fault, and would still think that Regulus blamed him.

"You'll probably have more fun this year if I'm not around," Regulus said. Harry looked offended. "What? Having an adult living in your dorm hasn't been keeping you from the freedom of Hogwarts?"

"No, it hasn't," Harry said immediately, firmly. "Not that I have anything to compare it to," he muttered, "you've always been there. I don't know anything else."

“Maybe it’ll be a good thing then,” Regulus said.

“But what about everyone else? What will they think when you don’t come back?” Harry asked. He sounded like he was trying to feign disinterest, but there was a whining in his voice that tugged at Regulus's chest.

“Your friends know I’m alive, and they’ll see me on breaks.”

“My friends?” Harry asked loudly.

“Erm, yeah,” Regulus said, confused.

“They’re your friends too!” Regulus chuckled sadly, intent on disagreeing, but Harry must have seen it on his face. “Ron stole from Sirius and broke into the Ministry to bring you back. Hermione helped him. How can you say they’re not your friends?”

“They did those things for you, Harry, not for me,” Regulus said gently.

“They did it for both of us,” Harry snapped, jumping to his feet. “And I think you abandoning them because you think you’re too old for Hogwarts is a poor way of repaying them.”

“I am too old for Hogwarts.”

“That’s irrelevant,” Harry said.

“Oh, of course they will,” Harry said sarcastically. “What about m—” He cut off with a sound of frustration. “Whatever. Just do whatever you want.”

“Harry —”

“I don’t think I want to talk anymore today,” Harry said, stomping into his bathroom and slamming the door shut behind him, leaving Regulus in the empty bedroom. He was shocked to see such explosive anger coming from Harry, especially since it was directed at him.

He waited a bit to see if Harry would reemerge from his bathroom, but it quickly became clear that Harry wasn’t coming back. Or at the very least was waiting for Regulus to leave before he came back. He left the room and thought about going downstairs to update Sirius, or maybe try to figure out what to do, but decided against it. He couldn’t believe it was still his first day, it had felt so long already.

He walked to his bedroom, feeling tired and stressed, hoping that he might find some peace there, but instead, he felt like he was being entombed. His bedroom had sat empty as a hallmark to his life after both of his deaths. When he returned the first time, he felt like he was a living ghost, floating through an empty house, searching for meaning which he found by seeking Harry out and trying to keep him safe.

Now, he sensed that directionless feeling again, inching into his conscious thoughts like morning fog drifting in to obscure the day. He huffed and threw himself onto his bed. He hadn't thought about what his life meant or why he was back the first time around. He wanted to keep James's son alive, to keep him safe, out of loyalty and love for James. He'd done his best, but he couldn't be sure that he'd really helped all that much.

What would be his purpose now? Where could he go from here that would give him purpose? Beyond killing the Dark Lord, there was no other goal that could satiate him. After the Dark Lord was dead — and Regulus hoped that that would happen soon — what would become of him?

Although he could feel his body, and the small bits of pain that still lingered there, he still felt like he was trapped beyond the veil, floating through nothingness, nonexistent. He wondered if it would have been better had he not returned. It all felt insurmountable, and he didn't know where to go from here.

He thought about Harry. Harry had been changed, fundamentally, from the boy that Regulus had once known. That young boy that Regulus met in first year was long gone, structurally reborn from guilt and grief. It was like when Regulus had been forced to take the Mark, when he talked himself into believing that it was the right move, that it was what he wanted, and then James left him because of it. He was never the same after that. A hole was carved in his soul, hollowing him out and turning him into a shell of himself.

The same thing had happened to Harry, and though Regulus had been given an absurd turn of luck and was alive once again, Harry would never forget the way his guilt had eaten him alive. Regulus couldn't help thinking of Draco too, poor Draco, left alone with the responsibility of his family on his shoulders. Would he ever be the same after this summer? Regulus doubted it.

How did his return help either of them? How did it help Ron or Hermione? Even Sirius didn't seem to need him. He had moved on after Regulus died. At least, to the best of his ability. Though murder wasn't typical in most cycles of grief, Regulus imagined, Sirius had still found a way to move forward.

He was adopting Harry. That news felt good to hear, but at the same time, there was something sour about it. It was almost like jealousy that this monumental moment between Harry and Sirius had happened when Regulus was gone. He was sad that he had missed it and even more upset that it would be tainted by his death.
